Well! She could only say his talk had absolutely no fascination for her. It made her think of Gwrgi talking to Blackie. In his tipsiness the handsome fool was just thinking aloud — and what muddled thoughts — not a single clear-cut, definite, lucid idea among them.

"It's only," he was saying now, "what I've been telling everybody for years, only nobody would listen. What's happening is simply what I've always said would happen. The age of our Brythonic glory is over — simply, naturally, and quite properly over. Why shouldn't it be? Isn't the glory of Rome over? Listen, Brochvael! Your friend Sidonius may pretend his Bishops of Rome are carrying on the Roman Empire. I tell you whatever they're doing — and heaven knows what they're doing — they're not doing that. Rome's done for, though I hate to tell you so, Euronwy" — and he made his wife one of his mocking bows— "and our New Rome on the Bosporus only lives, and will only live, even though Anastasius does recanonize our Pelagius — like the Blessed Bran at Harlech — as a Caput Mortuum! Every race has its Golden Age and then — ashes and dust!

"'All flows away,' as your son used to quote from somewhere, brother, 'and nothing abides.' The Modrybedd with their precious Derwydd are treating with the Saxons. Well! What of it? I would treat with the Saxons myself, as Gortheyrn Gortheneu did when Hengyst cried 'wasseil!' and 'drincheil!,' if they'd offer me — you must pardon me, beautiful niece!" — and this time he made his mocking bow to Morfydd— "such a bribe as from all accounts the girl Ronwen must have been! No, hear me out, brother; for though I talk like this, I've learnt my lesson and shall obey orders from now on. You'll say the forest people have had their 'Golden Age' too? Well, listen now to me, children all! The forest people have never had a 'Golden Age,' and never will. They're beyond it, like me; or beneath it, like Iscovan y Bychan! They don't want it anyway, and that's why we can't — why nobody ever will — really conquer them.

"All this business of their poisoned arrows and their Derwydd bringing them back to life and their giants from the mountains feeding on corpses is all foam on the surface. Their life, brother, is deeper than all that. They've always known — as our mother used to say when this mad Gorsant first came to trouble us — what we simple Brythons think was first revealed in Asia Minor in the year one! It was revealed in Africa, brother, in the year twenty thousand before Christ!"

He stopped suddenly and swung round. He had heard the shrill voice of his latest enchantress. Morfydd laid her hand hurriedly on her father's mantle. Euronwy and she exchanged a quick glance. The torch bearers turned their heads; and, as they turned, the flames they carried flickered wildly from face to face.

The prince paused as he moved away and said gravely and seriously and with a wave of his hand: "As I told you, Brochvael, I'll do in this matter whatever you decide. Euronwy will speak for our son. Morfydd will no doubt" — he gave his wife a mocking bow— "speak for him too. But from now on I'll meddle with none of you. What you" — and taking by its blade the broken sword from beneath his arm he offered the massive cross handle to his brother— “decide is best for me to do, I’ll do. What that mad counsellor is to Arthur you shall be to me, old friend. It’s a pity — and I’ve always known it — that you weren’t the first born! But since you’re not, the prince’s counsellor is what you are from now on! By my father’s head, you look the part, with that mystic cloak and Gallic staff! Hang up the sword in its place, brother, and tell me the cyngor of the counsellor over the mead tonight. No, stay here, you!” — this was to one of the torch bearers— “the ladies and the counsellor will want all the light they can get!”

His departure, along with that of all his followers save the one solitary torch bearer, had a bad effect on Morfydd’s nerves. Much as she despised him, she felt more at ease and for some odd reason safer while he and his mockery were the dominant element. Now that she was thrown back on herself she suddenly felt as if a powerful natural force, whose very waywardness was a support to her, had been removed. While the prince was there she had become a mischievous child again. She felt an impulse to behave like that wild Gwyddyl-Ffichti girl and cry out before them all: “Tell him to come back! I must have him back!”

The chapel itself seemed to miss that irresponsible and glittering presence. Something more than one of the torches was gone. The place had suddenly grown ghostly and cold, full of solemn vows and ominous finalities.

But she must pull herself out of this. She must think clearly and act decisively. She must get back her pride, her spirit! She must once more be the Morfydd she knew, the Morfydd who could face reality alone and unafraid. Her father was speaking to her now and Euronwy had her hand on her arm.

"Hold my staff, girl, will you?" Brochvael was saying and placing it in her hands he took the torch from the torch bearer who was evidently ill at ease and bade him be gone. Then holding the light clumsily above their three heads while its oil dripped on the stones and the flame grew dusky with smoke, he fumbled with the sword so as to get its injured point wrapped in the folds of his mantle.

Then Euronwy said, "Morfydd and I have been thinking, Brochvael, and we feel that the time has come—"

But something about her father's fumblings with the torch and sword had roused in Morfydd an absolute necessity for finding a mind as clear-cut and practical as her own; and she interrupted brusquely, and with a voice of almost harsh authority.

"We must go straight to your father, Lady, to Porius Manlius. He is the one to help us decide what to say to the prince." Then she turned to her father. "I know Porius ab Einion well enough," she said, "to have the right to speak for him, and I am certain" — while she spoke she was helping her father to adjust the sword under the mantle and lift the torch, whose smoke by this time was getting into all their eyes, into a perpendicular position— "that he wouldn't like us to decide anything, or advise the prince to decide anything, until we'd consulted Porius Manlius Patricius."

Pulling her own cloak as neatly as she could round both herself and the silver-tipped staff of Claudianus, she turned back now to Euronwy and respectfully rearranged the priestesslike folds of her robe.

"Shall we go at once to his room?" she enquired of the older woman. And it was then that it became her destiny to be the astonished recipient of the first gesture of impassioned gratitude that the Lady of the Gaer had had ever made to any woman of Edeyrnion. For, as Brochvael, moving forward in submission to his daughter's will, muttered wearily without turning his head or raising his voice, “While Rome’s still a name, we Brythons will cling to that name,” the shadow thrown backwards by the torch he was carrying swept both the women into darkness; and in this darkness Euronwy snatched at the cold fingers with which the girl was holding Claudian’s staff, and for one desperate moment pressed them, staff and all, against her love-starved lips.

CHAPTER XII. Porius Manlius

IT HAD BEEN FOR SOME years the custom of Porius Manlius to take his dinner alone in the chamber which had been his since his first coming to Mynydd-y-Gaer. Aulus brought up this repast to his old master from the kitchen and respectfully waited upon him while he partook of it, which he did in the traditional manner of his ancestors, reclining on his bed.

This bed, brought from the Villa Nova Praeneste, was supported upon four bronze feet, each designed in the shape of an eagle's claws grasping an orb. It was covered with a mattress and a pile of rugs and several cushions; and before the evening meal, which these two old men continued to call the cena, it was the duty of the ex-centurion to tilt up the bed an inch or two on the side furthest from the table by means of small blocks of wood placed beneath its feet.

The table itself was a little lower than the edge of the bed, and the effect of this tilt was to give the latter a convenient incline towards the former so that the old man, with his left elbow supported on a couple of cushions, could feed himself with his right hand.

In addition to giving his master's bed its appropriate slant, Aulus had to remove at dinnertime certain objects which impeded the spreading of the cloth. These objects which the ex-centurion crowded together on the portion of the table that was left uncovered consisted of a small statue of Fors Fortuna, which from its chaste and benign aspect, in spite of its origin in his pagan home, the old man had come to associate in his mind with the Mother of Jesus; an old-fashioned writing tablet; an antique incense tray, used only on certain particular feast days, for Porius Manlius was an austere Christian, to waft his homely piety to the throne of grace; and finally a few leather-bound volumes, the contents of which would have held small attraction either for Morfydd or her father.

Over the portion of the table, thus left clear for his master's cena, Aulus would spread a spotlessly white cloth; nor did he ever neglect to bring, along with this tablecloth, an equally spotless napkin, a silver bowl of fresh water, and several elegant spoons.

This last refinement from Uriconium, for none of the equites ever lifted their dishes to their lips, would have been impossible at the Gaer save for the respect throughout kitchen and scullery in which old Aulus was held.

Not a spoon disappeared. Sceptics maintained that this was due to fear of ill luck. But even the most sceptical seemed unwilling to try experiments.

On the evening of the nineteenth of October, more than twenty-four hours after the departure of his namesake with his precious water bottle, Porius Manlius, his repast over and the cloth removed, was enjoying, in punctilious sips from his army tin cup, his evening pint of red wine. The silver wine flagon from which this small cup was replenished was always carefully placed by Aulus midway between the statuette of the goddess of luck and the bronze incense tray, both of which were returned to their former stations, whereas it was the destiny of the books and the writing tablet to remain in exile until the wine was finished.

This event occurred every night just twice as soon as might have been expected owing to the fact that, though to make him sit down was impossible — for the only furniture in the room save the bed and the table was a tall lamp stand at one end of the bed and a capacious metal chest at the other — the old man insisted that Aulus, who was expected to bring with him his campaigning cup, should drink an equal portion of the wine.

What had made Euronwy select this chamber for her father was not merely its remoteness from the rest of the Gaer with which it was only connected by a long reed-thatched passage just inside the western wall, but also the fact that it had a balcony. The only window it contained was consequently the not very closely fitting upper portion of the thick wooden shutter opening on to this balcony, where had been inserted another civilized luxury, almost equal to the spoons, in the shape of an iron hinge.

"I hope," Porius Manlius was now remarking to his upright attendant, who stood gravely regarding him with his head a little bent and his tin cup in his hand, "I hope our young man hasn't forgotten in all these disturbances to fill my water flask."

"He is a good youth and a dutiful," replied the other.

They both raised their cups and drained them in simultaneous gulps.

"Is the fire all right?" enquired the Patrician.

Aulus reverently put down his cup on the extreme edge of the table so that it shouldn't obtrude its battered military presence in too close proximity to the chaste Fortuna, swung round as starkly as if fully armed and went over to a small brazier in the centre of the room raised on a couple of unpolished stones.

"It'll last till you're asleep, most honourable. But if it please you, I'll put on a small log."

"No, no, let it alone. We shall want all the wood they can spare us when the frosts begin. Do you remember, Aulus, that winter at the Villa when you and I had to sleep in the hall and my daughter in the kitchen?"

"And you told me, most honourable, about your illustrious grandfather, and how, when the barbarians invaded his house, he swam to an island and lived for a month in the stern of a stranded ship feeding on shellfish and tame sea birds and crabs."

“Aulus, tell me this. Tell me honestly what you think — no! fill them equally! — what you think yourself about all these rumours and counter-rumours?”

Both the aged men lifted their tin cups to their lips; and they did so with movements so exactly alike — an outward movement, a perpendicular movement, and a recessive movement — that they resembled the performance of a traditional drill.

Then, having drained the greater portion of the cups’ contents into which the last dregs of the silver goblet had been poured, they shook the remaining drops upon the stones in the direction of the balcony as if pouring a libation to a Presence in the upper air who was at once the Mother of the Elements and the Mother of God.

“My opinion, honestissimus?” asked the centurion in some surprise.

The one who reclined on the bed nodded.

“I am really to tell your honourableness what I think?”

“You are, Aulus.”

“I think, then, that the sooner a reliable messenger hastens to Brother John’s cell the better for us all.”

“With orders, you mean.”

“Naturally, most honourable, with orders from yourself.”

“Orders to whom?”

“Orders to Princeps Porius and that Greek idolater who goes about with him. I beg your pardon, honestissimus, I spoke as the kitchen speaks! I know he’s your son-in-law’s nephew; but I know too that if the ladies of the Giant’s Cave had their will, he and not Porius would be the next Prince of Edeyrnion. They’ve no laws, these people, no customs, no traditions! All they care for are poisoned arrows, magic cauldrons, and raising the dead.”

“Orders to do what?”

"To remain at their post, to remain where they are, throughout the night."

"And to keep careful watch, turn by turn?"

"Turn by turn, as your honourableness says, till they get further orders."

"But whom could we send? That is, of course, if my son-in-law took this advice?"

"He will take it. Make no mistake, most honourable."

"But he's never taken it before, and we have so often discussed plans of action for him. Sometimes — for we are getting old, Aulus — we may, I mean my daughter may, have even omitted to inform him of our decisions."

"My Lady and the Lady Morfydd were together this afternoon, and my Lady took her to the chapel. I won't trouble you, most honourable, with kitchen gossip; but I have reason to believe that the prince has never been more in need of advice than he is tonight — or more ready to listen to it."

"But whom could we send?" repeated Porius Manlius.

Aulus went to the door which opened into the reed-thatched tunnel that led to the hall and the chapel and the eastern gate. He opened the door a few inches and listened intently. From far down the long dark passage there reached his ears the sound of voices, a sound that started such a long sequence of thoughts in his mind that he waited there, pondering.

"It must be the lady herself bringing them all to see her father and to beg him to save them! That's how it happened when that bandit, Iscovan the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, burnt fifteen villages of the forest people. The forest people came near to revolting when they were told they had to fight against the Gwyddyl-Ffichti; and they would have done so too if the prince's brother hadn't married Kymeinvoll. And now they're in revolt again, and I know what they're up to. They're going to make a princeps of that idolatrous son of Alarch filia Iddawc in place of young Porius! I know their tricks; and what I know my master knows!"

"Aulus?"

"Adsum! I am here, most honourable," and softly closing the door he re-entered the chamber.

"You expect visitors here, my friend?"

"They are on the way, most honourable; not the prince but the Lady Euronwy and the blessed Jesus knows who else! They are frightened. They are coming to us because they're frightened. I heard the Lady Morfydd's voice."

He moved nearer to the bed where the Patrician lay in unruffled calm. Aulus had never respected his master more.

"Any one of these tricky islanders," he thought, "never mind from which of their curst tribes, would have been furious with me for not hurrying him through his dinner and giving him time to prepare his speech."

The two old men regarded each other gravely.

"Whom could we advise them to send to give those boys their orders?"

He had asked the centurion this question before; and now in his knowledge of the man he anticipated his response correctly.

"I would go myself."

"You, Aulus? On foot? But how would you get back?"

"In the same manner as I went! I would follow the method you yourself taught us when we hunted the bandit Iscovan over hill and dale. I'm not inexperienced, most honourable, in the tactics of colonial war. And I remember what you used to tell our scouts were the methods practised by Caius Julius in Gaul."

At this there did flit for a second across the clean-shaven countenance at the head of the tilted bed a look that might have been taken as a military substitute for a smile. But all he said was, "You'd better remove the props now, Aulus."

The ex-centurion went hurriedly round the bed and bent down between it and the wall.

"I'll get up," said Porius Manlius considerately.

When the props were taken away and the bed lowered and pushed back close to the wall, Aulus completed this part of his task by rearranging the rugs and cushions so as to afford comfortable seats for several persons. Then, placing the empty flagon and cups on the top of the metal chest, he proceeded to light all the five other oil wicks of the branching lamp stand from the one that was already burning.

That done, and with a quick glance at his master to make sure that the folds of the faded pallium hung properly from the old man's shoulders, he hurried to the door at which the visitors had already knocked and outside of which they had been holding a low-toned colloquy.

The centurion stood aside as they entered; but while they were exchanging courtesies with his master he took from Morfydd her father's precious staff, and from Brochvael the broken sword of Cunedda, and proceeded with scrupulous respect to balance the former against the bare wall and the latter against the embossed chest.

Euronwy could see, directly they came in, what a relief it was to her parent to find her brother-in-law rather than her husband crossing his threshold. Dutifully embracing the old man and commending Aulus for the neatness of the chamber, she might have seemed to the statue of Fors Fortuna an enlarged and modernized image of itself.

Knowing her father as no one else in the world, including even her dead Brythonic mother, had ever known him, Euronwy had not the faintest misgiving as to his reception of his new granddaughter. Like most old Roman officials Porius Manlius was especially partial to well-behaved young women, and there was something — she recognized this only too clearly — about the girl that endeared her, as by an immediate magnetic contact, to formidable grey-haired men.

But their impassioned covenant in the chapel, witnessed by Christ and Rhitta Gawr, must be kept at all costs; and so she forced herself to look on with a smile while her father kissed the daughter of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles tenderly on the forehead and even while he made a stiff little joke about youth and age and the two Poriuses, in the stately manner of a Roman ambassador doing honour to an Asiatic queen.

She was not even surprised, for the Manlii had been proconsuls for hundreds of years in all the three continents, when the old man began a series of quaintly elaborate manoeuvres to obtain a chance of speaking to Brochvael alone. To these manoeuvres she yielded so willingly that it was not long before she and Morfydd were more conveniently than comfortably settled, for the cushions were by no means swansdown, with their feet drawn up beneath them and their backs to the wall, upon the Patrician's bed; while Brochvael had been steered to a low wooden bench fixed in the angle between the lamp holder and the chest and quite out of their hearing.

Here the two fathers fell at once into a grave colloquy, the elder explaining to the younger without preamble or circumlocution the importance of Porius ab Einion remaining at Saint Julian's Fount.

Brochvael found himself more relieved than he expected by the massive shrewdness of this old man who belonged, he reflected, to the generation of his own parents and who would when Morfydd married Porius be his daughter's grandfather. He found himself too, in spite of the shocks he had received that day, in spite of all his nervous apprehensions, not a little amused by the spontaneous ease with which he sank back, just as the great Cunedda had done, into alliance with, and dependence upon, the power and competence of Rome.

"You're sure the prince was correct," the old soldier was soon enquiring, "in saying that the boy would be back before the end of dinner?"

"The prince and I heard it together," whispered Brochvael eagerly. "I was coming back from the Giant's Cave when I met him. He was going to tell them what he'd learnt of the situation — tell them first, my Lord Manlius, tell them before he told me or you or even his own wife! And as we were talking, and he was showing me, you know his way, how he had broken the point of Cunedda's sword" — here Brochvael made a motion of his head towards the weapon— "a young Gwyddyl-Ffichti lad, I forget his name, who had been skulking after the prince through the forest appeared with a message from Porius ab Einion written by Brother John himself on a page torn from a psalter.

"The prince threw it away or I'd show it to you; but it announced that Porius ab Einion and Rhun ap Gwrnach would be back in time for the end of dinner. That of course means before the drinking begins. The prince, whose Latin is poor, found the Brother's script hard to decipher.

"I doubt if he could have read it at all — though it was addressed to him. I told him at once how far things had gone and how dangerous the situation was; and for once he was roused and a little, not very much but I really do think a little, ashamed. He still refuses to take any initiative, though. That, he says, he leaves to his wife and to you and me. That's really why we've come to ask your advice. My daughter said at once, 'We must go to Porius Manlius!'"

There was an intense silence in the west chamber of Mynydd-y-Gaer. Then Aulus began gravely pacing up and down in front of the door, as though these treacherous rebels against Rome's right to give rivers and mountains, forests and wildernesses, to whom she pleased might at any moment come swarming with their poisoned javelins through every part of the Gaer.

Porius Manlius rose stiffly to his feet. “The moment seems to have arrived,” he said, speaking coldly and deliberately, as the agitated Brochvael rose too, “for breaking our old republican custom and for taking our children into consultation.” He had advanced halfway across the chamber and he now spoke as if he were addressing an assembly. “May I enquire of you two girls” — here Euronwy and Morfydd couldn’t resist a glance at each other— “just what on this nineteenth day of October, with the Gosgordd under arms and at our service, and the proconsular mission — if so I may term it — in considerable peril, and indeed, as I understand it, surrounded by ambuscades of indignant natives”— “He ought,” thought Brochvael, “to be wearing a toga rather than that faded Greek himation”— “just what you would suggest, since the prince sees fit to delegate the choice to us, it would be best to decide to do?”

The two women’s first response to this speech was to scramble as best they could from their not very dignified posture on the soldier’s couch and to advance hand in hand to where the old man stood.

Then Euronwy spoke quickly, pressing her companion’s fingers tightly in her own and keeping her steady gaze fixed upon her parent. “It is, Father, a moment for us to speak and I will speak plainly both to Morfydd’s father and to you. Morfydd and I feel that what the forest people need more than anything else to quell their anger is an immediate and overpowering proof that we are united among ourselves. Morfydd and my son are betrothed — well! Morfydd is ready for their marriage to be celebrated at once. I can answer for my husband. Brochvael can answer for himself. I find that Brother John of the Fount possesses priest’s orders, so that we can dispense with the services of Minnawc Gorsant and can select Brother John, and only

Brother John, to perform the ceremony. You know as well as I do, Father, that the Derwydd — Brochvael will pardon me — whom few of us have ever seen and whose existence some of us deny, decides, and he alone, the actions of the forest people. It is he who gives the signal for this holding of what here in Edeyrnion we call the Feast of the Sowing.

"Well! Nothing, I say to you, Father, nothing would please our people more, please both races among us more, than to have this marriage performed by Brother John at the Feast of the Sowing.

"But Derwydd or no Derwydd, Feast or no Feast, the marriage of these two and their marriage now — I know I'm right in this, Father — alone can save us. All the Gwyddyl-Ffichti — and there are lots of them still in the mountains and beyond the Swamp — will rally to us because of Morfydd, and that includes all the forest people with Gwyddyl-Ffichti blood and they are more, I fancy, than we always realize."

While his sister-in-law was uttering all this, Brochvael was regarding her with a mixture of admiration and astonishment. What on earth had happened that those two should stand there holding each other's hands, and that when the old Roman questioned the girl presently in his naively straightforward manner she didn't blush or display the least sign of hesitation as she confirmed what Euronwy had declared.

"But now we reach another question, my friends," Porius Manlius recommenced. "I have not" — he smiled as he spoke with a real flash of campfire amusement, for he heard his sentry's pacings suddenly cease and he knew the centurion was listening intently— "I have not to learn for the first time at this late hour that marriage and the mixing of blood is our grand modern secret for healing these tragic divisions. You will bear me out, Brochvael, when I say that at the Byzantine court the successors of Constantine let the love of women govern the empire.

“As for that Goth at Ravenna — and I think you told me yourself you had learnt this from your friend Cassiodorus — he keeps up the accurst power of his barbarians by means of his family’s marriages. But we’ve got a matter—”

He was interrupted by a far-off blast of trumpets from the watchtower over the eastern gate, a daily signal that was audible over the whole of the Gaer unless a strong west wind happened to be blowing.

Each father looked anxiously at his daughter, and the two women exchanged a startled look. Porius Manlius went on, “Your gwledd ready, eh? How long does that give you before you have to go in? Well — never mind! We’ve got to settle this matter now, even though it does mean keeping the prince and all his Gosgordd waiting. The post of danger for my grandson is clearly at the Fountain tonight, not here, when once the prince has called out the Gosgordd.

“That decision we may, I think, boldly assume will be considered by the rebels as a sign of weakness and will precipitate the crisis. What they’ll do, and my good friend who was a centurion at Castrum Deva will bear witness to the truth of an old soldier’s prediction” — here, to Aulus’s obvious satisfaction for the man jerked his right hand to his sword hilt in camp fashion and straightened his back, he indicated his retainer— “will be to attack, not us with our prince’s Gosgordd awaiting them, but the emperor’s horsemen at the Fountain whom they’ve already surrounded.” He paused and looked gravely and almost tenderly at Morfydd. “The place therefore where we need tonight our strongest and bravest, who is of course Porius ab Einion, is not here but at the Fountain.

“But Porius, though he probably won’t have left them yet, has promised to be here — his message said quite definitely ‘before the meal is over’ — in an hour or two, and thus can only be warned to remain where he is by an exceptionally rapid and experienced messenger. Who therefore is this messenger to be?" He paused once more, still looking with a frown of concern at Morfydd. Then he proceeded gravely, "Aulus here is no inexperienced—"

But Brochvael interrupted him. "I will go myself," he said. "I could find my way in pitch darkness and there'll be a half moon soon. Tell your man to replace that sword in the hall." Here he indicated the broken weapon propped against the chest, where the empty flagon and tin cups seemed at that moment to be edging away from the great cross handle.

"And you, my girl, keep an eye on my staff. Tell Einion, Euronwy, that we took your father's advice. He will agree — especially if you refrain from any mention — a restraint, sister, that I confess would be beyond my power — of that scandalous scene at the gate."

No sooner were those final words out of his mouth than he expressed by a grotesque inward suction of the lips his regret at having uttered them; and under their impact he saw her turn away from him to her father. But Porius Manlius had by this time stepped to Morfydd's side and was talking hurriedly to the girl in low gentle reassurance.

It was clear that the maid's beauty, combined with what must have struck the old man as hardly less than heroic dutifulness in this hurried marriage, had completely won that Roman heart; and for a fleeting second an icicle of jealousy shot through Brochvael's soul. And it left something behind. In the uneasy depths of his being he became aware of a minute splinter of icy loneliness.

"Yes," he thought, "if anyone's destined to perish in this crazy panic about the House of Cunedda I'm the one. But I'd like to see a boy born to Morfydd first, and that's the truth."

"Father!" Morfydd had been staring at him with large startled eyes as she listened to the old Roman; but those shocked eyes and that single cry were the only signs she made. "He knows every path through these woods," he heard Porius Manlius say. "He knows the forest people's tricks and all their jungles and swamps better than I ever knew our Uriconium textbooks of war! Aulus would willingly go. But he doesn't know the forest as your father does. And your father isn't going to fight. He isn't going even to defend himself with arms! He's going to make his way to the Fount by the quickest tracks. Even if they were to recognize him they wouldn't dare to draw their bows against him. But they won't recognize him. There'll be only the ghost of a moon, and I assure you your father will know exactly how to hide till the clouds blow across it again. You can hear the autumn wind, little maid, if you listen now! Nobody's going to shoot an arrow — poisoned or unpoisoned. I tell you as a soldier there'll be no arrow shooting tonight, not while this wind lasts and the sky's so dark."

Brochvael and Morfydd exchanged a long clinging look. Then a curious twitching of her brows took place that he knew well; and they simultaneously gave each other a little nod.

"Don't forget my staff!" he called out to her as he rushed from the chamber. His wizard's mantle, flapping behind him as he went, brushed against the old legionary's sword hilt, but the outraged Aulus remained motionless for a couple of seconds gazing at his master with an expression of dumb reproach.

Then he deliberately did what he only did when his master had not only behaved unpardonably towards an ex-centurion of the best disciplined legion north of Caerleon, but had behaved with egregious folly in a nice military dilemma. He acted independently, not necessarily contrary to, but independently of, any orders from his superior officer.

Without even glancing at the Lady of the Gaer, who now seemed in her turn to be trying to persuade Morfydd that Brochvael was in no real danger, and that the chances were strongly in favour of his reaching his ael, the Edeyrnion word for a goal, in time, he abruptly possessed himself of the broken sword and with an indignant heart went off to replace it in the banquet hall.

Meanwhile wrapping his mantle round him against the wind, Brochvael hurried out from the covered passage into the portion of the Gaer that remained open to the sky.

"I'm a fool to undertake this business," he told himself. "The gods alone know how it'll work out; but there come times to us all when we've got to be brave."

Then as the power of the southwest wind, reaching Mynydd-y-Gaer in accumulated strength, searching out the estuaries of the sea, buffeting the sides of the Cader, troubling Lake Tegid, rousing the sacred river, rustling through the treetops of the forest, caught him in its course, he felt a shiver of quite definite fear together with a faint but unmistakable thrill of exultation.

The wind prevented his thinking in words, but he thought on; and his thoughts, although expressed in long-drawn fluctuating waves of images, went wild and far, and these primeval hieroglyphs of human consciousness, trailing off in many places into animal and even vegetable awareness, would have been read by any invisible powers, inquisitive enough for such eavesdropping, as something corresponding to words like these: "Poisoned arrows on windy nights make a bad end; but all lives must end somehow and Porius will look after Morfydd if this is the end of mine."

Whether the invisible powers he always fancied as hovering about the Gaer comprehended the Homeric word "aisima," which kept bobbing up and down like a calm classical cork among the wild waves of his thought, bringing back to him a chamber on the shores of the Bosporus and its curious translation from the lips of his Byzantine host as “decency in fate,” that went floating out over the Propontic waters, he had no time to question.

But even though no god, or demon, or angel, or ghost, or elemental sprite understood the drift of his thought, even though the soul of the whole stellar world, the anima mundi itself, neither understood it nor stored it up, even though the thought perished in inconceivable annihilation, such was the effect of this rushing wind upon his dread and his exultation that for a few seconds he stood motionless.

“Though the House of Cunedda does fall,” he thought, “and though the forest people betray the emperor to Colgrim as they betrayed Iscovan y Bychan to the Romans, yes! though Roman and Brython sink together into oblivion, it still remains that the pious fury that murdered my son is always wrong, and that aisima is always right.”

CHAPTER XIII. Sibylla

AFTER SKIRTING THE HURDLED pens of the cattle and sheep which occupied the larger portion of the summit of Mynydd-y-Gaer, Brochvael arrived at the postern gate that led to the western ascent. Here he accosted in his most authoritative tone the little group of young guards, not yet changed for the night, but already on the alert for that felicitous event, and demanded from them in the name of the prince the loan of some kind of weapon.

Astonished at the request but obedient to his authority, the lads offered him with respectful eagerness an immediate choice of all they had at their disposal. He made his selection in the shape of a short boar spear, such as he could use as a substitute for the staff of Claudianus, and a sharp, dangerous-looking, double-edged dagger that he could insert into his leather belt.

Thus accoutred, and wishing the men stout stomachs for a good gwledd and an undisturbed night when the meal was over, he passed through the postern gate and went quickly down the long descent of roughly hewn steps that led to the western foot of Mynydd-y-Gaer.

Here he paused to take stock of the weather. He quickly realized that Porius Manlius had been right in his comforting words to Morfydd, for the wind was blowing up for rain, the clouds were racing across the sky, and it was only at intervals through some ragged-edged rent or quickly eclipsed gulf in the dark volume of flying vapour that the misshapen moon made herself momently visible.

"I'll avoid the river way," he thought, "and I'll avoid the way to the Mound of the Dead, and I'll avoid most of all the way to the Mound of y Bychan. Which leaves me," he decided, "unless I force a passage through the forest — and I'm not one to succeed in that — only the path to the Swamp of the Gwyddyl, and thence from the edge of the Swamp up the Avenue of the Dead as far as Pelagius's Walk, and so down the Walk to the Brother's cell."

His route thus determined he wrapped his mantle round his shoulders to free himself for running and set out at a steady trot. He was going west and thus faced the wind; but the path made so many curves and the trees were so varied in size and in their manner of growth that the wildest gusts often came against his side, and once or twice some wayward eddy even caught him from behind, causing his mantle, for only in the coldest winter did Brochvael cover his head, to flap against his skull like the ruffled feathers of a buffeted bird.

But on he jogged, muttering over and over a special invocation to "Chance, the Saviour" that tickled his fancy since it made all piety and prayer a little comical, while at the same time it left all doors of mystery so wide open that the craftiest denial of anything beyond the senses was betrayed in the utterance.

He was so incurably a man of books that all sorts of philosophic tags crossed his mind as he ran; but it wasn't long before he concentrated upon one particular among these, the head and front of them all as far as his own secret taste was concerned, though he would never have dared to reveal this preference to the late Bishop of Arverne or to the great bibliophile Cassiodorus for he'd only seen it in a fragment supposed to be by Hesiod and preserved merely for luck by a fellow traveller at sea who had shown it to him in a storm: “Give’s a good bitch; but Take’s a harpy and brings death.”

Certainly he had seldom known so many delicate death odours, whatever it was that brought them, as he inhaled that night as he ran. Scents of dead and dying vegetation came to him, scents of growths that were born of death and fed upon death, scents of funguses and leaf mould, together with the rank sour smell emerging from the Swamp of the Gwyddyl, whose murky pools and half-submerged swamp mosses were already near.

He was a little surprised that he could keep up running so long. He was surprised too that he felt so little physical or mental fear. “Body of God!” he thought, “Is it my destiny at threescore years to display heroic courage? I hope not! Ovid over a blaze of pine logs is better than a race with poisoned arrows for the sake of a broken sword!”

With only the familiar sounds of the forest about him, an owl’s hooting, the bark of a fox, and further off, in the Swamp somewhere, the howl of a wolf, he began to wonder if all this imminent danger from the Derwydd’s people weren’t after all a mirage of their imagination.

“I’ve never seen this damned Gogfran nor his brother either,” he thought, as he struggled to keep up the steady lurch of his swinging trot, “and what Einion knows or imagines he knows will go to the grave with him! How on earth have these curst Derwyddon managed to hide from us all? Or does everybody except Morfydd and me, everybody except Euronwy and her two Poriuses, know all about them? What if Einion is right and the future of us all from Lludd’s Town to the Ford of Mithras is really in the hands of our forest people? We’re humbugged by them, all of us, and that’s the truth. But save for the giants, who may all be poets’ fables, they’re the owners of the land, and as Einion said last night they can’t be defeated, for they just sink back into themselves.”

He was panting heavily now. “I’ll get as far as the Avenue,” he thought, “and then I’ll walk.” But he soon came to realize that he might have to walk before he reached the Avenue. He began to fancy that these creatures, the owl, the wolf, and the fox, that kept up their noises so regularly all round him, might not be what they seemed; might on the contrary be the calls to one another of the Derwydd’s archers anointing their arrows and stringing their bows.

He didn’t want to think of them nor to think of a fourth sound that sometimes intervened, a sound much more erratic, wayward, and irregular, concerning which he found himself deciding gravely: “It’s a sea hawk from across Lake Tegid!”

But at every plunge forward through this world of green-black dissolution, where the silence itself seemed rotting and drifting earthward in wind-tossed fragments of moss-scented decay, these noises began to prove a curious help to him. He found himself compelled by the very fall of his own feet to concentrate on certain physical aspects of the creatures that made these sounds.

He visualized, for instance, the feathery ears of the owl, the broken stumps whence the fox had lost his more serviceable teeth, the fleck of foam clinging to the wet hairs of the grey jaws of the wolf! And he found it possible by a metamorphosis, beyond any transformation imagined by his favourite poet, to confuse these objects with the rapidly overtaken patches of moss and wood sorrel into which his sandals sank as he ran; and it helped his endurance, now that his exhaustion interfered with his rational power of thought, to feel he was successfully defying these disturbing sounds by treading on them as he struggled forward.

But this fancy speedily changed, as his panting increased and his strength weakened, into the illusion that the ghost of Iddawc the Apostate was running by his side, thanking his younger son for taking the elder's place in the struggle to save their House from ruin.

Suddenly he stopped dead. The wind at this moment was blowing straight up from the Swamp of the Gwyddyl, and the smell of stagnant water astonished him by the depth of its morbidity as it had done many times before at this particular spot.

He knew by the presence of a colossal oak stump, out of which all manner of green parasitic growths sprouted and trailed, that he was within a few hundred yards of the Avenue of the Dead.

Round the next curve of the path he would come upon it, leading south to Saint Julian's Fount, and north to the Mountain of the Mothers. It was a peculiarity of Brochvael ab Iddawc — some would regard it as a weakness, others as a sign of heroic power — that what he felt at any particular moment he felt with his whole nature. At such moments his body, his soul, his reason, his nerves, became one thing; an obsessed, absorbed, and entranced thing; a thing that felt to itself as if it were as transparent as air, as penetrating as fire, as inviolable as water!

None had ever known of this peculiarity except his dead wife, Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles, and it is possible that it would have taken a Gwyddyl-Ffichti bard, perhaps y Bychan himself, for the outlaw had been no mean minstrel, to find expression for the "weak strength" or "strong weakness" of this man who hadn't a drop of Gwyddyl-Ffichti blood in him!

Thus by that familiar stump whose entangled mass of unasked-for offspring looked as black at this moment as the deepest pool of stagnant water, Brochvael found his whole nature, nervous and emotional, physical and rational, swept together in one absorbing impulse.

What produced this effect, what set him plunging down that path with a more reckless speed even than when he descended the rocky precipice from the Giant's Cave, had nothing to do with the curious smell of corruption emanating from the invisible bronze-black pools, nor had it anything to do with poisoned arrows.

It was a sound more natural to human ears than the howl of a wolf, the bark of a fox, the hoot of an owl, or the scream of a sea eagle. What made him tighten his lax hold on that un-Homeric spear till the fingers that encircled it met, what made him throw off his exhaustion like a mask torn from ear to ear, was the unmistakable sound of a woman's sobbing.

The first thing that caught his eyes when he rushed round a group of bare tree trunks was the figure of a horse, and the next thing he saw was the huddled form of the girl who was uttering these pitiful sounds. She was sitting on a fallen tree trunk clinging to the horse's bridle rein, and she heard him before he reached her, and though the moon itself was obscured by the drifting clouds and by the darkness of the trees, she knew him at once and leapt to her feet with her hand on the horse's neck.

"Arglwydd Brochvael!" she gasped; he recognized her then as the Gwyddyl-Ffichti girl whose wild cries had drawn his brother from the chapel some hours before.

"Sibylla!"

"He... was... unkind... Arglwydd Brochvael!" she sobbed. "He wouldn't let me... he said I mustn't... he said I must wait till after... he said he would send wine for me to the kitchen! Does he think he can treat me like a whore, making me hang about with the servants till he's finished drinking? He doesn't know me! None of them know me. But you, Arglwydd, have been always kind — for your lady's sake no doubt — but you've been always kind... you have a heart... but his is of stone... stone, I tell you!" And she beat her hands miserably together.

"How did you get here, Sibylla? Whose horse is this?"

"It's his! I went to his stable. I took his best one! He never rides it, but it's his best one."

"You can ride?" His breath had returned to him. His panting had ceased along with Sibylla's sobs.

"Ride, Arglwydd? I should think I could! I could ride on a stag of six antlers, like Myrddin Wyllt! But I'll let him go now. He'll find his way — they always can — back to his stable. I want to show you something — to take you somewhere, Arglwydd Brochvael! For the sake of your dead I want to; for your own sake I want to; for the Arglwyddes Morfydd's sake I want to; and for the old days at Ty Cerrig!" Sibylla uttered all this very rapidly but in a tone only a little louder than a whisper, and when she ceased Brochvael stared at her with bewildered interest.

It was too dark to see the waves of feeling that must have been crossing her face, but he felt them as acutely as if he'd been endowed with the visual apprehension of a blind man, though as to what they revealed in regard to her purpose his vision was a total blank.

She was carefully twisting the reins round the horse's neck, but he noticed nothing about the horse except that it was small and apparently light-coloured, and he contemplated what she was doing with an extremely casual and uninitiated eye. Like all the men of the House of Cunedda, Brochvael knew nothing of horses. He could just ride without falling off as long as the animal did nothing unusual, and even this was more than his father Iddawc could manage, for that sly traitor to the Roman Church never mounted a horse all the days of his life.

On this occasion, however, it only faintly surprised the son of Iddawc that the girl should be fastening the reins so carefully round the neck of the creature, and that when she gave its rump a few friendly pats and the sort of push that a child might give a dog when it has grown weary of its company, the creature trotted off lightly and easily down the very path by which he himself had so painfully run.

“Is that spear all you’ve got, Arglwydd Brochvael?” she enquired now, still keeping her voice low, but above a whisper.

He smiled in the darkness and pulled his borrowed dagger from his belt.

“Give it to me,” she said.

He hesitated, trying the thing’s point upon the knuckles of the hand with which he held his spear.

“Give it to me,” she repeated. She couldn’t see how grave his face became at this, but there was an appeal in her manner that he found impossible to resist, and reversing the weapon in his fingers he held it out to her.

She began fumbling with her clothes. “Here,” she whispered, and pulling aside her outer tunic she indicated to him the tight woollen band she wore beneath her breasts, which were childishly small and unusually wide apart, “put it in here.”

He let go his spear, encircling it with his arm, so as to have the use of both hands. Then, as tenderly and gently as he could, he made an attempt to do what she bade him, but the warmth of her body under his knuckles and the beating of her heart under that soft vest interfered with the deftness of his action.

Nor was his uneasiness lessened when a dim ray of moonlight flickering between the branches glittered on the bare blade of the dagger as it pressed against her, its point reaching to where, with only that soft vest between them, must have been the navel of her body. The idea of this was too much for him and he unceremoniously plucked out the weapon and made a move to replace it in his own belt.

"You'll be hurting yourself like that!" he muttered. "I can't let you have it."

For a second he thought she was going to struggle with him for it, but instead she addressed him in the coaxing tone of a child begging for a dangerous toy.

"Please, Arglwydd! I need it, I must have it, if I'm to show you what I've said I would!" She pulled at his wrist, not angrily or impatiently, but with that same childish coaxing air which still didn't strike him as a piece of acting or as in the least affected.

"Wait," she whispered, happy and confident in a new thought. "Wait! I'll make a sheath for it."

He let her take it from him for this bloodless purpose; and pulling up her outer tunic and using the weapon as a knife — for its edges were as sharp as its point — she expeditiously cut off a segment of her vest and wound it about the dagger, leaving only the handle free.

"Now, Arglwydd Brochvael," she whispered triumphantly, "you see how safe it is!" And before he had the heart to interfere she had replaced it under the band which zoned her body. "I could have it out bare in a flash!" she laughed, "but I can twist now in any kind of direction" — and she contorted her flexible form to show him— "without its hurting, and now you shall see what I can show you; what no one else could show you, no! not in all Edeyrnion!"

She pulled at his mantle, which in the course of this singular interview he had allowed to fall into its normal position, but he refused to move.

Sibylla saw, however, without seeing, that he was smiling at her with an amused, indulgent, and even tender smile. He ought to have known from his experience of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles that women of her race were quicker at sex divination than any others.

Even Morfydd, who resembled her Gwyddyl-Ffichti mother in certain occult perceptions, would have caught his mood at that moment, for all the darkness between them.

"But, my dear child," he whispered, as she tugged at his mantle, "I haven't told you yet what my quest is. I would be honoured — but I think you know that already — to be shown the marvel at which you hint, but I've got to reach Saint Julian's Fountain in time to stop my nephew Porius ab Einion and my other nephew Rhun ap Gwrnach from setting out tonight for the Gaer. The prince seems to have understood his son to say that they would reach the Gaer before the drinking began and my daughter"— "I'd better keep poor old Manlius out of this," he thought, "for these Gwyddyl-Ffichti hate the Romans worse than they do us"— "and my daughter wants them to stay where they are — at least for tonight. Even now they may have started, and I may be too late — don't you see, child, how it is?"

She shifted her hand from his mantle and clasped the fingers with which he held his spear.

"Listen, Arglwydd Brochvael! It was of this I was beginning to tell that man of no heart when he threw me from him just now. I was beginning to tell him that I knew the Derwydd had decided not to raise the cry nor to attack these horsemen and their whores until Sunday. The Derwydd thinks the whole thing's a struggle between himself and Myrddin Wyllt; and his brother — may the devil confound him! — is driving him on, so that he can get hold of Myrddin's woman. He nearly had her yesterday — only Myrddin set Prince Medrawd on him and he got half-killed for his pains! But now that Einion ab Iddawc has got Medrawd away — did you know he'd got Medrawd away? — he told me that! But I swear to you, Lord Brochvael, it's not the Derwydd himself, it's his accurst brother who's at the back of all this! That's what you'll see for yourself, Lord Brochvael, if you’re man enough to see it, man enough I mean to go with me and do exactly what I tell you!

“If you are man enough, and have the heart of youth still in you and the glory of life still before you, you’ll help your tribe far more by seeing what I will show you than by carrying any message! Please, please, come with me! Please let me take you there! — for the sake of your mother, the Princess Indeg, I beg you! — for the sake of your father who at his death — the saints keep him from devils! — refused to swallow the Body of God, I beg you!”

In her instinctive Gwyddyl-Ffichti knowledge of the weak places in his armour, Sibylla clung as she pleaded not only to the wrist of the hand that held the spear but also to the fingers, half-concealed in the thing’s folds, with which he was pulling his cloak about him.

She was even — an easy thing to do under those wind-swept branches — pressing closer and closer; nor was it long before the warmth and suppleness of her body, for he could even feel the handle of his own dagger rising and falling beneath her breasts, added the final touch to her supplication.

“She wants me to spy upon Gogfran ap Greidawl!” he thought. “She’s found the way to his hiding place.” So here was a fine concatenation of imperatives. If he went with her — God! and he would uncommonly like to know where this mysterious being he’d heard of all his life did actually conceal himself! — he would without question spoil his chance of reaching the Fountain in time.

On the other hand, Sibylla’s Gwyddyl-Ffichti fingers hadn’t failed to touch one chord that vibrated still, the advantage the Gaer would gain in its psychic mastery over Edeyrnion and Ardudwy if the hiding place of the forest people’s druid were no longer a sacrosanct secret.

But weak and irresolute though he might be, he knew well enough that there was one thing in his overcivilized nature that her flickering touch had not even approached; though whether this abstention sprang from a deeper wisdom than he cared at present to attribute to her or from — for that too was possible — a strain of guilelessness mingled with the passion of her cunning, he could not tell. She had avoided any allusion to his dead wife's never-ending quarrel with the Three Aunties!

He was aware — and he didn't attempt at this crucial moment to conceal it from his conscience — of an irrepressible desire to be avenged on the Modrybedd for the treachery about Colgrim, and of course there gathered round the name of Colgrim all the personal affronts and rebuffs he had himself received.

Perhaps the crucial moment in this temptation of Iddawc's second son was when in her impassioned pleading Sibylla loosened his fingers from his mantle and with both hands pressed them against her body above the handle of the dagger; for it was then that it would have been natural to throw round her shoulders the arm which held his spear, so that with both weapons between them he would feel master of her and of them at the same time.

His whole nature was hesitating now like a hunting dog at a crosspath. Had his wild rush to prevent the men leaving the Fount been from the start a pedantic piece of officious foolery, and had he only undertaken it to impress Euronwy and her father?

But before the pressure of that soft body and the repeated "Please, please, Arglwydd Brochvael!" had lasted for the passing of one cloud across the moon, or of one wind gust through the treetops, he was made aware that his tongue, as it moved about in his mouth in an unconscious effort to moisten his dry lips, had touched the sharp point of the one broken fragment of a tooth left in his mutilated gums. This whirled him back to what the Goths had done to him; and he remembered how a long time before it was over he had doubted he could bear it, and how a little time before it was over the pain nerve in his brain had gone numb and dead; and instantaneously he decided to unclasp his fingers, twist his mantle about his neck, and set off once more on his race.

He permitted himself, however, a moment's breathing space wherein to impress upon his consciousness every detail of what he was giving up, murmuring, as he did so, whatever evasive objections came first into his head.

His surprise was startling therefore when the girl herself unclasped their fingers, and herself held his spear for him while he wrapped the mantle round his neck, and herself reminded him of the crossways where he would have to turn when it came to leaving the Avenue of the Dead.

"These Gwyddyl-Ffichti women are all thought readers," he told himself. "One of these days I will let her show me where the Derwydd hides and how it is that none of us except the Aunties have seen him."

But he was destined to receive yet another surprise; for it now transpired that it was her intention to accompany him to Saint Julian's Fount.

In pursuance of this purpose she made him help her to twist her upper garment about her neck so that she should be less impeded; and once started he soon found that it was he who had to make the effort to keep up with her.

Too breathless to speak and praying that neither of them would feel the sting and the burning pain of a poisoned arrow he found that at first — though even this changed after a while — he was able to regard the situation as an amusing one. He even thought of how often in their youth he had seen his daughter run races with Rhun ap Gwrnach.

"Alarch," he thought, "ran races with her handsome Greek once too often!" And then from Morfydd his mind turned to Morfydd's favourite poet. “She may soon be crying out like his Sibylla, ‘Procul, O procul este profani!’ Avaunt, you unholy devils! Yes, I feel rather like that solemn son of Aphrodite when it was all he could do — passibus aequat — to keep step.”

He was, however, as has been hinted, not only too occupied in “keeping step” with his youthful guide to wonder how these Gwyddyl-Ffichti women could read people’s thoughts as easily as the mysterious Coranians heard on the wind their enemies’ plans, but even to notice the magical effects of the drifting moon, as the shadows of the great branches above the Avenue of the Dead darkened and faded, approached and receded, as they ran.

He was too breathless and exhausted even to wonder whether she was deliberately punishing him by leading him such a dance. His thoughts became the efforts of his muscles, the stiffening of his thighs, the labouring of his lungs. By the time they reached the crossways and took the path leading directly to Brother John’s cell he was past everything save launching one foot in front of the other.

The path they now were following was an extremely winding one; and if, as the story ran, it had been a favourite with Pelagius, the theologian certainly preferred curves to straight lines. It swung left, it swung right; and he soon became conscious and derived a sort of blurred comfort from it that there was a strong smell of mud on the air.

Then suddenly she stopped, laying a hand upon his arm. He staggered and nearly fell, but she supported him, whispering something into his stunned ear. He felt as if he were nothing but a hollow case in which his heart, a huge bursting entity, was swallowing down and vomiting forth great gobbets of black darkness.

“I must” — and the “I” that articulated this thought was a subhuman thing, an inbreathing heart, an outbreathing heart with no purpose but one, no desire but one, no end but one, to breathe, to draw in and gasp out cool, healing, restoring air; air, not black darkness thick as blood!— “I must breathe in and breathe out, regularly, steadily, evenly, deeply,” this “I” that was himself, his nameless self, kept thinking. “In — out — in — out — in — out — that’s right! I’ll manage if I go on — I’ll get there if I go on.”

What this poor subhuman entity meant by “get there,” or where it was that it was so obstinately determined to “go,” nobody, no god, no man, no creature, no! not even the mysterious Coranians, no! not even a Gwyddyl-Ffichti woman would ever know. For this in-and-out-breathing heart, that was just then all that was left of a mind that had known Greek and Latin and had exchanged ideas with Caius Sollius Apollinaris Sidonius, surnamed Modestus, possessed no memory; nor had it any receptacle in which to store up its impressions for the benefit of future generations. It could only breathe in and out. In one particular world among the unfathomable Many, a self-conscious entity, aware of itself as an organ for breathing in and out, became also conscious of an obstinate determination to “go on breathing in and out” until it “got there.”

Such was this entity’s life history, a history emerging from nothingness when Sibylla stood still and returning to nothingness when Brochvael ap Iddawc became himself again, nor was this particular entity’s experience entirely unique. Other transitory and subhuman existences all over the world were thus appearing, thus struggling, thus disappearing. And this went blindly on, indifferent to the fact that philosophers were treading winding paths, or that Sidonius Modestus was courting posterity as an innocent letter writer.

The first thing Brochvael knew when he came to himself after this lapse in human consciousness was that Rhun ap Gwrnach was standing before him talking to Sibylla. The grandson of the Greek slave was courteously permitting him to regain his accustomed dignity.

"He says—" It was the girl speaking now, and rather to Brochvael's annoyance she had completely recovered her composure, if she had ever lost it. She had allowed her outer tunic to fall into its proper place and having possessed herself of Brochvael's spear was leaning upon it with perfect equanimity. "He says Brother John is ill and that Porius ab Einion refuses to leave him tonight."

Rhun turned to his uncle at that and bent his knee with respect, waiting for him to speak.

"I have come to tell you, Rhun," said Brochvael quietly, "only as you see I am not a born runner like you, that we all want you — I speak for the prince and my sister and... for Porius Manlius" — he felt himself bound in honour to add this— "want you and Porius to remain at the Fountain tonight. We have had news — I'll tell you all this later, only I must get back to the Gaer to reassure Euronwy — that there may be serious trouble down here before noon tomorrow."

"But my dear Lord!" protested Rhun. "My dear Uncle — you can't possibly go back there in this state."

"Oh, yes, I can — not alone perhaps — but with Sibylla — Sibylla is—"

But the young man and the girl interrupted him by a hurried exchange of whispers of which he could only catch the name "Gwendydd" and the single syllable "wine."

He caught at this. "I think perhaps," he murmured, as if speaking to himself rather than to them, "it would do me good to have a drop of wine and a piece of bread before we go back. We shan't be in such a hurry this time. At least I shan't!" And he looked significantly at Sibylla.

But at the moment Sibylla's chief concern was to obtain wine and food for her elderly charge; and as the two young people helped him along with affectionate solicitude, it never entered Brochvael's head that it was soon going to be his destiny to witness an encounter between a Gwyddyl-Ffichti girl of the northeast and the most fatal of all the pure-blooded Ffichtiaid women left in Ynys Prydein.

It had been only a few minutes ago that Rhun had taken his farewell of Gwendydd; and though it could not be called a poignant parting, it was certainly no common one. Both the man and the woman — whatever in these twenty-four hours they had come to feel for each other — were more than ordinarily sorry to separate, and they parted with eager assurances from Rhun that as far as he could anticipate events there were many good chances that they would meet again in the emperor's camp.

What happened now, however, was not at all what the son of Gwrnach expected. But few things are more upsetting to a woman when she has just said goodbye to a man who has begun to interest her, and said it with the precise words and in the precise tone most appropriate for the expression or the concealment of her feelings, than for the man to come rushing back.

Feminine souls, like ethereal silkworms, spin around them psychic cocoons, and these cocoons are easily shocked and ruffled by an outrage to what might be called the ritual of the heart; and under such a shock a woman's nerves grow jangled and she is liable to act capriciously and even discourteously.

If Rhun's training at the school across the mountains had been rounded off as Porius's had been by the discourses of an expert in Pelagian casuistry like Brother John, he might have comprehended better what now struck him as arrogant heartlessness.

Gwendydd had in fact sunk down on the cushions by the brazier, careless of what Nineue was thinking, and had begun to brood pensively and deliciously on the new feeling in her heart, when lo! — for she palpably saw him the moment she heard his voice — here he was back again, and not only back again but hot, agitated, breathless, and not thinking of her at all!

So filled indeed was his limited and artless consciousness by some warlike crisis in his own alien world that as she listened to his voice brutally bawling out the barbarous name of Brochvael — as if that meant anything to her! — and crying, "Wine! wine! wine! wine! wine!" she almost hated him.

Nervously she leapt to her feet. No! She would not rush out to meet him! No! She would not carry him wine for Brochvael! But Nineue had approached her to learn her pleasure, and Rhun must even now be holding back with his arm the heavy folds of the tent entrance for his imperious "wine for Brochvael ab Iddawc" rang through the whole pavilion.

Outwardly composed but inwardly nervous and irritable, Gwendydd rose haughtily from her cushions and began searching for wine. Neb ap Digon had now appeared from the inner chamber in his green-and-yellow garb and she felt he was watching her with his head on one side like a motley mushroom possessed by a demon of malicious curiosity. Nineue too was watching her from the further side of the brazier.

"Will you go, Nineue, please, and find out what he wants — no! wait till I see what we've got here. Do you think this man's hurt?" she continued talking in this disjointed strain as with trembling hands she searched for what she wanted. "Who is this Brochvael? These Gaer people are all heathen! You saw how young Porius behaved when my brother brought his beasts in here and played that blasphemous game with the milk? What are you standing there for, Neb, like an idiot? Go out to them at once and say...

Go out to them, boy! And say... say there's wine coming... Here, take some cushions for the man who's hurt!"

When Neb was gone and Rhun had ceased shouting, she went on talking to Nineue. But her voice was quieter now though, as she searched, her hands kept going to her hair and to her neck and her belt.

"We know what my brother's capable of in his crazy moods, but that stupid young Porius — didn't you think he looked like a gladiator? — took it all seriously! I saw his face. He took it seriously, I tell you, pouring out a heathen libation like that in a tent of the emperor's and to those Cewri of the Cader! Well, here's the last of that Greek wine the sea captain brought me! Here, you'd better take it. The man may be dying. I must—"

"Must put on something fine," was what Nineue's look said, as carrying the big leather-covered foreign wine flask she hurried round the Cretan screen, "to impress your heathen admirer!"

But Gwendydd put on nothing. Without even waiting to tighten her mantle about her, she followed Nineue round the screen and watched her push the hangings aside and emerge into the night. Caught in a gust of wind, the hangings did not immediately close, and Gwendydd coming behind her was able to approach near enough to the entrance to be able, unblinded by the illumination within, to see something of what was going on outside.

Not much assisted by a lantern which was swaying wildly about in the hands of Neb, nor much more by a moon which was constantly being blotted out by flying clouds, Gwendydd succeeded in catching fleeting glimpses of Rhun talking to an elderly man, much taller and thinner than himself, who was leaning heavily on a short hunting spear as if it were an old man's staff.

But this was not all she saw. Standing close to the elderly man, who certainly looked unhurt and quite at his ease, was a young woman, between whom and Rhun a dialogue appeared to be proceeding, so eager and intense as to render them, so it seemed, disinclined to interrupt it even to welcome Nineue with the Greek wine.

Ideas, as wild as the movements of Neb's lantern, rushed into Gwendydd's brain and made her head feel hot and her woollen vest insupportably tight. Was this some girlfriend of her famous runner? She retreated into the interior of the pavilion and began pacing up and down its whole length like a beautiful animal in a luxurious cage.

"What gave him the right," she asked herself angrily, "to come back here shouting for wine like that, as if some great prince had been wounded in battle? These Gaer people have no manners at all! The House of Cunedda must have intermarried with every aboriginal tribe in the place — especially with those 'Cewri of the Cader' my brother admires so much! A vicious little witch that woman was, more like a Gwyddyl-Ffichti than a Brython. No Trojan blood in her — or Roman blood either!"

While his unwilling hostess was indulging in these bitter thoughts, Brochvael was rapidly recovering from his exhaustion. He was amused at the whole situation, and since the worst of his personal effort was now over, he was prepared to take matters with complacent equanimity and leave the responsibility to fate.

In his present mood he felt no inclination to take advantage of the Egyptian cushions which Neb had placed at his feet, though their softness was seductively hinted at in the moonlight. Nor when that fantastic assistant, observing his reluctance, piled them up together and balanced on the top of them with exquisite care several heaps of oatmeal cakes, was he tempted to change his mood.

His unusual exertion seemed at once to have drained him of heroic activity and of all egoistic preoccupations. He felt that he had earned the right to be a philosophic spectator. He therefore indulged his humour to the limit, and, as was his wont, allowed his whole nature to flow into this relaxed vein. Certainly if his previous deadly exhaustion, combined with the satisfaction of having nearly killed himself for the honour of his family, had not left him in such a mood he would have been anything but entertained at the sight of this great alien tent, thus planted down as if by wicked magic between the Mound of y Bychan and the Mound of the Dead.

As it was, he contemplated this apparition with vague curiosity, wondering, as if it were part of a scene on a stage in Hades, whether it would be phantom Coranians or ghostly Atlanteans who would emerge from such a tent in answer to Rhun’s clamorous summons.

So far all that had appeared was a ridiculous little page who seemed to be playing some childish game with his lantern, dancing it about as if he were trying to draw back to earth some wanton ghost-moth that was fluttering towards the moon.

But what was this? A woman was now issuing from the tent, and in the blaze of light that came forth with her he could see another woman behind her, much taller than the first with very fair hair and an imperious aspect, wrapped in a long oriental-looking mantle. Then the canvas walls closed once more, and it looked as if at any minute the whole erection might be swallowed up by the earth.

Meanwhile the darkness that surrounded her, combined with the whirling lantern and the wind-tossed moon, seemed to be throwing the woman who was moving towards them into some sort of angry hesitation. It was clear that it was easier for him to see her than for her to see him, and he quickly realized she was young and handsome. It was also evident to him that she carried in her hands a large wineskin of a shape that he fancied he had seen before in some island-harbour of the Aegean.

But it was not only the fact that she was strikingly beautiful and carried a Greek wineskin that arrested his attention. The erratic lantern had now paused in its airy curves for a brief second, as if by the deliberate design of its bearer, and in this pause it shone full on the girl's face; and Brochvael was startled by the expression of savage malignity with which she was staring at Rhun. That she had already, in spite of the lantern light in her eyes and of the darkness around her, realized the presence of Sibylla was clear to him; but it seemed to him that it was not because of Sibylla that she looked at Rhun like that.

At first sight of this seductive apparition, dimly revealed by the waterlogged moon, he had begun, as befitted a faithful disciple of the modest Sidonius, composing a speech of courtly gratitude. All the while indeed that his bemused eyes were travelling over her beguiling figure his dry lips were moving silently in the forming of appropriate eloquence; but when in that startling lantern flash he caught her sinister expression he swallowed his unspoken words.

And he was glad enough he had swallowed them when the girl opened her mouth to speak. She might be addressing Rhun, but she plunged at once into a deliberate insult to Sibylla.

"Blood of Caesar!" he thought, "this must be the counsellor's whore who's at the bottom of the whole trouble and the cause of Medrawd's flight. But I'll have a sip of what's in that Greek wineskin, though it's full of all the drugs of Egypt!"

"The Lady Gwendydd," Nineue was now saying as Sibylla drew closer still to Rhun's side, "never allows her visitors' attendants to enter her private tent. But if you and your wounded relative will wait till I've informed my Lady, and if the young woman will trust herself to the care of — here she glanced at the lantern bearer whose sardonic impatience was manifest in every movement he made— “I dare say our pages will be able to accommodate her, or perhaps she—”

But Brochvael could endure no more. “Pardon me, Mistress Nineue,” he broke in, “I would like to ask you a curious little riddle that I heard once at the table of the emperor in Constantinople. It runs like this,” and he glanced at Sibylla as he spoke: “What is sharper than these three things — the point of a dagger, the tongue of a woman, the remorse of a saint?”

Nineue turned her beautiful head upon him as a dangerous snake might have done when suddenly threatened by an attack from a totally unexpected quarter; but in the light of the lantern which Neb, with judicial impartiality, flashed sometimes upon her and sometimes upon Sibylla, he had the satisfaction of seeing she was puzzled.

Rhun, who had himself been secretly wondering how to get rid of Sibylla without hurting her feelings, but whose wits, when riddles and daggers were the order of the day rather than strength or speed, were easily confused, now lifted up his powerful voice, and did so in a tone that displayed in equal proportions bewilderment and good will.

“Would the Lady Gwendydd,” he enquired of Nineue, “like to come forth from the pavilion for a moment to receive our thanks? The Lord Brochvael is himself again and desires to return at once to the Gaer. Mistress Sibylla is good enough to say she will take him safe back. I have just made her promise to do this for us. It will enable Prince Porius and me to remain here. The prince’s bodyguard is in arms at the Gaer. But the prince wishes me to remain with Porius ab Einion. If you could persuade the Lady Gwendydd to come out just for a moment it would be a kindness to us all!”

Few things are more irritating to the human mind than to be jerked without warning from a mood of philosophic contemplation into some agitating social crisis. Nor was Brochvael's indignation with Nineue lessened by the exquisite charm of her slender figure in that wavering light. On the contrary, it was increased. He had noted this phenomenon often before, but his knowledge of it was never able to save him from falling a victim to it.

The more his senses were stirred by a woman's beauty, the more apt he was to grow angry with her, and this at the smallest provocation, unless conspiring circumstances permitted him to concentrate his whole nature upon her.

It is possible that if the object of Nineue's malice had not been Sibylla this outburst of indignation, so startling to himself and so astonishing to Rhun, would not have occurred. But it is also possible it would not have occurred if the soft woollen fabric of which her delicately fitting tunic was made had not been so warm that she could afford to risk the chill of that October night by emerging without additional protection.

Little Neb — that experienced courtier — was not one to miss the faintest shade of contrarious emotion among these four persons. To him, for all it took place in a chilly forest and beneath a rainy moon, it was just the old familiar scene enacted so often in an antechamber of Caerleon or Caergwynt. Was it with the idea of making it yet more courtlike that the sly Neb now turned his lantern upon Brochvael's face at the precise moment when Rhun, having concluded his request that Nineue should ask her mistress to come out to them, was looking to see if this suggestion met with his uncle's approval? If it were so he was certainly disappointed; for what Rhun saw in Brochvael's face brought the whole scene abruptly to a close.

Rhun deeply respected his uncle and had done so from his childhood. His mother, Alarch the Fair, had found in her younger brother her chief champion when to the shocked surprise of their mother Indeg, and under the bitter scorn of Auntie Esyllt and Auntie Erddud and the complete indifference of Auntie Tonwen, she had insisted on marrying her Greek runner, for all he was the son of a freed slave.

Rhun had often seen his uncle peevish with Morvran and irritable with Morfydd. He had seen him angry with their mother, Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles. But he had never seen those toothless lineaments, whose outlines Sidonius's wife Papianilla used to compare with those of her imperial father, transformed by such dangerous wrath! So the riddle about the dagger was no joke. His uncle felt that these Arthurian ladies had insulted the House of Cunedda!

Without a second's hesitation Rhun began striding towards the tent, and this drastic move on his part, wiser in its simple directness than he knew, brought Nineue in hurried pursuit and forced her when she overtook him to clutch him by the arm.

There ensued between them a heated dialogue which might well, had not Brochvael grown too angry to notice such things, have seemed to him, with that Greek wineskin in such close proximity to them both, an encounter more fitting for ancient Thessaly than for modern Edeyrnion.

Instead of such fancies all he could think of was the outraged Sibylla, and throwing his arm round her shoulder and using his spear as if it were his familiar staff, he led her away towards the forest path by which they had come; while Neb, after a skip and a hop and a mocking indecent gesture, first in the direction of one pair and then of the other, picked up as many of the cakes as he could carry and ran after them.

It was in vain, however, that he tried to attract Brochvael's attention by squeezing a couple of cakes under the arm that held the spear. Brochvael was too occupied in keeping his other arm tightly round his companion lest she should be driven to return towards the object of their mutual indignation. He could see it was doubtful, with the wind making the whole forest rustle and murmur, that Nineue could catch anything more definite than that she was being roundly abused; but he couldn't resist his vindictive satisfaction when Sibylla repeated over and over again and in a high-pitched voice the same brief and unmistakable words.

"Ffichtiaid whore!" he heard her cry, "Bitch-slave of the Cewri! Get back to your Cader cavemen and leave decent people alone!"

In addition to the wind, what must have dulled if it did not prevent the impact of Sibylla's words was the fact that Rhun had raised his voice to such a tune that Nineue was angrily trying to shake off his hold upon her wrist.

Rhun himself however must have felt that there was danger in the air, for he now dropped the woman's wrist, permitted her to utter a shrill summons for Neb to follow, and watched her escape into the tent. This did not occur, however, before he had possessed himself of the wineskin, and with this in his hand he now ran at his accustomed speed to regain the others.

On reaching them he gave the wineskin to Sibylla, and sinking on one knee before his bewildered uncle began passionately kissing his hand. This hand, together with the spear it held, not to mention the cakes squeezed behind them by Neb, presented themselves now to Sibylla as things so curiously blurred with the kneeling man's corrugated brow that on several occasions after this her sleep was disturbed by grotesque conglomerations of these familiar objects, obscurely fused together by the evil eye of a witch. The crumbling down to the ground of Neb's cakes as Rhun poured forth his remorse soon turned her attention, however, to more practical matters.

“He must eat and drink something,” she thought; and bending down between them and gathering up what bits of cake she could find amid the moss and leaves, she proceeded to investigate the foreign-looking wineskin in order to discover its mouthpiece.

“My Lord! Dear my Lord!” cried Rhun, “Forgive me, oh, forgive me! I had no idea they wouldn’t welcome us all or I’d never have let you be so insulted. It wasn’t Gwendydd. She didn’t know or didn’t understand. And when Nineue wouldn’t bring us in and wouldn’t beg her to come out, there was nothing—”

But Brochvael let his spear follow the cakes to the ground and lifted the agitated man to his feet.

“It’s all right, my boy,” he said calmly and then with a chuckle, “but he must go back, mustn’t he, Sibylla, or our wild race’ will be wasted. Better see that lady who wouldn’t come out, lad, before you sleep, though; or she’ll be having an uneasy night alone with that woman. God’s body! So that’s the famous Nineue?, is it? That’s the sweet enchantress who’s come with Arthur’s picked horsemen, and with Medrawd and Myrddin, to carry off our boys to the war! No, no! Don’t apologize for her, lad — or for her mistress either. It’s clear you and Porius must have stirred up the imperial mission not a little! There’s more in this than the rudeness of a spoilt handmaid. But go back now, child. Give my love to Porius and Brother John. And don’t let these court beauties make too much trouble. I am in good hands. You’ll see more of us, hear more from us, tomorrow.

“But warn Porius to be on his guard. There are strange things afoot. But we’ll keep in touch with you; and I’ll tell Einion and Euronwy that you won’t, either of you, leave these people. After all, they do come from the emperor. No, no! Off with you, lad. Here's my full forgiveness, though I've nothing to forgive you about. Morfydd would say just the same."

And kissing him quickly and easily, for they were about the same height, he was on the point of giving him a friendly push when he realized that no word had yet been exchanged between him and Sibylla.

"Here, child!" he said to her. "Give the boy something to keep him safe from these Silurian devils!"

"Let him drink of their drugs first!" cried Sibylla; and lifting up the wineskin and removing its mouthpiece she suspiciously smelt its contents.

"Let the old drink to the young!" said Brochvael, taking it away from her and raising it to his mouth.

"It's real Greek wine, children," he muttered, after enjoying several long and deep draughts. "You must have a sip of it, Mistress, before he goes off with it. 'When all drink none are drunk' is a true proverb."

He held the skin to her lips but she spluttered and spat.

"Well, Rhun," he said, "you'll have to take it back to the ladies or drink it yourself. Have a taste now."

Rhun obeyed but unaccustomed to wine he only swallowed a few gulps. Sibylla meanwhile had begun searching about by the side of the path while the uncle and nephew watched her.

"She knows too much," murmured the elder, "a great deal too much! But I tell you, boy, I'm safe with her; and what's more" — and he breathed a little mock sigh— "I'm afraid she's safe with me!"

Sibylla now returned holding the stalk of what might have been almost any tallish ditch plant, withered and gone to seed. The two men watched her with silent interest. They both had enough of the blood of Princess Indeg in them to be respectful to any sort of herbal magic.

The first thing she did was to run the stalk through her closed fingers, stripping it bare of its seeds. Then with the stripped stalk held loosely in one hand, she stretched out the other towards Rhun.

The moon was obscured at that moment and all that could be seen — at least so it seemed to the forest people's vision in those two men — was that outstretched arm. Then, speaking in a low grave tone quite unlike her ordinary one, she bade Rhun select exactly four seeds, neither more nor less, from the confused number in her palm.

"Take hold of them, Rhun ap Gwrnach ab Agenor y Gaethwas," she said, "and beware of losing one!"

She ran back to the edge of the wet ditch by the path and with some kind of murmured invocation threw the stalk and the rest of the seeds away. Then, returning to Rhun, she took from him carefully, one by one, the four seeds he had selected and held them for a moment in her mouth. Then she replaced them in the man's hand. "Have you anywhere to put them?" she enquired.

Rhun never wore his cap for very long at a time, but he now produced from inside his tunic the one which twenty-four hours ago he had replaced by the Mithraic headdress, and inserting the four seeds in the interior of its folds asked her the name of the plant.

"Narthex," she said, "is what Llew ap Greidawl calls it, but I believe there are other names."

Brochvael could not hold his peace at this. "Molu de min Kaleousi theoi," he quoted, "but the gods call it Moly."

The young people smiled at each other in the darkness.

"I thank you greatly, Lady," declared Rhun earnestly, "and I shall thank you, I hope, still more when all this trouble is past; that is" — here he made a quaint little bow— "if I am still alive." He straightened himself and arranged the wineskin under his arm as carefully as if it were a newborn babe. It was clear he regarded it as the sacred property of the lady of the pavilion.

"I will give Porius ab Einion your message, Uncle," he said, "and you may trust us to keep a good watch. There must be at least a score of young horsemen at the Fountain with swift horses. But—"

He left his speech unfinished as he turned away, but the shrug of his broad shoulders added enough; added, in fact, that Porius and himself without horses were more to be trusted at this crisis than all the cavalry of the emperor.

As he went off Sibylla could not restrain herself from a parting shot. She put some of the fragments of oatcake into her mouth. Then she spluttered, "Thank the ladies for their hospitality and tell them that the House of Cunedda will never forget its debt to the House of Caer Myrddin!"

CHAPTER XIV. The Derwydd

THEY STOOD FOR A MOMENT till Rhun’s figure vanished into the tent. Then Sibylla handed him the lion’s share of the crumbled oatcakes she had picked up, and he munched them obediently with his toothless gums.

“Come,” she whispered when he had disposed of these morsels, “I’m your guide again, my Lord, and I’ll be a better one this time.”

She put her arm in his as they turned away; and he was thankful to discover that with the help of the large draughts of wine he had swallowed he was back once more in that delicious mood of quiescent and yet reckless indifference, out of which he had been swept by this passing gust of anger.

“It doesn’t matter much,” he said to himself with a curious and almost sensual satisfaction, “what happens to me now. Morfydd’s lost after tomorrow, and after the Feast — anything! Meanwhile here I am, Brython of the Brythons, great-grandson of Cunedda, eternal ally of Rome, enemy to the end of Goths, Huns, Vandals, and Saxons; and now setting off to spy on the last of the druids under the guidance of my brother’s fancy girl!”

The stir in his senses caused by the alluring beauty of Nineue, though converted into another channel as far as she was concerned, had not left his nerves; and he soon found that he was deriving no small satisfaction from the youthful warmth and feminine softness of the arm he was holding. “Suppose she’s given up this druid hunt,” he thought, “and has decided to take me for the night to her own hut in the Swamp of the Gwyddyl?”

This idea was by no means disagreeable to him just then; but while he played with it he knew perfectly well that he would reject it since it was incumbent on him, especially if he slept heavily after these unusual exertions, to be at the Gaer to take Morfydd home.

They hadn’t proceeded far before the labouring moon was unveiled again and under its pale light he was arrested by the stump of an aged willow growing by the side of a mossy depression in the forest floor that must at some remote date have contained water.

From this old stump a small dead branch protruded that was of a most singular shape. It resembled some sort of flying serpent and yet it had no wings, and in place of any kind of snake’s head it had a long beak like a bird. It was a devilish-looking object, for it was attached to its parent stump by what might have been its belly, and its long twisted tail curled upwards, as if for the purpose of defence or attack; while its outstretched neck, from which head and beak were distended, rose into the air in the opposite direction, making a bow-shaped curve from the tip of its menacing tail.

A certain vein of primeval grossness in Brochvael, inherited no doubt through the Princess Indeg from immemorial Iberian antiquity, caused him, while in silence he pointed out to his companion the unpromising apparition, to think of it as a piece of trailing excrement dropped by some dragon’s spawn. “And it has taken,” he thought, “the shape of the creature whose vent expelled it.”

Then he thought of it as some extinct reptile, half-fish, half-bird, that when this whole forest was under water had writhed upwards in a vain effort to fly, and resting its belly upon some low branch of the willow had remained there ever since, its primeval saurian flesh transformed into wood by the magic vitality of the youthful tree.

"Devil, eh?" thought Brochvael, as they advanced along the Walk of Pelagius. "That's how everyone thinks nowadays! But it's all wrong. God or the devil, Mithras or the other one, Jesus or Judas, to love or to hate — it's all wrong. Why should I love or hate anything or anyone? I am myself; they are themselves; an unfathomable multitude of creatures in an unfathomable multitude of worlds! Plato was wrong when he dragged in that Supreme Being with his Super Paradigm of Perfection. Drag in God and you'll soon get the devil! Love or hate? By the Mother of all the Gods! I won't do either. 'Give's a good bitch. But Take's a vicious cur and a guide to death!' Daughter of God! you can be a good honest creature after your kind without all this loving and hating!"

He turned suddenly upon Sibylla. "Well? And what now, my most secret of mysterious guides? Where do you propose to take me?"

She hesitated for a moment. Then she said, "I'm sorry I made you run so fast when we first met, my Lord. I didn't do it on purpose."

"You mean you didn't do it to tease an obstinate old man?"

Sibylla pondered. Then she said slowly, "I don't know why I did it."

"I forgive you, child, but will you tell me now quite clearly and finally, and before we go a step further, what it was you had in your mind to do before we started our mad run?"

"Are you quite strong again, dear my Lord?"

"Strong as I ever am — before I've had meat and mead."

"Oh, they'll give us something to eat if I ask them."

"Good God, girl! Who will? Come, my pretty one, and tell me in plain words what you want me to do. I'm all right again, thanks to that wine. Do you know, I believe it was Greek wine. And since that's meant to be mixed with water, we risked heaven knows what by drinking it raw! You only just tasted it, I could see, but I drank quite a lot. I'm not at all sure that it isn't the kind of wine whose effect is gradual. You must watch your old man, my dear, and listen carefully to what he's saying, else he may ruin all your clever scheme. But what is your scheme? Be as frank with me, Sibylla, as I am with you! And while you explain it we may as well sit down; it's no good wasting our energies."

She looked at him, pondering and hesitating. He had lived so long with his daughter that Morfydd's proud little face had become his one map of a woman's feelings, and from this small chart he calculated all the signs of this great ocean of contradiction. When Morfydd pondered in an abstracted mood her eyebrows contracted into what an enemy might have described as a sullen scowl; so that when, pondering on his suggestion that she should lay everything frankly before him, Sibylla's face remained perfectly calm and clear, and her meditation seemed rather — unless that was the effect of the moonlight — to dispel than deepen any traces of trouble, his natural conclusion was that, whatever she decided, the issue was not of serious consequence either to herself or to him. Never was he more mistaken! He ought to have remembered the possibility that Morfydd's anxious frown might be inherited from his own self-accusing nature. He ought to have remembered his wife's abstracted trances when Kymeinvoll became more like a nymph of the elements than the conscientious wife of a scholar.

"Well, I'll tell you, Arglwydd Brochvael," she said, "and I know exactly where we'll sit down — only we must go back a step or two."

"Lead on, Sibylla," he said, wrapping his mantle round him and grasping his spear so that it might serve as a staff. He was surprised, all the same, to find that this "step or two back" did not mean back in the direction of the Gaer. It meant back in the direction of the Fountain. But it evidently did not imply the same path, and he soon found that it was necessary for him to walk behind her, since this path quickly became too narrow for the two of them to walk abreast.

After walking in silence for a time and following many turns and twists of this narrow way, he began to realize that he had no longer the remotest idea where they were or in what direction lay either the Gaer or the Fountain.

Sibylla was leading him with some intention; but as far as he could tell, she might be leading him round and round in circles. But thinking of the serene calm of her face as he had seen it just now he couldn't find it in him to be anxious about her loyalty. He was physically weak and in great need of food, and he had only told her the truth when he said he'd begun to feel somewhat light-headed after that potent Greek wine.

He tried in vain to remember where it had been that some priest of Apollo gave Odysseus the wine that helped him to burn out the Cyclops's eye. "Old, I'm getting," he told himself. "I shall soon be finding out why Cadmus and old Tiresias made such fools of themselves, but I've forgotten which poet it was who said that the gods laugh at an old man who plays at love with a young girl."

He watched the lightly swaying figure before him as she brushed the impeding fir twigs aside and touched the moonlit tips of the tall ferns with her outstretched fingers. "It's queer," he thought, "that I should feel so satisfied with everything when Einion has broken our sword, when my son is dead, when Morfydd's going to leave me alone, and when the Modrybedd are trying to betray us to Colgrim."

Suddenly he saw his guide had stopped and was waiting for him. They were now in an open space between the trees, the sort of forest clearing that the Brythons called a llanerch, and in the midst of this clearing lay a huge fallen oak. Here they sat down side by side; and the very moment they were seated she began talking fast and freely.

"Where we are now, Arglwydd Brochvael," she said, "is near the Mound of y Bychan. You know how scared of the Mound your people are, only daring to come near it on some great feast day? You know how they say the ghosts of y Bychan's women can be seen at night ascending and descending the Mound? Well! I'll tell you something you don't know. Under that Mound — yes! dug by y Bychan himself it may be — there's a small underground chamber.

"Here was the chief hiding place of Greidawl Derwydd, the father of Gogfran and Llew, and here these two have lived for years, safely hidden away from all you Brythons under the terror of that haunted spot. Most of the forest people know they're there, but there's such a tynged on any man or a woman who speaks of it that only rumours ever reach the Gaer.

"There are cases of your Brythons having been told, even Brythons of the Gosgordd; but the man who's been told, and the fool who has told him, have never lived long afterwards. At least, this is how it was in Greidawl Derwydd's time. But since his death things have been different. More know of it, many more. Some say your brother himself knows. I thought he did when I spoke to him tonight and he wouldn't listen to me. But I tell you, Arglwydd Brochvael, I don't mind at all now that he wouldn't listen to me." Here she paused for breath and touched lightly with her hand the knee that was next to her as they sat on the fallen oak.

Over both Brochvael's knees, however, hung the Etrurian mantle in its heavy folds, serving tonight a purpose quite opposite to the one it was popularly accused of serving; and, though he marked the gesture and liked it, it conveyed to him at that moment no particular thrill of pleasure.

The truth is he was staggered by what he heard. Since he was a child — that is to say, for over half a century — he had felt about the Derwyddon of the forest very much as he felt about the Cewri of the Cader or the women's ghosts at y Bychan's Mound — a tremulous half-belief that darkened with thrilling terrors the wild tracks of the forest and warmed with delicious security the hearth-fires of the Gaer.

And now here he was listening quite calmly to his wife's young waif from the Swamp of the Gwyddyl while she declared that the sons of the god-devil of his boyhood were not only living men but were near him in this very moonlight, amid the ghosts of y Bychan's Mound!

"You were wrong about the weather, Porius Manlius," he thought, "and so were the rest of us. The wind's dropped and the sky's clearing."

In spite of this improvement, however, he soon found himself drawing what he called his Mantuan cloak more tightly about him while he wondered how chilly he ought to let himself grow before his Socratic conscience permitted him to press this warm-blooded penitent closely to his side.

For an impassioned penitent is what Sibylla had by this time become, and she was pouring out to him, just as if he were Minnawc Gorsant or at least Brother John, one of the wildest tales he'd ever heard.

She told him that this brother of the Derwydd, this egregious Llew ap Greidawl who had been the cause of all the trouble over what she called Myrddin Wyllt's "Ffichtiaid bitch," had in his lecherous wanderings found her out and grown enamoured of her. She explained that in his headlong pursuit of her he had thrown caution to the winds, defied his brother, and persuaded her to visit him in their hiding place at the Mound of the Little One.

She swore to her new friend, whom she still persisted in calling “Arglwydd Brochvael,” that she had succeeded in keeping her maidenhead intact under Llew’s gross attempts; just as she had hitherto done, she declared, under the greater temptation of the prince’s seductive charm.

All this she explained to her now almost shivering confessor in the most naive and childish manner, while she so repeatedly shifted her position on the oak trunk as to end by satisfying to an appreciable degree both the imperative of his conscience and the now stronger imperative of the autumnal air.

They were indeed sitting extremely close to each other when she reached the climax of her tale; nor was there any cloud or any overhanging branch in this lonely llanerch to come between his attentive gaze and the wavering expressions that crossed her face. She had, she told him, arrived at last at an astonishing agreement with her infatuated pursuer, an agreement in which she had had the prince’s interests more at heart than anything else. She had agreed that on the night in which he could persuade his brother to receive an authoritative ambassador from the ruling House to discuss terms for letting the emperor’s mission depart in peace, she would yield and let him have his will.

And this very night, she declared, was the night appointed, by a conjunction of chance and fate, for her sacrifice to be made.

“Do you mean to say, child, that these people are expecting you now? But how the devil can they possibly know you’ve got me with you?”

“They know I went to the Gaer and they’ll be sure I’ll be bringing someone.”

“Bringing what kind of someone?”

“Someone like you or Porius ab Einion or Rhun ap Gwrnach; someone who could speak in the name of the prince. I had hinted to them, Arglwydd Brochvael, that I might even bring the prince himself."

Brochvael rose stiffly to his feet. The warmth of propinquity had in a moment transformed itself into the heat of angry pride. What was he doing here, listening to this waif of a Gwyddyl-Ffichti who had dared to assume she could persuade the Prince of Edeyrnion, third in descent from the imperial Cunedda, to go cringing among the hiding places of y Bychan and amid the wailing of his phantom women to beg mercy of their enemy for the emperor's counsellor and for twice a hundred of his most cherished knights?

Hurt, puzzled, bewildered, and completely unable to understand this sudden change of mood, Sibylla stared up at him from her seat on the oak trunk. The moonlight gave her an almost unearthly look, but her whole expression was that of a guileless child, outraged and shocked by the inexplicable behaviour of a grown-up person upon whose sympathy and power it has absolutely depended.

But it was a peculiarity of Brochvael ab Iddawc for these sudden outbursts of anger, especially when roused by some slight to his pride of race, to flicker out as quickly as they flared up. "It's simply comical," he now told himself, "that I should act the heroic brother of an heroic ruler when Einion's like what he is and when I'm like what I am! This girl is simply nearer to the reality of life and the reality of human nature than I am. The Gaer is helpless, Gosgordd or no Gosgordd, before a challenge like this. The forest people have surrounded these grandiose heroes, and in their fury at being at the mercy of such a dunghill rabble the Lord knows into what folly these proud lads with their horses and lances may not plunge."

Under the weight of these sobering thoughts, his anger ebbed and a quite different feeling stole over him. The girlish figure in the moonlight staring up at him as he stood leaning on his spear began now to strike him as much more helpless and pitiful than these proud horsemen with a thousand poisoned arrows pointed at their throats. What was in her mind that she should offer herself to this wretched Llew at such a price?

He sat down again at her side and took her hand, not amorously but tenderly and gravely. “What made you think I could possibly let you do such a thing, Sibylla? Good Lord! I’d be worse than this abominable Llew if I bought these people’s safety at such a price! Tell me honestly, Sibylla, tell me, as our Brython women say ‘across your heart,’ what it was that put this frightful idea into your head. Kymeinvoll was of your race. She would never let me call her a Gwyddyl-Ffichtiaid as she came from Iwerdon; but if the Ffichti came from Iwerdon to Alban there must have been heaps of them where she came from, as well as the sea robbers from Llychlyn. But Kymeinvoll I know would have had no fear of these Derwyddon.”

He paused for a second; and the girl, watching him as the wind switched the shadow of a fir branch back and forth between his face and the moon, was struck by the abstracted interest — just as if there had been no plots or counterplots, no Gosgordd spears or poisoned arrows within a hundred miles — with which he plunged into his favourite topic.

It would indeed have been clear to a much less experienced listener than Sibylla — and Sibylla had a notion that Sidonius Modestus was a Byzantine general — that this man had forgotten their quest, forgotten his son’s death, forgotten his daughter’s marriage, and was giving himself up to the quiet felicity of generalizing on race traditions.

“Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles,” he went on, “always assured me that in Iwerdon, where the Gwyddyl intermarried with the Norsemen or, as you call them, the Llychlynaid, the Derwyddon were always playing this sort of trick upon the women. They had, where she came from, she said, all sorts of devils’ devices to get what they wanted, just like your precious Llew! But the women over there, she said, weren't in the least afraid of them. They were ghastly afraid of the priests, though! The priests did whatever they liked with them. Kymeinvoll couldn't understand our ways over here, where only a few of us bother about the priests at all, but where the Derwyddon are the final mystery of awe and terror.

"It's all superstition and horror. I tell you, I hate it from the bottom of my heart! You've never heard, I expect, of the great Roman poet Lucretius? He's the one to expose them! It was when that murderous rogue down there heard I was teaching my son to read Lucretius that he had him killed. It was our Brythons, not the forest people, who did it. There's something in us Brythons — look at my unhappy sister-in-law! — that's heroic and fanatical, and these priests play on that. But what the forest people dread are only the ugly little magic tricks of these sons of Greidawl. It's all nonsense, my child. Be a good girl, as your own conscience teaches you, and send both priests and Derwyddon to the devil! And listen, Sibylla—"

She certainly seemed to be listening, and seemed as if she could have stood there looking up into his face till that oblong creature of a moon above their heads lost its brightness in the dawn. And it is true she was feeling no impatience. If he could forget that he was standing supperless and chilly in the heart of the forest talking to the witch-girl of Gwyddylwern as earnestly as he might have talked to the patrician guests in the palace of Sidonius, she was so accustomed to life in the open air that all the great moments of her life, her childish response to the kindness of Brochvael's lady, her admiration of Morfydd, her obsession for the prince, and now her complicated new feeling, so fiercely reverential, for the man she was guiding, were as intimately associated with leaves and mould and moss and mist as his were with his fireside at Ty Cerrig and Cassiodorus's version of Ovidius Naso.

“Listen, Sibylla!” She had heard those words not so much with her mind as with her whole body. Yes, and with more than her body! She had heard them with the obscure pressure of her thin sandals upon the dark soft moss. She had heard them with the now familiar pressure of the muffled dagger against her navel.

She had heard them with the motion of the wind at the roots of the damp hair she was now reluctant to push back from her forehead, lest the gesture disturb the flow of his learned talk. She knew he was beginning to be chilly by the way he tugged at his mantle, while she, so well used to these forest nights, was actually sweating a little.

“Listen, Sibylla!” Yes, she was listening, after her fashion; and hearing, amid oak stumps and pine-tree trunks and under that shapeless silveriness in the sky, more, it may well be, than he was saying.

“The reason,” he was now explaining, “why the forest people make better Christians than we Brythons or you Gwyddylaid — why, they take to it like wild geese to the swamps! — is because in their original home in Africa they, and they alone of all the ancient races of the world, found out for themselves what Jesus taught later, namely, that it is necessary to die in order to live; that to give is better than to take; and that in the long run the weak are mightier than the strong and the good more powerful than the evil! The forest people’s druids, unlike yours in Iwerdon, have always been prophets rather than magicians. Julius Caesar or, as you call him, Ul-Kessar, had as his counsellor a Derwydd from Gaul who told him that the Gaulish Derwyddon had to come to Britain — especially to Mona — to learn their philosophy. This was before Christ, but since then there has been... What are you smiling at, Sibylla?”

“At my thoughts, Arglwydd Brochvael.” She could hardly tell him that the impact of a couple of small weak moths who, interrupted on some languid autumnal errand by two anthropoids, were tickling her neck, had suddenly, in a way impossible to explain, made it seem comical that this learned man's interest in the difference between the Derwyddon of Gaul and those of Britain had put out of his mind the difference between a virgin Sibylla and a ravished Sibylla.

But her smile changed the current of his mood. "What put all this into your head?" he enquired.

"Put what into my head, my Lord?"

He picked up his spear from the grass at their feet. "Why," he said, "your absurd notion of letting this wretch have his will with you on condition of bringing Einion or me into the presence of the Derwydd."

"I thought the prince would be so grateful that he would... I mean I thought he might... I'm fond of the prince, Arglwydd Brochvael."

"You mean you love him?"

She lowered her head.

An unusual recklessness took possession of the friend of Sidonius. He rose to his feet and glanced impatiently round him. The moon was floating in a blue-black gulf just above their heads. The trees immediately round the llanerch were mostly small pines; but a few oddly grown stunted oaks could be seen among them to whose twisted branches the leaves still clung. The texture of these leaves in the moonlight looked quietly imperishable; and though the earth beneath them awaited their umbrageous dissolution nothing in their dusky enchantment broke the spell by which the mystery of living vegetation still asserted its presence.

"Come on, Sibylla," he said abruptly. "Where you can go I can go! What's at the back of your mind, I wonder? My mother used to tell Einion and me that the Derwydd would never hurt us as long as we were with him and were looking at him."

Sibylla rose from their log, raised her hands to her hair, and then tucked her tunic more tightly under her belt.

"You're not laughing at me, Arglwydd Brochvael?" she asked.

"Of course not. I never laugh at women and I don't often laugh at anything."

"No, I've heard you've never laughed since your son died."

"Where did you hear that?"

"In the huts by the alder swamp."

"My son was fond of you, wasn't he, Sibylla?"

"Perhaps... a little... not much."

"Do they know in the huts that my daughter is to be married to Porius in a few days — at the Feast of the Sowing?"

"What! Have they been sleeping together already? The Lady Morfydd is wiser and braver than any of us. May she be the mother of emperors!"

Brochvael knew that the marriage customs of the forest people were totally different from those of the Brythons, so he made no comment.

"Well," he said, "shall we go? Is it far to y Bychan's Mound? But you must tell me more, Sibylla, of what I shall find when I get there for you must remember I'm an old bookworm and only leave my study to catch fish sometimes or to help Gwrgi ploughing or reaping, and I don't do that very often.

"Is the Derwydd's lair directly under the Mound? But let's be off, child, for heaven's sake. We've wasted too much time already. You can tell me as we go just what you want me to do. In fact, we'd better make some very clear plans. But we can do that as we walk.

"Here! Hold to my wrist, will you, so I can manage this curst cloak. That's the girl! Is my dagger all right where you've got it?"

"Oh yes, I don't feel it at all, except — you know — it makes me feel safe."

"Well, on we go then, and hold tight to my wrist."

But instead of "making plans," clear or otherwise, Brochvael found himself visualizing with a forlorn and desperate distinctness his lonely life without Morfydd. No more would his halfhearted ploughing and reaping with Gwrgi and Blackie be sweetened by the thought of his welcome when he returned home. And half the pleasure would be gone from the Homeric fragments from Byzantium and the illuminated books from Brutium when there was no Morfydd to discourse to about them.

And what easy victories she'd win over the simple prejudices of Porius and the Pelagian fantasies of Brother John! "After tomorrow," he thought, "after the day after tomorrow, I'll be absolutely alone."

All of a sudden, as he stumbled over a snakelike bramble whose thorny tangles in the moonlight resembled black seaweed, this absolutely alone began to take the semblance of the wooden horse block opposite his goatskin chair whereon his daughter was wont to sit. Nobody there — nobody but old Canna and Gwrgi!

Whatever happened to the House of Cunedda, absolute loneliness was what he had to face. What did it matter what madness he undertook with this girl who was in love with Einion!

The shapeless moon, sliding in and out of the waving treetops like a broken shuttle, began to transform itself now before his distracted eyes into the familiar image of Mynydd-y-Gaer. But the Gaer he saw up there was desolate. Its hall was empty, its sword was broken, its Gosgordd was dispersed.

He saw the prince as a hopeless drunkard dependent upon the Modrybedd for his very sustenance. He saw the white-horse ensign of Colgrim the Saxon pawing the air on every high place in Edeyrnion, while, with Brother John dead of his fever and the emperor's young riders slain by the forest people, the fall of the House of Cunedda was complete.

At last he broke the silence. "What are we going to find, my girl, when we reach the Bychan's Mound? Is their hiding place a large one? Will they have many guards?"

"Large, do you say, Arglwydd Brochvael? Oh no! They've only two small smoky chambers there with nothing but a blanket hung between them; and as for guards, I tell you, their people run back like foxes to their burrows when there's no plunder in view!"

Brochvael stopped and looked down into the white, blurred, concentrated face beside him. The obscure picture that had been hovering before his mind, and before the minds of them all in that hurried conclave in old Roman's chamber, began to waver under her words.

Had they all this while, all their lives in fact, been exaggerating the power of these invisible Derwyddon? Was he under this girl's guidance going to destroy the superstition of hundreds of years?

"Listen, Sibylla!" he said gravely. "I can't have you giving yourself to this rogue. If there aren't a crowd of guards with them, if we find the two of them nearly alone, you're to stay close to me while I talk to the Derwydd! I'm not going to let you out of my sight; do you understand?"

"There'll only be a dirty old blanket between us. You'll hear every word and I shall hear every word. Besides, though he makes him do things, Llew's afraid of his brother. He knows the Derwydd could turn him into a rutting stag if he wanted to. I've got your dagger. I can look after myself, Arglwydd Brochvael."

"But you said you promised him! You don't want him to take you, do you, Sibylla?"

"I can look after myself," she repeated doggedly.

"Well, come on," he said. "But I warn you, child, whatever's in your mind I'm responsible for you; and I'm not coming out of this business alive if I don't get you out of it with me, and unhurt too. So lay that to your heart, as Homer says!"

He quickened his pace after that, but so winding and so narrow had the path become that it was anything but easy going. At last they were confronted by an enormous pine tree, so black in the moonlight that its outstretched arms resembled great ridges of murderous thundercloud on a gashed and gaping horizon; and there, like a dusky cupola in the middle of this wounded horizon, rose the Mound of the Little One.

Without a second's hesitation the girl snatched her fingers from his wrist, fell down on her knees, and began fumbling in the moss at the tree's foot.

"There!" she cried in a moment or two, "I've got it!" and leaping to her feet she displayed to him what looked like a dark stone as she held it up.

"What is it?"

"Llew's arrowhead. It's their sign all's well and they expect us. They'll be glad it's you and not Einion. They're afraid of Einion."

"Of him?"

His surprise was natural and quite the reverse of contemptuous, but the idea of his irresponsible and satirical brother being an object of fear struck him as comical. Arbitrary, incalculable, and wayward as he was, the prince's rule of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy was probably the mildest and gentlest in all Britain; and Brochvael, after the things he'd seen and suffered in Europe, often felt ashamed of his lack of appreciation of his brother's undisturbed graciousness.

But it was hard to do justice to an indulgence that never put off its mask of unfeeling irony, and Brochvael by long experience had found it best to counter his brother’s airy shafts by the absentminded indifference of metaphysical abstraction.

“Oh yes!” Sibylla went on as she carefully replaced the arrowhead, this time with its point directed away from instead of towards the Bychan’s Mound. “The prince is the only man in the country they’re afraid of except Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch.”

“Aren’t they afraid of the emperor? Aren’t they afraid of Myrddin Wyllt?”

There was a lilt of genuine amusement in her voice as she replied to this: “Mary-mother, no! The emperor’s under some sort of vow — some ridiculous holy pledge to leave them alone — and Myrddin Wyllt’s never hurt a mouse since he was born! He’s one of God’s innocents, Myrddin Wyllt is, though of course that Ffichtiaid whore who trails about with his sister — but you’ve seen what she is, Arglwydd Brochvael! But quick! Come! or Llew ap Greidawl will be too drunk to let us in!”

She clutched her companion’s wrist again, this time with an earth-cold hand and moss-scented fingers. This was destined to be their last skin-to-skin contact before they plunged together into this perilous encounter.

Shivering from the October damp, Brochvael now drew his sleeveless mantle tightly round him, round, that is to say, everything but his right arm, whose hand held the spear.

“We’ll be saving all Edeyrnion tonight and all Ardudwy and all the Cader for the prince,” she whispered in his ear; and her voice, full of a rich and deep content, had a ripple of laughing satisfaction in it that reminded him of his dead wife’s when anything peculiarly pleasing happened to her.

“It’s the Gwyddylaid voice,” he thought. “Aye! But I like it! It’s gayer than any note our Brython women can summon up!”

It was much darker where she had begun propelling him and yet, when he raised his bare head, for he was stooping now, and endured the pricks of the dark fir needles beneath which they were pushing their way he could see the beautiful, distorted, silvery creature sailing through the jet-black gulf of ethereal Space.

There wasn't much undergrowth beneath these fir trees, trees that Brochvael fancied he recognized as a particular species he had come to know well in Italy, but their trunks grew so closely together and their broad fernlike branches swung so low that even the girl had to bend her head, and sometimes he could even feel her hair tickling the wrist by which she steered their course.

Suddenly he became conscious that they were confronted by a thick barricade of intertwisted branches, cut branches from whose splintered sections a resinous odour assailed his nostrils. Here Sibylla stopped and began pushing aside a roughly heaped pile of dead bracken from which arose an even more pungent and sweetly bitter smell.

"Come, Arglwydd Brochvael!" she whispered with dramatic gravity. "Here's the way in!"

She dropped his wrist as she spoke and allowed him to take the lead. By a discreet shifting of the loosely flung bracken pile at its entrance, she had revealed to his amazed eyes a narrow descending flight of stone steps. Step by step — and flinging back his mantle he took her right hand in his left while he gripped his spear with his own right — they descended these steps, he first and she behind him.

One Virgilian half-line after another came into his head as they went down. "This old cloak," he said to himself, "must be feeling — ah! here's the beast's lair!"

The acrid smoke of a hidden hearth fire began indeed to mount up round them, combined with a curiously pungent scent of animal skins, human sweat, and what in some obscure sense made Brochvael think of wine flung into a fire.

"Who's there?"

The voice that came up to them was at once husky and shrill, harsh and infantile. It might, Brochvael thought, have been the voice of some aboriginal cave dweller whose primeval life had in some way retarded his natural growth into manhood from childhood.

Sibylla replied by calling out her own name.

"Who's with you?"

Quick as sound following sight the girl turned and clapped her bare hand on Brochvael's mouth, and even in that rush of so many things happening together he was calm enough to appreciate the texture of this soft instrument of silence.

"One who waits for the word of fate!" she replied in clear tones, and the husky voice promptly answered.

"Fate is the word. Cross this threshold!"

Not a little to Brochvael's relief this gnomic exchange of solemn salutations was followed by a lively outrush of rapid speech. The sentences now exchanged were all in that peculiar mixture of Brythonic words and Berber syntax which was beginning just then throughout the long mountain ranges and umbrageous valleys, stretching south and west from Dinas Bran to Caergwynt, to be adopted as the language of Ynys Prydein.

To the further relief of the reckless traveller, upon whose bewildered intelligence and empty stomach the unmixed wine of Dion Dionides was playing all manner of erudite tricks, there was a complete absence of the terrifying and oracular solemnity he had been led to expect in this mystic consistory beneath the Mound of y Bychan. And as a final benediction from his special goddess, "Chance, the Saviour," he found to his surprise that the general interest, of the four persons into whose presence he now emerged from the smoky descent was concentrated not on himself but on his guide.

The friend of the late Sidonius had fortunately much more claim by natural temperament to the epithet "Modestus" than the princely Bishop of Arverne; and it was with a profound sigh of acquiescent relief that he sank down on a heap of discoloured blankets and contemplated undisturbed the strange scene before him.

He soon realized that his attitude of withdrawn and patient observation was shared by at least one of the persons among whom he had been plunged. This was an elderly man of small stature who, seated on a three-legged stool close to a log fire in the midst of the pillared obscurity, kept feeding the flames with chopped-up pieces of wood from a pile within the reach of his not very long right arm.

The peculiarity in this person's appearance that struck Brochvael first was the fact that he was completely bald. This baldness, combined with wide, enquiring amber-brown eyes, above which there curved a pair of guilelessly arched and innocently questioning eyebrows, was rendered characteristically Iberian by the neighbourhood of a long powerful ugly nose; a nose that claimed no connection with an animal's snout; a nose that was peculiarly and specially human; a nose that seemed to be there for many other purposes than mere olfaction; but a nose, all the same, that brought a curious kind of discord into the face.

Since there was no question as to who was the notorious Llew — for never had Brochvael set eyes on a human creature more born for, dedicated to, and victimized by, pure unmitigated sexual greed than the one who was now bandying amorous quips with Sibylla — it remained that the bald little man with the innocent eyebrows, feeding the fire, must be Gogfran ap Greidawl, the Derwydd himself, the last of the druids.

But the manner of the druid's brother was so grotesquely reminiscent of all the wild stories rumoured through the forest about him, and the man was clearly so lost in his obsession for Sibylla that since the Derwydd also seemed preoccupied, or wished to appear so, it was natural enough that Brochvael's contemplative mood, rendered almost Platonic by the slow-working Greek wine, concentrated itself on the more fantastic aspects of reality in this thaumaturgical badger's hole.

The place was filled with smoke, though Brochvael fancied he detected behind the Derwydd's bald head an outlet different from the one down which they had just descended, and it seemed to him that separate trails of smoke were feeling their way airward through both these apertures.

And there undoubtedly was the "dirty blanket" referred to by Sibylla, behind which was the sleeping place destined, at least in the mind of the less worthy of the sons of Greidawl, to witness the rape of Sibylla's virginity.

Absorbed in thought, while his innocently questioning eyebrows still expressed their abysmal and guileless wonder that the world was as it was, the druid's brown eyes continued to blink abstractedly at the small yellow flames he was slowly coaxing into greater exuberance.

With the patient instinct of an old traveller, who has learnt long ago the cautious politeness of a complete suppression of curiosity, Brochvael lay back on his pile of rugs, and giving himself up to a delicious feeling of drowsy warmth and reckless security, avoided even glancing at the Derwydd's brother and sought to detach himself from the hurt and pain of all these events. He had crossed his Rubicon. He had put his seal on Morfydd’s marriage to that young Hercules of a nephew. In a day or two she would be lost to him and his hearth would be desolate. Well, let it be so!

The loss of his wife had been hard to bear but he had borne it. The loss of his son had been hard to bear but he had borne that also. And now he was going to lose his daughter. But he tried in vain to feel angry with this girl who had dragged him into this den to watch her games with this bawdy brute.

God! It was nothing to him that this monkey-man should enjoy her! Perhaps after all she wasn’t a virgin. Perhaps she’d lied to him when she swore she’d kept the man at a distance till now! Perhaps she’d lied about the prince too! When a woman once starts upon these tales, facts and fancies, fantasies and fables, she mixes them all up!

God! but the fellow had a hideous physiognomy. The way the wretch was whispering to her now showed a sickening infatuation such as he could scarce believe existed save in some underworld of God alone knew what subhuman life!

Without glancing in their direction, and they were both still on their feet, he got the impression that it was Sibylla who possessed the man, not the man Sibylla. But these other two — what a picture they made!

They were both men and they were playing chess. He saw their faces in profile from where he lay, with the fire between him and them, and the bald head of the crouching Derwydd hovering like an idol over the black-and-white board they held on their knees as they confronted each other.

Wisps of smoke from the flickering flames the man was feeding from the little heap of wood he could just reach out of the shadow behind him kept crossing that board on their knees. Yes, they were playing the immemorial, oriental game that the legionaries had long since introduced into Britain, with its variously shaped latrunculi, or chessmen, carved out of elder wood, arranged opposite one another on those black-and-white squares.

The whole scene became momently more dreamlike to his wine-dazed senses.

“Your turn, Drom,” murmured the elder to the other; and Brochvael recognized the husky voice that had challenged their entry. “But if you move your castle,” he went on with grim satisfaction, “I’ll move my queen.”

“Can’t I move my horse’s head to its rescue, Morgant?” The younger player’s voice was tame and flat in comparison with his fellow’s; a negligible, neutral voice, neither plaintive nor querulous, neither lively nor grave, a patient, passive, all-accepting voice.

But the one he called Morgant, whose features were rendered weirdly grotesque by a red scar that enlarged his mouth and by the fact half his ears had been cut away, replied with gruff complacency: “Of course you can’t, you idiot! Don’t you see my bishop’s ready for him?”

Brochvael, lying back on his dirty pile of rags, for they were in a state too tattered to be called blankets, felt at that moment as if his consciousness was so detached from all personal desires that nothing could alarm him and nothing could trouble him. He felt so removed from the whole arena of human wills and human contentions that it was as if he were already dead but were able, across his own dead body, to take an amused though rather aloof interest in all that went on about him.

He had sunk down with such infinite acquiescence into his resting place that he would have been puzzled to say at whose sign it was that he had collapsed into this corner by the smoking logs. He felt too much at peace to give more than a comfortable and carefree attention to the extraordinary difference between all that he'd been led to look for in this stronghold of the Derwyddon and what he now actually found.

Neither his mother, the Princess Indeg, nor any of the Modrybedd had ever given him, nor had perhaps ever possessed so as to be able to give him, a definite image of what the devout imagination of a thousand years had created. But from it, whatever or wherever it was, radiated the undying influence that had preserved the forest people's mysterious race consciousness alive.

And now here he was, in this grotesquely unhealthy and absurdly childish hole in the ground with the water oozing from the cracks of the mossy stones, with a lecherous clown trying to seduce a witch-waif from the Swamp of the Gwyddyl, and with a little bald-headed man, his bowed head over against a couple of chess players, feeding a smoky fire from a heap of chips!

What could a fellow student of Sidonius of Arverne and of Cassiodorus of Brutium make of a situation where a creation of popular rumour and old wives' tales could undergo a metamorphosis beyond the imagination of any Ovid?

Was this whole scene, as he regarded it now, this doting satyr adoring his teasing nymph and that queer pair playing chess, a prearranged background for some tremendous contest, occult and prophetic between himself and this absorbed little man throwing chips on a fire, a contest upon which the fate of the whole tribe of Cunedda from Caer Dathyl beyond Deganwy to Mur Castell on the borders of Dinodig might ultimately depend?

But, if so, what an absurdly ironical situation for the anima mundi if that was it, or the demiurgos if that was it, to have taken all this trouble to bring about! Old Porius Manlius and his servant Aulus had assuredly kept their heads in this confused crisis. And yet this mad adventure in which he was now immersed would never have happened if he hadn't, out of some crazy urge to self-immolation, offered himself as the emissary of their old-fashioned tactics!

At this point his drowsy speculations were interrupted by the abrupt conclusion of the game of chess. He had thought at first that these two curious servants dressed in such nondescript rags, the one with the scar and the clipped ears and an air of pontifical propriety, the other with an exceptionally beautiful face and figure and an expression of patient sweetness and docility, were undersized; but when, annoyed by Drom's obstinate slowness in being checkmated, Morgant swept the latrunculi into a leather pouch and rose to his feet, it was revealed that this latter was the tallest person in the place!

But if the height of Morgant was a surprise, the almost feminine beauty of his half-brother Drom had a disturbing effect upon Brochvael's wine-drugged senses. His travels in the classical countries and his interest in antique statuary had encouraged a certain congenital attraction in him towards the softer aspects of the masculine form, and he now began with drowsy gravity to imagine what it would be like to have Drom for his attendant. "If the bald man doesn't say something soon," he told himself, "Dion's wine will be sending me to sleep, and if I do go off I'm at their mercy — but I don't believe this Hylas of a Drom—"

He was roused from his torpor by a surprising conclusion to the lively dialogue between Sibylla and the infatuated Llew.

Looking at the two brothers nobody could doubt that they had at least one parent in common. But if Llew and this bald Derwydd, as Brochvael watched them now, sprang from the loins of Greidawl Hen, who was reported to have lived a hundred and nineteen summers in this forest without once being seen by any man or woman or child of the Brythons or Romans or Gwyddyl or Ffichti, they must have had, he thought, very different mental experiences and quite possibly very different mothers!

"I must ask Sibylla about that," he told himself, "when we've got out of here," and he recalled how Sidonius used to argue that the Derwyddon were survivors from a worldwide Society of Pythagoreans.

"If so," he thought "preincarnation is very likely true with them though not with everybody; and when these men are asleep together behind that dirty blanket the immemorial family likeness returns, only to vanish again the moment they awake."

The brothers were certainly very much awake at the close of the amorous altercation between Sibylla and Llew. The smooth, damp, shiny, jet-black hair that covered Llew's skull, like a clump of unpleasant seaweed on a wave-washed post at the mouth of a sea drain, changed completely the character of the megacephalic forehead inherited from the patriarchal Greidawl; whereas the staring brown eyes and arched eyebrows inherited by them both took on an infinitely questioning and guilelessly astounded look in the case of Gogfran and a yearningly obsessed and almost cannibalistically doting look in the case of Llew.

What Brochvael witnessed now was an attempt of Llew to drag Sibylla towards the dirty blanket, that unappealing suspended object that served as a curtain to their sleeping quarters; and he beheld this attempt immediately frustrated by a stinging slap in the face from the girl's open hand.

At the very moment this blow was delivered the tall chess player had just succeeded in lighting an evil-smelling oil wick placed in a deep earthenware saucer on a wooden projection by the side of the dirty blanket; and, as the man turned at the sound, the spluttering flame fell on his scar-widened mouth and gave him the look of a gloating demon.

But there was little for him to gloat over, for Sibylla became suddenly remorseful. Even without this new light the upward-spurting flame from the fire tended by the Derwydd would have been in itself sufficient illumination to reveal the pitiful contortion, like that of a child about to cry, that convulsed Llew’s face; and her blow was followed by an immediate revulsion of pity, and snatching at his hand, the girl moved straight towards the dirty blanket leading him gently with her and not forgetting, as her eyes encountered Brochvael’s before the curtain closed behind them, to touch her breast with a significant smile, as if to remind her friend of the presence in that warm hiding place of his rag-sheathed dagger.

They were no sooner out of sight than the Derwydd rose quickly to his feet, summoned the two attendants, and gave them some hurried instructions in a voice too low for Brochvael to hear.

As they both listened to him it was impossible for the onlooker to tell whether the scar-widened grin on the face of Morgant or the submissive sweetness of Drom’s smile indicated pain or pleasure at the nature of his instructions.

At any rate, when he had done, they each snatched a piece of blanket from the heap on which they’d been sitting, and without further delay, covering their heads and shoulders with what they had picked up and not turning again to look either at Brochvael or the Derwydd, they hurried up the steps.

Brochvael noticed that while Morgant carelessly clutched at the minute black-stalked ferns and the delicate little grasses and unknown plants that grew by the side of the steps, Drom with a gesture equally automatic — a thing natural enough to a man with such a delicate figure — mechanically stroked these outraged and indignant growths with the tips of his slender fingers, as much as to say: “he’s only a clumsy boor, illustrious daughters of thunder, so don’t waste your divine power in causing such a fool to die in anguish!”

Thinking about it later Brochvael came to the conclusion that there must have been a considerable pause, after both the masculine legs swathed in rags and the bare, exquisitely moulded, boy-girl legs had completely vanished, before the Derwydd approached him and asked permission to sit down by his side “so that they might converse in private.”

“It’s funny,” he told Morfydd later, “but I don’t seem to remember the fellow sitting down between me and the fire. I remember his asking my leave to sit down and I remember his using the word ‘private’ — or was it ‘secret?’ Yes! I think it was our own word ‘dirgelwch’ — but I can’t remember seeing him bend his knees or make the motion of sitting.

“I must have been only half-awake till he finally did sit down. I can remember his bending over the fire and I can remember him giving orders to those two men; but the Greek sailor’s wine must have made me shut my eyes at that point. Yes, I’m sure there was quite a pause between those two pairs of legs vanishing up the steps and the innocently incredulous eyes staring at me like those of an amiable but all-questioning idol in the temple of Aporia, the goddess of doubt.”

But whatever Brochvael said later to Morfydd, it must have been during this “interval” as he called it that he got permission from the Derwydd to follow those four legs into the air so as to relieve himself; for though he didn’t enlarge on this to Morfydd, he could clearly remember the moon transforming his urine into what looked like the silver semen of Endymion, while it crossed his mind how much pleasanter the air was that emerged from a certain badger’s lair near his own Stone House than what came up out of the Derwydd’s retreat; and since he could recall suffering no embarrassment with regard to this excursion, it could only have taken place after Sibylla's abduction behind the dirty blanket.

When once the Derwydd began seriously talking to him, some powerful psychic aura about the man must have driven out the drugging effect of the Greek captain's wine, for he was able to recount to his daughter every word Gogfran uttered; and some of these utterances sank like plummet stones to the very bottom of the tidal flow of his mind.

The odd thing was that he felt no inclination to argue with the Derwydd. About this he must, he told himself, be very clear when he explained it all to Morfydd. He must explain how it came from that disarming questioning of the arched eyebrows above the guileless eyes.

The man looked, he must explain, as if he were completely detached from everything that happened and as if, though taking a leading, perhaps a decisive part, in what happened, he regarded the part he took impersonally, as though he were not responsible for it or for the effect of it.

"You, child," he must tell her, "have had a fresh start and you're not, as Einion and I were, brought up to hear the Modrybedd argue that the Derwyddon were more Christian than Minnawc Gorsant. Even Alarch the Fair" — yes, he must tell her all that— "tried to make her son Rhun and her foster-son Porius repeat some old forest people's catechism about the Derwydd and the Trinity."

But could you worship the Trinity without being a Christian? Oh, there was more he must tell her about the power in this man's face! He must tell her it was like a carved figurehead he'd seen once in some African port, carved in the shape of an Avanc, of that lizard-monster that they say came from the bottom of Lake Tegid.

Only an inanimate piece of wood it was, rotting in the prow of a stranded ship that the natives had sworn was Phoenician. But if it were Phoenician, why did he fancy he made out from its weather-battered stern the familiar name “Dyfnwal Moelmud,” the legendary king of these isles before even the Gwyddyl-Ffichti came?

But this imaginary conversation with Morfydd was now abruptly interrupted by the man himself speaking to him and speaking to startling effect. The face with the raised eyebrows and Avanc power was assuring him that it was as impossible for Arthur’s men to remain here as for an army from the emperor at Constantinople to invade Britain. “I’ll give them two days from tonight, Brochvael ab Iddawc,” he said, “and on the second day, that is to say, the day after tomorrow, they will have the privilege of seeing us celebrate the Feast of the Sowing; but when the Feast of the Sowing ends at noon they must be ready to start; for if they’re not out of our prince’s dominions, bag and baggage, by sunset on that day, Arthur will lose them all. Myrddin Wyllt cannot save them. It will be very interesting to see” — he spoke as if he were himself entirely detached from the whole business — “whether he’ll he able to save himself.”

At this point his resigned listener could not repress a protest.

“I hope he won’t bring down thunderbolts and lightning upon us all! I’ve never heard of Myrddin Wyllt being outwitted.”

Gogfran ap Greidawl smiled. His eyebrows twitched a little and their guileless wonder seemed like an innocent mockery of all the established reputations, human or divine, from the beginning of the world. Then his features stiffened into an inanimate piece of wood carved like a prehistoric lizard.

“I’ve no wish, Brochvael ab Iddawc,” he replied, “to be the instrument of the downfall of the greatest prophet of modern times, and indeed, as you quite properly suggest, there is always the chance that he may destroy me; but whoever it is he destroys — and, as you probably know, he tried without much success to destroy my brother — of one thing I am in a position to assure you, Arglwydd Brochvael, and that is that by the afternoon of the day after tomorrow there will be none of Arthur's mission left in Edeyrnion!

"Today is the nineteenth. That will therefore be the twenty-first. How curious and interesting it is, my Lord, that two and one should make three, and that three should be the number of the Trinity. Myrddin Wyllt's number is four. You know that, I expect?

"Think, my Lord, what a privilege it is for us to have lived long enough to see the great struggle reach its conclusion between three and four! Oh, how much more important the issue of this will be than any possible battle between Arthur and Colgrim!"

It was Brochvael's turn to smile now. "My aunts always swore to us you were a Christian, Gogfran Derwydd, and now I see they were right. May I enquire if you propose to call in the aid of Minnawc Gorsant, the priest, as he calls himself, of 'Corwen,' the 'White Choir,' in your contest with Myrddin Wyllt?"

A flicker of the most illuminated and almost rapturous interrogation flashed across the Derwydd's face. "Oh, if you could and if you would," he cried, "persuade that man to come to me here tomorrow, I can promise you that whatever the issue of this most fascinating contest, your daughter and Porius ab Einion will rule over Edeyrnion undisturbed. Bring him to me, oh, bring that man to me, Arglwydd Brochvael, and I will be your daughter's friend till the end of her days!"

"Ha, my friend," thought the exhausted and wine-drugged recipient of this surprising appeal, "so the Aunties weren't so wrong after all!" But what attended this conclusion in his confused mind was a queer feeling that what this extraordinary individual was really enjoying, even in anticipation, wasn't any possible success he might have himself against Myrddin Wyllt or against the emperor, but simply the fact that there should occur in the universe at all an event as stimulating as a life-and-death struggle between two such magicians as Gogfran Derwydd and Myrddin Wyllt, one representing the number three and the other the number four!

“Can he have guessed,” he thought, as he settled himself on his rugs and contemplated the face before him with puzzled interest, “that we’ve decided on marrying Morfydd and Porius at this Feast of the Sowing?”

As if reading his thoughts the Derwydd now remarked quite quietly and carelessly: “We’ve always had a marriage of some sort as long as I can remember at the Sowing. Why not have your daughter’s and Porius ab Einion’s? That would strengthen your House’s rule more than anything else, for it would be popular with the Gwyddyl-Ffichti and they’ve been increasing a good deal of late. They’re crossing from Iwerdon again, now that the legions have gone and the men from Lychlyn rule in Dulyn. And once here they seek the swamps and the mountains.

“But your Deganwy cousins in Gwynedd know their ways and are guarding all the approaches to Eryri; so they’ve been compelled to break up into small parties and follow the forest paths across the valleys, driving off cattle and sheep where they can, with the idea of settling on the slopes of the Cader. Many get killed but some get through. Our women have always had a tenderness for anyone from Iwerdon and some say the Ffichti served the Cewri in ancient days.”

At this Brochvael couldn’t resist a second interruption.

“You don’t believe these tales, Gogfran Derwydd, about the giants being still up there, and coming down when they smell death to carry off the dead?”

A look of the absolute illumination of pure dispassionate delight, like a look Brochvael had once seen on some exultant African faces in an old temple-court in the Atlas Mountains, came into the Derwydd's eyes.

"O Arglwydd Brochvael!" he cried — and his voice rose to such a shrill pitch that Brochvael distinctly heard a sudden pause in the constant murmur of amorous whisperings and endearments that were going on behind the blanket— "O my dear Lord, if you could, out of the fountain of your inexhaustible learning, and out of the experience of your unprecedented travels, reveal to me the historical and philosophical aspects of this wondrous question I should be eternally obliged. Is there any cause in Nature why this old race of giants should be extinct? Oh, it has been the hope of my life, Arglwydd Brochvael, that one day I might with my own eyes see a cawr of the Cader! We certainly live, derwyddon, tywygion, and gwerin — druids, princes, and people," he repeated, using the melodious intonation of Edeyrnion, "in the most exciting times the world has ever seen! What world-shaking events! What settings and risings of zodiacal aeons! What sinkings into irretrievable downfalls! What mountings into unbelievable restitutions!

"Do you know, my Lord Brochvael, I sometimes think that if the ineffable wheel whereby my father, Greidawl Derwydd, would always symbolize his worship of Three-in-One, would permit me after death to be a solitary and harmless fly on its uttermost rim — an immortal fly, you must understand, my dear Lord — I would fling away all the powers my father left me, and old Myrddin Wyllt might build an eel bridge from Saint Julian's Fount to the top of the Gaer; and the emperor's circus boys with their whores behind them might gallop over it, and over my dead body at the end of it!

"A little brown horrid-looking dung fly, my Lord Brochvael, is all I'd ask to be — only it would have to be immortal, you understand — an immortal dung fly with sticky feet. Sticky feet it must have, Brochvael ab Iddawc, so that nothing, not even the milky moat of Caer Gwydion, could shake me off!”

There was something about all this, with its effect heightened by those everlastingly mocking eyebrows, that had begun to annoy Brochvael. In the depths of his Brythonic soul he felt an invincible distrust of this levity. Wasn’t the whole nature of human life, wasn’t its whole tragic purpose, only to be explained as an unceasing struggle between good and evil?

Brochvael’s moral sense, one of the deepest things in him, was outraged by the idea of being more anxious to enjoy the spectacle of these titanic struggles than to enjoy the good in the universe and fight against the evil.

“But oughtn’t Greidawl Derwydd,” he enquired earnestly, “to have believed that the circumference of his three-spoked wheel extended into infinity, and was therefore nowhere? And oughtn’t he to have believed that the mystic hub of his three spokes was omnipresent and was therefore everywhere? Isn’t that what Greidawl Derwydd ought to have believed?”

“Oh, that’s how it is, is it?” cried the other; and it was clear that his fascinated delight in such a boldly conceivable solution obliterated all annoyance at the criticism of his begetter’s fancy.

“Good Lord!” thought Brochvael. “What’ll this fool chuckle over next? Would he cry, ‘Oh, that’s how it is!’ if he were told that Myrddin Wyllt had invented a thundercloud that could destroy all Edeyrnion with a single bolt?”

“I hope our enemy—” he began, and then stopped short, startled at what he had said. Our enemy? This man himself, with his frivolous enjoyment of worldwide cataclysms, was our enemy.

“I mean,” he went on, “I hope Myrddin Wyllt won’t meddle with my daughter’s marriage on the twenty-first. What’s today? Yes! Venus Day. Well! The day after tomorrow will be Sunday. How did you know, Gogfran Derwydd, that we were thinking of holding this marriage at the Sowing? We only settled upon it tonight."

Across the man's face there began to flicker something that was almost like reproachful surprise, but it was overtaken at once by the usual gleam of innocent interest, a gleam that had already begun to strike Brochvael's famished stomach as both absurd and annoying.

"You mustn't tell me your Gaer secrets, Brochvael ab Iddawc! For us worshippers of the Three-in-One, the keeping of secrets — how one and two, you know, can make three — is part of religion. It's the same with the religion of Mithras, as your nephew Rhun knows. Sunday is his great day of course as well as ours, and if you are interested to see what Myrddin Wyllt makes of our Feast, I shall be interested to see what Rhun ap Gwrnach, priest of Mithras, makes of his cousin's marriage."

This final hint that the man was aware of what Brochvael himself had only vaguely and obscurely divined and had indeed shrunk from facing, namely, that his girl's betrothal to Porius wasn't as wholehearted as he could have wished, was the greatest shock he had yet received in this weird encounter under y Bychan's Mound.

"Angels and devils!" he groaned in his heart, "the fellow can read our thoughts!"

But immediately afterwards there rose up in him a fierce defiant wave of the old Brythonic pride, the pride of the race that had brought its bronze swords from Crete and Argos and the vales of Ida and the coasts of Ilium.

"Tricks to catch eels," he thought, "this conjuring with thoughts! Tricks to win at mercatio as the sorcerers of Sicily teach! So this is all the Aunties' grand Derwydd can do, read a person's thoughts, like a Gwyddyl-Ffichti witch-wife!"

He was all alert now. The wine fumes were gone. His drowsiness was gone. And the thought came to him: "If he can read my thoughts to my hurt, why not make him read them to my gain?"

He sat up on his heap of rags, hugging his leather-bound shins, while his Etrurian mantle hung down on each side of him, trailing loose upon the smoke-darkened floor. The oil wick that had been lighted by the tall chess player, now that it was half-consumed, was burning quite brightly, throwing into relief not only the Derwydd's unnaturally bald head but something of the figure that supported this head. But even now with his own head clearer and the light more diffused, he found it hard to concentrate his attention upon any isolated details about him.

Between the smoky roof and the fire-blackened floor the Derwydd's head with its mildly ecstatic wonder seemed to hover in a void. The man's body seemed to inhale and exhale all its material surroundings. It actually seemed to lessen and increase in a vaporous fluctuation, devoid of bone and muscle as if it were made of grey smoke. His attire must have assisted in producing this effect, for as far as Brochvael could see it consisted in nothing but a long grey garment with loose sleeves.

Searching in his new clearness of mind for definite details, Brochvael asked himself whether the patches of colour at the man's waist which seemed to shift as he moved were just an ordinary faded belt made of the hide of an ox, and whether the hairy fringe round the neck of his garment was really the wolfskin it seemed to be.

Brochvael remembered that he'd had in his time the same difficulty in noting exactly what the monks from the Egyptian desert wore when he encountered them in Alexandria. They too, like this person, had such strikingly expressive faces that they became bodiless heads moving about those crowded streets.

In this case the whole smoky pungent-smelling room served as a vaporous body to clothe this connoisseur of gigantomachian catastrophes. Livelier and livelier did the yellow flame lit by the chess player flap and sway in its earthen saucer; and since the log fire was redder now, and the smoke clouds had gone, it even began throwing a faint simulacrum of the man's shadow upon the clawr-yr-wyddb-wyll, or "board of black-and-white squares," that Morgant had balanced above the Derwydd's head.

Brochvael had so often seen the throwing of dice on a board like this that he found the sight of it curiously restorative to his spirits. Chess might be a game that lent itself to superior cleverness, but there were no chessmen in sight, and those black-and-white squares suggested that even here, under the very shadow of this thought reader, the great impersonal goddess of pure chance still exercised her impious and unpredictable sway.

Behind the suspended blanket the sounds of amorous endearment had begun to grow more ardent; and the now alert visitor could clearly catch the pleading tones of the man and the protesting cries of the woman.

"Give me something to eat," he repeated over and over in his mind, putting all the mental force he could summon up into the words, "give me something to eat, you bald fly upon the wheel of fate!"

He felt a real thrill of triumph when he saw the man stir, rise, take a few steps towards the darkest corner of the chamber, fumble in the obscurity for a space, and finally return with a hunk of cheese and a bowl of goat's milk.

"Your pardon, my Lord Brochvael," the Derwydd said casually, "I'd forgot you came without your supper."

He reseated himself by his guest's side, and handing him the bowl proceeded to break the cheese into two halves.

"Eat, son of Iddawc! Eat the food of Gogfran ap Greidawl, and may your child be happier than you; and your children's children happier than your children!”

Brochvael was too hungry to treat these words with much attention. He had lived too long with Gwrgi ap Cyngar and had seen too much of the formal pieties of Greece and Italy not to take such things with a pinch of salt. But when he had finished his portion of the cheese and drained, after the other had tasted it, his bowl of goat’s milk, he felt so invigorated that he actually decided to ask his host a question that probably had never been asked of any druid in Britain for a hundred years.

It took him a minute or two — for even in this queer hiding place under the Mound of y Bychan he couldn’t forget that he was a disciple of Sidonius — to determine the best words to use in putting his question; and as he pondered he was so struck by the exultant intensity of his companion’s stare, that like the flight of an owl through the twilight across a confused conclave of rooks the thought struck him that the Derwydd fancied he’d won some occult advantage over him by this sharing of the milk and cheese.

“Not by eating your food, my friend,” he said to himself, “nor by warming myself at your fire, nor by tossing my thoughts into your lap will I fall into your power. That will only happen when I worship your god and chant your Tris-Hagios. Meanwhile, Master Fly-on-the-Wheel, I will ask you something.”

He sat up straight on his pile of rags and looked the man in the face. “What,” he asked him, “is your ultimate purpose, Gogfran ap Greidawl, in all this plotting and conspiring? Put aside the matter of the Arthurian mission, and let us suppose these horsemen are back safe in the south again, what do you want the forest people of Ynys Prydein to do? Throw off us Brythons and rule this land themselves? Is that why you are plotting with Colgrim and sending him our secrets? We Brythons are a small minority of the people of Britain. If you can stir up the forest people in Edeyrnion, Gogfran Derwydd, somebody else could stir them up all over Britain! And what if this new stirrer-up turned out to be the emperor's nephew, Medrawd ap Llew, in league with the Saeson to dethrone the emperor? You and yours would get short shrift, Gogfran Derwydd, from Medrawd ap Llew!"

Brochvael put his bowl on the floor and scrambled hastily to his feet. He hadn't the remotest idea why he had suddenly blurted out the name of the emperor's nephew. He knew no more than the rest of Edeyrnion about Medrawd. What had put it into his head to think of him as such an appalling traitor? He'd heard the usual rumours about the man's infatuation with the empress Gwenhwyvar; and one of the Modrybedd had told him that Medrawd, on the paternal side, had the blood of the forest people. But so had they all; and yet every Brython instinctively put faithfulness to their own proud race, to the race that brought to Britain the Homeric "pitiless bronze," before everything else.

He had taken for granted that where there was a Brython, there was loyalty to the emperor! Why then, in the names of all the separate devils of hell, had he said what he had said? This excitable pet insect of fate must have thought it for him. And now as the great wheel hummed and the whirling hub became invisible from its speed, the creature was clearly congratulating itself, with as much satisfaction as a purring cat, over what it had stirred up in its bewildered onlooker.

As Brochvael watched those eager eyebrows twitching and quivering, rising and falling, in the light of the yellow flame, he felt as if the Derwydd's fluttering thoughts were hardly able to await the airy wings that would turn them into words. The little bald man seemed eager to ask Destiny, Fate, Providence, Necessity, everything but the kind and wayward goddess who really decided how this mad chaos heaved and sank, for the clue as to what would happen next.

“Do you know, Brochvael ab Iddawc, I really do believe, whether you can or cannot succeed in persuading yourself to bring that ill-advised priest to see me tomorrow — and if you cannot I shall fully understand it — that the question you have raised as to whether the Trinity will inspire me to cajole the warlike Brython, outwit the savage Saeson, beguile the ferocious Gwyddyl-Ffichti, and even arouse our own peaceful natives, will be mysteriously answered at the Feast of the Sowing on the day after tomorrow. As you know, I was not responsible for your son’s death.

“If he had come to me, and he was given a chance to do so, I could have saved him. And now if you want your daughter to have a happy life, I implore you to see that all these people including Myrddin Wyllt and his women are over the border by sunset on Sunday. It’ll be your daughter who will pay the price, you know. It’s a night’s ride from here but they must be beyond the meeting of the waters where Sarn Elen turns west by time of sunset.”

“There is only one thing more then,” said Brochvael resolutely while his fingers hurriedly searched in the hidden wallet under his belt where he carried his treasures, for unlike Einion he never hung anything round his neck, “and that is—”

But he was interrupted by a ghastly howl of pain and panic from within the alcove. The blanket was torn aside; and the figure of the Derwydd’s brother, his face distorted with terror, his clothes half-off, his nakedness grossly and shamelessly exposed, stumbled, staggered, and finally collapsed at their feet, while close at his heels, repeating her stabs at his shrinking shoulders came Sibylla, the dagger clutched tight in her right hand, while with her left she struggled to conceal beneath her dishevelled tunic her bare breasts, which even at that crucial moment struck Brochvael as pathetically small and childish.

But he was quick enough to get between the girl and her victim; and after a few seconds of uneven struggle, in the course of which he was compelled to cry sharply: "Now stop that, Sibylla!" he succeeded in taking the dagger away from her and returning it to his own belt.

All this would have been easier for him if during their struggle the Derwydd's brother, who was still twisting and writhing on the ground from the smarting stabs which the dagger's point had inflicted, hadn't seized one of his ankles with the desperate clutch of a dying man.

"She's murdered me, brother! She's finished me! I'm done for! Llew's for the rats and crows! The pains of death have got hold of me! I am falling into black night. Give me a minute, dear God! in your mercy give me one minute, two minutes, three! — three sweet little heavenly, precious, eternal, everlasting minutes, in which to tell you how much I love you!

"Oh, I can love you here, dear God! I can love you best here! I don't have to see you to love you! I'll love you more — I swear I will! — if I don't have to go to you! I don't want to go to you yet, dear God! I'm not quite ready. But I'm ready to love you, more than anyone's ever loved you, if you'll let me do it down here."

Meanwhile the Derwydd was giving advice to Brochvael with the utmost calmness. Indeed so quietly was he speaking that his voice hardly rose above a whisper. Between his words, for he was now on his knees by his brother's side, there were spaces of silence, and Brochvael, whose panting as he held Sibylla made a sort of accompaniment to the girl's angry sobbing, felt an uncomfortable inclination to laugh. These dead silences in the midst of a scene that might have been tragic and which certainly was painful, struck his mind as comic. But the Derwydd seemed to have nerves of iron in the presence of all such occurrences.

“I suppose,” thought Brochvael, “that confounded wheel of his has to cross great gulfs of aboriginal chaos before its ‘immortal fly’ wakes up! Meanwhile how it hums and drums!”

“Don’t let her go till I’ve found if he’s seriously hurt. I don’t think he is. Don’t tread on his hands! He seems to take you for God by the way he clings to your foot. Wait, my Lord! There! You’re free now! Let the girl lie down over here” — and the Derwydd nodded his head to the rugs where his visitor had just put down his bowl of milk— “and you might bring the light, my Lord, and hold it for me while I look at his hurts.”

Carrying her to the place he had quitted, for Sibylla’s hysteria was apparently transforming itself into a tender quiescence, Brochvael was relieved to discover when he returned to the prostrate man that the Derwydd was correct in his surmise. Llew’s hurts were clearly, as his brother wiped the blood away, not of a nature calculated to convey him, at least at this time, into the presence he dreaded. Holding the earthen saucer with its flickering flame as low as he could, Brochvael was now struck by the fact that the Derwydd was extremely short-sighted.

This discovery, in some odd way, he found disarming, and he almost determined, as he helped him to make the writhing and whimpering man comfortable, to omit the little ceremony of polite retort upon which he had resolved. He had, however, only to recall the particular look of intense and almost gloating delight with which the bald man had spoken of that sharing of the milk and cheese to withdraw this weak concession.

“I must keep my head,” he said to himself. “It wouldn’t do for a house sparrow like me to halve a feast with the father of all carrion crows without paying my share!”

With these thoughts racing through his mind, as he held the light while Llew’s wounds were examined, he once more fumbled in his wallet.

Yes! There it was! He could feel the deeply cut impression with his fingers. There it was — the head of his favourite emperor, Hadrian!

More than any other recent figure within these confused and chaotic modern times, this great ruler had always possessed a peculiar attraction for him. And now in this murky and mystical hiding place, now in this citadel of all he most instinctively detested, of all that was occult, obscure, and treacherous, of all that was obscene, unclean, and barbarous, his mind turned to this sceptical and civilized ruler of the world with incredible relief and comfort. Here was an emperor who took religion and piety and patriotism and morals as they ought to be taken, with indulgent and humorous common sense. Here was an emperor prepared to number Jesus among the gods and yet prepared to build a temple to Venus on Mount Calvary!

Sceptical and tolerant, believing in nothing, yet believing in everything, the elegiac celebrant of his own pale and bewildered soul, the mere idea of Hadrian always gave Brochvael a reassuring sense of the triumph of good over evil and of tolerance over intolerance.

Holding the flickering flame so that the wounds inflicted by Sibylla — and he could see they were not very serious — could be wiped clear, both of blood and of bits of woollen fluff, he now decided, insult or no insult, that nothing should stop him from paying for this man’s equivocal hospitality with the head of the great imperial virtuoso, the symbol of a civilized life as against all these murky barbarisms!

This decision was not obliterated by the polite and easy tone with which the Derwydd — his perspiring face, as it was lifted up to the light, shining like that of a benevolent merman ministering to a wounded dogfish — enquired whether he would mind carrying the lamp into their sleeping quarters, opening a chest there, and bringing him a green phial of mandragora which that repository contained.

Brochvael lifted the lamp above his head and raised one knee from the floor. The removal of the light plunged both the brothers into profound shadow.

"Is it the only phial in the chest?" he asked.

"Certainly, my Lord, the only one there. It's made from a white bog moss that my mother used call migwyn. The moss grows on the stone Tyriawg, near Melenryd, where Pryderi the son of Pwyll lies buried."

Brochvael raised his other knee from the floor, not without difficulty, for his muscles had been exhausted by his run that evening, and as he struggled to his feet his joints perceptibly creaked.

"Pardon me!" cried the Derwydd eagerly, giving his groaning relative a soothing pat on the rump. "Did you hear that, brother? The bones of his body cried 'Hagios' three times! That's a sign of prophetic importance.

"Human bones have spoken in you, Lord Brochvael. They have uttered the number three, the sign of the All-Holy. Do you know what that means? It means that Minnawc Gorsant is coming to me of his own accord tomorrow so that he and I can invoke the Holy Trinity together, and join our forces in the power of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, against this heathen magician Myrddin Wyllt!"

Brochvael's anger at these words required more than his usual self-control. With a special and peculiar mental effort, an effort he had acquired during his imprisonment by the Ostrogoths, he reduced to invisibility the bald head and lively eyebrows of the Derwydd and concentrated his attention on a shadowy spot beneath them, where neither the wavering firelight nor the flickering lamp could display more than the bare back of Sibylla's groaning victim and what might have been either a trickle of blood or a torn shred from a woollen vest.

Upon this blurred space he stared in silence, quite aware of the fact that what had roused this rush of anger was not so much reference to his son's murderer as what, in his Brythonic fastidiousness, seemed a shameless and almost indecent allusion to so intimate a thing as the creaking of a person's joints.

Then he began to speak, lifting the lamp so high as to cause the bald head beneath him to merge in the same shadow as the wounded back, and pinching the coin in his wallet as violently as if it had been the skull of Minnawc Gorsant himself.

"I think your brother could stand up now if he wanted to, but I'll get that drug. And I'll give the prince a full account of this interview. The day after tomorrow, Sunday the twenty-first, is the day of the Sowing; and at sunset on that day your ultimatum to the emperor's mission expires."

All this Brochvael uttered hurriedly and mechanically, as if before taking a dangerous plunge he were making sure of certain practical details. But his tone changed now and became the tone of a man whose words at any syllable might be cut short by violence.

Having been brought up by the Modrybedd, Brochvael knew very well that among the forest people the old non-classical, non-Celtic Berber tradition still continued, whereby the mother is the centre of the family and from the king's sister springs his heir, and that his aunts rather than his uncles are those who in his illness rule the tribe in his stead.

He knew that even to ask a question about the mother of a forest chieftain, still more about the mother of a Derwydd, was treading on dangerous ground. But for all that — so angry had he grown with these two men — he drove forward, still staring at that compound living shadow beneath him, still pinching the image of Hadrian against his ribs.

“One thing more, Gogfran Derwydd. With regard to this phial of mandragora made from the moss that grows on the stone Tyriawg, you did me the honour to speak of your revered mother. Will you do me the further honour before we separate now, very likely for the last time, of informing me of the name of this honourable lady and if you and your brother enjoy the great happiness of her being still alive?”

There was a tremendous silence in that underground chamber broken only by the dripping of water and the whimpering of the man on the floor.

“Alive or dead,” thought Brochvael, “I warrant the woman loved this absurd fool on the floor more than his elder brother!”

Then the Derwydd spoke, and spoke without the faintest flicker of a change in his eager, artless, buoyant, astonished, vividly pitched voice.

“What a curious stuff blood is, isn’t it, Brochvael ab Iddawc? And, do you know, the blood of our family has a taste all of its own? It’s neither salt nor sweet. You might even call it fragrant! It has a taste, yes, and a smell too! just like rhedyn-un-goes, or ‘bracken!’”

He put his finger against one of the hurts in the prostrate man’s back and put it into his mouth. “Yes, it’s strong tonight! You try it, my Lord Brochvael. I want you to try it so you can tell your brother you’ve tasted our blood! Or are you afraid it’ll poison you? Fear is a curious thing too when you come to think of it! Blood and fear — they are like incestuous brothers and sisters.”

The man was licking his lips now, gently and meditatively licking them, with the tip of his tongue, just as if his visitor’s cowardice were a delicious bowl of cream over which he was purring.

Brochvael couldn’t endure it. He felt absolutely reckless. “Sibylla,” he thought, “loves Einion. Einion’s son is to have Morfydd. It doesn’t matter what I do, or where I go, or whether I live or die.” He desperately fought down a rising of his gorge in a spasm of sickening nausea. He didn’t even bother to kneel again. Bending forward and holding the lamp as carefully as he could so that the oil shouldn’t be spilled on the man’s back, he wetted his fingers in Llew’s blood and licked them clean. Yes! The fellow hadn’t lied. The blood of Llew did taste like bracken!

But he refused to witness the triumph of the Derwydd. Swallowing little gulps of his own uncontaminated saliva to get the taste of Llew’s blood out of his mouth, he pushed aside what was left of what Sibylla had called “the dirty blanket” and entered a scene of so much litter and such curiously smelling confusion that it was as if the yellow flame he carried, so wildly did it wave and flap, was itself possessed by a panic-stricken spirit that kept imploring him to draw back!

But as he advanced, stumbling and groping, he soon caught sight of the object of which the Derwydd had spoken, a large black chest in the shape of a coffin, studded with huge bosses of discoloured bronze and by a silver handle.

Forcing the reluctant lamp to throw its yellow rays upon this sinister receptacle, he quickly pushed open the thing’s lid; and there, amid a miscellaneous collection of arrowheads and metal cups and knife-handled crystal goblets and birds’ feathers and the furry tails of squirrels and the slippery skins of snakes, was a large enamelled phial stopped with a golden stopper and carrying an unmistakable “M” in silver lettering upon its purplish belly, while from its whole appearance emanated an aura of occult alchemy.

With this in his hand and feeling so impatient to end this night's business that he didn't even pause to close the chest's lid, he was on the point of leaving this inmost lair of the sons of Greidawl when the oil-flame he carried fell upon four human legs apparently descending from the ceiling on the left side of the chamber he was re-entering.

Two were covered with twisted rags; two were not only bare but were scratched and bleeding. His first impression was that the Mound of y Bychan itself, wounded in its half-animate feelings by the outrages, physical and psychic, that had been offered to its subhuman soul tonight, had fallen in, and in its collapse had brought down with it all who had been caught standing erect upon its baleful eminence.

But the truth followed hard upon this self-imposed fantasy and resolved itself into the personalities of Morgant and Drom submitting themselves, the very second their feet touched the ground, to fresh and totally unexpected instructions from their master. And of what these instructions consisted soon became clear.

For brief as his absence had been, he found on his return that it was the wounded man who was now ensconced in the place recently occupied by himself, while Sibylla, "clothed," so to say, "and in her right mind"; in other words, with her outer tunic tucked into her belt and his own spear — where had that been all this while? — clutched against her eager body.

The Derwydd was on his feet too, explaining to the pair of chess players in rapid undertones the nature of their new task. It was now Brochvael's destiny, as he stood contemplating this scene and holding the mandragora in one hand and the lamp in the other, to be, as Homer would say, "divided in his mind," in a manner that troubled his soul to its very depths.

He had eaten of the Derwydd's food. He had tasted the blood of the Derwydd's brother. According to every latent superstition inherited from his mother he had now incurred what the Princess Indeg had taught him to call a tynged, that is to say, a fatal compulsion laid on him, not to offend the feelings of the Derwydd, not to defy the Derwydd, not to break loose from the Derwydd.

Within his body was the food, within his veins the blood of this mystic family, and yet from something also within him, something beyond and outside his physical body, there arose, powerful and strong, free of all such compulsions, the inalienable independence of his own personal spirit. To assert this independence seemed to him then the one essential thing, an urge that overpowered his natural politeness and swept away his natural consideration for another's feelings.

Resolutely he placed the mandragora in his host's hands, put down the lamp beside the chessboard, and clutched the coin in his fingers.

But the Derwydd was prepared for him. "You asked me my mother's name, Lord Brochvael. Her name — she has been dead many years — was Rhelemon; but our people were not content to know her by that name alone."

Brochvael bowed, bending his head a little to the left, as he had seen the silentiaries do in Constantinople. "We leave you now, Gogfran Derwydd," he said, "and I have only one last thing to do before we go. We may, or we may not, meet on the day of the Feast of the Sowing. We may, or we may not, see your triumph over Myrddin Wyllt. But now I have to pay you for your food and for your drink; now I have to pay you for my taste of your brother's blood. Here is a denarius with the head of Hadrian. Put this along with the rest in that chest of yours. I believe I forgot to close its lid."

Well! He had done it! He had outraged the most solemn tradition, the deepest mystical piety, of the oldest race in the land. To eat of these men's bread, to drink of their blood — and what had they done to him and his House? His brother was still Prince of Edeyrnion. Sibylla was still unraped. No one had been even threatened but these intruders from Caergwynt and Caerleon. As for the blood spilt between them, it had all belonged to this ridiculous Llew!

It was the emperor's business, not theirs, to clear the land of Colgrim and Baldulf and these Saeson pirates. The emperor's business? No! No! That was going too far! Had the House of Cunedda, that at the bidding of Rome had cleared all Edeyrnion of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, descended as low as that?

He remembered the rush of indignation with which he'd caught the name Colgrim in the corridor of the Modrybedd. No! No! His weakness and confusion was carrying him too far. Even though that hurricane of daring thought that had swept through him from some large and remote horizon had dispersed now that the thing was done, at least it was done. His Cunedda blood had risen in its pride and challenged the ultimate piety of his mother's people. He had made his choice just as Morfydd had made hers. As a Brython he had lived; and as a Brython he had paid this enemy of the Emperor Arthur with Hadrian's denarius!

Well! He must get out of this place now and away back to the Gaer, and tomorrow he must take Morfydd home. He would at least have her to himself for the next twenty-four hours.

All these thoughts — each with its own comet's tail of agitating emotions — had barely rushed through his mind when he became aware of the unruffled equanimity with which the Derwydd had taken this final calculated affront.

The man's countenance was so adapted by Nature to express lively and fascinated wonder that Brochvael found it totally impossible to say whether the absorbed interest with which he accepted the coin and took it at once to the light to examine it, and finally, summoning both Morgant and Drom, explained to them what it was, was assumed or not. Hardly assumed at any rate could be the tone he was now using about the Great Wall built by this emperor, and about the forced labour that had constructed it, and how an ancestor of the Bychan of this very Mound had successfully flouted it by living with a band of Gwyddyl-Ffichti for months in a wattled hut, daubed with clay like a martin's nest, beneath its very ramparts!

"But this is indeed a treasure you have given me, Brochvael ab Iddawc," pronounced the Derwydd quietly. "I thank you for it, my Lord. It shall be a covenant between us. And if our memorable Feast on Sunday result, as you predict, in my destruction by Arthur's counsellor, I shall certainly see that it comes again into your hands. And now farewell, my Lord.

"My servants will guide you and will guide this lady whither you wish to go — you, I take it, to the Gaer and she to her home. You need not and you need not" — here he looked significantly at Sibylla— "have any anxiety about my brother. This," and he pointed to the place where he had deposited the phial of mandragora, "cured the hurt he got yesterday and it will cure the hurt he got tonight. What a Ffichtiaid woman could not do is not destined to be done by a Gwyddyles. I might add that when you two together" — and as he said this, still standing close under the light beside the chess board, it seemed to the persons he was addressing that it was no mere trick of the yellow flame that one of his raised eyebrows hesitated to follow its fellow in their accustomed upward tilt— "that when you two together cross the threshold of Ty Cerrig it will be wise to remember that it was not from our people that my mother, Rhelemon, received the name of yr Ellylles, the 'she-devil!'"

Having spoken this final word — a word that came nearer to a personal threat than any he had yet uttered — the Derwydd turned to Morgant and Drom. "You men are responsible for these people tonight, wherever they wish to go! Do you understand, Morgant ap Cynfelyn? Do you understand, Drom ap Dinsol? You're not to leave them till they're safe where they wish to be!"

Having uttered these words he proceeded to behave as if all four of them were already out of sight. He began, in fact, a singular and not very appealing ritual on behalf of his injured brother; and since Sibylla was talking earnestly to Morgant about the various forest paths and about where it would be best for their ways to divide, Brochvael, still feeling uncomfortable and ashamed, watched his movements with sombre curiosity.

The first thing the Derwydd did was to wash out with meticulous care the bowl from which Brochvael had been drinking. This he did at a stone trough by the side of the steps they had first descended. Into this trough, dripping and oozing from a slippery wall of green moss, ran a steady trickle of iron-dark water, water which later drained itself away through a leak in the trough and vanished down a hole in the floor.

When the bowl was clean he filled the bottom of it from the phial of mandragora and diluted this with an equal portion of water. Then as Brochvael watched him with growing interest he was amazed to see him gravely and deliberately spit into the bowl three times.

"The Trinity again!" thought the traveller. "What triads there'll be when the priest and this fellow do get together!"

But further observation of the Derwydd's curative alchemy was now cut short. "Shall we be going, Arglwydd Brochvael?" Sibylla's voice was calm and her tunic was neatly girded up for the forest paths.

Brochvael instinctively made sure that the borrowed dagger used so recently to such potent effect was safe in his own belt. "Lead on then!" he responded; and with the dimunitive son of Dinsol bringing up the rear they ascended the steps.

Brochvael had not observed on their former acquaintance with this entrance how tightly in the course of years the roots of the huge pine tree had twisted themselves about these mossy steps. He couldn't resist pausing for a second to note the queer effect of these vast roots as the moonlight threw them into black relief between his face and the ankles of the girl above him, making him think of the arms of Briareus, the Titan.

"Would I have belonged," he thought, "to the earth-born rebels in that old struggle, or to the crafty rulers of the upper air?" But he had plenty of time to ponder on other matters than the war between Olympus and Othrys before they reached the dividing of their ways, for their guides gave them no opportunity till they arrived at this point to exchange a single private word together.

Nor were they alone then. Morgant, with whom the girl had been conversing as they went, now declared his intention of accompanying her to the Gwern, or "Alder Swamp" of the Gwyddylaid. "Move away for a moment then, both of you," he commanded, "while I bid the lady farewell. You needn't look so distressed. Just out of hearing is all I ask — no further than that tree; and then we'll separate, and you'll have obeyed your master to the letter."

With evident suspicion and extreme reluctance the men withdrew to the spot indicated; and once there they remained intensely alert, their dark figures in the moonlight resembling images of runners on tiptoe for a race.

The girl gazed up at him in silence, her face a pallid blur, inscrutably passive, waiting for him to speak.

"Whether we meet at the Feast on Sunday," he murmured, taking her hand and raising it to his lips, "is in the lap of the gods. But we've just had the Derwydd's own word that we're to meet at the Stone House on Monday, so I shall expect you, Sibylla."

“I will come, Arglwydd Brochvael.”

“If we’re alive.”

“If we’re alive, my Lord.”

CHAPTER XV. Myrddin Wyllt

SATURDAY, SATURN'S DAY, or the Day of Cronos, fell, that eventful week in Edeyrnion, on the twentieth of October and was ushered in at Saint Julian's Fount, where the tents and pavilions of the Arthurian mission still remained intact, by one of those light variable mists that are more characteristic of that part of the country than the thicker overshadowings.

This morning's mist had nothing about it, for instance, of that faint stubble-field tinge that had so arrested the attention of the younger Porius all the evening of Thursday. Nor did it in any way resemble the thick white fog that sometimes covered that valley as if by a death sheet.

In the case of this latter phenomenon any visitor who left the banks of the Divine River and climbed even a short way up the slope of the mountain would soon find himself clear altogether of the fog, which presently he would see below him like an undulating ocean of snow-white clouds rising in curving billows up the sides of the bigger hills, while the tops of the lesser hills and even the tops of trees would emerge from it as from a flood that was overspreading the whole land.

From the more transparent mist, however, that dominated this particular dawn no hill climber would be able to escape. And yet neither the higher mountains nor the far-off curves of the river were concealed by it. But it completely altered their appearance. It turned them into a background for a different type of human drama. It gave them an enchantment they lacked in the clearer air. It made the mountains less substantial and the river more diaphanous.

A traveller saw them emphatically enough, but he saw them through a re-creative medium, as at a different hour or on a different day he might see them through sunlight, or through moonlight, or even, under special conditions, through driving rain.

But if it were possible to see the far reaches of the Divine River transformed by this sort of transparent mist, just as you could see these same serpentine curves and the hills above them transformed by moonlight or by sunlight, it must be allowed that there was one form of the mystery of light in that district, and indeed throughout all Britain, that had the power of drawing attention to itself independently of anything beside itself or beyond itself.

I refer to the uniquely cold, uniquely sad, uniquely portentous light of early dawn. We cry glibly, “How the sun shines through the mist!” or “How the moon shines through the mist!” but the first light of dawn and the greyness of the mist it reveals strike us as independent phenomena simultaneously generated.

By imperceptible degrees the first infinitely faint change in the warm dark bosom of the night reaches us like the tolling of a bell under water and with a tragic greyness, far more deathlike than anything to be found in the comfortable embrace and kindly oblivion of darkness; and there comes into existence, thrusting itself between the familiar alternation of night and day, a death-cold, corpselike, alien entity newly arrived upon earth from heaven knows where.

And from the first moment we are conscious of the dawn we are conscious of it as a thing in itself, as personal as sunlight and moonlight, but in a curious way less natural than these two. There is indeed nothing on earth more supernatural than the first light of dawn. The life juices, the life sap in all living things, sink low with the approach of this stranger from beyond the border. This is the hour for which the dying wait so long, and at the coming of which the watchers by the bed shiver and stare at one another.

Thus while in relation to sunlight and moonlight the particular mist to which reference has been made, this most transparent of all our island mists, whose dedicated home is in Edeyrnion, appears as a magical transformer of rocks and streams and hillsides, in relation to the first greyness of the dawn it shows itself — if a traveller marks it at all — as a minor element in the background of an elemental tragedy. It is the supernatural fatality of this early light of the dawn that in itself, in the cold absoluteness of its stark acceptance of death, begins, fulfils, and ends this primeval tragedy.

With the first ray of the rising sun, or rather with the first streaks of yellow or crimson in the eastern horizon, this tragic elemental mystery play is over. These golden and rosy streaks are the warm lamps of the chattering exit when the diurnal theatre is left in its darkness. Forgotten by sun and moon, excluded from the huge heart of the all-obliterating night, the weird protagonist of that brief prehistoric drama has vanished.

But always when the appointed hours have rolled round and the day’s exhaustions and the night’s restorations are over, the tragic stranger reappears, his appearance preceded and followed by the kind of supernatural chill that needs something as stark as itself in the soul of the spectator who can welcome it without quailing.

If it had been possible for the ancestors of the forest people, in the days when Mynydd-y-Gaer was ruled by Rhitta the Giant, to explain to some merchant from Crete or Egypt how the sun and the moon were made, he would almost certainly have implied that this spectral light of dawn, with its phantom sense of drowned populations rising and falling on the grey waves of oceanic floods, was already in existence on the coasts of chaos long ere either sunlight or moonlight appeared; and it may well be that those of the human race who can watch with equanimity this death-cold stranger have something in them of the endurance of those primeval souls.

On this particular day of Saturn the grey light of which I speak appeared at all parts of that little portion of the earth's surface simultaneously. A moment or two ago everywhere in forest and swamp the velvet weight of the all-enfolding night had been pressing evenly upon grass and trees and bushes and moss and mud and reedy pools. Whereas now, all over that region, there suddenly appeared, as if born of the body of night herself, and in places where no eye could see any difference between east or west, that extraordinary ash grey effluence, which, while it is the precursor of the richest reassurance of all life, remains in itself by the power of some prehistoric mystery the saddest thing upon earth.

If there were differences at Saint Julian's Fount between the dawn's relation to particular rocks and stones and trees and even to particular movements of the mist, it would almost seem as though such differences could only be detected by certain wild animals or by a few peculiar human beings whose disposition resembled that of wild animals; but the chances are that these human creatures would be no better capable of expressing what they divined than the animals they resembled.

Did it strike any such creatures when the day of Saturn chanced to fall on the twentieth of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine that this early dawn and this early mist were two living entities that strove together, and, independently of all the rocks and ridges and all the precipices and level pastures, found their variable victory or defeat according to the waxing and waning of their own inherent powers? What was the cause, for instance, that a fainter ripple of ash grey light appeared on one side of Saint Julian's Fountain than on the other, or that a more protracted lifting of the pressure of darkness took place on the summit of y Bychan's Mound than in the open space round Gwendydd's pavilion?

One of the creatures of earth in that region who might have been able to answer such questions concerning the retardings and accelerations of that ash grey dawn was Myrddin Wyllt.

As he lay on his back in the inner chamber of Gwendydd's pavilion he could see only a very narrow space of the forest outside through a square hole in the sailcloth of the tent. But through this square hole across which the upward-tapering twigs of the extreme end of an ash-tree bough were visible against the sky, Myrddin Wyllt was as competent as any wolf, or fox, or hare, or badger, or squirrel to estimate the precise significance of the infinitesimally faint changes in the air and in the sky round and about those ash-tree twigs that indicated the approach of the death-cold visitation whose presence, ever since human beings first observed it, must have evoked a sadness at once tender and absolute.

In a mood of complete relaxation and ineffable peace did the emperor's counsellor contemplate this square in the canvas of his tent, letting the phantom waters of the world flow past him, carrying the dead, carrying the living, carrying the unborn.

At last there came a faint twitter from some small bird, then after a few minutes another twitter, a little louder; and then, with its harshest cry — but compared with the pervasive deathly grey light that familiar harsh note sounded homely and reassuring — a crow flapped past the opening. Then there followed in succession, first a hound's troubled baying, then a horse's anxious whinny, and at last, careless and confident and full of a reckless defiance of death by life, the friendly crowing of a cock. But there was something else now that disturbed the abandoned passivity in which the counsellor lay. This was the breathing of a human creature at his bed's head.

“Is that you, Neb?” he whispered.

“Yes, great Master. There’s the sort of mist abroad today that never ends in rain. Have we got till noon as your Mightiness predicted?”

“Till noon, child. Just about five and a half hours. So we mustn’t linger over our refreshment too long. What have you brought?”

Both of them spoke in whispers that were lower than ordinary whispers. Both of them had an air of conspiracy and a tendency to glance apprehensively at the portion of the tent that separated them from the outer pavilion.

Raising himself on his pillows and casting a sidelong glance downwards to the left of his bed, Myrddin Wyllt was aware of what, in spite of the faint light, he quite correctly took for the upper portion of the boy’s face.

Neb’s eyes were indeed peering up at him over the rim of the Phoenician tray which the small creature had just carried in on his head and which he was now with some difficulty trying to balance upon the edge of the bed.

“Careful, little one! Let me help you!” And heaving himself up with as much discretion as he could, for at that particular moment to have sent that tray clattering to the floor might easily have produced the one result that was most of all dreaded by both of them, the counsellor, somewhat clumsily but not ineffectively, got the tray on the bed where it was under his control.

“Climb up at the foot, child,” he whispered, “and we’ll see what you’ve brought. But we mustn’t be long.”

Agile as a monkey, though the bed was as high as an altar and had been put together piece by piece, the son of Digon obeyed; and in less than a minute the enormous skull and broad low forehead and green-black eyes of the man at the head of the bed were confronted by the elflike features and impish gestures of the boy at the foot of the bed, both of them eating large slices of oatcake dipped in pots of honey and both of them drinking large gulps of yellow mead from deep earthenware goblets.

Not a whisper did either of them dare to utter with this distance between them, nor did they exchange more than a few significant signs while Neb assisted his awkward and unwieldy master to dress. So cautious were they both that it was only by a sign that the boy asked the man whether he intended to take his great herdsman's club with him, an object which was propped up at the bed's head; and only by a sign that the man signified his intention of taking no weapon of any kind.

It was just when they were ready to set forth that their inability to address each other above what was barely a whisper proved especially trying, because it then became necessary to decide two important strategic points: first, whether it was worth their while to arrange inside the bedclothes some sort of sham figure that to anyone peeping in would resemble a sleeping man; and second, how to get out of the place so as to leave it securely closed against all incomers before they themselves got back.

Both these sagacious moves presented insurmountable difficulties to the mind of the counsellor, but in the end, after several grotesque scenes of wordless gestures and desperate signs, they were both settled efficiently and expeditiously by the precocious Neb. Standing as closely against the ash tree as he could so that the outlines of his figure would blend in that grey light and phantom mist with the shape of its trunk, Myrddin Wyllt watched with wondering satisfaction his youthful worshipper worming himself out under the canvas of the tent and as soon as he was free replacing the peg he had removed and driving it back into the earth with all his puny strength.

Not till they were out of sight of the tent, however, did they exchange a word, and until that moment they made every use, in spite of the aid they got from the mist and the dim grey light, of all the trees and bushes they passed.

Once out of sight, however, and a subhuman exultation seemed to seize them both. The counsellor took Neb between his great hands and repeatedly flung him into the air and caught him as he came down; while Neb kept climbing the trees like a squirrel and skipping from one to another till he would finally descend with the leap of a wild cat upon the shoulder of his companion.

"When will you call your animals, Master?" the small creature at length enquired, after jumping to the ground from the man's shoulder.

"But I want to tell you first where we're going."

"You needn't tell me, O great Master, for I know."

Myrddin Wyllt gazed with wonder into the prematurely old countenance of his extraordinary companion, rendered still more unchildlike by the grey light of dawn.

"How can you know, Neb ap Digon?"

"By listening to you talking to yourself."

"When do I talk to myself?"

"At night, O mighty one."

"And you are there listening?"

"I am there, great Master."

"Where are we going?"

"To the Cave of Mithras."

"What else do you know?"

"I know how you fool her, and to see that going on makes me worship you most of all."

"You hate her then?"

"I hate them all."

"All women, you mean?"

"Yes, Master. I like to see her think you're afraid of her. I like to see her throw these enchantments over you that you make her think you can't break. I like to see you lying for days without moving and she coming to stare at you and going away so content, and you pretending all the time, and enjoying it more than anything else."

"How do you know I enjoy it, child?"

"Because, when she can't hear you, you talk about it to yourself. Will you make your animals come now, great Master?"

"I can't, child. Nothing will make them come into sight with you so close. Besides, I want your help at the Ford and at the Cave; and you'd run away if they came."

"I'd freeze like a rabbit."

"No, you'd run like a hare."

"If I kept stiller than a rabbit, Master, if I kept as still as a leaf, would they come?"

"Not into sight. But they'd be quite near."

The counsellor and his attendant walked on in silence, but very soon Neb became aware of tramplings and snortings and neighings and gruntings and hissings and chatterings and flappings and breathings and squeakings and scamperings; and it was not concealed from the counsellor that Neb had begun to tremble violently, since with a childish impulse he couldn't restrain he had taken possession of two of his master's fingers.

At last the little creature could stand it no longer. "I can hear a bull bellowing," he whispered. "I don't want him to come any nearer."

"I can't send one away without sending them all away."

This produced a few minutes of hesitation, but a renewed bellowing from the very direction towards which they were walking broke the small creature’s final pride.

“Please send them all away, great Master.”

Myrddin Wyllt displayed no irritation, nor indeed was there any need for any, for in the easy mental instructions he proceeded to give his animals there was one they all understood, understood to the very tips of all their scales, feathers, paws, tails; namely, that they could come as near as they liked without uttering a sound or causing a sound, or giving the human creature by his side the faintest inkling of their presence.

And henceforth, save for the increasing noise of water over stones as they approached the Ford, and a faint intermittent stirring in the dead bracken and the taller grasses and the fallen leaves, from a direction whence such stirrings were rare in that part of the country, there was a wondrous silence between the sacred Fount and the Divine River.

The rare event just referred to was a perceptible rising of the wind that was, of all the eight winds of heaven, the most uncommon in Edeyrnion, namely, the southeast wind.

Not only was the southeast wind a rare visitant in that valley where the prevailing wind was southwest and its usual alternative northeast, but for any wind from any quarter to arise upon a dawn already dominated by mist was more than unusual, it was phenomenal; and Myrddin Wyllt, as he recognized its presence, welcomed it as a special sign from the elemental powers.

“Nobody has been here,” he said to himself when he and his companion reached the riverbank, “since Thursday night when I crossed with those young men.” He knew this from the position of the punting pole which he had observed Rhun balancing against a particular alder stump and between two little shoots that in spite of the season had young leaves growing on them.

He now took the pole out of the hands of his page and proceeded to use it himself, anxious to cross quickly, and also anxious to spare the small creature the shame of being unable to struggle with the current. But after they had mounted the steep bank on the further side and had drawn near the mouth of the Cave, he paused to give the son of Digon a task more adapted to his strength.

"Have you flint and steel, little one?" he enquired. "And something you can set light to, so as to make yourself a torch?"

A radiant smile lit up Neb's downcast face. Nodding expressively, his tiny hands went straight to some secret pocket beneath his fantastic Arthurian livery, out of which he produced every conceivable modern invention for reenacting the great Promethean defiance of the jealous ruler of gods and men.

Myrddin Wyllt surveyed him with approval. He himself was attired in the same rough sheepskin and rustic leggings as he had worn when he first encountered the young worshipper of Mithras and his kinsman-convert.

"You're not afraid to go into the Cave with me?"

"Not with you, great Master."

"Come on, then."

But the page pulled at the man's sleeve to arrest his full attention.

"What is it, child?"

"I always tell everybody that you're afraid of her. I told Prince Porius and Rhun ap Gwrnach."

The counsellor made a motion as if to tug at his great beard, but that characteristic adjunct was so securely tucked away that all he could reach to assist his thinking was a woolly and strong-smelling lining.

"Quite right," he responded gravely, "as long as you tell it mischievously and secretively and don't just babble it. But to one person you may babble it, and add all you like to invent of her power over me."

The wizened little face lifted up to confront those two great cavernous green-black eyes under the broad low forehead was alive with excitement.

"I can guess who!" he cried.

"Who then?"

"The Henog of Dyfed."

"By Hecate, you've said the word! How in the name of heaven did you arrive at him?"

Neb gave the only being he respected an impish wink.

"I know he's writing about you, mighty one, for the people of the future. I heard you say yourself that people two thousand years hence will read about you in what the Henog of Dyfed says. I know it was you because I didn't know what 'hence' meant and I know what everybody else's words mean."

"Do you know why I want the Henog of Dyfed to tell posterity that Myrddin Wyllt was helpless in the power of Nineue ferch Avallach?"

Neb gave his master another impish wink.

"You do, little one? Well, on my soul, I believe you do!"

"Because as long as the Three-in-One rule in heaven, cruelty and love and lies rule on earth."

The counsellor's green-black eyes seemed to sink inwards into his skull, and, as they sank, the bridge of the nose dividing them seemed to sink away also, so that as they increased in depth they not only increased in size but displayed a tendency to coalesce and become Cyclopean.

"Did you hear me say that?"

Again Neb nodded.

"Tell me, little one, what is it that makes you serve me as you do?"

Never had Neb's face looked so grave.

“Because you were God before the Three-in-One conquered heaven, and you made people happy before cruelty and love and lies ruled the earth.”

Myrddin Wyllt said not a word in response to this, but he offered two of his fingers for the small creature’s comfort and support, and hand in hand they entered the Cave.

Once inside and appealed to by his master for light, Neb ap Digon came more fully into his own than he had yet done in all his short life.

He lost all his fear at once. He dropped the fingers of his master; and so well did he manipulate his flint and steel that before long there were torches burning in their sconces in all parts of the Cave, and Rhun’s supply of oil had been discovered, and the wick replenished in the small votive lamp that hung before the image of the child Mithras wearing his Phrygian cap and the image of Cronos wound round about by his serpentine symbol of unending Time.

Having accomplished all this, his eyes gleaming in the torchlight and something approaching a flush in the pale cheeks, Neb now proceeded at a hint from his master to gather enough kindling and odds and ends of dry wood to make a comfortable fire within the Cave’s entrance, not far from the spot where a couple of days before the devoted white hound had crouched on guard, awaiting the sound of Rhun’s voice from the river below.

By the side of this fire, his head propped up on a heap of bracken and his face turned towards the Cave’s mouth, Myrddin Wyllt now laid himself down.

“Bring me that image, child, will you, of the old god with the serpent twined about him.”

Neb looked at him with consternation. “But, mighty one,” he protested, “that’s your own image, before the cruel ones made you what you are now.”

Myrddin Wyllt felt so confounded with astonishment that all he could do was to fumble desperately with his herdsman's garment till he really did succeed in getting hold of his great beard. He even managed to pluck it forth not only from beneath his outer garment but from beneath the woollen vest he wore next to his skin; nor was he content till it lay in full view upon his spacious chest, covering the sheepskin completely and descending below his belt.

With all his fingers at work toying with this mass of jet-black hair he felt better able to fix his green-black eyes upon the pinched countenance before him, the countenance of the only worshipper he had left upon earth after ten thousand years of the tyranny of the Olympian, and four hundred and ninety-nine years of the tyranny of the Three-in-One.

"Who was the god who long ago gave mankind and all the creatures of earth a Golden Age of Happiness?"

Neb held his peace, but he pointed significantly with the index finger of his right hand at the centre of the great beard before him.

"Who is the god who one day — perhaps ten thousand years from now — will again give mankind and all the creatures of earth a Golden Age of Happiness?"

Again Neb lifted his thin arm clothed in the grotesque imperial livery and pointed at the exposed beard before him.

"Whose tomb is it they made on the top of the highest peak of Eryri, the peak they call yr Wyddfa?"

"The tomb of Cronos."

"What do the Romans call Cronos?"

His ability to deal with this important point so enchanted the wizened infant that he made three skips from sheer joy, causing some stray wisps of half-burnt bracken stalks to grow red again and emit their fragrant smoke.

While his prostrate divinity coughed a little under this infliction, the son of Digon explained that in their pride and insolence the Romans had changed the name of the god of the Golden Age from Cronos to Saturn, but had been compelled by the plebs, or common people of every land, to hold at the end of every year a feast called the Saturnalia, when in anticipation — Neb used a cruder word — of the Golden Age to come, all masters became slaves and all slaves became masters.

Still coughing from the smoke raised by his worshipper's dance of joy, Myrddin Wyllt thought in his heart: "Why have I taken this child's understanding for granted ever since I gave him to Gwendydd to rear? Has he served me in all my incarnations? Has he hated some woman like Nineue in every life we have shared, since the beginning? And who was he at the beginning?" The prophet coughed, choked, spluttered, and sighed heavily.

"What a thing," he thought, "that even I, the son of earth and heaven, even I, the liberator of earth from heaven, should have no more idea what existence is, or what life is, or what death is, or what cosmos and chaos are, than this funny little creature who must have been my companion every two thousand years since the beginning, that is to say, if there ever was a beginning!" — and he thought of the twisted serpent with his tail in his mouth.

"Run now, will you, and get me that image of myself with the snake round me? Yes, little one, you know about as much as your old Saturn knows as to what life really is — whether it's the life of gods or men. You can leave Mithras where he is with his lamp burning. It's no good for us rebels not to respect one another. For all of us sons of earth, the enemy is the reigning despot of heaven, whether that despot is the Olympian, as he has been for the last ten thousand years, or this new Triad of Cruelty, Love, and Lies, who will rule for the next two thousand years. But get me that image of myself."

The moment Neb was gone Myrddin Wyllt uttered a long, low, faint whistle, a whistle inaudible to the retreating messenger, but a whistle that found its way through the air in smooth vibratory spirals out of the Cave's mouth.

It was answered at once. There was a quick movement among the grasses outside, followed by a quiver among the heaps of stray leaves that lay all about the entrance, and by an undulant rustle, like the motion of a mole under the earth, beneath the scattered wisps of half-burnt bracken that surrounded the prostrate man.

Finally, and long before Neb had returned, a small but unusually active slowworm slid across the prophet's arm and wound itself like a living bracelet about his wrist. Making sure that the creature was comfortable, satisfied, and secure, Myrddin Wyllt concealed his wrist in his enormous beard.

"Angulo-meetis," he murmured complacently, "crooked counselling Cronos still!"

On Neb's return with the image, he took it from the boy with his free hand and laid it on the ground by his side.

"Get me a couple of big stones."

With evident reluctance the small creature obeyed. It was clear that the destruction of an image, even though carried out by the original of that image, caused him some obscure distress of mind.

"Listen, child," said the prophet gently. "You know and I know, and it's the same whether we've had an hundred incarnations in the last ten thousand years or only one brief life, and it's the same whether we are worms or fishes or birds or animals or gods or men, that we are all the victims of pain and desire and hunger and madness and weariness and sickness and misery.

"And the worst of these things is the hatred and cruelty between the families and tribes and races and nations that dwell on the earth. Did the Olympian stop these cruelties with his thunder and his lightning? He did not! Has the Three-in-One stopped these cruelties with his rewards and punishments, with his love and his hate and his lies? He has not! Child, queer one, little one, ancient companion of twenty thousand years, will you tell me who did stop these hatreds and these wars and cruelties between men?"

Neb laid down the two heavy stones he was hugging in his arms and once more pointed the first finger of his right hand at the centre of the vast beard before him, under which the prophet's hidden wrist seemed to be making somewhat unnatural movements for that portion of a man's frame.

"And when will the next Golden Age be?"

"When you rule the world again, my Master and my God!"

"And shall I tell you, Neb ap Digon, how I made the first Golden Age, and how — only it's all a mystery and a riddle — I hope one day to make the second?"

The little creature nodded vigorously.

"By putting an end to all tyrants, dictators, despots, rulers, kings, priests, and governments. By putting an end to myself — as a god — and leaving men and all the children of earth — alone!"

"A fine example I'm showing," thought Myrddin Wyllt, "of 'crooked counselling!' Aye! I know it! The whole thing, all my half-memories, all my super visions, may be pure imagination."

An intense gravity seemed to be tightening and screwing up the mischievous little face that was watching him.

“My only believer, my only friend,” he thought, “is this funny little manikin! For what does Arthur know, save to chase Saxon pirates into the sea with Roman cavalry?”

The counsellor’s green-black, eyes grew larger and darker and closer together as they encountered the intense stare of Neb ap Digon.

The child’s lips suddenly moved. “May I ask you something, Master?”

“Anything! Anything! Only remember this, little one. At bottom — whether I begot that thundering Olympian or not, and whether the Olympian begot this new Three-in-One or not — I know no more of these mysteries than you do. No! Not a bit more!”

Neb permitted the shadow of a flicker of a smile to cross his young-old face as he listened to the echo in the recesses of the Cave of Mithras repeating the counsellor’s deep-throated “not a bit more!” But neither the words nor their echo stopped his question.

“They all keep talking of the devil, Master. Who is the devil?”

The latest incarnation of the god of the Golden Age made a sound between a chuckle and a groan.

“Listen, child. Do you think obedience is a good thing?”

“Am I to say the truth?”

“Of course.”

And Neb the son of Digon boldly shook his impish head. “No, Master. I don’t. It’s what cruel people do to children and animals.”

The resurrected one from yr Wyddfa positively clapped his hands at this reply.

“Well then, the devil is every god who exacts obedience.”

“What turns a god into a devil, Master?”

“Power, my son. Nobody in the world, nobody beyond the world, can be trusted with power, unless perhaps it be our mother the earth; but I doubt whether even she can. The Golden Age can never come again till governments and rulers and kings and emperors and priests and druids and gods and devils learn to unmake themselves as I did, and leave men and women to themselves! And don't you be deceived, little one, by this new religion's talk of 'love.' I tell you, wherever there is what they call 'love' there is hatred too and a lust for obedience! What the world wants is more common sense, more kindness, more indulgence, more leaving people alone.

"But let them talk! This new Three-in-One with its prisons and its love and its lies will only last two thousand years. The thunderer I begot — and I'd have swallowed him if his mother hadn't given me a stone instead — lasted for ten thousand years. But none of them lasts forever. That's the hope of the world. The earth lasts and man lasts, and the animals and birds and fishes last, but gods and governments perish!

"And now, little one, I want you to see how I have a real right to break up the image of one god at least. You mustn't be frightened if I show you how my pet snake — it has to be a little one because real snakes are rare round here, and this was the only one near enough to hear me whistle — twines itself round my wrist and tries to put its tail into its mouth. A slowworm can act unending Time as well as a sea serpent. You won't be afraid, Neb ap Digon?"

"No, Master!"

And the small creature really did show no sign of uneasiness as the being who declared he had been buried on yr Wyddfa revealed his wrist with the slowworm twisted round it so tightly that its tail did give the impression of entering its mouth.

But the counsellor now began murmuring something in a language that was apparently more difficult for his human listener to understand than for the slowworm, for that intelligent reptile promptly untwisted itself from his wrist, glided across his beard, and crawling along one of his legs made its way silently and rapidly into the open air.

It was then that Neb ap Digon gazed with such an unhappy countenance from the stones he had placed beside his master to the image that was now in his master's hand, that Myrddin Wyllt felt a sudden throb of pity.

"Very good, my child," he said gently. "Your idol shall remain. Whether I was Cronos or not I never took arms against anything but the tyranny of heaven. There! Take the thing back. Blow out both the lamps and put out the torches. I want to see the rising of the sun."

With a look of gratitude and worship such as few idols and still fewer living divinities have ever received from their votaries, the son of Digon snatched up the image and rushed into the interior of the Cave. When he returned his master was already outside and was climbing the slope above the entrance.

The child followed him and soon realized why the man was walking so quickly. The whole eastern sky, now that the wind had driven away every trace of mist, had become an unfathomably receding gulf of Space, of Space that had assumed a pale green colour.

And it became clear to Neb ap Digon that the point at which his master and his god was pointing was a rocky ridge covered with nothing but dead bracken; and the child knew that from this ridge a certain wide concavity in the foothills above the House of Stone and the Giant's Cave allowed a glimpse of the valley through which, after it had turned in its course, the sacred river flowed directly eastward.

Panting and perspiring, and using his thin arms almost as much as his thin legs as he went, running and crawling and climbing, and dragging himself up by every possible vantage that offered itself among tree roots and heather stalks, Neb kept gasping out his voiceless prayers between his heartbeats to his master-god that he might be permitted to overtake him before he reached the ridge at which he was aiming.

But it was evident that this bearded enemy of heavenly despotism — whether his rebellious incarnations reverted back to crooked counselling Cronos or not — was prepared to apply the “Golden Age” method of letting the unfortunate creatures of earth have their little pleasures, such as they were, undisturbed by celestial discipline or mystical schooling, even in such minor occasions as waiting for the smallest of worshippers; for he suddenly swung round, waved his hands to indicate to his follower that there was no need for him to come so fast, and, throwing himself down on the ground, began — so it appeared to the panting Neb as he advanced less violently — to scrabble with his hands among the slaty stones upon a barren patch of the hillside where there was no earth out of which grass or ferns or heather could grow.

When at last he sank down, breathing hard but happily triumphant by the counsellor’s side, he heard Myrddin Wyllt give a deep-throated groan of satisfaction and saw him extract from among the stones a huge fragment of slate with jagged edges.

Seated on the ground with this formidable object across his knees the counsellor proceeded to feel with his fingers these slaty teeth, muttering as he did so the words “adamas karcharos” and gazing alternately at the wide landscape immediately beneath him and at those green gulfs of Space away to his right. He was so absorbed that by the time Neb had regained his breath the child’s satisfaction at having overtaken his master was seriously shaken by his conviction that the man had become completely unconscious of his presence. Nor was his uneasiness altogether alleviated when Myrddin Wyllt, evidently making an effort to throw off his abstraction, pointed to the unwieldy shape of the waning moon floating now like an overloaded, waterlogged, drifting ship in the less luminous sky to their left, and began murmuring, half to the child and half to himself, an obscure and confused monologue — Neb couldn't tell whether its drift was praise or obloquy — addressed to this shapeless creature.

At last, and with an obvious effort that was distressing to Neb to witness, the counsellor flung away his memory trance, or whatever it was, as a man might tear an arrowhead from his own flesh.

"You go on up there, little one," he said, "and see the sun rise. Don't stare at it if it's too bright and don't be frightened if you see anyone coming. They'll be a long way off and I'll be here. But see how long it takes for it to rise above the hill; you might count — one — two — three — four — only don't count too quickly. See if you can count a hundred!"

Neb jumped up with alacrity. Then an alarming thought crossed his mind.

"You swear you'll be here when I come back, Master? And you'll be in sight all the time when I look round, and you won't vanish away?"

The crooked-counselling enemy of high heaven smiled.

"I swear I'll be here. And I swear I won't vanish. I swear by the Styx."

More reassured by his master's smile than by his reference to the Styx, Neb ap Digon went off, climbing, scrambling, crawling, and pulling himself up as before, though at about half his former speed and with periodic pauses to look back.

At last he reached the desired ridge, and less out of breath but much less pleased with himself than when he overtook the counsellor, he glanced hurriedly at the wide gap above the eastward-flowing river beyond which a circular hilltop outlined itself darkly against the receding gulf of pallid green sky. He was in time. There was no sign yet of the sun.

With a sigh of relief he turned to make sure his master was still where he had left him, but what he saw down there made him give vent to a sharp little cry.

The counsellor was standing erect with one arm raised above his head, and it looked to Neb as if he were making savage movements with the great jagged piece of slate-rock, slashing the air with it in fierce cuts and jabs.

The man must have exerted a formidable energy in this appalling gesture, for Neb now saw him fling the stone away and sink down upon the earth, evidently totally exhausted. It was not that "obedience" which he'd just heard his master reprobating that enabled the little boy at this crisis to restrain himself from turning his back on the green sky and rushing to the man's aid. It was in fact something that had happened to the sky itself, and an instinctive awareness of this made him hurriedly turn to see if those green gulfs were still there.

Yes, they were there, but across them now were two long sinister streaks of blood-red crimson, and as he looked Neb could not resist the feeling that those streaks of crimson blood were in some way connected with the counsellor's brandishing that jagged-toothed fragment of adamantine stone.

But even while he was staring at them, those crimson streaks grew dim. Presently they faded away altogether, and almost at once their place was taken by feathery wisps of shining gold; and, simultaneously with the appearance of these, there arose above that curved hill a point of blazing white light accompanied by dazzling rays, like pointed javelins, which radiated down the slope of the hill as if they were defending it from some shadowy rearguard of darkness invisible to human eye.

Although the number of times Neb turned his back upon the resplendent lord of light now rising before him, to make sure that the prostrate figure on the unillumined hillside behind him hadn't sunk into the earth, might have served as a rough method of calculating how long this blazing circle was taking to rise, whose circumference now began to be filled, not so much with burning white fire as with a mysterious vacuum, in the creation of which fire had given place to a blazing whiteness that was whiter than light itself, it must be allowed that in the matter of counting the minutes it took for this phenomenon to occur he did definitely follow his mysterious friend's ideas and threw obedience to the wind.

When, however, the fiery circle had completely freed itself from the curve of that far-away hill there shot through him, like one of those first rays, the memory of what the counsellor had said about not being frightened if he saw anyone coming — for there, only about a quarter of a mile away and crossing a platform of bare rock directly between his own ridge and the now dazzling sun, appeared three human figures, two women and a little girl.

Without giving them a second glance he had already begun his precipitous descent when he noticed that the counsellor was no longer lying on the ground, but was standing erect with his face turned towards the Ford across the river where Rhun's barge still lay.

This sight, while it relieved his anxiety about his great friend, had also the instantaneous effect of arousing in him his natural, and since he'd been a court foundling from infancy it might also be said his professional instinct, to discover who these women were before he announced their presence.

Back therefore he went; but this time he took care to make a cautious and circuitous approach to the nearest point of observation which was a patch of perishing and yellowing bracken that had not yet sunk level with the ground.

Peering at the newcomers as he lay prone under this ferny screen he was astonished to note that one was a young and beautiful girl, bearing every sign — for the son of Digon was a virtuoso in these niceties — of being the sort of woman whom tribal tradition, family power, and her own self-esteem has made a privileged figure.

Down the hill he now scrambled at top speed, making not the faintest attempt to diminish the disturbing noise which even the descent of so small a creature was bound to make. This he did by reason of the fact that the thing of all things that he himself dreaded most was to be surprised off-guard; and consequently he treated his friend, whether devil or god, whether conjurer or magician, as he preferred to be treated himself.

Myrddin Wyllt swung round to greet him, and Neb noticed that the queer man had forgotten since he came out of the Cave to conceal his black beard under his herdsman's sheepskin.

"I saw the whole of the sunrise, great Master!" he panted, "and I didn't count the time! But the blood in the sky turned to golden foam before it rose. And there are two women coming and a girl-child with them, and one of the women comes from the north — I know by her dress — and I think she is the other's nurse. But the other is beautiful and young, but not like the ladies of the court. But I can tell she is a high-born lady all the same; and I think she may be Morfydd ferch Brochvael herself, who is to marry Porius ab Einion."

"Who is the child?"

"I don't know, great Master. But I would say from the look of her a Gwyddyl-Ffichti child."

"What makes you say that?"

"She runs by herself, Master, and looks about her, and stops behind them, and picks up things, and runs ahead. Brython children have learnt from the Romans how to behave. If she'd been a Brython she'd be holding one of those women's hands and listening as they talked to each other — not looking for toads and frogs and calling to the crows. Besides she wouldn't have given her doll to the old woman to hold. A Brython child never trusts her doll to anyone else."

"God's blood! But you must have been near to them to see all this, Neb ap Digon."

"Not so very near. It's long practise, great Master, and knowing the ways of women."

"Well, my young friend, if you're right and it is Morfydd ferch Brochvael, she's probably sent a message to young Porius to meet her here."

"To Porius ab Einion, did you say, Master? The man she's going to marry?"

The counsellor's green-black eyes grew smaller and endless little wrinkles formed themselves round their corners. Neb couldn't see his mouth for his beard.

"Well, my child," he said, "I'll leave you here to show the Lady Morfydd the Cave of Mithras. Only don't frighten that little girl by starting echoes. It's as bad as the mouth of Tartarus, that Cave, for the echoes it makes. I wouldn't be surprised if it went down to Tartarus."

"You're not going back without me, Master?"

Neb's voice clearly indicated that he was much more dismayed at the prospect of being left with two women and a little girl than at the thought of the Cave of Mithras being connected with Tartarus.

"No, no, my friend! I'm only going to take the boat over so that the princess's friend can cross the river if she has arranged a tryst in this place. If I don't return soon it'll only mean I'm waiting for him on the other side.

We still have about three hours left us. Listen, child! If I don’t appear with somebody before the sun reaches the mouth of the Cave, you must bring them down to the ferry and we’ll see what’s to be done. One thing is certain. You and I must be safe back in my tent by noon.”

Neb nodded with the infinite comprehension of an age-old conspirator.

“Better hunt round the Cave before they come and find something for them to eat and drink. These Mithras worshippers are women haters like yourself, little one. But a taste of his sacred honey — Don’t be frightened now! I swear I won’t leave the ferry.”

Slowly and heavily the “herdsman from the south” walked down the slope. As he passed the Cave’s entrance a wisp of smoke on the wind indicated to him that their fire was not yet extinct, and glancing round he was able to wave reassuringly to his only worshipper as that goblinish little figure lingeringly and reluctantly disappeared. On reaching the river he entered the boat, took the pole, and mechanically punted himself across. He soon realized he had begun slipping into one of his periodic fits of abstraction, but why not yield to it since in any case he had to wait?

Seated therefore on one of the benches with the great pole across his knees, he allowed his mind to float back over spaces of Time that would have made his present biographer, the erudite Henog of Dyfed, gasp with amazement.

It was not that these far-flung excursions of his mind could in any sense be called mystical trances. He could pull himself out of them at any moment, and he could pause at any moment to resume his consciousness of what was occurring in his immediate vicinity. Nor were they always of the past. They were more often of the future. But if his journeys forward and backward through these huge spaces of Time were more like ponderings over obscure memories, and travelling through imagined scenes that were only dimly realized, than they were like any kind of mystical vision, he always regarded them as an essential part of his life.

Almost querulously he made the familiar motion of his mind by which he commanded all his animals and his birds and his fishes and his reptiles to leave him alone and in peace.

"I'm too old," he told himself as he bent over the punting pole and listened to the gurgling of the water, and repeated his order to his animals to leave him alone, "I'm too old to go on wondering why I should be what I am, and not be what I might be, and always be divided by such a gulf from everybody else."

He'd been about the age of Neb ap Digon when his mother had died and left him to the care of the rulers of Britain. Her tale to him about his father had been the same as what she told everybody; namely, that he was a glorious vision of beauty, made of shining light, and more like an angel than a man; nor had she hesitated to let her small son perceive that she herself was puzzled, shocked, and even horrified to find that so heavenly a lover should have caused her to give birth to such an ungainly and hideous progeny.

"No," he said to himself as he released his hold for a moment upon the punting pole on his knees in order to thrust back his great beard beneath his sheepskin, "I'm too old to tread any more that old winepress of vain questioning— 'why am I what I am?' I am what I am, and I shall be what I am; until once again I force high heaven and all its messiahs and prophets and heroes and emperors and kings and druids and priests and rulers to leave the poor creatures of earth alone and let them enjoy themselves together in peace! What'll happen to me then, who can say? I shall probably have too much longing for rest and sleep to care!"

Letting his head sink a little over the punting pole and rocked by the motion of the sacred river under the keelless boat, he allowed his mind to drift back, like one of the alder leaves blown lightly past him, to the moment when — and as his memory fumbled its way among those vast dim immensities of the beginning of things he felt still a weary necessity to remind himself that it might easily all be, just as his mother's story might easily all have been, simply imagination — to the moment when as the "crooked-counselling" child of earth he had seized that sickle of adamantine flint, so vast and jagged, pelorion karcharodonta, and not only dismembered the heavenly despot but driven those monstrous brethren of his own, Cottus and Briareus and Gyes, beyond the nine circles of Oceanus, and even further than that; yes, beyond the lost tenth stream where the black water drips down into the cave of the goddess Styx.

"Is it memory," he thought, as with his half-shut eyes bent down above the punting pole on his knees he envisaged all this, "or do I just imagine it? O human Mother of my hideous flesh, who gave me life only to loathe and despise me, and you, great Mother of us all, mysterious Earth, who yourself have given birth to all the tyrants of heaven from the beginning, why will neither of you ever tell me who I am and whether I imagine these things or not? Mother! Mother!"

This final appeal was uttered in a groaning whisper; and as he uttered it he raised his head an inch or two and his green-black eyes opened wide again, and, as always happened when he was excited, their dark full orbs drew together as if they were about to coalesce in Cyclopean oneness.

But all he saw was the worn gunwale of Rhun's old battered ferryboat and the swirling current of the cold grey water, untouched as yet by any ray of the sun.

“Can’t you explain to me,” he groaned, “you they call Divine Water, why no woman in any of my lives, no woman when I brought stones from Gwent to that southern plain, no woman when I served Gortheyrn Gortheneu, no woman when I gave to men and beasts and birds and reptiles and trees and plants an aeon’s space wherein to enjoy their life, has ever cared for me? Gwendydd shrinks from me just as her mother did! Nineue hates me just as Rhaea did at the beginning of all things, when she gave me a stone to swallow in place of that accurst Olympian! Oh, that I’d been a real ‘crooked counsellor!’ But you also, you the great Earth yourself, took the side of my tyrant son!”

Again his head sank down over the punting pole across his knees, and again his memory went back to that slashing blow with the sickle of jagged flint, which liberated the faithless mother of us all from her heavenly tyrant.

And he saw in his mind the monstrous forms of his brethren, born oppressors of the weak, as he drove them before him with his parricidal weapon beyond the nine circles of Oceanus, “beyond even chaos,” as his old Aeolian biographer, exiled among the crude Boeotians like his present chronicler in Edeyrnion, wrote of him, twice as long before the birth of Christ as the present year is after that crucial event!

Once more he felt himself standing in that terrible grey mist on the ultimate ridges of the world. Once more he surveyed the gulf of Tartarus and the bronze threshold of Hades. Once more he saw the abode of Death and Sleep, once more the dwelling of Styx, “eldest daughter of backward-flowing Ocean.”

And it was only because he had dared this impious deed, only because he had dismembered the tyrant of heaven and driven his monstrous progeny beyond chaos, that he had the power — he, the angulo-meetis, the “crooked counselling” — to give the race of men and the poor creatures of earth their first Golden Age.

“But,” his thoughts ran on, “the Thunderer ended it all. He brought back those monsters, Briareus and Cottus and Gyes, to help him destroy it. O Mother, Mother, are all my voyages into the future to end like that also? Can there be no lasting Golden Age for the children of an earth so faithless, of an earth so ready to conceive, so ready to enthrone, ever new tyrants?”

And what a hideous answer to his prayer it was that even as he called upon his “mother” — and this was one of those curious moments in the life of Myrddin Wyllt when he confused according to what he called his “imagination” the proud, pure nun, loved by that celestial visitor, with the enormous earth mother herself who had helped Rhaea to save the Olympian — there should have come into his mind what in all his flights down the years he had never recalled till this moment, the actual countenance of Styx, “the eldest daughter of backward-flowing Ocean.”

He was standing on the misty ridge at the end of the world between the precipices leading to the mouth of Tartarus and the cavernous entrance to Hades, listening to the dying away of the rumbling retreat and thundering execrations of the monsters who were destined to help his son destroy the Golden Age, when he found his eyes fixed on a vast smooth wall of jet-black rock against which the mist kept blowing in ice-cold gusts as it issued, driven by spiral volleys of wind that were incessantly whirling up, from the mouth of Tartarus. Half of these volleying winds were no sooner clear of the slippery precipices surrounding this abyss than they were caught by an irresistible indrawing suction, a suction that drew them, with a never-ceasing, low-murmuring roar, into the archway that led to Hades, from out of which, as they were sucked in, there arose a dark-throated gurgling noise, like the noise of a deeply buried weir.

But the other half of these whirling eddies of ice-cold air struck against this huge wall of jet-black rock and visibly raced along its surface, for their contact with it precipitated a kind of icy film, which, as it moved beneath their impulse, created all manner of fantastic scrawls and curlicues and hieroglyphs, all of them to be dissolved as soon as they appeared, but only to be re-formed again in endless and infinite succession.

These Tartarean winds, thus brought into interminable visibility by reason of their icy chill, swept up the surface of the rock as well as down, but their downward movement was necessarily unseen by the watcher since he was separated from the face of the rock by a gaping precipitous chasm, which, because of its narrowness and because of the queer movements of this perpetually shifting ice-cold scurf that was forever forming and dissolving and re-forming upon the rock, must have struck his mind, and must now have returned to his memory, as far more repellent than either the precipices leading to Tartarus or the weir-gurgling archway that led to Hades.

Among other things he had forgotten till now was how there had been aroused in him a curious and fantastic pity for the shifting hieroglyphs forming and dissolving, dissolving and re-forming, that were eternally being carried down this narrow chasm between the platform on which he stood and the smooth face of this windswept rock.

In two places only — and here the water had made for itself, during the long aeons of Time in which it had been falling, grooves so deep that the icy winds could not reach it — did the mysterious tenth stream of backward-flowing Oceanus descend, over which the eldest of Ocean’s daughters held rule; and it was as he looked upwards, searching through the freezing mist for the abode of that strange Being, that he caught the unforgettable glimpse of her face.

There was a thousand-year-old stump of some long-dead tree — an ash tree he told himself now — that stretched out, grey and lonely and unutterably sad, from some high orifice far above his head in that vast rock surface.

And why did a thing like this come back to him so clear if it were all imagination? And what had he, the hideous son of a holy nun, or what had he, the servant of Gortheyrn Gortheneu, or what had he, the bearer of the sacred stones to the great plain in the south, or what had he, the counsellor of Uthyr Pendragon, to do with the goddess Styx who dwelt, as the old Greek Henog wrote, "beyond mist-enshrouded chaos," and how was it that he could remember the very words of the tale of what he had done, if he'd never done it? But these Henogs, whether of Dyfed or of Aeolia, were all the same! This one of Arthur's would no doubt describe this very Cave of Mithras as "beyond mist-enshrouded chaos."

But why did this interminable jet-black rock, lost in the mists above his head and with that horrible chasm at its base, now, very now, aeons of ages after, come back so vividly to his mind? Had that old Aeolian Henog imagined it so strongly about him that it had forced him to imagine it about himself?

No! He remembered. He must have read that old Henog's stories long afterwards. Very likely this modern Henog knew all those old ones by heart! And that was what had started him off trying to rival them with his own.

No! He remembered. It was he himself who had seen for a moment — oh, there could be no mistake! Henogs, old or new, could never have put that into his head — the face of Styx herself, eldest daughter of backward-flowing Ocean, leaning out from her cave and peering down at him over her clenched knuckles through that grey ghost of an ash stump.

It all returned to him now, and well might the new gods fear to swear by the water that ran past that face! Those eyes had seen the roots of the earth and the fountains of all the seas; they had seen the ultimate floor of Tartarus; they had seen to the uttermost ends of Hades... They had seen where I flung that sickle of adamant when those monsters fled before my face and I freed earth from the tyranny of heaven!

And having seen all this there remained but one thing, one thing only, only one thing, in the eyes that stared down into mine over the grey ruins of that phantom ash.

And that one thing was death. “From death,” those eyes said, “all that exists has sprung; and to death all that exists will return. Death was the beginning. Death will be the end. It will be the end of gods and men. It will be the end of the starry heaven and the enormous earth. It will be the end of even that which is beyond mist-enshrouded chaos. Give up,” those eyes said, “striving so hard to give men and women and beasts and fishes and birds, and all that feels pain and draws breath, a Golden Age without the meddling of gods and rulers. Give up — let go — have done. It all comes to the same thing in the end.”

Myrddin Wyllt’s enormous head had always a peculiar and even rather savage look when he concealed his beard. His face became rougher and more untamed. The impression he then conveyed was not so much that of a dangerous tribesman belonging to a wild tribe, as of the wandering and lonely herdsman of sheep or goats who has been so accustomed to follow his flock through untraversed and unfrequented regions that he has grown shy and suspicious and even a little inhuman.

At this particular moment, with his head sinking down over his knees and with this curious broadening of his face and obliteration of his chin combining with the shaggy roughness of his hair, he might have given the impression to a stranger come suddenly upon him of being some species of saviour beast or animal redeemer who had that moment accepted on behalf of all the beasts in the world the sentence of the slaughterhouse, and was weighed down by the appalling weight of the burden he had undertaken.

The emperor's counsellor was in plain truth struggling at that moment under a destiny almost too heavy to endure. His eyes were tight shut and the little black hairs on his subhumanly large ears stirred in the wind from the southeast like the antennae of minute insects.

"Death, death, death, death," he said to himself; and again the face of the eldest daughter of backward-flowing Ocean, as he had seen it through the ribs of that grey ruin of an ash tree, returned upon him with a sense of inescapable doom.

Suddenly he became aware of a curious sensation upon the knuckles of one of his hands as they rested on the punting pole. It was half a tickling and half a scraping sensation, and it was accompanied by quite definite scratching on the back of his wrist. Without a movement of any kind and guarding with exquisite care the very drawing of his breath, he slowly lifted by an infinitesimal degree one of his heavy eyelids. And there, curled up upon the back of his hand, its hind feet steadying its cold, wet, plump body, was a bright-eyed water-rat, assiduously and with absorbed and intense concentration licking his knuckle.

An incredible feeling of warmth rushed through him. Starting from the determined motion of that small tongue, it suffused itself through the whole of his body. It revived his brain. It comforted his heart. It steadied his nerves.

"So you, water rat," he thought, "you alone of all my creatures have dared to disobey me! For this disobedience may your children and your children's children, even unto the third and fourth generation, have luck upon luck upon luck in finding their food and safety beyond safety from all their enemies!"

As cautiously as he had lifted it he let his eyelid fall again so that thick darkness covered him. But the darkness that covered him now though it accepted death, and included death, and in a sense was as it were death, seemed to be so permeated by the sensation of satisfaction under the licking of that tiny tongue and under the precise balancing of that cold wet plump body, that it sufficed as an answer — though he could not have explained to anyone but his friend Neb just how it did — an answer from all the doomed creatures of earth to the eldest daughter of backward-flowing Oceanus.

"Pray for the death of a mortal woman, old Mother," he cried in his heart, "and for poor Myrddin Wyllt, the death of a mortal man!"

But now there was a scamper and a splash, and the rat was gone. Footsteps were approaching the river from the direction of Saint Julian's Fount. Instantaneously, with the animal instinct of an old herdsman, he knew that these steps were those of a man in the prime of life.

"Porius," he thought; and then, remembering the look on Neb's cynical face, "or that young worshipper of Mithras."

Rhun ap Gwrnach was quite prepared to find his ferryboat exactly where he had left it the day before yesterday; but he was not a little surprised to find the crouching form of the emperor's counsellor, whom he supposed to be still asleep in the inner tent, and whose sleep he had been assured was never disturbed till noon, seated in the boat and nodding quietly over the punting pole.

But as usual Rhun was silent about these personal reactions, nor did he give his errant host — if this questionable conjurer deserved so normal a designation — the remotest hint as to the cause of his sudden appearance. He carried no weapon save a formidable hunting knife; but as that was almost as long as old Aulus's Roman sword and hung with something of the same air of authoritative aggressiveness from his belt and kept thumping, as it swung, against his thigh, it served to correct any illusion a stranger might entertain that Rhun was one with whom you could meddle with impunity.

Laconically but respectfully he saluted the man; and as he jumped into the boat he used all his agility so as not to unbalance it or incommode its occupant. With natural ease and very gravely and carefully, as if he were ferrying the counsellor across a darker and more dangerous stream than the sacred Dee, he took possession of the pole, and moving to the front of the boat began leisurely punting.

But he had barely got clear of the bank when Myrddin Wyllt suddenly asked an unexpected and disturbing question.

"Was Brother John still alive last night?"

"Alive, my Lord?"

Rhun was so startled that he had a moment's difficulty with his pole. After he'd got it clear he stared at the man in expectant silence, waiting for him to say more.

"His devils must have told him something," he said to himself.

But Myrddin Wyllt remained silent while his eyes which were only half open, drowsily and with what to Rhun looked like humorous amusement, contemplated the ascending slope on the further side of the river where wisps of white smoke now kept appearing, growing larger and larger, and finally drifting away in a northwesterly direction.

Rhun broke the silence. "Have you heard anything during the night?"

But the man only gazed at those wisps of smoke across the river.

"When I left him," Rhun continued, "he was answering Porius ab Einion's questions about Pelagius, explaining how it was that the things Pelagius taught were contradicted by the priest of Christ at the Gaer. My father wasn't a Christian, you must understand, my Lord, and so the warmth of the Brother's cell made me sleepy, and I got up and slipped away. You've heard nothing in the night, my Lord, nothing else?"

"Else? No, no! Certainly not; certainly nothing else."

"You've not been told anything by your spirits?"

To this there was no reply; and Rhun, as he swung his pole and saw the smoke issuing from his Cave, was aware of a vague wish that he was more than a simple soldier of his father's god. "If I were one of the Metechontes," he thought, "if I were a 'participant' of the Mysteries, I'd soon exorcize his devils and make him answer!"

Rhun had not missed the man's obvious amusement at the smoke issuing from the sacred Cave.

"He's half an atheist and half a Christian like all these Romanized Brythons. Oh, if I were only a 'participant' I'd stop his jeering forever!"

In his indignation Rhun's mind went back to their first encounter only the day before yesterday and how the fellow had murmured about "trestles" and had said it was upon trestles that he'd put the corpse of the man murdered by Medrawd — put it in the centre of Saint Julian's Fount! And then a minute or two later the detestable dwarf Neb confessed that it was the accurst conjurer himself who had killed the man.

"Trestles?" This whole mission from the emperor was a thing of trestles and mist! No, it was impossible to get at the truth of anything with people like this. And as he recalled how moment after moment in that weird pavilion his natural apprehension of reality, and his normal sense of what was happening to him, had been invaded and routed by his feeling for Gwendydd, it seemed as if something very sweet and something very salt were mingling in his mouth.

He might have been floating on the fresh water of a clear stream, and suddenly there was the taste of the salt of the sea! “Oh, it’s a tragic fate this poor girl has to bear, being the sister of such a shape-shifting, time-serving, cowardly liar!”

A few more thrusts of the pole, made with sulky vehemence, brought them to the opposite bank. Here as he tied the boat to the nearest alder stump his apprehensions about Brother John began to subside.

“They’re all like this at Arthur’s court,” he thought, “all liars; and encouraged in it too by that old pedantic false chronicler of a Henog who solemnly writes down as true history every tale they tell him! If Porius and I go to Constantinople I suppose we’ll find the same there — women and conjurers and conceited boys on horseback, and gullible historians writing fables about them! That’s how the world goes in these modern times now that the servants of Mithras are so few!”

And there throbbed in Rhun’s heart a proud and complacent thrill of satisfaction that he had so soon detected what the pure-minded Gwendydd had to endure among these wretches and from a brother who brought horses and cows into her chamber and poured libations to the Cewri!

“Do you wish to remain where you are, my Lord?” he enquired as soon as he had jumped ashore. “I don’t think I’ll be away long, and I shall be glad to ferry you across again. And then if you cared for my company I could escort you back to the tent. I am at your service, my Lord, but I expect you have not come here to worship Mithras.”

The man he addressed made a faint movement with his hand that might have been a sign of acquiescence or a sign of indifference or a sign of dismissal. Rhun accepted it as a token of all these things and began quickly ascending the slope. He had been neither surprised nor disturbed when Gwythyr, the Lady of the Gaer’s special messenger, had appeared before dawn with a brief and imperative command from Morfydd that he should meet her at his god's shrine.

He knew that according to old Brythonic tradition, rigorously followed by the House of Cunedda, any sort of meeting between bride and bridegroom on the day before their marriage was out of the question; but that farewell visits by the girl to members of her own family were not only in order but were encouraged by ancient usage.

As her first cousin and as the foster-brother of her husband, Rhun knew that outside the Gaer and the House of Stone he was her nearest of kin. Even the Modrybedd as her great-aunts were more remote.

All this he naturally and properly took for granted, and yet it cannot be said that as he ascended the incline towards those disturbing wisps of smoke his mind was quite at peace. Anyone indisposed to be indulgent to a simple soldier of Mithras, whose ascetic ideal had justified him in assuming the Phrygian cap even though he was no "participant," might have challenged him to confess as he climbed this slope that his conscience was not altogether easy about the softening influences of Gwendydd's tent.

It is even possible that Brother John himself, about whose welfare he had just received such a shock, might have warned him that according to the insight of Pelagius it was possible that his righteous indignation with the man in the boat was accentuated by some hidden uneasiness in his own conscience.

When, an hour earlier, Neb ap Digon had been left by his lord and god to a sacrilegious profaning of the shrine of Mithras, the boy had felt anything but elated. His chief concern was anxiety lest something should occur to delay their return to the tent before their absence was discovered.

"My master," he thought, "may be the wisest ever. A great one he may have been before Eryri and Cader were raised up and before Atlantis was thrust down; but when he begins to think ’tis easy to deceive a female he’s no wiser than that little snake he whistled round his wrist!”

It must have been his long experience of the fatal ease with which these same females can persuade a man to talk of that concerning which a man had best hold his tongue that induced Neb to confine his ministrations to Morfydd ferch Brochvael and Canna ferch Glam to the piling of a fire for them, the spreading of a couch of bracken leaves for them, the robbing Mithras of all the sacred honey he could find for them, and the lighting of several fresh torches above their heads.

In vain he hunted for wine and bread. Doubtless this false god from Persia devoured such sacraments the moment his worshippers departed and was, like Neb himself, thoroughly tired of honey.

Keeping therefore carefully out of hearing of the two women, Neb concentrated his attention on the little girl. For her benefit and that of her doll, he constructed a special fire just beneath the little statues of Mithras rising from a rock and of Cronos surrounded by a serpent with its tail in its mouth. It had not been Neb’s privilege to know any little girls during the conscious decade of his chequered career, and he was not therefore at all surprised to find this one as totally without nervous fears as he was himself. Nor did her playacting about the comfort of her doll strike him as in any way silly. In fact he sympathized with it. With the cynicism induced by ten years of court life it struck him as perfectly natural and even perfectly philosophical to prefer the society of the inanimate to that of the animate.

“What is her name?” he enquired gravely, leaning forward from his carefully adjusted cushion of bracken and surveying with complacency a Mazdean incense burner turned upside down which he had converted into a seat for the doll.

The doll’s mother was in no hurry to reply. She was examining the son of Digon with careful and critical but not unfriendly deliberation.

“She’s Lynette,” she said at last; and then in a whisper so that Lynette, who was all ears, shouldn’t hear, “she doesn’t know I’m her mother.”

“What does she call you then?”

“Gunta, of course.”

“Is that your name?”

“I don’t know. It’s what everyone calls me.”

“What’s your mother’s name?” he asked.

These direct personal questions didn’t seem to embarrass the little girl in the least; but on the other hand they seemed to retard the conversation till after a further scrutiny of the questioner.

For his part Neb was either much more rapid and secretive in his summings-up or much less interested in new personalities; for what seemed to preoccupy his attention was an almost fussy desire to make these two young women physically comfortable.

But Gunta had now evidently decided upon a daring venture. “My mother doesn’t think,” she whispered, bending towards him so that Lynette shouldn’t hear, “that I know.”

“You mean she doesn’t know you know she’s your mother?”

Gunta nodded.

Neb gave her his oldest and most conspiring smile full of the cynicism of ten years at court.

“That’s the best way,” he said, and added, “nor that you know your father’s either,” indicating by a sympathetic glance that in her place he also would conceal these premature flashes of insight. Gunta’s hair was very long and very flaxen and without a curl or a ripple in it. She wore nothing that Neb could see but a ragged tunic of very thick wool dyed black, and white woollen drawers. Her legs and feet were bare.

“My father knew I knew,” she whispered, clasping her hands over her knees, “because I told him when he went away.”

Neb shook his head and made a grimace that said better than words could have done: “Dangerous, very dangerous! The only path of wisdom is to watch, ponder, decide, and say nothing.”

“My father’s a Sais,” Gunta said. “His name’s Gunhorst.”

“I hope I corrected myself in time,” he thought, and he hastened to add, “Her over there” — and he wagged his head in the direction of Morfydd— “is expecting Rhun ap Gwrnach soon; and they tell me his father’s father was a slave. Kings’ sons can be slaves,” he added pensively. “It depends on the fortune of battle.”

“My father’s a great warrior,” said Gunta proudly, forgetting the necessity of whispering. “And what I hope is that the Saeson kill the emperor and possess the whole land!”

Neb contemplated his guest with unconcealed admiration.

“How brave she is!” he thought, but what he said was: “I hope if he does kill the emperor he’ll take all the ladies of Caerleon back with him to Germania!”

Gunta fixed her grey eyes full upon him. “If he kills him,” she pronounced, “he’ll never go back to Germania.”

Neb shrugged his thin shoulders and made a vague motion of his hands. “I’ve heard that word ‘never’ before,” his gesture said, “but for wise people like you and me ’tis a word better unspoken than spoken.”

To seduce those grey eyes into the softer mood, he now began rocking the daughter of Gunhorst up and down with both his hands. The seat he had arranged for her was a three-legged cauldron. He had dragged this out from beneath the two images and placed it in such a position between the upturned incense burner and his own heap of bracken that the torchlight above the images caused its rusty bronze curves to glow like red flames.

It pleased the satiric Neb to make a see-saw of this sacred utensil and to rock the daughter of an emperor-killer backwards and forwards to the tune of the crackling sticks of a profane bonfire kindled in the presence of the Cave's divinity.

But his experience as a courtier warned him that though rocking might distract, it could not absorb a visitor. So he returned to personalities.

"You haven't asked me about my father."

She disregarded this.

"Why... are... you... dressed... in... that... funny tunic?" Her words came out in jerks as first one and then another of the cauldron's outstretched legs hit the floor.

"Green and yellow are the emperor's colours," Neb replied proudly.

"I thought only slaves wore kings' colours," said Gunta the daughter of Gunhorst. "And I don't believe you know," she mocked, "who your mother was!"

Neb went on rocking her. "I must act like my master," he thought, "like my master. I must let her have her way."

"I don't believe you've ever seen her!" laughed the flaxen-haired rider on the cauldron.

"How did you guess?" asked Neb, trying to assume a tone of awestruck wonder. "They say only the cleverest people in the world have the power to recognize an orphan." And he went on rocking her.

"I was a very little one when I was born," he confessed with crafty sadness.

"As little as Lynette?"

He turned to the fixed eyes of the battered little person balanced on the incense burner. "Almost," he admitted gloomily.

"And who was your father Digon?"

Neb looked down for a second at the fringe of his green-and-yellow tunic. Then he lifted his head and made the plunge.

"I don't believe," he whispered, "there was any such person!"

"You... don't... know... who... was your own father!"

He shook his head.

Gunta's eyes looked horrified. "That's worse," she said in a shocked voice, "than not knowing about your mother."

"She's a Saesnes, sure enough," thought Neb, and all the stories he'd ever heard the forest people tell about unnatural mothers who put tyngedion on their children stirred in his mind.

"When I was born," he said, "I was as little as Llew when Gwydion ap Don picked him up from the floor."

The grey eyes of Lynette's mother widened. "Why, that's the story Sibylla tells me," she cried excitedly. "In the Gaer they call it a low, wicked, filthy, disgusting story. It's about Arianrod jumping over Math's wand and two children falling out of her — Dylan and that little one! I think it's a wonderful story and so does Sibylla." She lowered her voice to a whisper. "Sibylla is like Arianrod, you know, only I don't tell her so. I have to take care of Sibylla now my father's away. It's a secret between him and me. We're both fond of her; but oh, she's so hard to look after! She acts so foolish and talks so silly. It doesn't do to tell her things."

Neb accelerated the rocking till the three legs of the cauldron hit the ground one after another with a metallic ring.

"Yes," he repeated, "when I was born I was as little as Llew when Gwydion ap Don put him into a chest at the foot of his bed.

I know not who bore me nor who begot;
I was found in the empress's chamber pot!"

Neb uttered these words in a plaintive chant, while in place of tears he stared into the darkness. If only he could risk one glance at the serpent-wreathed Cronos he might yet get through this crisis in his life!

"Stop rocking me!" ordered Gunta. Her voice had changed. It had taken on a queer husky sound as if she were trying to whistle through a straw that had a hole in it.

At once he brought to an end the seesaw swaying of the bronze cauldron, and she slid to the ground.

"Careful now!" Neb's experience warned him. "Remember what you fear for your master!"

In a subdued voice and in a tone quite different from any she had used to him yet, and different too from any he could imagine her using to Lynette, she asked him when his birthday was.

Neb wanted to look anywhere away from those steady grey eyes framed in that fall of flaxen hair. Even if to appeal to the image with the serpent were forbidden him, it would be something to snatch a glimpse of the defiant Phrygian cap of the god of the Roman legions.

"I'd better tell her I'm thirteen," he said to himself. But even while his mind was finishing the word "thirteen" he was telling her the truth. "I'll be eleven on the first of November."

Her mouth opened with a little gasping cry. "Why, I shall be eight on the first of November. Our birthdays are on the same day!"

For a fleeting second the son of the non-existent Digon felt as if his own existence as the free armour bearer of the Lord of Time were in peril, but the little girl's excitement over this not at all astonishing coincidence saved the Persian god's shrine from further profanation.

Whatever softening of her feminine nature had been brought about by this new friend's confession found at this critical moment a queer and surprising outlet; for with a hurried movement she snatched up Lynette — the only thing that entirely belonged to her — and thrust it into his arms! This she had hardly done when a man's voice — grown familiar enough now to Neb — broke with shattering emphasis into the low-murmured whisperings of Morfydd and her nurse.

"Quick! We mustn't be caught here! He'd kill me. It's his innermost shrine, this is! Here" — and he thrust back the doll into her arms— "keep close behind me. Catch hold of my belt or something. No! Hush, wait! Take care of your bare feet! Beat out those sparks with something for heaven's sake! I must put—"

Standing on tiptoe and extending his arms, he extinguished both the torch and the small oil flame; and then in the dim light that remained he smote the smouldering sticks of their little fire into black ashes with the rim of the incense burner.

In spite of his agitation, something about the metallic contact of this rim with the half-blackened sticks, as under its pressure their final vital sparks were scattered into the darkness, made him think of that great piece of jagged rock which he had lately seen in the hands of his master.

The daughter of Gunhorst the Sais, swinging Lynette by her one solitary garment, kept tight hold upon her new friend's green-and-yellow tunic and found no difficulty in imitating the stealthy shuffle becoming at last a silent run by which, following the obscurer wall of the Cave, he led her to its entrance unchallenged. Indeed neither Morfydd nor her nurse, least of all the outraged and indignant soldier of Mithras, had any attention left to bestow upon them. They were too fully occupied with their own emotions.

Both the women were on their feet now by the ashes of their extinct fire, the dying of which they had been too absorbed in their talk to heed; while Rhun ap Gwrnach, his fingers on the hilt of his hunting knife, his head in the Phrygian cap, towering above them, and his lithe athlete's legs poised as if ready for a leap into the outraged sanctuary of his god, struggled to give expression to his inarticulate feelings.

"I've always wanted to bring you here," he cried, "and you always refused. I wanted to show you what I had done; how I had carried on the religion of my father and of his father! I wanted to show you how I had kept the sacred fire alive when everywhere else in Ynys Prydein it had perished. I wanted to show you the sacred image that my father's father, Agenor y Gaethwas, brought from the ancient city of the Great King — yes! and the image of Cronos that he brought from Athens! For years and years I've longed for the day you would come and I could show you these things. And now you have come — you and Canna ferch Glam — and what do I find?"

His wrath so shook him that it became clear to Neb, and even to the little Saesnes, as they stood close together that the man would soon break into a fit of rending sobs or into some terrible violence.

"His Mithras worship," thought Neb with a faint spasm of pity, "must be to this simple fool what serving my master is to me. Mother of God! but I wish my master would come! I don't want to see a man cry like a baby, and I don't want to see a bride killed like a whore."

But Canna ferch Glam was not an old nurse for nothing. She now spoke up without showing the least fear of the infuriated wearer of that extraordinary headdress. "She never touched your heathen honey," she announced resolutely. “I kept offering it to her and she never would taste one least lick of it!”

Rhun looked from the proud pale face of Morfydd to the unblinking eyes of the old woman.

“Who told you to scour about in my father’s temple?”

Quick to take advantage of this transference of his anger from her nurseling to herself, Canna hurried to take up the challenge. “What for did you go and leave your temple then for two long nights and days? I warrant Prince Porius didn’t need you, and he watching the bedside of Brother John till the glory of the Feast.”

Rhun made a step towards her, then stopped short and stared at her sullenly, his angry eyes sinking inwards into their deep sockets and the heavy folds of his lowering forehead wrinkling downwards.

“If I come to a place like this,” the old woman went on, “and find all in a hurly-burly just as though some drunken cattle dealer or some great old horned bull had been rampaging around, aren’t I to act natural as anybody would and begin clearing up?”

“But... woman... no one... in Edeyrnion... would dare—”

Rhun had been not a little disturbed when she spoke of the Bull. Blunderingly and fumblingly his simple slow-moving mind began groping towards the possibility that this old woman, who had known them all from childhood, had heard from his father or even from his grandfather some vague reference to the sacrificial mysteries of their cherished deity.

At this point the wise Neb, who in the shadow of one side of the entrance had been listening to every word of this, whispered to Gunta, “Look for me tomorrow by the Fount. We may all be gone by noon! Go straight in to them now!"

"Remember our—" the little Saxon began; but before the word "birthday" could issue from her lips he was gone, and at that very moment, just as if the great luminary had been looking for them down here and now had found them, the first rays of the ascending sun struck the mouth of the Cave.

The little girl sighed as with maternal irritation she straightened Lynette's rumpled garment, arranged the doll properly against her ribs, and advanced calmly towards the man with the odd thing on his head who was now acting just as her father so often acted with Sibylla.

"Come, nurse!" said Morfydd suddenly. "We must go back to the Gaer. This blazing sun will wake my father and he'll be wanting to go home. Goodbye, Rhun. I wanted to see you and I have seen you."

She had chosen a good moment to move past him and get out of the Cave; for presented with the totally unexpected apparition of a flaxen-haired little girl holding a doll, the not very mobile wits of the soldier of Mithras were plunged into complete confusion. The wildest ideas rushed through his head, ideas to which not only his complete ignorance of women, but certain vistas of life's possibilities which he had recently glimpsed between the Syrian-perfumed brazier and the Cretan screen, contributed fantastic encouragement. He suddenly had a dreadful doubt about the virtue of Porius's bride, a doubt that completely threw into the background the question of the sacrilege in the Cave.

So devastating to Rhun's austere and rigid morality was the wild thought that the playmate of his boyhood was an unmarried mother that the three feminine figures had begun to ascend the hill towards the ridge from which Neb had spied on them before he recovered from the shock sufficiently to run after them.

At the sound of his running — and what memories did that sound evoke in her breast! — Morfydd turned quickly and came down the hill to meet him.

"Who," he panted, his breath failing him, not from his haste but from the horror of his crazy fancies, "who is this child?"

The ghost of a smile flickered over Morfydd's mouth, not a bitter or ironic smile but the sort of sad indulgent smile with which the little Saesnes she had just left must have often have regarded the heroic Gunhorst. But then without a word or a sign of warning she leapt towards Rhun, flung her arms tight round the back of his head, and buried her face in his bare, perspiring, pulse-throbbing, muscular throat.

No one who knew Rhun ap Gwrnach could have told her — and it is doubtful if he could have told her himself — what he would have done when she tore herself away and fled up the slope to rejoin the old woman and the child, if his action had not been decided by an occurrence completely beyond his control.

For at that moment a summons reached him from the ferry; and there was the detestable form of that "herdsman from the south," suddenly risen up in full view of them all! Not only so, but the damned conjurer was beckoning to him that he wished to cross the river. And, as if this wasn't enough, by the side of the counsellor — and how did he get across the river? — was none other than that imp of Satan they called Neb ap Digon!

Rhun snatched the Phrygian cap from his head and proceeded to conceal it beneath his tunic. While he did this, and he did it as carefully as the man who was waiting for him below had concealed his great beard, his shocked, confused, and stunned senses played a trick upon him not unworthy of the very serpent of Cronos. For so dazed had he been by his whole encounter with Morfydd, and especially by that wild embrace with which she had left him, that in the confused impression of cold cheeks, tickling hair, hot lips, and clinging arms his memory ceased to be memory and the present was as completely penetrated by the past as the fennel stalk of Prometheus was penetrated by the stolen fire.

Thus it came about that when he raised his fingers to his throat, feeling a sharp stab of pain, and when he put them to his lips and tasted his own salt blood, it was as if at that very second, instead of striding down the slope behind the grotesque forms of that conjurer and his dwarf, he were standing with Morfydd's arms still round his neck, realizing the startling and inexplicable fact that she had bitten him while she had been embracing him and must, very now, have that same salt taste in her mouth. She had in fact — bride of his foster-brother though she was — mixed her blood with his!

Perhaps if he had been a worshipper of the Three-in-One rather than of the Bull-loving and Bull-slaying Mithras, he would have tossed the whole incident aside as the legitimate fury of a hot-tempered maid whom he'd unfairly accused of sacrilege.

But his father, the half Greek, and his grandfather, the pure Greek, had by degrees got it lodged in his slow brooding mind that the mixing of blood, whether it were a man's or an animal's, was one of the most fatal of all mysterious covenants.

Whatever else that embrace had done — and it was more than once before he reached the river that he touched the place in his neck — it had made him feel profoundly ashamed of the outrageous fancy that had rushed through his brain when he first caught sight of that fair-haired little girl.

It was his disgust at having been visited by such madness at all, yes! even for a single second, which, far more than his anger at the supposed sacrilege over the sacred honey, reduced him to a mood of such bewildered humility by the time they were in the boat that Neb and Neb's master could not help being aware of the change. He struck them as friendlier and less reserved.

Not that he initiated any topic of conversation; but if Neb uttered a cry when a trout darted under the boat or the counsellor commented on the shifting of the wind from southeast to east, Rhun smiled as any other ferryman might have done and added some natural comment of his own.

It was Neb himself who was the gloomy and pensive one on their homeward walk. He had spent every second of the precious moments during which he had had the counsellor to himself in impressing upon him the necessity for inventing some clear and compact and simple story explaining their encounter with Rhun, and their return in his company. He had gone further. He had taken upon himself to offer such a story for his master's consideration; namely, that by means of what his enemies called his "devils," the counsellor had anticipated the errand of the messenger from the Gaer and had summoned Neb to accompany him to the ferry to cope with any possible danger.

"Did he take in what I told him to say?" thought Neb anxiously as he looked up at his master's face during their walk through the undergrowth, dreading lest it should assume that particular expression of vacant abstraction which he feared most of all.

"Well, if he doesn't say what I told him to say," the fussy little conspirator groaned, "he'll just have to play his old trick of pretending to be so frightened of that she-devil's anger that he's in danger of falling into one of his fits, and Gwendydd will have to come to our rescue then."

Neb had indeed some justification for his anxiety, for seldom had Myrddin Wyllt been so absorbed by the mere look of that wild stretch of woodland between the Fount and the ferry as he was on that walk back while all the dials in Edeyrnion indicated high noon. They had to pass through many open spaces where there were but few tall trees, and where the sun had free scope to play upon funguses and lichens, upon ferny rocks and mossy stumps, upon nameless graves and the scattered stones of ancient enclosures, edifices that had fallen into ruin long before the followers of Iscovan y Bychan had sought refuge here from the legionaries of Uriconium or Deva.

What was seducing Myrddin Wyllt into his mood of abstraction as their three shadows moved in front of them, a tall shapeless darkness, a tall athletic darkness, and a thin childish darkness, was the golden warmth that had arisen and had fallen everywhere. He had seen many autumns since his infancy in Caer Myrddin, and if his memory were to be trusted many more long before that; but he could never remember seeing any October decked for its grave in cerements as golden as this.

Vaguely he was conscious of some small teasing thought that just kept him from full abandonment to this golden noon. Was it his little friend’s fussy anxiety about Nineue’s wrath? No, no! He could deal with that when the occasion came. Ah! He had it! Tomorrow at dawn was the forest people’s Feast of the Sowing when this marriage that was to crown it would include at least one chant, so they’d assured him, from their old orgiastic Fisher King’s mystery.

Yes, he was weary of being warned of the effect of this chant and of the power of their druid to stir them up to revolt. But it was not the power of the druid that worried him or the fury of the forest people. He had been overtaken this last couple of days by menacing warnings from quite a different quarter, warnings that confirmed the original impulse by which he’d made the emperor send him on this mission to the Prince of Edeyrnion.

No, no! The obstinate, dark spot in this day's golden noon came from Colgrim the Sais.

What if Colgrim were not trying to join Baldulf? What if he were imitating the Romans and were intending to overrun Edeyrnion and all the Venedotian coast on his way to Mona? "Well, anyway," he thought, "Arthur must rule Britain for at least a generation. I gave my word to Uthyr Pendragon for that, and if it's in my power so shall it be; but I'm a marsh reed to lean upon these days, old and feeble, not what I was, not even what I was in Gortheyrn's time when the Saeson had to bribe him with Ronwen.

"But old as I am, I think I can do it. Yes, old Isle of Cronos, I think I can make you endure Roman law and Roman horsemen, and Brython fury and Brython fancy, for a generation longer! You'll have the Henog of Dyfed to record it, and the Three-in-One to work miracles for it; and then — adieu! The Saeson are bound to have their day, but they'll yield to another, and still the forest people will be the same."

By this time he knew that his companions were getting impatient. Hitherto he had walked as fast as either of them but he was beginning to loiter now and how could he help it?

"I want my animals," he thought, "and I want to listen to the earth. Shall I play at madness?" he thought, "or shall I play at losing consciousness? No, no! It would scare the child too much. Besides, it would spoil the scene between Gwendydd and this innocent sun worshipper. No, I must humour them and get ahead."

Had Neb been able to overhear these cogitations of his master he would have been furious with him. He would have regarded this consideration for himself as totally irrelevant; and as for the meeting between Gwendydd and her admirer it would have struck him as fantastic to give a thought to such side issues.

So the three of them moved on proceeded by their three shadows, and the counsellor had to make what he could of the golden sunlight before they reached the trunks of the taller trees. No, since his mother sent him forth from Caer Myrddin to the llys of Gortheyrn he had never seen at the end of October such a day of Saturn.

There was not one red leaf in sight, either on the ground or on the bushes. Every single one of them was pure gold.

“These are the colours of the earth,” he thought. “Brown and green and grey and gold, now as in the days of old; green and brown and gold and grey, today, tomorrow, yesterday!”

Every now and then a shower of golden leaves would flutter down, disturbed by this unusual wind, this wind that was now moving backwards, so it seemed to him, like backward-flowing Oceanus.

“Each leaf as it falls,” he thought, “must have its own sound to the creatures who hear it. They must fall like trees of different size to the ears of shrew mice, and like avalanches of heavier or of lighter rock to the apprehension of beetles — there!” And he himself heard the fall of one particular golden leaf which fluttered down on a slab of stone as yet uncovered by moss or lichen; and it seemed to him to make a thin scraping sound that had in it, for all its vegetable substance, an infinitely faint tinkle.

“Like a curl of gold leaf,” he thought, “slipping from a goldsmith’s fingers upon the lap of the image it’s about to cover!” Nor in the October noon and amid these intricacies of flickering sunlight was there room for anything but gold upon grey, gold upon green, gold upon brown.

And every leaf whether crinkled or withered, whether torn or twisted, whether crumpled or soft with sap, was a leaf of gold. Some were floating down from their place of growth, others were swaying and undulating on their stems. All were alive, all alert with meaning, like quivering scrolls of prophetic mystery unrolled by this east wind!

And if there was no trace of red or crimson or any hint of blood among the grey stones, green mosses, and brown trunks of earth, so there was no room in the sky, so dazzling were the sun's rays, for any translucent, deep-receding pools of blue. The sky was as blanched above their three heads and their three shadows by that blaze of golden light as the fallen branches beneath their feet were burnished and bronzed by its radiance!

Starting in the pit of his stomach and mounting up to the low, apelike, corrugated bar above his deep eye sockets, there now trembled a great shiver of exultation. This golden forest was his forest, of all the forests of the world it was his, his in a special, peculiar, and unique sense, for it was the virgin heart of those aboriginal forests of the western isles beyond the Pillars of Hercules to which the lost leaders of the Golden Age had fled, when with lust and lies and thunder Olympus conquered Othrys, and where they would remain hidden, while with thunder and love and lies Calvary conquered Olympus.

And beyond and beneath it all and round and about it was his mother the earth, Gaia Peloria, the immense, the enormous, the incalculable! She it was who had invented and found within herself that "vast jagged sickle of the element of adamant" with which he had dismembered the heavenly tyrant and caused the Cytherean to be born out of the crimsoned foam. The earth it was whose innumerable progeny of gods and men and beasts and birds and fishes and reptiles he had made happy and had caused to enjoy their first Golden Age.

But for life, for inhuman miserable life, to go on on any terms and to change perpetually and to take ever new forms, was dearer to her than for her progeny to enjoy themselves, free from bloody tyrants and false prophets and dying priests!

“O Mother, Mother! O deep, sweet, mysterious treacherous Mother! Can you feel this golden sunshine warming your heart through the virgin forest of your first worshippers and not hear us?”

But the lurching and swaying figure of Myrddin Wyllt, together with those of his impatient companions, was no longer in sunshine, no longer were there three shadows advancing in front of these three figures; for they had entered the last belt of towering pine trees that surrounded the tangled approaches to y Bychan’s Mound.

It would have been hard for Neb, had he known of the druidic hiding’ place under this same Mound, to refrain from puzzling and agitating his careful mind as to whether his master knew of it also. But Neb did not know of it, nor did Rhun; and if the counsellor knew of it, or could have known of it if he’d wanted to, his mood was such just then that the whole question of the druid was of less importance to him than that the wind had moved from southeast to east.

The counsellor was now lumbering forward between the trunks of the tall pines with the swaying motion of a drunken man. Gropingly and fumblingly he was trying to explain to himself the treachery of his first great mother. He felt as if he were walking like an upright ape or goat or even a fish with legs, upon her enormous and cavernous body, the body of Gaia Apeirona, “the earth without end.”

And what he wanted to say to her now was what he had always lacked the courage, or the unscrupulous recklessness, to say to his Caer Myrddin mother: “Take me as your child and be honest with me.” The golden leaves had ceased falling under the dark pines, but still the counsellor went on crying: “Tell me the secrets of your deep heart! What is your purpose in bearing tyrant after tyrant? What is your purpose in giving your progeny to this new triple despot of thunder and love and lies? And when his time, or their time is over, what new tyranny will you devise before which the unlucky creatures of your spawning must crouch and cringe?"

Both Rhun and Neb were watching him with anxiety as he lurched and lumbered forward. It crossed the latter's mind, as he watched those long arms swaying before the stooping figure and those great fingers closing and unclosing, that the counsellor might at any moment fall down upon his hands and knees, and scramble off on all fours, to meet his animals and be welcomed by them! Neb felt as if he already heard the gruntings and neighings and hissings and chatterings and squeakings and bellowings and howlings of the man's real mates as they crowded about him!

But all this while as the three of them came within a bowshot of y Bychan's Mound, the counsellor kept on swaying and heaving and groaning and stooping towards the earth; kept on thrusting his soul down into the earth; kept on crying to the earth that if only she would take him into her secrets and explain why she had supported the children of her son against her own children, and the children of her daughter against her own children, and why she had supported this new tyranny of law and love and lies against the freedom and enjoyment of all her children, he might be able to forgive her the wrong she had done him.

"You whispered to me how to overcome my father, and you whispered to my son how to overcome me, and you whispered to the Three-in-One how to overcome the Olympian. Have you grown too old, Gaia Peloria, grown too old, great Mother of gods and men, to whisper to me, your son, for the second time?"

Had but only one among the fourscore round, feathery, innocent eyes belonging to the triangular-shaped flock of wild geese, which at that moment was flying before the east wind towards the salt marshes of Venedotia, been endowed with the ocular vision of the most short-sighted of sea birds it would have seen, and no doubt supposed he was searching for food amid the forest rubble, the counsellor of the Emperor of Britain falling suddenly on his hands and knees and pressing his forehead into the earth. It would also have seen, probably a second or two before they were seen by the counsellor's two companions, a large and stealthy company of bowmen, with their bows drawn, their arrows tense on the taut strings ready to be released, encircling these three persons, encircling them ten or twenty deep and to the number of several hundreds.

The counsellor had fallen to the earth without a sound, and was now without a sound burying his low, broad, apelike forehead in the earth; and it was equally without a sound — at least without a sound audible to anything but the smaller four-footed creatures of the forest — that these bowmen with drawn bows had made their appearance.

Both Rhun and Neb felt for a second's pulsebeat that their last moment had come, and for a second quite independently of their minds their bodies prepared to meet it with indrawn breath, stiffened muscles, and contracted nerves. They both had seen the counsellor fall to the earth and bury his forehead in the rubble; but since he had been staggering along with down-swinging arms and drooping head for some while, they both took it for granted that he had neither seen nor foreseen the deadly ambush into which he had fallen.

As soon as their wits returned to them and they realized that the arrows directed towards their hearts were still firmly gripped by the archers' fingers and that some sort of command was evidently awaited, Rhun and Neb acted according to their different natures. After a quick glance round him, a glance that was enough to show that from those encircling arrowpoints, upon which here and there the golden rays of the sun glittered, there was not the smallest loophole of escape, Neb ap Digon bolted like a rabbit to his master's side and kneeling there tried desperately to arouse his attention.

Rhun on the other hand stood his ground, laid one hand on the hilt of his hunting knife, and thrusting the other deep into the breast of his tunic clutched tightly with his fingers his Phrygian cap. The various shocks he had received that day, the summons from Morfydd, the question in the boat about Brother John, his anger about the sacred honey, his momentary suspicion about the fair-haired little girl, that desperate embrace of Morfydd's and the biting kiss that had left his blood on her lips, his vague uneasy memories of the hours he'd spent with Gwendydd between the Syrian-scented brazier and the Cretan screen, his bewildered and helpless consciousness of himself as a blundering and idiotic fool, all these now receded into the background, merged together, and finally vanished away.

What remained was Rhun ap Gwrnach, the swiftest footed Brython in Edeyrnion, Rhun the son of Alarch ferch Iddawc, Rhun the sworn soldier of Mithras, Rhun at bay.

He thought quickly to himself: "If I leapt straight in upon them, slashing left and right with my knife, I might get through! The druid can hardly have poisoned all their arrows, and once through I'd bring those young horsemen on them before they'd finished with the conjurer and his devils!"

An inarticulate rage rose up in his heart and shook him from head to feet. Every drop of his Greek blood tingled with contempt for this rabblement of barbarians who were daring to hunt down a soldier of Mithras, a soldier of the great god of all the imperial legions of Rome from Persepolis to Damascus and from Damascus to Macedon, just as if he were a wolf or a wild boar!

And then directly before him the rank of this wild rabble of arrow shooters divided, parted to left and right, and through this gap two figures emerged, each of them holding something aloft, and each of them having an air of tremendous mystery and devastating authority.

The two men were about the same height and about the same build, neither tall nor short, neither plump nor lean. One was clad in a long grey robe of some very dirty weather-stained woollen material reaching almost to his feet. This one, though only guessed at by Rhun and Neb for neither had ever seen him, was Gogfran Derwydd; and it must have been only now, as he led the other through the underbrush, that the Derwydd had broken off the end of the small oak bough covered with fresh un-yellowing leaves which he held above his great shining bald head.

But it certainly wasn't only just now, but by premeditated intention, that when Minnawc Gorsant left his half-built church above the marketplace of the ancient will he had so lately rechristened "White Choir," he had brought with him that morning an enormous silver cross mounted on a long wooden pole.

"What does all this mean?" cried Rhun boldly; advancing towards the two men. "Is this a revolt against Einion ab Iddawc? Is this a revolt against the emperor and his counsellor? Or is it that these brave bandits with their hundreds of arrows pointing at two unarmed men and a boy have had orders from you two Christians to murder me as you murdered Morvran ap Brochvael? This rabble" — and he made a contemptuous gesture with his free hand at the crowd of bowmen, while he still clutched tightly the Phrygian cap under his tunic— "cannot be men of the forests of Edeyrnion. Gwyddyl-Ffichti they must be from the hills and the swamps! If you are men of Edeyrnion, unstring, I tell you, those bows of yours! Am I the son of Alarch ferch Iddawc ab Edeyrn for nothing? Unstring those bows, I tell you, or I'll have you hunted out of your caves and your swamps as our father Cunedda did the Gwyddylaid bandits of his day!"

His bold words were not without their effect. Neb, kneeling by his master's huge dark head which was still buried face down in the pine needles and moss, glancing quickly round noticed several of the less raggedly attired among their assailants looking dubiously at one another, while in several places he could see that the arrows were pointing downward and earthward.

The druid and the priest turned haughtily away from Rhun and moved towards the huddled figure of the counsellor.

"Is he ill? Is he conscious? Is it one of his fits?" Gogfran enquired of Neb.

To this question the counsellor's small servant esteemed it wisest to make no answer. He paused and stood up, opposing his small body between the two robed figures — for Minnawc Gorsant was wearing his longest and blackest mantle — and his master's buried and oblivious head.

"He is invoking Beelzebub," said the priest angrily. "And I thought you called for me" — here his fanatical emotion turned upon his companion— "to bear witness to Christ and the Holy Trinity before a large company of unbelievers."

Neb sucked in his lips with a long soundless interior whistle, and with his eye still on those alarming arrowpoints he noticed with indescribable relief that nearly all of them were now pointing to the earth.

"I summoned you to help me in exorcizing more than one devil," responded the Derwydd softly. "I wanted you to confront this man now on his knees before you, who has been for years corrupting the emperor by the help of Satan into serving his worst designs; but since it now appears that you have only to lift your cross above your head and this man bows down at your feet, I must not let you waste your time further with him.

"Many of these brave men, all faithful subjects of the Prince of Edeyrnion, though our hot-tempered Greek idolater here accuses them of being Gwyddyl-Ffichti, have for long craved to know exactly where my own humble interpretations of the tremendous mystery of the Blessed Trinity have — as of course they must have — fallen short of the divine truth. They will now therefore, with your holy permission, await us on the summit of that Mound of unhappy memories usually known as y Bychan's, where I will take upon myself to be the interpreter of their chief difficulties in regard to that Threefold Mystery which is, in my school of interpretation, represented by three divergent straight lines descending from one invisible point."

The "invisible point" at which Neb ap Digon was staring now was the point behind the burning blue eyes, set deep within their hollow sockets, of Minnawc Gorsant, as he stood with all his ten fingers passionately clasping to his breast the tall pole of his silver cross, the invisible point where the human mind, whether of a priest, or of a druid, or of an idolater, or even of an "imp of Satan" like Neb himself, makes its unaccountable and arbitrary decisions.

But Gogfran Derwydd ap Greidawl Derwydd, with such a sudden and startling movement that it made Rhun clap his hand once more to his knife hilt, whirled round several times on his heel till both his oak branch and his grey robe fluttered awkwardly about him as if they'd been a pair of immense wind-blown butterflies linked in uneasy love, and as he turned he stretched out his leafy branch to every quarter of the circle and cried aloud in a shrill voice: "To the Mound! To the Mound!"

The instantaneous obedience of all these wild-looking and undisciplined men was an amazement to Rhun. When the Derwydd had begun his dance of dismissal the wood was full of them; now there was not one!

But he had hardly time to assure himself that the men had really gone when the Derwydd came quickly towards him, carelessly switching the bushes as he came with his green branch, as if, its official work finished, it had become an ordinary stick such as anybody might pick up.

Rhun watched him as apprehensively as Neb was watching the priest, who simultaneously approaching the figure crouching on the ground had lifted up his cross to the full height of both his arms and was chanting: "Illumina quaesumus Domine Deus tenebras nostras!"

On reaching Rhun, who had dropped his right hand from the hilt of his knife but still kept his left hand within his tunic, the Derwydd with an air of casualness and complacency reversed his hold upon the branch; and taking it lightly by its leafy twigs proceeded to give the portion of Rhun's tunic beneath which the Phrygian cap was concealed several playful prods.

"Trusting in him still, eh, Rhun ap Gwrnach? Well, well! We never know! I'm not one myself to deny any possibility. The Persian was a great Being in his day and — well! There's always a chance— 'Nama, Nama, Sebesio!' So you see, I'm not as ignorant as some of our colleagues in the Triadic Truth!"

And he nodded his bald head in the direction of the priest who, his chanting over, appeared to be invoking what was visible of the sky at the expense of the man at his feet.

Rhun had stared with bewilderment as he heard those mysterious syllables, uncontaminated in their unknown meaning and their unknown potency through the interminable histories of at least three buried civilizations. And in his bewilderment the fantastic idea crossed his mind:

"Suppose this Derwydd, in whom all the forest people believe, were himself one of the great 'participants' of the Mysteries?"

But no, that was a blasphemous and wicked thought, like his thought about the little girl!

"What's come over me," he said to himself, "that I've had such crazy thoughts in the last few days?"

But the druid was still speaking; and to Rhun's surprise, as he spoke, he casually and indifferently threw away the oak branch as if it were of no importance.

"I do not know, my young friend," he said, "any more than you do or than he does, or he either" — and he nodded once more with his bald head in the direction of the erect priest and the humped-up counsellor— "what will come of our contest tomorrow! Most curious, most fascinating, my young friend, will it be to see what does come of it! That's the whole interest of life, isn't it, for people like you and me, who are temperate in their desires and totally without ambition?

"But of this I can assure you: if the Arthurian mission is sent back by the way it came, the shrine of the great Mithras will suffer no hurt either from your people or mine. I shall see to that myself!"

For a second Rhun had the feeling that the man was about to whirl round in another dizzy circle as a confirmation of this amazing assurance, but he went off as casually as he'd come.

He left Rhun, however, so bewildered that not only did his right hand but the hand that had been clutching the Phrygian cap sink helplessly to his side, while the wild thought again slid, like a night owl's pellet in mid-noon, into the lake of his consciousness: "Suppose Gogfran Derwydd, unknown to the Three Aunties, unknown to any of these superstitious forest people and whose bald head has never been seen by either Porius or Morfydd, should now be revealing himself — and to me alone — as a high and secret 'participant?'"

The priest, lowering his cross, turned at the other's approach and advanced to meet him.

"How marvellous it is," whispered the Derwydd eagerly, laying a couple of enthusiastic fingers on the clenched knuckles that supported the cross, "that there should be no escape for any of these people from the power of the Divine Triad! One of them," and he nodded towards Rhun, "seems to have been stuck to the earth by me; while this other" — and he jerked a contemptuous thumb at the counsellor— "seems to be calling upon the earth to hide him from you. But come, brother, come now, brother. Your congregation awaits you. They've no idea of the power the Holy Three have given you. They're waiting now on that accurst Mound. Who knows but the Mound itself may rise up beneath you to testify to the—"

The priest's nose was large and curiously shaped, and its nostrils so abnormally distended that they seemed created for the tracking down of devils, but his ears were less acute, and it was Neb, listening intently to this exultant whispering, who caught the queer words— "to testify to the triumph of three over four!" with which the Derwydd concluded.

But though he lost — and perhaps his colleague in the faith intended him to lose — the less solemn import of these final syllables, the priest must have obscurely divined the presence of some sort of frivolity upon the air, for his mouth hardened, and as the other propelled him away he flung from his burning blue eye at the bright noon sky an almost reproachful look, as if demanding of the eternal heavens why it was that their cause compelled a man to make use of such contemptible allies.

The same Christian diplomacy that had brought him to seek the druid was, however, strong enough to restrain him from striking that bald head a resounding blow with the handle of his cross; and it was not till just before they disappeared among the trees that he permitted his obscure irritation to find some sort of vent. Then indeed he did shake off the Derwydd's fingers, and swinging round and lifting the cross high in the air he shouted, "Hagion! Tris Hagion! Tris Hagion!"

They were no sooner out of sight than Rhun positively leapt and skipped out of the paralyzed condition into which his last "crazy idea" had plunged him; and if ever his Greek legs carried him swiftly, they carried him now, just as if it had been the last spurt of a deadly race, to the counsellor's side. His sense of relief was so imperative that he even seized Neb by the waist and began jumping him up and down like an infant.

But Neb had no mind, no heart, no feeling for anything but his friend. Once free, he didn't waste a curse or even a glance on their excited escort, but lying on the ground by the counsellor's side called out into his ear: "We must get back to the tent, Master! We must get back to the tent!"

Without the delay of a pulsebeat the crouching man staggered to his hands and feet, and thence with a few groaning ejaculations caused by the stiffness of his cramped muscles stood straight upright before them with his hand on Neb's shoulder.

"Neb!" he murmured.

"Yes, Master."

"Did you hear anything?"

"Yes, Master."

"From the earth?"

Neb was silent but his eyes shone with understanding.

Here Rhun intervened. "The Derwydd and the priest came upon us, my Lord Counsellor, with a mob of bowmen and—"

But Myrddin Wyllt made a gesture that dismissed this piece of information as totally irrelevant. “They shall enjoy themselves yet,” he murmured, “men and beasts and birds and all! As long as the earth remains there’s hope for us all. They shall let us alone at last, these gods and priests and druids and kings and rulers! I have heard her whisper. The enormous earth has spoken.”

CHAPTER XVI. The Youngest Princess

IF THE TWENTIETH OF OCTOBER in the year four hundred and ninety-nine was an eventful day for Rhun the son of Alarch the Fair, it was still more so for that dead lady's three aunts, the Modrybedd of Ogof-y-Gawr.

To do justice to the fanatical tribalism that had impelled the Aunties, at least the two elder of them, together with their devoted silentiary, the tight-lipped Erim, to embark on their "treachery" to the House of Cunedda and on their shameless negotiations with the invaders of Britain, it is necessary to remember that for thousands of years this curious matriarchal family had been accustomed to receive royal honours and royal privileges.

They had received these honours, even to the levying of tithes and taxes, though these were usually paid in kind rather than in silver or gold, from all the forest people who called themselves Venedotians and Ordovices.

It is necessary also to remember that centuries before the Brythons had appeared in Britain this struggle between the forest people and the Ffichtiaid had been going on, a struggle that had been intensified when the Gwyddylaid came on the scene and intermarried so easily, so freely, so promiscuously with the Ffichtiaid that it was hard not to believe in some sort of blood relationship between these two races. But the Brythons were totally different. They had no difficulty about intermarrying with the Romans, a thing that rarely happened in the case of the forest people and still more rarely in the case of either the Gwyddylaid or the Ffichtiaid.

Indeed the Brythons had enough in common with the Romans to justify, though not enough to prove, their common descent from such of the heroes of Troy as escaped from the Greeks. Both at any rate were Aryan; whereas, whatever the Gwyddyl-Ffichti may have been, the forest people's ancestors were non-Aryan and Iberian, first cousins to the Egyptians. And whereas with the Brythons the rule of descent was through men and from father to son, with the forest people it was always through women, and if by any chance a man became king, his successor was not his son but — if he had a sister — his sister's son.

Thus for generations upon generations the matriarchal mothers and grandmothers and sisters and aunts of the household of Ogof-y-Gawr had, we must not say "ruled" the land, for the forest people, on the strength of a tradition from Africa far older than Christianity, were at once anarchical and peaceful, but had guided and inspired their imaginations and had supported their druidic observances.

Nor had the half-royal House of Ogof-y-Gawr found any difficulty in procuring husbands and lovers to keep their inheritance alive and provide them with descendants. Nor had they lacked means — so strong was the matriarchal and communistic tradition among this people — to forestall any attempt on behalf of their temporary husbands and fathers to interrupt their feminine jurisdiction. At least, so it had been worked out until the marriage of the Princess Indeg to Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda, the apostate son of the giantess Creiddylad. From that day the influence of Mynydd-y-Gaer increased and the influence of Ogof-y-Gawr declined.

On the morning of which we speak, this day of Saturn the twentieth of October, the whole household of the Three Modrybedd, aunts of Einion and Brochvael and great-aunts of Porius, Rhun, and Morfydd, was disturbed throughout its "shadowy halls" by the arrival of their ambitious silentiary, Erim, bringing as an ambassador from the dreaded Colgrim himself none other than Gunhorst Sais, the crafty progenitor of Neb's little friend Gunta.

The news carried by this ambassador was indeed startling. Colgrim himself, he announced, followed by his Saeson army, had debouched westwards from Pengwern and was already advancing straight upon Edeyrnion which he hoped speedily to conquer on his way to Deganwy and Aberffraw and the harbours of Mona!

This agitating, and to Esyllt, the eldest auntie, this exultant news was received by the three ladies in accordance with their different characters; while for the reception of Gunhorst, their unknown liberator from Germania, each of the Modrybedd put on her favourite robe. Tonwen, the youngest, wore black; Erddud, the middle one, wore grey; and Esyllt, the eldest, wore a rich shade of bronze-tinted gold. Their dark-complexioned steward, Amreu, with his curly hair and ingratiating smile, was very soon going about among all the hungry retainers of Ogof-y-Gawr, bearing as delicately as possible the unwelcome news that the usual day's banquet had been postponed by Princess Esyllt's orders until the return of a special messenger recently despatched to Mynydd-y-Gaer.

This messenger was none other than Erim ab Uchtryd himself, for the arch-conspirator knew well, none better, that the essential thing at this juncture was to forestall all the unofficial rumours that were sure to be spreading through the countryside, and what he had in his mind was to appeal to Prince Einion to come himself to the Giant's Cave and discuss terms with Colgrim's envoy.

Knowing that the sympathies of the prince were rather with the Modrybedd and the forest people than with his own Romanized Brythons, the silentiary's private hope was that after crushing what the Derwydd's poisoned arrows might leave alive of the Arthurian horsemen, Colgrim and his Saxons would turn Edeyrnion and perhaps all Venedotia into a forest people's province, ruled ostensibly by the easygoing Einion but in reality by himself, the Modrybedd, and the druid.

Erim's patriotic imagination went even further. He had been telling himself stories lately as he lay on his back in bed, his formidable eyes fixed on the arched obscurity of the smoke-darkened roof, of a day in the future when Prince Medrawd, the emperor's heir, whose hostility to the Romanized Brythons was well known and between whom and Colgrim some sort of secret understanding was more than suspected, would allow Venedotia to become an independent forest people's kingdom from whose pastoral valleys and mountain uplands Romans and Brythons alike should be expelled.

The point at which in these impassioned imaginings Erim ab Uchtryd was wont to be overcome by sleep was when he tried to imagine the extermination of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti. He himself at the bottom of his heart detested the Gwyddyl-Ffichti more even than the Romans or the Brythons; but though his devouring eyes pierced the roof with a magnetic force disturbing to spiders and devastating to bats, the problem of these lawless people, children of the mingling of races that ought never to have mingled, born to follow bandits rather than statesmen, outlaws rather than lawgivers, and their own personal loves and hates rather than the sacred mysteries of ancestral traditions, seemed always to cause Erim such complexity of puzzled resentment that to escape from it he had to let the bats and spiders go free from his magnetic glare and close his eyes.

Amreu, himself the purest-blooded Iberian in the Modrybedd's whole retinue, used to assure his wife that Erim's mother was a Gwyddyl and his grandmother a Ffichti, and that both these ladies had run away from their husbands to join the camp followers of Iscovan y Bychan.

It was Auntie Tonwen to whose lot it fell to convey their Gaer letter to the silentiary in this same chamber in whose smoky arches there must have still hung among the cobwebs so many of his desperate dreams. Neither Auntie Esyllt, whose composition the letter was, nor Auntie Erddud, who actually transcribed it, would allow any man — not even their handsome dark steward — to place this document in the hands of Erim. Erim himself, so jealous were the princesses of their perilous prerogative, had been dismissed from this final act of dictation and transcription, though the plan of it had come, as most of their plans, from his brain alone.

It was the youngest auntie, therefore, who was also the thinnest, the most eccentric, and in a sense the least formidable of the three, who nearly a couple of hours after noon, with the wind steadily shifting from southeast to east, knocked lightly at Erim's door. He was awaiting the summons with drawn face and staring eyes, and at the sound he rushed to the door and dragging it open stood back to let her in.

But Princess Tonwen had no inclination to cross Erim's threshold. She disliked and distrusted him as profoundly as he disliked and distrusted the Gwyddyl-Ffichti. Besides, she wished to go out, to leave Ogof-y-Gawr for an hour or two, on an affair of her own. If their meal was to be postponed till Erim came back from Mynydd-y-Gaer — and Erim had not yet started — she had plenty of time for anything she might want to do.

She placed the precious letter in his hand, therefore, merely saying, "This is for you to take to the prince," and giving him a little grave bow and a faint, wan, wry smile left him there and went down the corridor.

Issuing from the main entrance she suddenly heard their steward's rich propitiatory voice and his gusts of over-exuberant laughter. These sounds were issuing from the midst of a group of persons who seemed anything but converted by his jovial arguments in favour of the indefinite postponing of their one substantial meal of the day.

There was a general movement to avoid seeing her as she went by. This was no new thing to the youngest princess who would be seventy-three that January. Indeed, it jumped with her own humour; for one of the chief necessities of her life, whether it were morning, noon, afternoon, or night, and most especially during the two twilights, was to feel invisible, to feel she could see everybody without being seen by anybody.

Her elder sister Esyllt, who though in her seventy-ninth year was the most energetic of the three, was far too occupied with the secret purposes of the Derwydd and the elaborate schemes of the silentiary to give any attention to such personal matters; but Erddud, who was only a couple of years older than Tonwen and was herself proud and fastidious, was completely puzzled. She could well understand Tonwen's avoidance of people; but why people should avoid Tonwen, and Erddud was forced to admit they did, was an insoluble mystery.

When Gunhorst, the Sais from Germania, was first presented to the youngest princess he took her for a holy woman who for religious reasons was starving herself and whose trances and ecstasies had already unsettled her mind. A little later in broken and halting conversation with Erddud — for Gunhorst, who had been carried off from his home as a child and had spent his boyhood in Gaul, knew more Latin than any of the Aunties — he expressed, not very tactfully, his amazement that she was an old lady. "I took her for your sister's daughter — filia sororis," he explained with a glance at the formidable Esyllt.

It was no surprise to Erddud to recognize the incredulity with which a stranger to Ogof-y-Gawr learnt the age of the youngest princess. To herself it was an old story; for being next to her in age and more often with her than with Esyllt, she had grown accustomed to Tonwen's inability — or was it refusal? — to grow up.

She knew, of course, as indeed did all their populous household, that this light-footed, youthful-looking septuagenarian had only one real friend in all Edeyrnion; for both their nephews, different as they were from each other, were equally shy of Auntie Tonwen, and neither Porius nor Rhun, and still less their young playmate Morfydd, had made any attempt to break down the inscrutable barrier she threw around her.

The deep-natured, passionate Erddud, after deciding for the hundredth time that her sister might have been one of the "ice-maidens" of the tales that old Canna ferch Glam brought from the north, tales that lost nothing in the telling when they spread from the nursery of Ty Cerrig to the banquet hall of Ogof-y-Gawr, would always remind herself that no one had ever borne with her own tempestuous fits of temper and listened to her outpourings of unhappy passion as gently and tenderly as had Tonwen. Gently and tenderly — that was the point! — never sympathetically.

But at least Tonwen never pretended sympathy, as some people did. She treated you not only as if she weren't your sister but as if she were of a completely different species. She never looked down on you. On the contrary, she brought it about that you looked down on her.

But she made you feel her difference from you, and that's what everybody must feel. "Haven't I talked to her since we were both little?" Erddud would say to herself. "Many's the time I've sat with her over the red embers telling her everything on the nights they took Esyllt and me into the hall when Iddawc and Indeg came to the banquet. And it was never as if she looked down on me or despised me. And she always understood — understood without understanding!

"It was like talking to a wild seagull who'd come to live with you of its own accord and that looked up to you and wanted to understand you, but never could understand you, because of the barrier between it and you."

And if Erddud was puzzled by the youngest princess's attitude to herself, she was still more puzzled by Tonwen's attitude to her one and only intimate. The friendship between this odd couple had lasted so long that Erddud tried in vain to recall the particular moment when it began. This was made more difficult by the immense age of the friend in question.

"Well over a hundred," she would say to herself, "that man must be, for Mother used to take us to Ogof-yr-Avanc to visit him. He was certainly a great friend of Mother's and — Heaven knows — perhaps of Grandmother's too!"

And Erddud, time and again but always in vain, would try to imagine what went on between Cadawg ab Idris and her sister as they sat in his little boat on the river, he fishing and she dabbling her hands in the water. Did Tonwen listen to a constant stream of impassioned revelations from the old man such as she, Erddud, had so often poured into those docile ears? Or were these the sole occasions when this strange young-old creature unsealed the scroll of her own thoughts and pulled up the dam of her own feelings?

Erddud herself knew — none better — how the prehistoric matriarchal custom, grown through the ages into an absolute law, of their' semi-royal Berber descent, had turned the intimacy of a man's tenderness into something like a forbidden paradise that the women of their blood had to snatch for themselves in desperate and passionate secrecy. Their mother had snatched at it as the birth of the four of them proved; for it needs a man to beget a girl, whereas any boy can beget a boy.

How then had she allowed Indeg to break the tradition by which the matriarchs of Ogof-y-Gawr had for generations taken their man and dismissed their men? By Indeg's marriage with the son of Edeyrn ap Cunedda and Creiddylad y Gawres the matriarchy of Ogof-y-Gawr had been broken forever.

Had she not herself ever since he first grew up loved her nephew Brochvael with more than an auntie's love? If she had followed the old Berber tradition she would have seduced Brochvael and made him give her a child. She ought to have done this, and done it long before Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles came on the scene. And it was no Christian notion of the wickedness of incest that held her back; it was her own passion! She loved him too much to be able to do the thing with him that if she hadn't loved him she would certainly have done — and done with ease and joy, for she was a woman of hot blood — with some other man.

But her love had made her shy, had made her — God knows what — in his presence; and thus between the three of them, she from too great passion, Esyllt from too little, and Tonwen out of her insane indifference, they had handed over their traditions and would be soon handing over, for they were all so old, Ogof-y-Gawr itself to some descendant of Cunedda the Brython!

Yes, their very memory, together with every stick and stone of their ancient matriarchal abode, would soon become an appendage of Mynydd-y-Gaer. While such thoughts as these — and she brooded over them daily — hovered in the background of Erddud's attempt on this occasion to interpret Gunhorst's Gallic-Germanic Latin to her elder sister, her younger sister was approaching the dwelling of Cadawg ab Idris.

The peculiarity of Cadawg's small domain was that his goats, pigs, and chickens lived in much more imposing and a great deal more accessible quarters than he did himself. This also applied to the oats and clover which grew on his two acres of arable land, not to speak of the ferns and mosses and grasses and wild plants upon which his goats nourished themselves.

But Cadawg ab Idris himself lived in Ogof-yr-Avanc, or the Avanc's Cave, a place that may or may not have really been a refuge in the days of the first human intruders for the huge, scaly, lizardlike monster with long saurian head such as the old legends described.

This retreat was on the side of a rocky and somewhat precipitous hill about a mile to the north of Ogof-y-Gawr, a hill that descended by degrees and with less and less precipitancy to the narrow pastoral valley through which the Divine River flowed eastward towards Dinas Bran.

Cadawg Hen, or Cadawg the Old, had long ago made for himself, partly by cutting steps in the slate-rock and partly by driving in stakes and connecting them by ropes of twisted cord, a fairly easy descent and ascent to the Avanc's Cave; but by drawing these ropes with him into his retreat he made it difficult if not impossible for marauders to take him by surprise.

This precaution, as the youngest princess now hurriedly reminded the old man, was rendered especially advisable since with the arrival of Gunhorst the approach of the implacable Colgrim was declared near.

The light-footed, young-old lady, whose ceremonial black robe was now carried on her arm, and who appeared in the Cave's mouth in a long cream-coloured woollen tunic held at the waist by a thin silver chain, came upon her old friend in the act of washing his hands.

Nature had provided the Avanc's successor with a diminutive waterfall that descended from the roof on the western side of the entrance and ran in a conveniently narrow channel down the precipice below. But in addition to this, the original cataclysm that had created — perhaps to remain unchanged till the obliteration of the planet — this rock-bound chamber whose eastern and southern walls, extending solidly into a great mountain range, must have been scores of miles thick, had so arranged it that a narrow fissure in the western wall, reaching into the open air, made it unusual for the smoke from Cadawg Hen's hearth fire to cause him any inconvenience, even when the wooden planks with which he barricaded the entrance were all in position.

Cadawg the Old was just under six feet in height, but the unnatural number of years that had passed over him had given him a perceptible stoop. His head was wrinkled and rugged, its shape square rather than long, his eyes were small and very dark blue; while in spite of his snow-white beard which he took pains to keep neatly trimmed, the effect conveyed by his massive nose and low forehead was rather that of a warrior than of a philosophical hermit or religious recluse.

Morfydd ferch Brochvael, whose mother the Gwyddyles and whose nurse from the north had between them filled her head with demigods and heroes, thought of Cadawg Hen at once when she first heard tell of Pwyll Pen Annwn; nor did any old wife in Edeyrnion ever speak of him as a holy man or a sorcerer.

Canna ferch Glam used to assure Morfydd that it was not so much Pwyll Pen Annwn he resembled as Manawyddan fab Llyr; and that like Manawyddan he was one of the lledyf unben of these islands, in other words a great chieftain who'd been "disinherited" or had "gone awry."

At the sound of the visitor's light steps the old man began to speed up the ritualistic process of washing his hands; but as this ritual was complicated by the smallness of the bowl in which he caught the thinly descending water and also by the danger that a drop should fall into the sacred cauldron that stood hard by, and finally by the fact that the rough oatmeal with which he cleansed his fingers required a good deal of squeezing and kneading before it served its purpose, the youngest princess was upon him before he had finished.

The massiye skull, which had an ageless look under its leathery wrinkled skin, was now turned humorously towards her.

“How pretty you look in your white flannel and silver belt! Put your robe down — hang it across that cord over there, if you want to keep it clean. Oh, never mind my vest! It’s been well washed. Put the robe on the top of it.”

Erddud would have been profoundly interested, perhaps even rendered a little jealous, by the easy familiarity with which her sister, looking decidedly prettier and much more animated than she usually did at Ogof-y-Gawr, treated this lledyf unben, or “disinherited chieftain.”

“Do you always wash your hands so carefully?” she enquired, from the back of the Cave, turning her head with a smile as she rearranged his shirt and stretched out her robe on the cord he had designated.

Cadawg’s bent back was the most grievous sign of his unusual age. With this exception he might have been described as active and even agile. He now swung round and faced her. But he made no motion to dry his hands. On the contrary, he continued rubbing his thin long fingers with the wet oatmeal and ostentatiously squeezing them and rinsing them and wringing them out.

“Don’t!” cried the youngest princess with genuine uneasiness. “You look like Pilate washing his hands!”

He turned back to his bowl and this time did not smile; and though he washed away all trace of the oatmeal, he refrained from drying his hands. This he would ordinarily have done with a piece of embroidered Syrian cloth that he kept for that purpose, though she had given it to him five years ago to serve as a tablecloth; but instead of touching this sumptuous if rather faded object he moved to the fire, now almost entirely composed of red embers and emitting hardly any smoke, and called her to him.

“Come and sit down for a moment, only for a moment, while I tell you about my hand-washing. We’ve got plenty of time.”

Had their emissary from the ferocious Colgrim, to whom little Gunta had applied the ambiguous title of “father” in her crucial talk with the fatherless Neb, chanced in the course of his dubious mission to follow the youngest princess into this Cave, he would undoubtedly have taken her for the old man’s daughter as she settled herself affectionately by his side on a seat in front of these smouldering logs and watched him extend towards them his wet hands.

“The truth, my dear, is” — and he looked from his long thin fingers to her face and back again to his fingers— “that you’ve caught me in the only ritual we’ve never shared.”

His visitor’s face expressed a frank uneasiness; and to her sister Erddud this intensity of interest and even of concern as she leant towards him would have been both startling and significant. Erddud would have interpreted it according to the language of her own heart. She would have taken for granted that the youngest of the Modrybedd was, for all her seventy years, in love with this man. But her interpretation would have been incorrect. The youngest princess and Cadawg Hen were not in Erddud’s passionate sense in love at all.

They were not so now, when the man was over a hundred and the woman was over seventy, and they had not been so then when the man was nearly seventy and the woman was a young girl.

The relation between them, however, whatever it may have been, had at any rate thus much common with love at first sight — and here it had an advantage over Erddud’s passion for the son of her sister — that it had been completely and irrevocably established at their first encounter and had gone on increasing for more than half a century.

“Has it anything to do with the cauldron?” Tonwen enquired; for she was, as her sister would no doubt have detected, unwilling to break the current of her friend’s confession by committing herself too quickly.

He bent forward still further towards the smouldering logs, advancing and withdrawing his fingers, as if he were playing a game with the scorching heat.

“No,” he replied in a low detached tone, as though even while he spoke his mind were occupied with something else, “no, not directly with the cauldron or with Ceridwen. It’s more to do with the cauldron of rebirth; though I suppose the great goddess is the power behind that too. But as we’ve only got the ‘wisdom’ one here, I have to make it also serve for the ‘rebirth’ one, the pair dadeni.” He paused and continued his queer game with the red logs, advancing and withdrawing his long fingers.

She watched him with still more concern. Then she rose. “Don’t you want the cauldron nearer?” she enquired timidly.

“It might be a good thing,” he murmured without turning round. “Can you move it?”

“Of course,” she said, and hurrying to the Cave’s entrance began dragging the great bronze receptacle towards the fire.

The sound of the thing’s scraping against the stone floor as with all the force of her thin arms she pulled it after her, walking backwards, did at last rouse him, and he leapt to his feet like a young man and taking it from her placed it close to the logs. Here, though it took all his strength to do so, he tipped the cauldron over on its side and tapped it several times against the ground. Then, setting it on its feet again, he picked up by their unburnt ends such of the smaller logs as were still burning and threw them into it. The contact with one another and with the belly of the cauldron evoked some bright sparks, a few little blue flames, and a considerable wisp of smoke.

This latter now began rising, undulant and pendulous but in a thin perpendicular column, straight towards the roof. The disinherited chieftain and the youngest princess made, each of them, an automatic inclination of the head.

This obeisance may have been — though had Tonwen's two nephews been discussing so curious a point the prince would probably have denied it — the very last gesture of disinterested worship that this once great Ordovician and Venedotian goddess was destined to receive upon the earth until the destruction of the earth itself!

But the man of over a hundred years of consciousness and the woman of over seventy sat down again by their diminished fire with the same spontaneous relief in emerging from religious solemnity into a more easy and perhaps wiser enjoyment of life as their predecessor, the monstrous Avanc itself, must often have felt when it turned its awestruck saurian eyes away from blinking at the mysterious omnipotent sun, and, giving its scaly tail a wanton twist, scrabbled off to look for its equally mysterious but somewhat less omnipotent mate.

"I hope," gasped the youngest princess, a little breathless from her effort with the cauldron, "that all the insects did fall out when you shook it just now."

"You don't believe in its power of rebirth for small creatures then — only for big ones! But I didn't only shake it, child; I hit it against the floor. I've dinted the rim of it ere now in saving a centipede."

"Well, I can see clearly enough" — and this time Tonwen's smile had something definitely mischievous in it— "that you're ready to do more for Ceridwen and her cauldrons — whichever of the two it may be — than you are for our Blessed Mother, the Divine River."

"What on earth are you talking about? It was you who suggested the cauldron."

But the tone of his words was as tender as their pitch was abrupt; and so, though her smile flickered like a lamp in a doorway, it did not go out.

"You didn't sweep out the Cave this time," she said, with mock old-maidish severity, "before you made the cauldron smoke."

"Do you honestly want me to tell you why, my dear?" he retorted.

"Of course, Cadawg."

"Because when you cleaned this place out for me last week you scattered to the winds a precious bit of paper that's now lost forever."

"You're teasing me, Cadawg."

"Not at all! But fortunately I had learnt both versions — one was on one side of the paper and one on the other — by heart."

"What was it? But I know what you're doing. You're trying to put off telling me about washing your hands."

"No! The two things are connected, and both have a sort of connection with this smoke! It really does smell sacred today, don't you think so?"

The youngest princess had been thinking exactly that very thing as the smoke from Ceridwen's cauldron floated down like a half-visible spirit round their heads and crept into their nostrils.

There was a pause while sitting together in silence they inhaled this miraculously fragrant smoke. Then the old man burst out profanely enough. "The rebirth one," he said, "can't have smelt like this when it was resuscitating dead bodies!"

But Tonwen wasn't over seventy for nothing. Long past was the epoch when to follow her friend's realistic imaginations was a painful pleasure.

She returned to the subject.

“I must know the connection, Cadawg, between my sweeping away that bit of paper and you washing your hands like Pilate. Come now! What was written on it?”

“Brochvael, I suppose you mean. Everybody’s ready to hear anything about the prince.”

“Well, I’ll tell you. When Brochvael came to ask my advice about his son, we talked for some while about death and he quoted a verse from Horace. This verse you shall hear if I can remember it. But do you mind if I walk up and down? I remember things easier when I’m not looking at anybody and am on the move.

Omnes eodem cogimur; omnium
Versatur uma; serius, ocius,
Sors exitura, et nos in aeternum
Exilium impositura cumbae.

This your nephew translated into a sort of Brythonic jingle which you certainly won’t want to hear.”

“But I do, I do!” protested the princess. “I’m no good at Latin. The only words I could follow were ‘urna’ and ‘exilium.’”

“Well, listen then,” said the old man, “but don’t blame me if you don’t like it. He wrote it straight off, mark you, when I asked him. You ought to be proud of a man like that.”

“I know he’s travelled a great deal,” she said, but to herself she thought, “I must tell Erddud about this.”

But when she heard the faltering lines the old man now repeated, without even the measured solemnity in which he had intoned the original, she decided to conceal from her sister all reference to Brochvael's Brythonic version of the Roman acceptance of death.

Driven to it, all of us,
When shakes the urn for us;
Sooner or later, each in his turn.
For exile dolorous
Leaps out the lot for us;
And Charon's the boat for us
Without return.

He now sat down by her side again and she said to herself, "I can't stand it if there's silence between us now! It'll be a silence of terrible omen." And she murmured his name aloud.

"What is it, my friend?" he responded gently.

"I'm glad I swept that paper away! And I don't care what the connection is between Horace's urn and our cauldron. Let's leave all that, and you tell me, plain and outright, what this hand-washing of yours really means."

"All right. I will tell you. Only first of all I must confess that it only has to do with Ceridwen in so far as she inspires her servants with wisdom. Nor has it — but I can see you've guessed that already — anything more to do with our Blessed Mother Dyfrdwy than the fact of my having gone to her side with you for seventy years—"

"Not seventy, Cadawg! I never saw you till I was ten and I never got into your boat till I was fifteen!"

"Fifty-five years then. For fifty-five years you've worshipped the Mother of Rivers and I've held your hand! No, it's really nothing to do with either Ceridwen or with Dyfrdwy. They're women, like you, and have always been kind to me of themselves, without oblation, libation, prostration, or purification! So also, for the matter of that, has the goddess of the Christians, the Mother of Jesus, been kind to me. No, this washing my hands with meal and water, and drying them with fire, is the only way I know of getting even with the most powerful of all the immortals, who is not a woman at all!"

The youngest of the princesses stared at the wrinkled profile beside her, upon which flickered up a faint rosy glow from the smouldering logs.

"Is he a god?" she asked.

Her companion nodded. "He's a god all right, but I won't tantalize you any more, my dear. I am talking about Death. It is for Death I wash my hands. It is in honour of Death, in praise of Death, in hope of Death, and to prepare for Death! And I wash them with meal and with water, and I dry them with fire, because life springs from the earth like grain and dissolves in the air like smoke and is sustained by water and fire."

"Cadawg," said Tonwen, gently pushing a blackened log towards the burning heap with the toe of her right foot; "Cadawg," she repeated, as she crossed her slender ankles and stretched them out towards the warmth, their white skin showing flushed by the red glow between the yellow straps of her deerskin sandals; "Cadawg, when you say this are you thinking of what happens to us after death?"

"After death? Certainly not! At least I don't think I am. We're men and women, not gods. All we know, all we feel, all we desire, all we imagine is bound up with our earthly life. No, no! When I wash my hands like Pilate, it has nothing to do with any 'after.' Nor is it only to worship and praise and honour Death; it is to get even with him! He hears nothing but curses from Christians, and if he feels that pagans only propitiate him because they're afraid of him he may leave us forever, and cease to bring our pain and grief and labour and sorrow to a blessed end.

"Death is the greatest of all the gods, for he alone makes life endurable. Think, little lady — but it is unthinkable — of the appalling horror of not to die! But with this great god, Death, only waiting to liberate us from all our pain, from all our fear, from all our misery and madness, we can lift up our hearts once more and enjoy what good moments are left us, of sun and earth and air and water, before the end comes!"

The youngest princess uncrossed her ankles, and drawing her feet beneath her and hugging her knees with her thin bare arms, jerked herself round, so that she could see more of her companion's face than his snow-white eyebrows, the humorous lines radiating from his eyes, and his carefully trimmed beard.

"But, dear friend," she said quickly, "your worship of Death doesn't explain the way you rinsed and scoured and wrung out your hands just now. What's your reason for doing that?"

At this he laid one of these same well-scoured hands upon her knees, and so closely were these latter pressed together, and so daintily had Nature moulded them, and so small an effect upon this daintiness had seventy-three Octobers been able to make, that his long fingers covered them both in a simultaneous grip. And for the first time since she'd entered the Avanc's Cave, her aged friend fairly chuckled.

"Of course I've a reason, and a very good one. Why do we instinctively kneel down when we pray? Answer me that, you little worshipper of Dyfrdwy, the Divine River! You're never quite happy till you're on your knees down there, whether at the bottom of my boat, or on the bank, or on the mud, or on those pebblestones she's washed so smooth and round! Well, I tell you, this rinsing of my hands is as instinctive as your kneeling! And I do it daily so as to impress on my mind the necessity of looking forward to Death. I rinse and scour my fingers, Princess, not only to cleanse them after feeding my goats and my pigs, and grubbing up stalks and leaves for boiling, but that my inmost self may remind itself to shake off as much as it can of the aching, itching, scrabbling, scratching, and snatching ‘I’ that has managed, through its vitality and cunning, to live as long as I’ve managed to live! Do you know what I say to myself as I wash my hands? I say, ‘Melt into fire, Cadawg! Melt into water, Cadawg! Melt into air, Cadawg!’”

Tonwen unclasped her hands from her knees and straightened her back, gazing at him with wide eyes. Then she gave her head a jerk; and raising her hands took out four large silver hairpins and deliberately loosened the Greek knot of her masses of white hair. With deft fingers she shook down this cloudy mass till it fell, whiter and more filmy than morning mist, over her thin shoulders.

The grey smoke from the cauldron and the red glow from the fire mingling with this white cloud gave it a strangely elemental appearance, not exactly unearthly — the red glow saved it from being that — nor exactly phantomlike, since through the undulating smoke the cloudless expanse of the eastern sky gave a reassuring human warmth to her cream-coloured tunic as the afternoon light reached her from the mouth of the Cave, but a look as if it were an insubstantial bond between a beautiful woman in a youthful tunic and all those non-human elements into which her friend, as he washed his hands, prayed to be dissolved.

The emotion in his eyes under his thick white eyebrows shot forth a flame that was almost savage.

“All that she’ll get of me,” he cried fiercely, “will be ashes! Let any of their priests only try to put Cadawg Hen under the earth and they’ll see what they’ll get! The maggots that’ll eat me will be nothing to the scorpions that'll plague them! Burnt I'll be, I tell you, heart of my heart! Burnt to ashes and a few white bones!"

She bent towards him, covering his arm with her hair, and stroked his hand. "Burnt you shall be, Cadawg, if Tonwen's still alive!"

At that they both, as if with a single thought, rose from their seat. Then in a cold, quiet voice, and speaking as if it were her duty to tell him but as if it affected neither of them very much, she revealed to him her eldest sister's treachery to the House of Cunedda, and how Erddud had joined in the betrayal, and how she herself had made no move to counter it.

She went on to reveal the result of Esyllt's and the Derwydd's scheming, and how that very day Gunhorst the Sais had arrived with the news that Colgrim was on the march from Pengwern to Edeyrnion, with the idea of possessing himself of Deganwy and the ports of Mona.

All this the old man received as if it were something happening in Gaul or Italy, something that scarcely affected the Avanc's Cave at all. But, the moment she ceased speaking, silence fell again, nor did they look at each other while she coiled up her hair in its accustomed Grecian knot, and while he searched vaguely about for one of the silver hairpins. Finally it was without a smile that she insisted on carrying her black ceremonial robe, so that he might carry his woodman's coat as well as his boar spear.

Even when they left the Cave and began to descend the precipice, preparatory to crossing the expanse of brushwood and bracken that separated the foothills of the mountain from the fields by the river, they both felt the same impulse not only to avoid looking back, but, though they were walking hand in hand, to keep their faces turned away from each other.

The path they took had been familiar to them for so long — indeed they had made it themselves by the pressure of their own feet — that as they approached an enormous ash tree which stretched out its remaining proportion of pale loose leaves from its hardly less pale upturned twigs, twigs that seemed to grope and fumble at the air as though belonging to a creature that was trying to grow roots out of its head so as to draw its sustenance from the very conduits of the clouds and to tap with the desperate suction of its tendrils the very sluices of the rain, each of them automatically went through their habitual motions of half a century's repetition.

These motions that by their constant recurrence, spring after spring and autumn after autumn, had come to partake of the monotone of mysterious satisfaction enjoyed by the subhuman and the inanimate, were simple enough.

He released her hand so that she could embrace that primeval tree, whose whole being was straining upwards like an imprisoned Titan, and she dropped her robe to the ground so that she could press her body against its grey trunk while her lips touched its indented bark.

On their arrival at the river the old man was the first to break this curious shyness about meeting each other's eyes that had fallen upon them since she did up her hair in the Cave.

Nor was it without a serious concern that he now looked at her face, for he felt she was behaving as she had never behaved before in all those fifty-five years.

Whether in wild gusts of wind and rain, or in freezing cold, or in overpowering snow, or in hot July sunshine, the youngest princess had always been driven to leave his side; driven to rush to the bank where his boat was fastened, driven to clamber into it without help, and once within it compelled to fall on her knees and to plunge her arms into the flowing water.

But today everything she did was done as if in a trance, or rather as if she were moving through a Cimmerian mist like the one through which this morning's grey light had first dawned.

Cadawg himself had something of the same feeling; but with his boar spear in his right hand and his woodman's coat over his left arm, fortified moreover by the consciousness of being clad in as stout a leather jerkin with bronze-embossed frontlet and as good a pair of oxhide leggings as any disinherited chieftain of his years could desire, he was confident that he could break the spell at any moment.

But he grew more and more uneasy as he watched his companion. She seemed to him to be moving through some dim Limbo of her own vision across the margin of which he could not pass, and towards an issue he could neither see nor imagine. He gave her his hand to help her into the boat and was startled by its coldness. And how strange it was to be helping her — of all women in the world — with this conventional modern politeness!

It had become a second nature with him, in this curious unimpassioned alliance of theirs to which Erddud would certainly have scrupled to give the name of "love," to regard his young friend — for what to him was seventy years? — as both more and less than human. He had come to associate her so closely with two magical and mysterious phenomena: with ash trees, the oldest of earthly trees, and with this divine water, that to treat her as an ordinary lady seemed a derogation.

Had he ever helped her into his boat since the day in her childhood when he had first shown it to her? He couldn't remember a single occasion when he had done such a thing. Always lighter footed than he, she would never wait for him to do it!

But this taking of her cold hand as she jumped into the boat brought chillily to his mind the poet's "impositura cumbae," and he wished to the gods he could receive one warm familiar look from her, even if it were a grim and stoical one!

But once clear of the bank she didn’t even turn her face. Without impulse or eagerness, lost in some interior vision, she automatically obeyed her accustomed routine and kneeling in the bottom of the boat leant over its edge and plunged her bare arms into the water.

There beneath him now as of old was the oval head he knew so well! And how often, while enjoying its delicate contours and the shadowy curves of the neck that supported them, had his excited imagination, seeking an outlet for the overflowing of his exultant delight in her companionship, allowed itself to tease itself with some horrible image of that Grecian knot of filmy hair, grotesquely attached to some last remnant of withered skin and hanging over his boat’s gunwale from an eyeless and grinning skull! An immense wave of tenderness for this woman — still a young woman to him — surged up in this man of over a century of springs and autumns.

He couldn’t remember ever feeling as strong and formidable as he felt now. He’d use his woodman’s cloak as a shield with one hand while with the other he’d plunge his boar spear into the heart of the, strongest Gunhorst or Colgrim or treacherous Derwydd who might threaten her peace!

He glanced at the winding path, something between a cattle track and a market road, that followed the river from the foot of Mynydd-y-Gaer to the foot of Dinas Bran and there left it to thread its way through the thick forests between Llan Tysilio Sant and the ancient fortress of Pengwern.

“Once through those forests,” he thought, “and the Saxons will have an easy enough march. But what places for ambushing them! Down the slope from the Avanc’s Cave in front of them! Down the slope from Moel Gamlin behind them! Mother of Heaven! But what devil put it into Esyllt’s head to follow this mad Derwydd in destroying us all? Do they fancy for a minute, these women and these druids, that Colgrim will keep any terms they've offered him? I must go to the Gaer tonight. I must see the prince. Our only chance is to collect all our fighting men inside the Gaer and stand a siege, while we send messengers to Arthur. And tomorrow's the Feast. Tomorrow the druid's people hope to massacre every man and ravish every woman of Arthur's mission! That ought to bring him here anyway, Saxons or no Saxons, the moment he hears. But, Mother of Heaven! How is he to hear? By the time the rumour reaches him the Gaer will be starved out, Deganwy fallen, and the Saxons in Mona.

"I must go to the Gaer tonight. Brochvael will listen to me, and if the prince does what his aunt wants and meets Colgrim's man at their banquet, all the better! I shall have the field to myself. Euronwy anyway will be on my side, and the old Roman. Mother of Heaven! Before the prince gets back tonight we'll have all the Gosgordd with us, and then to hell with Colgrim! It's of Gortheyrn the prince is thinking! I know him. He hopes for another flaxen-haired Ronwen straight from Germania!"

The old man looked up the river path towards the Gaer and down the river path towards Dinas Bran. Then another thought entered his head and he struck the butt end of his boar spear against the ground.

"The prince is an unaccountable creature," he said to himself. "Blow hot, blow cold; blow east, blow west! And it may be that in his moods and his fancies, especially if he's had a few flagons of mead, he'll smell out the trick of these Saxon pirates, send his aunts to the devil, and man the walls himself! With him, as the Christians say of their god, all things are possible. But I shall go to the Gaer."

He stepped quietly into his boat, doing as he had done for a quarter of a century, done in fact ever since he had hammered into the bank his second pinewood stake after the old one had been rotted by the floods.

He pressed heavily with the palm of his left hand, impeded though it was by the cloak he carried, upon the rounded top of his post. He always had the same feeling when he did this as if he were embarking in some enchanted barge. He had trimmed this pinewood knob to make it smooth, and contact with his hand, as he came here daily to fish, had made it slippery as silk.

The youngest princess was still absorbed in her worship of the Divine Water. What she precisely did at these times, whether she prayed to this mother of rivers for definite things or whether she simply merged her human soul with the stream's superhuman one till she became as united with it as the Christian monks in the desert claimed to be united to their god, he had no idea; but he saw she had drawn her arms out of the water and was resting her chin upon her clenched fingers as her elbows rested on the edge of the boat. He could not, even yet, see her face, for her head was turned a little downstream; and where he stood now, which was upon the seat at the stern of the boat, while his fingers, the cloak dangling from his forearm, still rested on the familiar pine-post knob, he was facing the opposite bank.

It was while he paused like this, reluctant to disturb her by taking the final step into the body of the boat, that it was his destiny to experience one of the decisive moments of his long life. What practical decision he himself now made, as a result of this climax to more than a century of personal impressions, he would have been hard put to say; but the experience itself, though a concatenation of several minute particulars, was a clear and definite one.

And it was because of the strange exaltation which transported him as he balanced himself there that he did his utmost to prolong it. A reckless movement would not only destroy his friend's trance, it would bring to an end this supreme crisis of his own earthly days.

And so he continued staring at the opposite bank, between which and himself, in fact only a few yards from the boat, hovered wavering clouds of small midges whose wings, like minute sails, were conveying them, under the gentle pressure of the upstream wind, upon their own secret affairs. And while he stood there, moving nothing but the palm of his left hand as he adjusted his fingers for his greater comfort to the smooth knob and heard the creaking sighs of the rope that fastened the boat to the post, he saw a seagull that had been floating with alert upraised head on the river-current suddenly rise with a startled splash and flap off with heavy wings.

And the lledyf unben, or "disinherited chieftain," suddenly felt that long ago and far away this knob under his hand had been part of the balustrade of a flight of steps leading to an enchanted embarkation!

The cloud of gnats had also been a part of it. So had the startled seagull. But what part in it had that white profile propped on those thin arms? And into what waters did those steps lead? To Brochvael's aeternum exilium? "Eternal exile" was a paradoxical name for the exultant thrill of homesickness swallowed up in a sensation of homecoming too delicious for words.

Curse it! He'd begun to question, begun to analyze, begun to reason upon what that magical pinewood knob, cut, carried, and carved by himself, a bit of wood among other bits of wood but a veritable Hermes' wand for stealing secrets from the gods, was actually conveying to him through his hand and down his arm, across which hung his old woodman's cloak!

And with this accurst questioning the whole mystery began to fade. Anxiously he tried to cling to its departing skirts, which, unlike his now somewhat too obtrusive cloak, were vanishing moment by moment.

"O Divine Water!" he prayed in his heart. "Whither do those stairs lead? What does this happiness mean?"

He glanced up and down the river, then along the river road towards Mynydd-y-Gaer, then along the river road towards Dinas Bran. “Why do I keep feeling,” he said to himself, “that someone or something is coming?”

Once more he looked at the immobile figure of his friend, still on her knees, still gazing fixedly at the stream. Then, although his arm was aching a little and he felt a faint apprehension lest his precious cloak should slip down and fall between boat and bank, he set himself to recall other aspects of this sacred water that was now turning cold and grey under a darkening sky.

He saw it when the newly risen sun flickering through a clump of alders threw dazzling splashes of radiance upon it, radiance that floated, or seemed to float, upon a tide that had suddenly turned black. He saw, when the sun rode higher, innumerable little ripples, as the wind blew against the current, that were transformed when you looked more closely into delicately cupped shells with shadowy interstices and sparkling rims.

He saw the long trailing emerald green weeds at the bottom of the shallower places. He saw the mosses, hardly less brilliantly green, covering the limbs of the dead willows that had not yet grown indistinguishable from the mud or been washed down by the rain-swollen stream.

Grey as the autumn light had grown, it was still possible to make out the dark reflections in the river of the clump of alders eastward and of a large and ancient willow tree westward, bending low above the water.

Reflections and shadows! All his long years of earthly impressions — over a century of them! — were no more than that! But how often it had occurred to him to wonder and be puzzled at the difference between a reflection and a shadow; both of them the projection of a person or a beast or a bird or a tree, both of them dependent on the light in the sky, but one of them dependent on sun or moon or lamp! Could the moon reveal the reflection of anything but herself in the water? Could you see the shadow of a thing and its reflection at the same time?

No, he supposed not! First the shadow — if shadows were in evidence — and afterwards, by some change of position, the reflection. Or — he supposed this at least was possible — the shadow of one thing and the reflection of another, at the same instant. Mother of the Gods! How ignorant a man can be — and a man too who's lived for a whole century in touch with Nature — of the simplest things!

But a curse on his questions! Here he was staring at the dim reflection of that old willow tree, and still clinging obstinately to his pine knob, when — But he suddenly withdrew his hand, saved his cloak from slipping from his arm, and jumped down precipitously into the boat.

"Tonwen!" he cried.

She rose as quickly as he had descended, and all the reflections and shadows of his long life dissolved like mist in the comfort of seeing her smile. She was herself again. His ash tree nymph, his river maid, was once more his woman.

"Look, child!" he cried in intense excitement, pointing westward with his boar spear along the road to the Gaer. "Who's that? One of those Arthurian boys, is it? He's coming at a walking pace, but he's carrying a lance. Look! And there's a man with him, holding the horse by the bridle. It's a grey horse; no! dapple-grey, and a tall one too! And the man riding it is tall. But look, child! He sits so stiff and straight. He can't be one of Arthur's men. They are all young and sit so easy on their horses you'd think they were part of them! Real horsemen they are, my girl, like centaurs. I know, for I was one myself in my young days, though it wasn't with Arthur but with Gorthevyr Bendigeit, before Ronwen the Saesnes poisoned him and brought back Gortheyrn Gortheneu."

The youngest princess had come to his side now; but what the passionate Erddud would have made of the wistful ghost of a smile that flickered across her face, as she heard this Nestor-like boast from her old friend, is a doubtful question. But she too none the less was watching the approaching group with interest, though not with the intense excitement of the lledyf unben.

For him a whole century was fading away like smoke. He was staring at the first real battle lance he had seen since the death of Gorthevyr the Blessed. His heart was crying aloud within him, to all the powers of air and sky, that once more before he died he might be mounted on such a horse and hold such a lance in his hand!

CHAPTER XVII. Amherawdr Arthur

NEARER AND NEARER to the two friends standing in the boat came the great dapple-grey horse with its towering rider. The man who walked by the rider's side now showed himself to be at the horse's head and with a hand on the animal's bridle rein.

"What in the name of Earth's Mother," gasped the old chieftain, "is the matter with the man? He sits as stiff as if any moment he might fall off! Is he hurt? Is he dead? Who on earth is he?"

They both gazed in silence for some minutes. Then the youngest princess cried out, "It's Einion himself! It's the prince! Let's go and meet him."

Cadawg helped her out of the boat, and they advanced into the middle of the path. Their sudden appearance, for the willow tree on the bank had hitherto concealed them, brought horse, rider, and man to an abrupt pause.

But recognition soon followed. The prince raised his great lance to the full height of his long arm, and on they came again.

"Einion!"

"Auntie Tonwen!"

And then the prince, with a friendly gesture of salutation that almost unseated him, turned to Cadawg. "Cressaw Duw wrthyt, eneit! The greeting of heaven be unto thee, my soul!"

The old man bowed ceremoniously. Then he enquired in the same modern speech, wherein the Brythonic words were arranged according to the ancient Iberian manner of the forest people: "Arglwydd, pa gerdet yssyd arnat ti? My Lord, whither do you travel?"

"Ha, lledyf unben," responded the prince, "Ha, noble Incognito! I'll answer your question and Auntie Tonwen's too, though hers is unspoken. Only I must get off this beast first. Here! Take the lance, Owain Pen Uchel, and hold steady!"

Einion looked such a magnificent figure of a man, as he now paused for a second before plunging into the effort of dismounting, that the thought came to both Cadawg and Tonwen, as it had already come to Owain Pen Uchel, that it was a thousand pities he was so helpless a horseman.

His long legs were crisscrossed by golden-fringed straps of deerskin; his flexible sandals were embossed with gold; his warm perfectly fitting tunic of dusky leather was tightened at the waist by a belt of massive golden links, among which had been inserted, above both his hips, pierced leather holsters, from which hung on one side a long Gaulish sword and from the other a large bejewelled dagger. His soft yet rugged features, between the greying yellow hair of his trimmed beard and his eagle-feathered cap of rare oxskin, were illuminated by his amusement at this fortunate encounter.

"I've come straight from the Gaer," he began, the instant his long legs had resumed their natural dignity on the motionless earth, "and I was coming to see you, my Lord Cadawg." Here he turned to Owain Pen Uchel and with the' utmost courtesy begged him, as if it were a special favour he were asking, to take both horse and lance a little further down the path. "I can't talk freely to the lledyf unben, my dear lad, with this terrifying animal and this symbol of imperial power listening to every word. I'll tell you, of course, all we've said to each other later on, and all we decide."

Owain Pen Uchel looked a little disappointed and a little disapproving, but it did not appear that his personal feelings were hurt, for he nodded at the prince and walking down the road till he was well out of hearing, sat down on a lichen-covered stone, laid the lance beside him, and let the horse crop what it could.

"Come with us into my boat, my Lord, if that pleases you, Princess?" And the old man glanced enquiringly at his friend.

But Tonwen addressed her nephew. "Better tell him everything at once," she said, "He doesn't like delay, and I've kept him too long down here as it is."

The prince obeyed her and turning to the old man, "pennaf neges vu ymi, keissaw dy welet ti," he said, "my first quest was to seek you yourself."

The old man looked what he felt, extremely uneasy. "Tell him in the fewest possible words, Einion," interposed the youngest princess. "He never likes being flattered, and he prefers to know the worst."

"How do you know there is a worst, Auntie Tonwen?" But watching her as he spoke he saw that this was no moment for levity; and, much more easily than she could have believed possible in him, he suddenly became so serious that if his wife had been present she would have thought he had gone mad or was on the point of falling dead at their feet.

"In the first place I have to announce to you, lledyf unben, that I have had a letter about you from the emperor."

The youngest princess moved close up to her aged friend.

"What emperor?" enquired the old man hoarsely, and the princess began comparing the pointed beards of the two men that now faced each other across the magnetic tension of this dramatic moment, the golden one touched with grey and the silver one with the whiteness of snow, but both so carefully cut.

"My soul," said the prince gently, "you know, as I do, there are only two emperors in the world, now that the Goths rule in Rome; and I have no correspondence with Anastasius. The Emperor Arthur's letter begins by—"

"I've never recognized Arthur as emperor!" broke in the other, not so much angrily as petulantly.

But the prince went on without heeding. "I tell you, lledyf unben, the man's a military genius. Porius Manlius assures me he writes in the manner of Julius Caesar, Ul-Kessar as we call him, all pithy and to the point, and talking of himself as if he were somebody else, and he begins by explaining the precise position of the invaders and of his own dispositions in defence of Ynys Prydein."

The youngest princess pressed so close now to the disinherited chief that the prince, who had his back to the west, couldn't detect the thinnest slit of eastern sky between them. But though he wondered a little at this proximity, he had — at least for tonight — to attend to business, so he threw into his countenance an ambassadorial expression in which nothing but the exaggerated seriousness betrayed his characteristic irony.

But the emperor's operational dispositions, much as they may have resembled those of Ul-Kessar, failed to absorb at that critical moment all Cadawg's attention.

"What's the use," he asked himself, "of being more than a hundred years old if I can't take news, even heartburning news, like a man? Down, down with you, heart! Stop that heaving and throbbing there, you devil in the pit of my old stomach!"

He surveyed the stately personage in front of him, who was clearly well pleased with himself for being able to explain just how the Arthurian legions were able to gather both from the west and from the east at the same time, and begin marching simultaneously upon Mons Badonicus in the southwest and Mona in the north-west, and it occurred to him that had the prince been facing the rising sun instead of having the sinking one at his back, he would have looked like an image of gold. From the thought of gold the mind of the lledyf unben was directed by the chance of association back to the thought of the golden spangles of the sunrise that so often he'd seen transform the tide of the sacred river into a moving mirror of dazzlements; dazzlements that so soon became pools of liquid gold floating upon water that was as black as jet.

The old man's mind now clung fixedly to this image of golden fire floating calm and solitary upon black water, and he resolved to defy what the world deified, and to deify what the world despised. "Not for nothing," so the old warrior's thoughts heaved up from the depths of his being, "have I the blood of all the ancient races; the blood of the Cewri, the blood of the forest people, the blood of the Ffichtiaid, the blood of the Gwyddylaid, and not one drop of the blood of these Brythons and Romans. What fate and destiny lay on me I can endure, and on the tides of destruction I can ride!"

His mind came back with a leap when he caught the word "Pengwern." What was it this image of gold was saying? The heart of the youngest princess must have leapt also, for he felt her fingers laid on his wrist. He now listened with his whole nature, while the fingers on his wrist remained deathly still.

"The dispositions made as I have described," went on the prince, "the emperor writes that he himself with a considerable body of horse, led by some of his most skilful e*quites,* is advancing rapidly, riding by night as well as by day, to make a surprise attack upon Colgrim, of whose sudden swing to the west he has just heard.

"He can hardly know as much as we know, with this damned Gunhorst already in our midst and Colgrim halfway, but it's amazing how much he knows; and it looks to me as if Ul-Kessar's ghost had better look to its laurels! The emperor says he doesn't think, from what his messengers tell him, that he has any chance of reaching us before Colgrim reaches us; but what he wants from us is news of Colgrim. Now what he doesn't know — and the old Afagddu I sent with Medrawd has no chance of reaching him, going the way they are — is that our own forest people have turned against his mission and surrounded it, while our vagabond Derwydd, with the help of Auntie Tonwen's sisters, has opened negotiations with Colgrim.

"But the strange thing, my dear lledyf unben, the strange thing, my pretty Auntie" — here the prince, unable to keep up his ambassadorial tone and yet resolved not to resort to irony, fell into a vein of almost maudlin geniality— "is that the emperor takes for granted that all these handsome young equites of his mission are unavailable as messengers! Does he suppose they've done their work, got hold of my Hercules of a son and half my Gosgordd, and already departed by the way they came?

"Taking this for granted — and I swear to you, my dear friends, I'm almost tempted myself to believe that he communicates with this precious counsellor of his in some unnatural manner — what does our modern Ul-Kessar do? He implores me to call upon you, Cadawg, to join him at Pengwern and there inform him in detail of what's happening up here, so that he can take measures accordingly."

Here the prince stopped. He was surprised by the calm with which his hearers regarded him in the now gathering dusk. He could not see that beneath the ceremonial robe she carried on her arm, and the woodman's cloak he carried on his arm, their fingers were now tightly clasped together.

"And so," continued the prince, this time in a more guarded tone as if even his assurance had begun to require the support of a certain restraint, "we come to the end of the emperor's letter. Here he reveals at last to us, most honoured lledyf unben, at least he reveals to me, for Auntie Tonwen is no doubt already aware of it, the real identity of the hero to whom, under the name of Cadawg, my father Iddawc offered a sanctuary in the Cave of the Avanc.

"I now know — what naturally nobody but myself and the translator of this letter knows — that you, unben, are in reality a son of the immortal Gorthevyr Bendigeit ap Gortheyrn, whom Ronwen the Saesnes slew by poison. Were you really aware, Auntie Tonwen, all this while, of our great unknown's identity?"

This abrupt question addressed to his aunt was due to Einion's incredibly quick and subtly imaginative tact, for he saw that the old man was wrestling with himself under the shock of what had been said.

Cadawg was indeed desperately forcing himself to feel nothing, see nothing, think of nothing, save the liquid super-gold of so many Edeyrnion dawns floating over the jet-black river. "Fire on water — fire on water — fire on water — fire on water!" This was the image, this was the invocation, this was the secret, these were the magic words to keep events in their place and the soul of a living man in its place.

So though it was impossible to conceal from the observant personage in front of him that what he had heard had the effect of making his shoulders bend lower, his pulses beat faster, his eyes grow less clear, and his head feel dizzy; yet by the process of visualizing those floating sun pools upon the black tide, it was almost at once that he was able to speak quite calmly.

"And so Arthur will dispense with my homage if I serve him as a timely messenger? Correct me, Prince, if I mistake the drift of his communication."

"You do not mistake it, unben," returned the prince, "but if he has revealed to his whole imperial court what he has revealed in this letter, for all Britain knows that Gorthevyr the Blessed is our greatest warrior since Bendigeitfran, you'll receive, unben, such honour, such anrhydedd, from these people as... as would turn a frivolous head like mine completely; besides—”

He stopped suddenly for the white beard before him was now lowered against the old man’s chest, while the woman’s profile, turned towards it, had become like an image in white marble.

“Between me and God! Y rof i a Duw!” he cried to himself, “I struck a wrong note there! Be careful now, Master, or you’ll spoil it all!”

But as can happen with the politest person in the world when he is considerate out of general good nature rather than from actual fellow feeling, the prince, from being too frivolous and familiar, now became too serious and formal.

“Yes, unben,” he protested, “you’ll have honour from Gwenhwyvar and all her maidens, and from Garanwyn the son of Kai, and from the great Kai himself, and from Morvudd the daughter of Uryen Rheged, and from Clydno the father of Cynan, and from Cynan himself. All these will honour thee, unben, both for thine own sake and for the sake of Gorthevyr the Blessed, saviour of Ynys Prydein! And there will be no question, unben, of doing homage. Arthur will embrace the son of Gorthevyr like an equal.

“But I’m sure my aunt thinks I’m guilty of a wretched discourtesy in not paying due honour to the son of Gorthevyr myself, now that I know him for what he is.”

Having thus spoken, the prince gravely and ceremoniously sank upon his knees, and snatching at the knuckles of the old man’s only available hand pressed upon them a reverential kiss. This gesture, which a century earlier would have been offered to none save a crowned king, broke down what remained of the old man’s dignified restraint.

A sound like the creaking of one of the stunted pines in front of the Avanc’s Cave reached the ears of the youngest princess, and to the astonishment of her nephew who was on his feet now, courteous and discreet as ever, it wasn't against him that her unaccountable anger broke forth but against the son of Gorthevyr himself. In fact she jerked the old man's arm up and down so violently that his woodman's cloak fell to the ground, and if it had not been that it was caught in the folds of the robe she was herself carrying, his boar spear would have fallen too.

"Cadawg! Cadawg! I'm ashamed of you! Don't you know what Einion is? He's playing a part all the time! He cares for nothing and nobody but his own pleasures! We all know him here, and none of us takes him seriously. The Gaer is ruled by Euronwy and the forest by Esyllt. Einion would kneel before you today, before Arthur tomorrow, before Colgrim on Monday! I tell you, he's laughing at us both. He's despising us both. He's—"

But the prince moved her gently aside, laid his hand on the old man's shoulder, and, as the latter lifted his head, looked straight into his eyes.

And there passed between them as their eyes met — as much from the contact of male body with male body as from what they caught in each other's glance — a deep masculine understanding.

"She is my woman," the old man's look said. "They say you don't live with yours and they say you've had so many that it's like having none. But there it is! Conventions, symbols, logic, ritual, reason, even words themselves, are nothing to them! They live by some wild, free, natural reality underneath these things, the very reality perhaps from which we protect ourselves by these laws and rules and traditions and rituals."

"I too would have struggled, unben," the prince's look said, "just as you Struggled, to give no sign. But we are weak when it's a matter of anrhydedd! I should have given way long before you did! But you and Arthur will understand each other; and you and I know that it will be neither Euronwy at the Gaer nor Esyllt in the forest who'll deal with Colgrim and decide the future of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy."

Thus by a wordless process of masculine magnetism, that might have been passing between the point of the white beard and the point of the golden beard, did these two warriors take refuge, the one in the wisdom of his inheritance, and the other of his disinheritance, from the mysterious anger of the youngest princess.

Moving away from them now the prince called to Owain Pen Uchel to bring the horse. But before the man had lifted the lance from the ground or made a move to secure the horse's bridle, the princess, who had been exchanging whispers with her companion, flung her robe round her shoulders in a manner roughly like that of a clumsily arranged toga and announced her intention of accompanying the lledyf unben.

Nothing had ever caused Auntie Tonwen as much human irritation as her relations with her eldest nephew. She had always liked Brochvael and would have seen more of him if she hadn't feared the jealousy of Erddud; but Einion's everlasting irony, his perpetual light-of-loves, his vaunted detachment from all responsibility, his neglect — though she had no interest in the woman — of the Lady of the Gaer, combined with a secret sense at the back of her mind that he regarded his youngest aunt as absurdly deficient in dignity and decorum, had at last begun to create in her an attitude so hostile that in many things it became totally unjust and unfair. It was unfair now. Her astonishment was overwhelming when she discovered that in place of being horrified at what she assumed he would regard as a silly, hysterical, and even insane caprice, he was delighted at the idea.

"It'll just make the whole difference," he declared emphatically. "You'll be able to announce the unben's real rank much better than he could do it for himself. What forest people you meet between Tysilio Sant and Pengwern will acknowledge you as their princess, as they'd never acknowledge any Brython. And when you meet the emperor you'll be able as the unben's friend to say a good word for Esyllt, and possibly even for the Derwydd, who at the Feast tomorrow may be tempted — Body of God! I don't know what he mayn't be tempted to do!"

While the prince was thus astonishing his aunt by applauding a project which he had secretly been wishing could be brought to pass ever since he had found them there together, a rich, soft thudding of hooves, whose very sound suggested the smell of river mud and aromatic water mint, indicated the arrival of Owain Pen Uchel. Lightly he jumped from the tall steed's back and watched while the animal nuzzled up to Tonwen in easy and familiar response to her caress.

"The mare's taken a liking to you, Princess," he said, "an unusual thing for her. She came to us from Deganwy, where they hoped she'd be quiet enough for the boy-prince, but he was scared of her height, being a small child himself, and she threw him twice, for she never took to him, and none of the Deganwy ladies took to her; so as I didn't want her to leave the House of Cunedda and didn't want to leave it myself, I brought her to the Ford of Mithras, I mean to the Gaer of Corwen."

"What's her name?" enquired the youngest princess.

Owain Pen Uchel looked sharply at her. Then he said with obvious nervousness and hesitation: "I call her Brithlas," he said, "but since both my parents — as they know well at Deganwy — were forest people, I believe in keeping horses, and children too, unnamed until they win names for themselves. My parents, for instance, called me Owain for convenience, as I call her" — and he patted the mare who took not the smallest notice of him — "Brithlas, but when I was the first to climb—"

“Pardon me, eneit, forgive me, good soul,” cried the disinherited chief. “Your mare must get us past Tysilio Sant and well into the forest before the twilight’s gone, for the moon’s not yet nearly full and we might tumble into the scouts of the Saeson. But here — before we’re off — I’d like to give you this little spear of mine, as a memento.”

Owain’s eyes shone and he received the gift with a respectful obeisance.

“And now,” said Cadawg, “may I lift you up, Lady?”

The prince stepped back politely. But as Homer, and indeed as the Henog of Dyfed might have expressed it, the youngest princess “took other counsel.”

“You’d better put that on, Cadawg” — and she touched the cloak on his arm— “the wind’s moved east and we’ll be facing it.”

With a certain peevish impatience the old man obeyed her. Then, as if fifty years of planting oats and feeding pigs at the Avanc’s Cave had been the passing of a summer’s day, he lifted her on the mare’s rump and with the help of Owain’s bent knee mounted in front.

“Hold fast round my waist, Lady! I’ll want my hands free.”

The youngest princess clasped him firmly with both arms.

“Now the lance!” he cried to Owain, “and Brithlas, I can promise you, will soon find a name for herself.”

He gathered up the reins firmly and swung the lance into position with unexpected ease. A gleam of intense pleasure crossed his old face.

“Farewell, Prince!” he cried, “and if I don’t serve the House of Cunedda well for all it has done for me, may Ynys Prydein disinherit me forever!”

“Farewell, unben!” replied the other; but Tonwen, freeing one of her arms and half turning, called her nephew to her side, while Cadawg arrested the mare’s leap forward.

“Are you going to the banquet up there to meet the Sais?” she asked in a low voice.

Einion nodded. “I shall do everything I can, short of killing the fellow, to delay his proceedings and hold up Colgrim, but you can tell Arthur that at a pinch we can hold the Gaer till help comes. You can tell him too — though all that will be over before you see him — that I’ll do my best for his counsellor as I did for his nephew; but all I can promise, tell him, is to hold the Gaer till help comes.”

He was silent, but he felt that his aunt had something else to say, and that she found difficulty in saying it. When she spoke at last it was to do what she had never done in her whole life before. She asked advice of the man she held so frivolous and so false.

“What message shall I send to my sisters? They’ll be wondering why I’m not at the banquet.”

“Will you leave all that to me, Auntie Tonwen?”

She looked at him gravely. “You’re sure to be there?”

“I’m going straight there now! Do I usually dress up like this?”

“Very well. Tell them what you like. Goodbye, Einion!”

She clasped her arms once more round as much of her friend as she could get hold of, now that his gaunt frame was thickened by the leather coat; but though the coat smelt as if its wearer never carried anything on his back but dead foxes, the youngest princess felt happier than she had ever felt in her life.

The touch of her arms made the son of Gorthevyr know that all was well, and with a bound the dapple-grey sprang forward. It was certainly a good thing that she’d made him put on his fox-smelling coat, and a good thing too, even with the protection of his shoulders, she had twisted her great robe of ceremony so closely round herself. The wind on that day of Saturn, the twentieth of October, had moved from southeast to due east, and it smote cuttingly against their faces as they rode. It was not equally strong, however, all the way to the domain of Tysilio Sant.

Indeed there were times, as they followed the Divine River by the winding road she had made for herself between precipitous woods and ferny slopes and inaccessible rocky peaks, when they were in comparative shelter. But they were both thankful when they reached the hostelry of the saint. It was among a group of huts clustered round what had been the cell of the converted warrior that they found this resting place. It had a homely and natural, if a secular, origin.

A rich miller of the neighbourhood, anxious to leave his millstone to his newly married son, had been inspired by the idea of establishing an inn for the lodging and refreshment of pilgrims to the new saint's shrine; and his project had flourished.

Here Cadawg pulled up Brithlas and helped the lady to dismount. While she entered the inn he dutifully proceeded, for he had caught something of Owain of the High Peak's solicitude for the nameless mare, to certain new sheds at the back of the establishment where he hoped to find assistance. Here he waited patiently, talking to Brithlas at the entrance to a most promising-looking 'empty stall.

"You and I must win place and name tonight, old girl! It's tonight or never, I fancy, for us twain! Yes, old lady, it's our night, this night! Mother of Heaven! and I believe you understand every word! A name for the nameless and a place for the lledyf; that's what it is, aye?"

His patience was rewarded at last, for not only one man but several men came rushing forth. From kitchen, scullery, bakehouse, and cellar they came to look after the horse of the escort of Princess Tonwen.

When he returned at last to the front of the inn, satisfied that the needs of a rare creature like Brithlas were understood at the miller's inn, he found that the quality of the still rarer creature Brithlas had carried had also been comprehended by these wise exploiters of the sanctity of Tysilio.

Never had the youngest princess looked more beautiful, or indeed more royal, as she did with her white hair combed and caught in its Greek knot, and her great robe of ceremony trailing at her feet, as she sat in a chair of carved oakwood black with age, by a blazing fire.

It had been the excitement of her arrival, for not a man or woman of the forest people's blood from Castrum Deva to Castrum Uriconium, and even as far south as Dinas Llyr, but knew the Three Princesses of Ogof-y-Gawr.

As to the identity of her aged companion, the whole place was in an uproar of guesses. Some said he was Myrddin Wyllt; others that he was the famous Kai, bosom friend and chief seneschal of the emperor; others even hazarded the conjecture that he was Gortheyrn Gortheneu himself, the treacherous lover of Ronwen Saesnes, come back to life! It was this last guess that caused the princess and the unknown unben to glance at each other with most significance, as indeed was natural, considering that the long-lived traitor in question was no other than the father of the Blessed Gorthevyr, and therefore Cadawg's grandfather.

While they were refreshing themselves, the old man with meat and mead, and his companion with oatcakes and wine, the hubbub in the little community caused by their arrival reached its climax. About a dozen men, all armed with javelins and bows and arrows, flung themselves and their rattling arms at the lady's feet and with a clamour of excited voices offered to follow her against Sais, or Brython, or Gwyddyl, or Ffichti, or even against the dreaded Rhufeinwyr, or "Romans!"

It was after the youngest princess had dismissed them with the sort of royal dismissal they understood best and had managed, by the rapid opening of a little wallet inside her cream-coloured tunic, and by the bestowal upon each of a small silver coin with the head of Constantine upon it, to make her rejection of their offer seem to their glowing hearts as its happiest acceptance, that the mysterious silver-bearded unben at her side uttered the words that were so long remembered among the miller's inn people, and so often repeated to strangers and pilgrims at the shrine of Tysilio Sant.

"Three things together," he said, "are unconquerable — an old man with a good lance, a young horse with a good back, a beautiful lady with a good seat, but 'tis a fourth thing that gives the victory — good means to a good end!"

And it was after the echoing silence that followed this declaration by the mysterious lledyf unben as to what alone in this confused world brings lasting victory, that the old man, now risen to his feet and gazing sadly at their excited faces, told them the bad news of the approach of Colgrim's savage army.

"You'd better keep," he said, "a good watch night and day, and when the Saeson are near you'd better take to the forest. 'Tis no use thinking of resisting those great battleaxes with arrows and javelins. Take to the forest, my friends! But if I were you, I'd leave behind all the barrels of mead you can spare; and then perhaps, when the place is full of drunken men — but all that I must leave to you!"

Whether any of Cadawg's hearers were scrupulous enough to question how far the use of barrels of mead could be regarded as "good means" to the "good end" of defending Ynys Prydein is doubtful. But there is no doubt that when the visitors mounted their great nameless horse and rode away, they left behind them many sobered and disquieted hearts.

The waxing moon, grown big between her silver horns with the burden of her own shapeless body, seemed to those two riders to shine upon them ever more weirdly and more ominously as they plunged deeper and deeper into that huge forest. Not a wolf, not a fox disturbed the silence, not an owl, not a nighthawk.

Nothing was audible but the steady hoof fall of the dapple-grey thudding upon moss soft as sleep, upon grass fine as hair, upon marsh sedge fragrant with water mint, upon wind-ruffled drifts of dying leaves, upon muddy beds of last season's dead leaves; nothing but the old man's deep-drawn breaths and the sigh of the wind — for she had pulled out her hairpins and untied her Greek knot — in the woman's long hair as it floated silvery white behind her.

Hour after hour seemed to be passing over their heads, charged with strange meanings; and they felt as if all the years they had been friends together were returning on soundless wings to reassure them, to let them know that in this their supreme moment they were not alone, but that all their shared memories like guardian spirits were about them, risen up alive from their pair dadeni, the imperishable cauldron of rebirth.

Suddenly the youngest princess clasped him tightly, and her voice in his ear was like one of those far-borne whispers across the forest in which her people said the mysterious Coranians sent their warnings.

"Don't you hear, Cadawg? Isn't that the clash of arms in front of us?"

He pulled up at once. "Yes!" he muttered, "the clash of arms and the groans and cries of men."

Then she spoke eagerly and quickly. "I shall not leave you, Cadawg, and I must ask a great privilege from you before we go on."

"What privilege, my Princess?" he asked gently.

Both of them took for granted that whatever lay before them they were going to ride straight forward. It was their day, their night, their hour, Saturn's night on the twentieth day of October!

"Let me draw your knife from its sheath, Cadawg! I can feel its handle."

"Draw it," he cried exultantly, "and wave it high above our heads!"

She obeyed and drew it; and as he urged the nameless one to a gallop the glittering blade, nearly as long as a Roman sword, flashed bright in the moonlight over her streaming hair.

On they plunged, the mossy turf falling away behind them and the shapeless moon lurching and lifting and swimming and swaying between the dark boughs before them. All at once he pulled up the mare and pointed excitedly with his lance.

"There!" he gasped; and for a second she lowered her weapon to lean sideways and see what he saw. He had stopped just in time for themselves not to be seen; but what he and the woman clinging to him saw neither of them ever forgot.

On a grassy mound before them, doubtless some old warrior's burial mound, was one tall figure standing erect. He was sweeping round him, as he resisted the attack of some half a dozen desperate assailants, the longest, heaviest, and brightest sword that the princess had ever seen in her life.

He was a very tall man, and all they could see of his face, as he struck blow after terrible blow at those who were attacking him, was that it was beardless, and all they could see of his bare head was that it was abnormally elongated in shape and that it was covered by thick, closely cropped dark hair.

Tonwen could feel the beating of the old man's heart under his leather coat. For a second longer they watched, and then Cadawg uttered one single word: “Caledvwlch!” Well did the princess know what that word meant — the sword of Arthur. It was the emperor himself.

Then they saw that while the tall man on the mound, having disposed of three of his assailants, was absorbed in resisting a savage onslaught from the three remaining ones, there had suddenly appeared from the forest behind the mound a fresh crowd of men, more than a score of them, led by a gigantic warrior with flowing locks, locks that must have been yellow though they showed pallid in the moonlight, on the point of making a rush upon him from the rear.

Cadawg couched his lance, the mare leapt forward, and the youngest princess brandished her blade. Straight at the giant who led this new attack galloped the dapple-grey, bearing that mighty lance with the old man humped above it like a black cloud behind a shaft of lightning, and behind the man a wild-floating trail of long white hair, and above the hair the glint of a gleaming blade in an upraised arm!

In dazed confusion the giant mechanically lifted his shield to protect himself and awkwardly lifted his great war axe; but his doom was upon him. A shout of terror, not physical terror but supernatural terror, burst from his lips and was echoed in chorus by all the warriors behind him as they turned and fled:

“Woden is against us! The Valkyrie! The Valkyrie! Woden is against us!”

Shrewdly aimed by the old man and with the accumulated impetus of the horse, its two riders, and the rush of their onset, the lance pierced through everything that opposed it; and burying its point deep in the earth tore itself out of Cadawg’s hands with such violence that the mare sank on her haunches, throwing both her riders to the ground.

It was not till Caledvwlch, that sword with which all Britain was already familiar, had sent to Valhalla or to Horace’s aeternum exilium his two companions, that the last of the emperor’s assailants limped off, unmolested and disregarded, in pursuit of his friends. Between the upright shaft of Cadawg’s lance and the bloodstained turf rested hushed and still in the cold moonlight an embossed Saxon shield, an iron-plated Saxon tunic, and a death-cold Saxon heart.

Before she found herself lifted from the ground, with the hunting knife still in her hand, the thought crossed the youngest princess’s mind with what far-off prayers, in those dark unknown forests of Germania, that heart, that tunic, that shield, yes! and that great iron axe that looked as if it were made of black stone, had been sent on their way by some Saxon woman.

But it was not Cadawg who was lifting her up; it was the tall man from the mound. Cadawg himself, half-stunned, was struggling to his feet, and she noted with approval that his first care was for their horse. As tenderly as the great emperor was caring for her the disinherited one was caring for the nameless one.

But the mare was also on her feet now, trembling and wet with sweat, and with foam on her lips and nostrils; but her liquid eyes in that unearthly moonlight showed neither bloodshot nor panic-struck.

“If it is my Lord’s pleasure,” the old man heard the princess say, as in a curious fit of shyness he hid his forehead and eyes behind the dapple-grey flanks he was rubbing down with the skirt of his leather coat, “would it not be right to lay these four men side by side, and sprinkle leaves over them, lest their unhappy spirits become a curse to this place?”

“The lady is right, Cadawg ap Gorthevyr,” said the emperor gently, moving to the mare’s side and laying his hand on the old man’s shoulder, “and since I’m the younger of us two, you mustn’t take it as a discourtesy if I draw out your lance.”

He went over to the dead man and took hold of the long upright shaft. The princess shuddered and started forward. The old man with his eyes on her face knew well what she feared. But in a second she was reassured; for instead of placing his foot on the dead man's shield, the emperor knelt on it, and, though in the position the pull was a harder one, his arms were strong enough for the purpose, and he quickly rose to his feet, the lance in his hand.

"Tis as tough a one as Rhongomyant," he declared, examining the weapon, "and only an inch or two shorter. You know you saved my life, unben," he added in a low tone, and plucking a handful of grass from the base of the mound he proceeded to wipe away from the lance's point the blood of the dead Sais and the wet earth mould.

While the princess murmured the gratitude of them all in the responsive ears of the still trembling mare, the two men laid the bodies of the four Saeson, one on the one side and two on the other of their gigantic leader, under the trunk of a mighty wych elm.

Then Tonwen began collecting dead leaves. "This is a woman's work among my people," she said, "as I expect it is in the forests of Germania. My hands tonight," she repeated dreamily, as she moved from tree root to tree root, filling the gathered-up folds of her black robe with leaves, "must serve for the hands of four German women."

Meanwhile the emperor climbed the mound to where he had thrust the sword Caledvwlch into the turf. Pulling it forth and seating himself where he found it, he soon appeared completely absorbed in the process of cleaning its long blade.

"I've always heard," whispered the princess to her friend, as she closed the eyes of the four men and made Cadawg help her to strew the leaves over their bodies, "that he was the most courteous warlord in the world. I think he’s waiting up there now lest in his ignorance of our customs he should impiously spoil the ancient rites of the dead with some Christian novelty.”

When all that could be seen in the moonlight of the four dead Saeson were their white upturned faces and closed eyes, she drew the old man — who had begun muttering something in the language of Rome, though whether they were pagan or Christian words she could not tell — away from the wych elm and back to the emperor, who rose and descended the mound to meet them.

“Amherawdr,” said the disinherited chief gravely, using the Brythonic word in place of the Roman Imperator, “God give you good! I have a boon to ask of you, negessawl wyf wrthyt.”

“What is it, Arglwydd?” responded the tall man kindly.

“This dapple-grey mare, who has saved you from death and all Ynys Prydein from unspeakable loss, has as yet no name. The boon, the neges, I beg of you is that you give her a name.”

The princess drew near with more pleasure in her eyes than Cadawg had ever seen in them.

“Willingly will I do what you ask, son of Gorthevyr Bendigeit — but on two conditions.”

“And what are they, Amherawdr Arthur?”

“The first condition is that you and I dismiss from our souls all past misunderstandings and all question of ‘offering homage.’ And the second condition is that the Arglwyddes here, when I have learnt her name, should bestow the name I select upon the horse.”

“To the first, Arthur ab Uthyr, I willingly agree,” and he glanced enquiringly at Tonwen. Receiving a nod from her he at once went on, “This lady is the youngest of the Modrybedd of Ogof-y-Gawr, that is to say, of the aunts of Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda, Prince of Edeyrnion.

They are the only direct descendants of the old matriarchal queens of the forest people of Ynys Prydein. She is the Princess Tonwen."

Never had either of them seen such a courtly obeisance as Arthur made. Solemnly he possessed himself of the lady's hand. He had brought Caledvwlch down from the mound, and its long blade shimmered as white as Tonwen's waving hair as he closed her fingers upon its immense cross handle.

Then he led her to the mare's side.

"Her name," he said, "was given her out of the throats of our enemies. Did you hear what they yelled as they turned and ran? 'Valkyrie!' they cried. Her name is Valkyrie."

The youngest princess touched the mare as if with the feather of a white heron. Four times she touched her; and the dapple-grey, accepting the salute as though from its godmother, nuzzled against her breast.

Then the emperor stroked the creature's bent head. "In the name of Llamrei my mare," he murmured, "and of Caledvwlch my sword, and of Rhongomyant my lance, and of Wynebgwrthucher my shield, and of Carnwenhau my dagger, I offer you, Valkyrie, the thanks of the Princess Tonwen and the thanks of the Arglwydd Cadawg and the thanks of Arthur!"

It was then, and for the first time since they had left the hostelry of Tysilio Sant, that the youngest princess moved to the old man's side and took his hand. But Arthur looked carefully round him, peering this way and that into the moonlit forest.

"My camp is quite close," he said, "and I'll be your guide. But before we go — for there'll be rejoicings and clamourings and much talk when we're there — I must beg you both to give me a little help out of your knowledge of this district. Come! I need your advice, your cyngor. Come, if you please, my souls; we'll sit down as we take counsel."

Thus speaking he thrust Caledvwlch into its place at his side, where its hilt reached nearly to his collarbone and its point nearly to his knee; and letting Valkyrie's bridle trail along the trodden and bloodstained turf he led her by her mane, reassuring her when she turned her head to see that the others were following, a little way further along the path, till they came to one of the earth-stooping willow trees, still green, but bowing low towards its final resting place, whereof all those forests contained so many.

Here he motioned them to be seated while he produced from a slit inside the lining of his tight-fitting tunic a roll of soft leather scrolls, bleached white for script. Selecting one which his companions could see was a rough military map of that whole district, he brought out a blackened stick of charcoal with a sharp point, and holding this between his finger and thumb spread out the map before them on his knees.

They bent their heads over it, and since he had seated himself between them, the old man's beard on one side and the lady's hair on the other made in the moonlight a wavering white frame for the map's white surface.

It was soon plain, however, that the old man's eyes weren't good enough to read the marks on the scroll before them; but undiscouraged by this difficulty the indefatigable emperor, after a little more fumbling beneath his tightly strapped tunic, drew forth the flint and steel of a device similar to the one which was the pride of Rhun ap Gwrnach, together with a tiny silver cup with a close-fitting lid containing a wick floating in thick oil. This he now ignited; and holding it over the scroll with one hand while he waved the piece of charcoal with the other, he proceeded with absorbed intensity to verify, supplement, and correct by their help the precise positions of hills and streams, mountains and fountains, rock caverns and hill camps within all the boundaries of Edeyrnion.

The emperor’s passionate interest in his map was contagious. Even Valkyrie, undismayed by the moving light, drew near enough to breathe a few deep breaths against the scroll’s rim.

The man indeed had completely changed. With his piece of charcoal, with his campaigner’s lamp, he was now an obsessed war craftsman crouching with inhuman concentration over the strip of moonlit parchment. The fabulous hero with that historic sword was gone. The courtly emperor bestowing names upon brave steeds and learning the names of beautiful ladies was gone too. The man who dominated them now was a man of pure, undiluted generalship, realistic, practical, and competent.

Sitting on the branch of a willow in an aboriginal forest he was a superlative master of the art of war, a trained military technician, one who would have had little or nothing to learn from Ul-Kessar or even from the great Hannibal. The long sword by his side, the men he had just slain, all had vanished from his consciousness. He was no longer addressing an old revivified warrior and a proud lady; he was playing an absorbing game of chess with a dangerous antagonist.

Both his human listeners — and it almost looked as if the newly christened Valkyrie felt the same — were suddenly aware that he was exerting upon them the irresistible pressure that the fingers of a great chess player exert upon pawns and knights and bishops and castles, and even upon kings and queens.

They felt as if that little bit of charcoal, following the motions of that miniature oil lamp, were tracing the outlines of a master purpose that compelled obedience with the force of an inevitable destiny, a destiny that could be obeyed willingly or unwillingly but that could not be resisted.

He was soon asking them a series of quick decisive questions, in the course of which he learnt how Einion had placed Medrawd under the care of the experienced Afagddu, who would probably be guiding him southward to Caer Myrddin and thence across Mor Hafren, the great tidal estuary from the ocean, to Gwlad-yr-Haf, “the Land of Summer,” with the idea of finding the imperial camp at Mons Badonicus; and how the Derwydd of the forest people had warned the counsellor and the whole mission that there would not be a man of them left alive if by noon tomorrow, after the Feast of the Sowing, they hadn’t retreated by the way they came; and finally how there was no man or woman, of any tribe or race or religion in all Edeyrnion, who didn’t fear the Derwydd or didn’t believe he could do what he threatened.

“We have always believed,” the princess assured their questioner, “that the Derwydd has at his disposal a secret host of archers, recruited from both the forest people and from what are left of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, and that at the moment he summons these men they must gather at once from all the woods and swamps and mountains of Edeyrnion ready to obey his orders. We also believe that the Derwydd can, when he wishes, furnish a deadly poison for the anointing of these men’s arrows and javelins.”

“I have never doubted it,” was the reply; but as he spoke a certain humorous detachment from the Derwydd’s poisoned arrows revealed itself in a faint shrug of his shoulders.

“I think,” the old man went on, “that what really disturbed the nice balance of our tribes and customs was the appearance of a fanatical priest at Mynydd-y-Gaer called Minnawc Gorsant, who at once renamed our Ford of Mithras, calling it Cor-wen or Cor-waun or Corvayne. Whether the fellow meant ‘White Choir’ or ‘Dwarf Mound’ I don’t know. But what I do know is that he’s cleverer in church Latin than he is in Brython, whether spoken as the Romans speak it or as the forest people speak it. Until this priest came to us the House of Cunedda—"

But the emperor made an impatient movement with his charcoal as though dismissing the House of Cunedda for the present, and the princess intervened. "We believe in the Derwydd's blessings and poisons, Amherawdr," she said, "as Christians believe in miracles. My sisters are old, very old. We have no one to succeed us. The Derwydd has no one to succeed him. My sisters are the last of our family and the Derwydd is the last of the druids. It is this that has led him and has led them into plotting against our nephews and against you.

"It is this that has brought Colgrim's envoy to Ogof-y-Gawr. We are at an end, Amherawdr, and the Derwydd is at an end. When ruins fall they drag down with them many fresh and living things. After the gods and yourself, Amherawdr, Edeyrnion has one hope. Cadawg will know what I'm trying to tell you. I mean the marriage of Porius ab Einion and Morfydd ferch Brochvael. Porius is anxious to serve you, my Lord, and to unite all Ynys Prydein under you; and Morfydd's father has been to Italy and Greece and Constantinople, and receives letters from many foreign men of learning, both Christian and Platonist.

"If only this marriage can be brought about, Amherawdr, Edeyrnion will settle down in peace, whatever happens to the last" — the youngest princess's voice trembled a little— "of us, or to the last of the druids!"

The emperor was silent for a moment, holding his lamp and his charcoal suspended above his map, and looking from one to another with grave intensity. Then he said, speaking slowly at first but soon very rapidly: "You have saved my life, you two, and I am going to assume that you are ready at any cost to yourselves to save Ynys Prydein. Tonight you shall sleep in my camp for six hours. At dawn tomorrow you shall choose whom you like of my people to ride with you, and you shall return" — here both lamp and charcoal moved as rapidly as his mind and became stationary in the centre of the map— "by this mountain path marked here, to the Cave of Mithras, and thence, fording the river, to the Fountain of Saint Julian. You will reach my counsellor's people before this Derwydd's ultimatum expires, that is to say, before noon tomorrow. You will take a letter from me in which I shall tell the counsellor and his ladies to take refuge in the Gaer along with this Porius of yours and his bride, and in which I shall tell my horsemen to disregard these poisoned arrows and to watch for the approach of the Saeson along that road by which you have just come; watch, I mean, between the Gaer and Dinas Bran, and harass Colgrim's approach.

"Meanwhile I shall harass his rear till he gets too far to retreat; and then — but I will explain all this to Myrddin Wyllt in my letter, and indeed he may receive the gist of it tonight for he has taught me how to catch his attention, however far off he is; and then, when Colgrim has begun seriously to attack the Gaer, I shall come up with all the horsemen I've got and make my serious attack upon him. You will do this for me, son of Gorthevyr the Blessed? You will do this for me, Princess of my forest people?"

Without even a glance at each other, the two friends, to whom Erddud would still, we must suppose, refuse the title of "lovers," bent their heads in agreement. And at once with a pleased nod he plunged again into his map and his military dispositions.

Tonwen was naturally the first to grow weary of the concentrated attention required for these projected operations, but she found enough to keep her mind from roving, in the glimpses she got of the personal appearance of this master artist in the art of war.

The emperor’s figure was what most struck her. He seemed literally all bone and muscle. His neck was long, but she got a queer impression that his spinal column, tough and flexible as iron, was continued up through his neck, clean into his head; so that his skull, in place of loosely wagging and nodding as do most human skulls on the top of their skeletons, seemed to move naturally and easily with the whole rhythm of the bony structure of his body.

She decided that he was the extreme opposite of what the Jewish scriptures call “stiff-necked,” and one particular peculiarity, or “cynneddf of his gave her special pleasure, the unusual depth of the little indented hollow between the small bones just above his neck at the back of his head.

His head was of the strangest shape; so strange indeed that it would have come near to deformity had not the attention been distracted from it by the extraordinary expressiveness of his face. And not only was his head abnormally long; it was covered by closely cropped thick brown hair, hair that naturally formed itself into small tight nut brown curls. He had extremely thick dark eyebrows pointing upwards towards the centre of the forehead, not downwards, as is more usual, towards the bridge of the nose.

His eyes were the most remarkable thing about him. They were of a deep umber, a brown so dark and rich and yet so luminous that they made his hair look like the brown of dead leaves. There was not a trace of gold in either the brown of his hair or the brown of his eyes. He had a hooked nose of a dominant size and of a distinctly Roman cast; but what wasn’t Roman about him was his mouth. This feature she could observe now at her leisure, and there was that about it that absolutely fascinated her.

His upper lip was long, a great deal longer than his chin, which was the reverse of what might have been expected in a great military leader. It was a small chin, and a very gentle and retiring one, showing not so much weakness — though it did perhaps show a complete absence of that massive obstinacy that is so often taken for strength — as an almost feminine sensitivity.

He was clean-shaven; and she felt as she watched that everything about him indicated whatever it might be in the sphere of character, thought, counsel, or action, that went most appropriately with a clean-shaven rather than a bearded man.

“Well!” And his voice which certainly rang out with the clarity of a silver horn drew her with a start out of her ponderings. “And now to guide our reappeared son of Gorthevyr and our youngest princess of the forest people, mounted, each of them, upon Valkyrie, to what refreshment we can offer. Only first — for all my warriors will want to touch it — we must pick up the unben’s lance. I only hope it won’t make Rhongomyant jealous!”

The emperor raised Valkyrie’s trailing reins, lifted Tonwen lightly on the mare’s back, offered a bent knee as naturally as Owain had done, as a mounting block for the old man, and handed him the reins and the lance.

Thus equipped, with map and charcoal and oil box returned to their place inside his tunic, he led them forward, his brown eyes searching the moonlit glades to right and left as he walked and his hand on the hilt of Caledvwlch.

The princess’s fingers could not help straying now and again to the handle of her friend’s hunting knife as they advanced, and she was amused at herself for this.

“River Divine!” she thought, “am I becoming like that old Queen of the Iceni in the early days? But that’s the way it is! We think we’re modern; we take our newfangled civilization as something established forever, and then behold! In a moment the wheel swings back, and we’re the same old men and women we always were!”

Just as if fate itself had been anxious to verify this, the tall man at her side suddenly stopped and laid his hand on Cadawg’s wrist, who promptly pulled up the mare.

“There’s a fellow with a bow behind that pine tree over there,” he said softly. “He’ll be shooting at us in a second.”

In her new and fanciful recklessness Tonwen wasn’t surprised to discover that she felt excitement rather than misgiving at these words. “This must be just like what that old Iceni woman felt,” she said to herself, “only she’d be rushing at the man with a spear!”

But the emperor’s brown eyes as he turned them upon her now were as serious as an experienced hunter stalking a stag, and gay as a boy steering a canoe.

Even at this moment when any of them, including Valkyrie and herself, might feel the stinging pain of an arrow and perhaps the descent of eternal darkness, she was compelled to note the queer new shape assumed by the man’s mouth. As a military expert poring with concentrated gravity on that map, his upper lip had pouted grotesquely over the lower. But now his full lips were drawn apart a little, and delicate upward curves of sheer humorous enjoyment showed at their corners.

She had hitherto associated a life of warlike activity and political statecraft with grim implacable chins, heavy jaws, and tightly closed mouths turning down at the corners. She had associated these things with Esyllt’s austere preoccupation and with Erim ab Uchtryd’s fanatical gravity. But here was this man, whom she’d heard, only half a dozen hours ago, compared with Ul-Kessar himself as a master in the art of war, with a smile as gay and humorous as a boy’s above a chin a good deal more feminine and relaxed than her own! Nor could she see a trace of the irony she was so used to in the prince.

Danger and the rush of contest seemed simply to throw him into the highest good spirits, just as those military maps had plunged him into the concentrated gravity of a game of chess.

Mother of Earth! But what was that? There'd come a horrible whirring and swishing sound, and then an ugly shock. Cadawg had difficulty in keeping Valkyrie from rearing up and bolting; and across the man's face she had been watching came a spasm of pain, and behold! just beneath her a great feathered arrow, its shaft quivering and its point fixed in the emperor's thigh, just above his knee!

She saw him bend down, jerk the arrow out, and lay it carefully on the grass. "Don't touch that thing," he commanded, "and don't, for God's sake, throw it away! I'll want to examine it when I get back."

Swish — whirr — swish — another arrow whizzed among them, but this one swerved when it struck the iron clasp of Cadawg's leather coat, slid sideways grazing the horse's neck, and buried itself in the root of a tree.

Arthur now issued his orders to them quick and fast, his mind, Tonwen felt, working by some infallible instinct that was almost automatic.

"Tumble off, both of you, as if hit," he cried, "and lie still, with your hands on your daggers, but don't touch him till he touches you! Yes! Away with you, my girl" — this last word was to Valkyrie— "and don't forget the way back when you're tired!"

Valkyrie bounded off straight down the path, and the princess never forgot the convulsed combination in the emperor's face of sharp pain and lively amusement.

"I'm going to round up that fellow," he said. "I think he's" — the sentence remained suspended while another arrow whizzed past him, grazing his shoulder— "alone, and not anxious to lose his arrows either!

But I'll be with you as soon as he is; and for God's sake, unben, don't move, or let the lady move, till he touches you!"

Silence then fell upon those two; but so often had it fallen upon them, as they lay side by side on the bank of the Divine River, that they felt nothing incongruous or grotesque in the situation.

Presently, however, she became aware of a curious sound issuing from the leather-covered form by her side, and hastily she stretched out her hand. From their present position, which in obedience to their singular Ul-Kessar's extremely rapid "operational dispositions," they had had no time to select and had been forbidden to change, all she could do in her concern was to touch with the tips of her fingers the lledyf unben's belt, and here she felt to her consternation the sort of spasmodic heaving that the human frame suffers when it is vomiting.

"What is it?" she whispered. "Are you sick, Cadawg? Because if you—"

But there she broke off, realizing what it was. The son of Gorthevyr Bendigeit had been seized by an uncontrollable fit of laughter and was burying his face in the mossy turf to conceal the sound. Some hidden Iberian nerve in the old man, as full of the childish laughter of the desert as were those of their curly-haired seneschal at Ogof-y-Gawr, had been tickled to the limit by the difference between this real Amherawdr Arthur and the insolent young popinjay conjured up by the magic of Myrddin Wyllt, whose fabulous claims he had rejected on hearsay and whose face he had refused to see.

Wondering as much at the laughter of men as Cadawg and Einion had wondered at the anger of women, she now tried to count the number of the arrows that were still flying over their heads or sinking into the ground beside them.

But she had not reached half a dozen when she heard a wild cry of alarm from the forest, followed by the sound of a scuffle ending with a second cry in a lower tone from the same voice.

Immediately after came the gay though rather breathless voice of the emperor. “All’s well, unben! All’s well, Princess! I’ve got the rascal!”

Then as they scrambled to their feet they heard his voice calling again, this time not to them but Valkyrie.

“Will she hear him?” Tonwen thought.

Whether she did or not, there she was, back again, nuzzling against her godmother’s thin chest in happy contentment. And then the amherawdr arrived, carrying a now quite passive prisoner, unwounded and unbruised, in his muscular arms. He placed the man on his feet, retaining a strong hold however upon his right arm.

While the lledyf unben occupied himself in rubbing the sweat from the exhausted mare and removing the twigs entangled in her mane, the emperor, as pleased with himself as a boy who has won a prize, and having learnt that neither of them had been hit, picked up the arrow he had drawn from his own flesh and showed it to his prisoner, asking him a series of rapid questions, some in colloquial Latin and some in the rather archaic Brython fashionable at court. But the prisoner seemed completely puzzled.

Arthur turned helplessly to Tonwen. “Arglwyddes,” he implored almost querulously, “do make him understand that I’m going to let him go, only I want to know, first who he is and of what tribe, and second whether he poisons his arrows.”

And so the princess plunged into her first essay at formal interpretation, and such a queer exchange of broken words took place between her and this tangled-haired, panic-stricken creature of the woods, that Cadawg, and apparently Valkyrie too, drew near to listen.

It was clear to Cadawg, whose pride in his friend reached one of its highest points as he watched her, that the first question as to this queer being's identity had been satisfactorily answered.

"What a number of Gwyddyl-Ffichti words she must know!" he thought, "and more of the forest people's dialects than any Derwydd or Henog among them!"

It was, however, her solution of the question about the arrow poison that roused his admiration the most. This she obtained purely by dumb show. She took the arrowhead from the emperor and plucking some stalks from the grass made as if squeezing their juice upon its point. Then she pretended to prick herself with it and immediately afterwards distorted her face and twisted her body as if in extreme pain.

She was evidently not quite content with the emphatic shaking of the prisoner's head in answer to this performance, and the emperor and Cadawg watched her with something more like awe than amusement as she went through a sort of symbolic act of solemn invocation, touching the earth with her right hand then raising both her arms towards the moon, and concluding her prayer that the gods should bear witness to the truth of the man's words by gravely laying her fingers upon the arrowpoint.

So impressed was the emperor by all this that he released his hold upon the prisoner's arm, who instead of taking this chance to escape deliberately imitated the princess's performance, and then stood before her with cast-down head and folded arms.

Arthur, however, took immediate advantage of his own freedom of movement by untwisting the bloodied straps from his wounded leg, a proceeding which ended with a wry face and a groan as he attempted in vain to pull off the particular strap that covered the wound.

“Well, Arglwyddes,” he enquired, looking up from this attempt, while the boyish lips under his great hooked nose continued to twitch with the pain he had caused himself, “what does he say?”

“He says,” explained the princess, “that he lives with his father, his mother, his grandfather, his wife, and his six sons, alone in the forest. He says he is a pure-blood Ffichti, the last of his tribe. He says—” She broke off quickly. “Please, my Lord, leave your hurt alone till I can see to it! In these things a woman—” But when she saw he obeyed her and confined himself to dabbing at the trickling blood which, black in the moonlight, was writhing like a snake across the whiteness of his thigh, she went on with her interpretation.

“He says he hates the Gwyddylaid as much as he hates the Rhufeiniaid — he means the Romans, of course — and that he and his family have already killed with their arrows several Saeson. He says he’s afraid to shoot at any of the forest people because they have a great Derwydd hidden away somewhere, to whom every wind that blows brings news of what happens to his people, and who sends sudden death to all who hurt them.

“As to poisoning arrows, he says that no Ffichti is permitted by his gods to do such a wicked thing. He says that even if the forest people’s Derwydd began to use poison, the gods would be angry and he would be the last Derwydd in Ynys Prydein. He swore by the earth and by the moon that the arrow you pulled out would do you no harm save loss of blood.”

“I thank you from... from my heart, Princess; and I beg you to tell him he can go back... back... to his... to his family. If I didn’t feel at this moment a little... a little dizzy... I’d have given him something... Have you... perhaps... Princess?”

Tonwen snatched at her tunic, drew out a little wallet, and flung it to the old unben. “One of Cystennin’s silver coins, Cadawg!” she cried as she ran to Arthur’s side.

The Ffichti outlaw received the gift of the Brythonized emperor’s profile with superstitious awe, pressed it to his lips, bit it, and nervously dropped it into the bottom of the empty quiver that still hung from his neck. Then he proceeded to tap the ground with his tousled head three or four times before Valkyrie, whom he appeared to regard as the only one of these mysterious intruders he had not so far properly propitiated. This having been done, and Valkyrie having contemplated him with friendly surprise and breathed warmly at him through distended nostrils, he bounded off and was no more seen.

Only for a second after helping the injured man to relax on the grass was the princess at a loss what to do. She saw his fingers move feebly to his side, and she snatched quickly at what they sought. In his belt on the opposite side of where Caledvwlch hung was a small Roman wine flask.

Untwisting its stopper, she held this flask to his mouth with one hand while with the other she raised his head. He choked a little at first, and some of the wine ran down from the corners of his mouth to his chin and even below his chin.

In the moonlight this spilt wine assumed the appearance of those long moustaches that had been so fashionable among the Brythons in the days of Uthyr Pendragon. But the princess wiped it away with the nearest thing available, a strand of her own hair, and again tilted the Roman flask. This time he gulped it down properly, as she could see from the motion of the muscles in his long neck, and when she let his head sink on the grass again he smiled at her contentedly.

At this moment Cadawg came up to them. “It wasn’t poisoned after all, I hope,” he said.

For the second time that day the princess's anger flashed out in a look she turned on him. But all she said was, "I would stake my life on his oath!"

One cause of her look lay in the fact that since the emperor had turned faint like this she had been reproaching herself for letting him go to "round up" their lonely assailant.

"Why did I take for granted," she asked herself, "that the arrow wasn't poisoned?"

"I'll be all right in a second, unben," Arthur was now saying. "Oh, no! I'm subject to this weakness. That's why I carry the flask. Give me one more good pull at it, Lady, and you'll see!"

Tonwen obeyed, putting the flask into his hands. She now felt an impulse to fasten up her hair, and she began trying to find her hairpins and found only two; but with the help of these she got her long tresses into some sort a rough substitute for the Grecian knot, and as soon as this was accomplished some mysteriously lost virtue seemed at once to return to her and she answered the old man's anxious glance with a natural smile.

"Now, Lady," said the emperor, sitting up. "I'll lean against this molehill — it's not an anthill, is it? — and bite my lip while you tear off that strap and tie up my leg with something or other — anything you've got handy!"

The son of Gorthevyr the Blessed had to turn away his head when he heard that. As when the two of them were crouching on the turf with the Ffichti's arrows flying over them, his Iberian capacity for stomach-hurting laughing fits — final spurts it may be of the life force within him that had enabled him to live so long — was suddenly tickled by the sight of an emperor, as famous as any in Constantinople, propped up against a molehill, while his forest princess of the riverboat tore at her clothes to find a rag to bandage his thigh.

"I'll go and see if there's any water under those trees," he announced. "I can see some rushes there. A drop of water, even if not too clean, would be good for that hurt, Amherawdr, and you'll have to be the one to ride Valkyrie this time. Finish the wine, Amherawdr. Then you won't see what she's doing. And I'll try to fill the flask with water, if it's only from a — Mother of Heaven and Earth! What's this? Are the dead coming to life?"

With Tonwen's trailing bandage hanging loose from his bare leg Arthur leapt to his feet. The eyes of the princess opened wide, and her lips parted in a gasp.

Coming straight towards them from the direction of the mound, where they had first seen the sweeping blows of Caledvwlch, was indeed a veritable figure of death. Out of a ghastly white face, as the moonlight fell full upon it, stared a pair of pale fixedly staring eyes, the eyes of something other than a sleepwalker, other than a madman, the eyes of the dead come to life!

His clothes, especially those across his breast, down one side of which hung a bloodstained tangle of fair hair, were so caked with blood that the leaves that had been strewn upon him still adhered to his body, giving him a look as though some wild creature of the forest had been prematurely dragged forth from its annual hibernation.

He was repeating some articulate words over and over again, and he moved as if propelled by a soul struggling for release, but a soul that could not, without some exterior aid stronger than itself, stronger even than the power of death, find such release.

Never had the princess, as a piece of torn flax-spun fabric fluttered to the ground from her fingers, felt such a shock of supernatural horror.

Never had the old unben, as in complete ignorance of what he was doing he beat the belly of the wine flask against the front of his woodman's cloak, in all the days of his long life, seen a thing like the thing he saw now.

But what amazed them both was the way the emperor behaved. “He acted,” Cadawg declared to Tonwen later, “as if he’d been dead himself many times and knew exactly—” To which the princess, interrupting her friend, retorted, “Rather as if he were used to being a king among the dead.”

It was Arthur himself who explained to them later as he limped by Valkyrie’s side, for no persuasion could induce him to mount, how he came to understand the words the man kept repeating, and what he wanted. It was, he told them, his custom to spend an hour or two every day in the portion of his camp allotted to Saxon prisoners. He was anxious, he said, to learn all he could of their ways and customs and even to pick up if possible a few words of their outlandish tongue. In the profession of arms, he told them, knowledge of the enemy’s mind is worth the taking of many of his cities.

At this moment, however, Cadawg and Tonwen were agitated and troubled as well as puzzled by what they beheld. The staring eyes of this living corpse saw nobody but the emperor. Towards him he moved, not staggering and lurching, but walking mechanically, as if he were impelled by a force that acted upon rather than through his body.

And it was brought about by the great goddess Chance that the youngest princess heard the three syllables, repeated now over and over again by the emperor, that she herself was destined to repeat at the hour of her death.

“So be it,” the emperor kept on repeating in a voice of solemn authority as the two men met, “so be it, so be it, so be it. I release you, Ulric, son of Wolf, in the name of Colgrim! I release you, Ulric, son of Wolf, in the name of Baldulf!”

He then took the living dead in his arms and laid him gently on the ground and knelt beside him, the bandage trailing from his thigh and his own warm blood dripping upon the cold caked blood of the other.

Then he stooped down and kissed him; and as he kissed him he uttered his final words: “Ulric, son of Wolf, I release you in the name of Cheldric!”

It was then, and only then, that the end came. A smile of unbelievable gratitude and contentment crossed the man’s face. There was a quick convulsion of the limbs, the mouth fell open, the eyeballs receded, and the body straightened itself in the stiffness of death.

The two friends, whose hands had instinctively sought each other, separated now and rushed forward to help the emperor to his feet.

“He said,” the emperor whispered, “he couldn’t die till his king had released him from his post. He said his name was Ulric Wolfson. I tell you, unben, I tell you, dear Princess, that if only we could disarm and cajole these common soldiers of these queer Saeson and kill off their curst chieftains, we’d have as good and as law-abiding a set of colonists among us as any — No! Leave him as he is — and let us pray that his soul has gone to Valhalla!”

CHAPTER XVIII. The Doctor

AT THE VERY MOMENT when the appearance of Colgrim's emissary was causing such excitement in Ogof-y-Gawr and such agitation and desperate consultation at Mynydd-y-Gaer, the lady of this latter fortress was so far from forgetting the marriage of Porius and Morfydd that she found time to despatch her personal maid, or morwyn, together with her personal serving boy, or gwas, to prepare, in as close proximity as possible to the cell of the Brother who was to unite them, the couple's marriage tent and marriage bed.

The two youthful messengers employed on this important mission were none other than the silent and apparently stupid young Gwythyr who had been made responsible for the care of Rhun ap Gwrnach's white hound, and the sagacious and pretty Nesta, daughter of the Roman Aulus, who had carried off old Canna to the Gaer kitchen on the occasion when it was so necessary for Morfydd to be alone with Porius's mother.

These two, like Porius and Morfydd themselves, were betrothed to each other and were hoping — though rather vaguely and apprehensively — to seal their tribal and secular union by an official Christian marriage at the hands of the aged disciple of Pelagius.

At first sight Nesta's dark complexion would have suggested the Iberian blood of the forest people. Her eyes, however, were of that rich blue-black common among the women of the Brythonic race, while Brochvael ab Iddawc had always assured Aulus that his daughter's colouring was not Iberian at all but pure Italian, and that there were thousands of dark beauties in the Etruscan vineyards with exactly her hair and skin.

In any case, whatever was the colouring of her skin, her feelings beneath it had the natural intensity and simple loyalty of the old centurion; nor had she lacked the wit to recognize what no other woman — probably not even his mother — had discovered, the fact, namely, that the odd-looking, absentminded lad she had taken for her own possessed several disturbing ideas in his heavy skull.

These ideas, never uttered to a soul till the centurion’s daughter fell in love with him, were of a rebellious character; were in fact allied with the ideas that at various crises in the history of human slavery, even after Saint Paul had insisted on the Christian duty of submission to constituted authority, had recurrently inflamed the minds of those victims of injustice whose fate it is to serve others in the name of duty and custom.

Young Gwythyr, in fact, though their easygoing prince would never have beaten him as Thersites was beaten, far less crucified him as modern rebels were crucified, harboured thoughts of a kind more natural to the Cewri of the Cader than to a patient gwas at Mynydd-y-Gaer.

In person Gwythyr was powerfully built though only of medium height. He had a heavy protruding forehead, a small upturned nose quite out of proportion to his other features, and a large mouth whose curiously protruding upper lip gave his profile a resemblance to that of a gigantic rabbit. His forehead, however, was his most characteristic feature, for upon it was a concentrated frown of brooding questioning; not so much questioning any particular complication as the whole contrarious gamut of the piled-up unfairnesses of fate.

What Nesta had discovered, by her beautiful Brythonic eyes, whether aided or unaided by the instinctive pores of her Italian skin, was the fact that her betrothed had the power of so exaggerating his shy silences in the presence of his superiors that he reduced his rabbitlike countenance to a mask of almost idiotic stupidity. This, she soon discovered, he was wont to achieve by the simple device of opening his mouth extremely wide and letting his lower lip hang down.

It was nearly sunset when these two young people arrived at the Fount. They were pleased with their chance of being together on this momentous eve but they were also a little scared; and they were this, not only because of the responsibility of the task before them, but because of their own private and personal apprehensions about tomorrow’s dawn and the Feast of the Sowing.

They had long been fond of each other, but it was only recently that they had actually been betrothed; and now, in accordance with the Edeyrnion custom, they, like many other couples, including Porius and Morfydd, were to consummate their union at the great Feast. But they were anxious and disturbed about this; for although they had already, under the influence of the sex custom of the forest people, made love in bed, Nesta was still a virgin, and they had been worried by a talk the girl had had with old Canna ferch Glam.

All the young folk of Edeyrnion went in their sex difficulties to this old woman, and Canna had told them that it would be unsafe for Nesta to bear children. This worry was naturally not far from the surface of their minds as they shared their task, but since the light had already begun to fade and they had now only two hours before it would be quite dark, they set about their business with single-hearted alacrity.

The first thing they did was to borrow from the camp of Arthur’s emissaries a small unused tent made of a material lighter and more elegant than any sailcloth known at the Gaer, a material that had been freshly dyed in the court colours of green and yellow. With the help of a couple of camp servants it did not take the sturdy young Gwythyr long to get the tent he had procured fixed in the soft ground on the edge of the lake within only a short distance of the cell of the priestly Brother.

Marriage among the masses of the forest people still tended to be rather a tribal than a religious affair, though both the more pious and the more superstitious were prone enough to welcome a priest's services if a priest were forthcoming.

Left to themselves at last in that fading light, where the lapping of the lake water and the sigh of the wind made the intermittent sounds from the Arthurian camp ring out more intrusively than ever, the lovers were now able to intersperse something of their own personal feelings into the traditional arrangements they had come to make.

They had decided to offer as their own contribution to the marriage bed of their prince's son a golden coin with the head of Caius Julius upon it which Aulus had long ago given his daughter, and for which the old man had himself spent many a winter evening carving a wooden frame. This sacred relic Nesta now decided to suspend by a cord from the bedpost nearest to the tent's entrance, so that the great emperor's impassive profile might drive away any evil spirit ere it approached so much as the outer one of the two pillows.

"Did you hear what that Cymry boy said when he was hammering the tent pegs, Gwythyr?"

"No, my sweet, not a word! I was so afraid he wouldn't get the entrance facing the east and the bed's head facing the entrance that I missed his chatter."

"He said they had a very good Jewish doctor in their camp, a friend of the Greek merchant, and he says this man goes every few hours to Brother John's cell to keep the old man alive till he can marry us all. What about catching him as he goes past? He has to pass; that Cymry boy said he was so friendly and comical that you’d never believe he was a doctor. Would you be scared of stopping him, Gwythyr?”

Gwythyr looked up quickly from an earthen bowl in which he was arranging an elaborate floral pattern composed of red funguses standing erect in bog moss, round which he had twisted the filigree-foliage of the wild corydalis, fragile as the hair of forest nymphs, and bearing amid its trailing filaments minute flowers of the colour of ivory.

The use of any kind of mushroom growths as a symbol of fecundity came naturally to the forest people, but it wasn’t the first time Nesta had been impressed by her lover’s peculiar passion for such vegetative decorations.

“By the Mother!” he cried, “I will stop him! You girls believe every word Mistress Canna tells you. Amreu, up there at Ogof-y-Gawr, told me only yesterday that he’d forbidden Lela going to see her again — only I can’t imagine that woman obeying him!”

Nesta became immobile, her eyes grown large.

“What did Canna tell her?” she enquired.

“What do you think? What she wanted to be told, of course. You can guess what! That Master Curly-Head had better leave her alone for a bit.”

“Did she really tell Amreu Canna had said that?”

“That’s what he said. You’ll never come, I hope, Nesta, to wanting me to leave you alone.”

Nesta patted the smaller of the two embroidered pillows round one of which she had been arranging sprigs of ivy and round the other a festoon of heather.

“I must wait till we’re married, cariad, before I can promise anything!”

“Well, I shall certainly stop that Jew and hear what he says! Keep an eye on the path, sweetheart, so we don’t miss him. I can’t see from here.”

Nesta began thumping the bigger pillow — the one with heather round it — almost viciously.

"What if he wants to examine me?" she said. "Canna told me real doctors put their fingers everywhere."

"I don't care where he puts his fingers if he lets me—"

"Hush, love! You mustn't talk like that."

"It'll be more than talk, pretty one, tomorrow."

She threw this aside with a shrug of her shoulders.

"Gwythyr—"

"What, sweetheart?"

"Do you think there's any truth in what they say in the kitchen about something between our young lady and Rhun ap Gwrnach?"

"I only know what old Gwrgi says, and I've told you that a hundred times."

"Why is she marrying Porius ab Einion then?"

"Why do all these people do the things they do? I tell you, if the whole lot of them, and all Arthur's court too, battled with the Saeson till there wasn't one left, we Cymry would be no worse off!"

"Gwythyr, I won't have you say such things! The Saeson would make slaves of us all."

"Well! What are we now?"

"Oh, but to our own people!"

"My pretty, it makes no difference. We Cymry all over the land, whether we're Brythons or forest people or Gwyddyl-Ffichti, if we had any spirit would get rid of all these lords and ladies, these tywysogion and tywysogesau, and have the earth and its fruits for ourselves! God gave the earth to us all, not to them only!"

Nesta’s hands in the chilly darkness fell to her sides while her mouth opened to emit a low whistle.

“Don’t let anyone but me hear you say such things, Gwythyr!”

“The Cymry say them all over this island.”

“How have our masters and mistresses then,” the girl whispered, feeling braver now that it had become so dark that both their faces had turned into small oval-shaped floating clouds hovering over the head and foot of the bed, “taken the treasures of the earth away from us, like you say they have?”

“You know as well as I do, Nesta! Who started all this quarrelling and plotting and threatening, all these horsemen with lances, all these forest people with bows and arrows? We Cymry didn’t. You know that, my sweet. Some of us are forest people, some Brythons, some Gwyddyl-Ffichti, and we’re all comrades; but they — keep — us — down.”

He spoke slowly and solemnly while over the trodden path between the tent and the lake reeds the twilight was already gathering.

“And they do it,” he went on, “by dividing us, by making us hate one another. That’s their great trick. They turn blood against blood. The Three Princesses and their Derwydd make us hate the Brythons. Iscovan y Bychan made his Gwyddyl-Ffichti hate the Romans. Our Cunedda princes join with the emperor — aren’t they doing that now, and isn’t that what this marriage is for? — to keep the forest people in subjection and prevent them from following the Three Princesses and the Derwydd, or making Cymry of the Saeson instead of driving them out!

“I tell you we all came here in the beginning like these Saeson — all foreigners and invaders, every tribe of us! And yet even among us Cymry — and don’t think I don’t feel it myself! — there’s this same blood-hate ready to explode! And the emperor plays upon it. He doesn’t bother about us enough yet to cry out to us: 'Cymry of Ynys Prydein! Let all comrades join hands to keep out the foreigner!'

"But mark me well, my girl, he soon will. Yes, he soon will. And why? So that he and his courtiers may rule the country undisturbed! Foreigners? We were all foreigners once! Who are the true possessors of these woods and mountains, Nesta? You know as well as I do. The Cewri! And, if you go further back still, the wild beasts or the old gods! Nobody knows because nobody was there! I don't often say what I think, my pretty. I hold my tongue. I'm taken for a fool. Gwythyr, the orphan, good for nothing but carrying messages from one arglwydd to another arglwydd! But I have my thoughts; and this bed, this night, and our marriage tomorrow have lugged them out of me, Nesta ferch Aulus!"

As far as he could catch the expression on the face of the girl at the head of the bed, it was one that he knew only too well. And quaintly inappropriate it was, this familiar expression, as it appeared on the phantomlike oval face, disembodied as that of a spirit, that hovered before him. It was a tender and caressing expression; but its tenderness was so maternal that it seemed to absorb with the delicate suction of a beautiful sea sponge all the secret springs of his natural masculine pride in his daring thoughts.

"O Gwythyr," she began, "no one knows, when they listen to you, how far you're going to take a person, or what you're going—" she broke off suddenly and slapped her hand over her mouth. Then he saw her rush to the tent entrance and peer out. "Hush!" she murmured in a loud clear whisper, holding the folds of the tent apart and leaning sideways towards him, "I believe that Jew's coming. Are you really going to dare to stop him, Gwythyr? Mind you, I've not promised to let him examine me. But I would love to show up old Canna! Besides, we do want to know" — Gwythyr was by her side now, and this was murmured into his ear— "whether it's all right about our having children."

"Sure, I'll stop him! I'll bring him in here. Oh, and you'd better start up both those torches, Nesta. The lighters are in that sack over there. We'll have to make sure anyway they're not liable to smoke or raise a stink before we leave the place, and we might as well do it now."

If Julius Caesar's erratic goddess Chance had decided that though Gwythyr's mask of resolute stupidity might fool his human masters, there was no reason why it should fool those masters' masters, namely, the fatal powers of accident and occasion, she could hardly have proved her point better than by bringing it about that no sooner had the Jew arrived opposite their newly raised tent and paused to regard it with surprise and curiosity than there was a sound of hooves, a lively and challenging shout of greeting, and the bold young Mabsant, mounted on the same beautiful white horse from whose back he had been lifted so unceremoniously only three days ago, pulled up with more noise and stir and rattling and jangling and scraping and clattering than the irritable Gwythyr — in no case very sympathetic to the youthful vagaries of high-class blood — felt suitable to the occasion.

"Curse the conceited fool!" he said to himself. "Does he treat everybody he speaks to as if they were ambassadors from an enemy king?"

"Doctor! Doctor!" cried the young horseman in great excitement. "I suppose you heard everything before you left the camp? What do you think will—"

But Lot-el-Azziz had raised his right arm — his left being pressed against the curves of an exceptionally twisted ram's horn which protruded from the folds of the loose sash he wore round his waist — and to Gwythr's astonishment had addressed a remark to him while he restrained with lifted hand the excited volubility of the boy on the white horse.

"Did you want to speak to me?" he enquired. "I seem to know your face very well, though I can't recall your name."

Gwythyr looked over the Jew's head at the proud young figure on the white horse, and as he did so, though it was too dark to meet the lad's eyes, his own countenance automatically assumed that expression of awed and wondering idiocy which he had found so acceptable among his rulers. Then, lowering his glance to the oriental physiognomy in front of him: "It is my wife, my Lord," he murmured, "who is anxious to see you, Nesta ferch Aulus, from the Gaer. She is in that tent, my Lord. We have been preparing it for tomorrow. It is Prince Porius's marriage tent. But we thought if you could give us a moment... it's about... about our life together, Master Doctor."

Lot-el-Azziz made no attempt to conceal his humorous enjoyment of this double encounter.

"This young man," he announced, addressing the rider on the white horse, "has a lady hidden away in Prince Porius's bridal tent that he wants me to see. So I fear I must put off hearing the news unless you can tell me in a single sentence! I'm a doctor, you know, my dear Mabsant, first and foremost."

"I can tell you in a single sentence," protested the horseman eagerly. "Colgrim the Sais with a huge army from Germania has outmanoeuvred the emperor and is marching direct for Edeyrnion! The counsellor has learnt this as he learns everything else; and at this very moment—"

But the Jewish doctor had for the second time lifted his arm; and although both the young men were quivering with impatience, there was a magnetic intensity about the man that compelled their attention.

“When the moon rises red,” he cried, “much blood will be shed! Neither of you boys knows the Cabbala or the Talmud, and I am only a scribe of the outer gate, a worm in the lintel of the porch of the Holy Ones; but when I see—”

He stopped abruptly. His whole appearance had suddenly changed. His enormous nose, his retreating stubbly chin, his jet-black projecting eyebrows, his thick underhanging underlip that was almost a deformity, were now lifted up and seemed to be mounted, as with certain antique busts, upon a pedestal whose size was enhanced by its faded and weather-worn material. His stature was of medium height and his outer garment, though appropriate enough to his calling, was of a dingy and dirty brown. But what he was now contemplating so transformed his every aspect that the two young men stared at him in fascinated astonishment.

Gwythyr had to move a step or two sideways so as to see what it was that so absorbed the doctor; and even then, since he saw it against the horse’s rump, and against the creature’s untrimmed and irritably switching tail, he felt little affected by it. Mabsant also had twisted round with a jerk, but neither was he greatly moved by what he beheld.

This indeed was no more than the unwieldy moon, still grotesquely lacking her full rondure, but, as she now rose from among the reeds on the further side of the water, revealing a shape so reddened by the terrestrial atmosphere of this particular place and occasion that she presented the aspect of a sinking sun, but a sun that from suffering some mysterious stellar shock had collapsed before it had completed the first quarter of its diurnal round.

To some far-drawn strain of rabbinical fantasy in the doctor’s consciousness the rising of this blood-red moon out of what at that moment, and from where he watched it, might well have been a subtellurian Limbo of mist and mud and water and the roots of enchanted reeds, had an unearthly effect upon every object animate or inanimate, human or subhuman, within the marginal influence of that prehistoric lake.

Towards this bloodstained apparition the secret souls of trees and plants, of ferns and mosses, as well as of men and beasts, seemed to him magnetically attracted. Lot-el-Azziz knew nothing of the legends which surrounded Saint Julian's Fount, nothing of the influence that emanated from it. He had heard once or twice, since their arrival at this strange forest lake, of a place called the Avanc's Cave near the llys of the Three Princesses, but so far he had not picked up from any of the local persons who had come to him for secret healing the tradition that it was from the unfathomable depths of this holy-unholy expanse of water that that prehistoric saurian had originally emerged.

But too many of Lot's ancestors had been learned Talmudists and subtle rabbinical scribes for him not to possess, even though he had been employed by a Greek sea captain, a psychic power that could dominate with equal ease a gwas like Gwythyr and a court princeling like Mabsant.

And not only dominate them. For the extraordinary thing that happened just then, as the doctor watched that bloodstained moon rise from amid the roots of reeds that aeons ago had served as pasture for prehistoric monsters, was that he felt able to seize hold of both these human souls at the same time, the soul of this excited young warrior, leaning down towards him with his terrific news and stroking so nervously the neck of his white horse, and the soul of this agitated young gwas whose wife "wanted to see him in the tent," and whom every now and then he caught staring at the other young man with the sullen ferocity of an idiot.

And he felt as if he had the power to engage these two young souls in an enforced embrace, an embrace that would pour into them an abandoned and flowing equality of life-enjoyment.

The image of that moon rising so red out of the reeds had plunged his own soul into an undersea of mysterious satisfaction such as he would have found difficulty in analyzing or interpreting. He felt, however, that it was connected in some way with his pleasure in his domestic life, with his undisturbed appreciation of the qualities of his wife Zora, of the attractiveness of their son Gog, of his hopeful expectation that the unborn progeny with which she was now pregnant should be a second son, worthy of the name Magog.

He felt as though the same cosmogonic compulsion that was now forcing that bloodstained image, reluctant still, it would seem, to relinquish its shapelessness and accept its brief destiny of perfect rondure, to rise out of that watery Limbo and take possession of air and sky, might at any moment compel him to indulge in some grotesque physical gesture, in the contagion of which this unnatural difference, this tortuous embarrassment between eques and gwas which now surrounded him, would dissolve like the arbitrary and fantastic shapes assumed by foam-froth on troubled water!

El-Azziz kept his black hair cut short save for the centre of his skull. Here he allowed it to grow into a curious horn, not altogether unlike the twisted ram’s horn he was accustomed to carry about wherever he went, and which he generally kept concealed on his left hip under the folds of the scarf he wore round his waist.

And Lot-el-Azziz made use of both these objects — the one of hair and the one of horn — for purely personal purposes. The ram’s horn he used to increase the sound and the carrying distance of his own voice, and in some cases of others’ voices, while the horn of hair on the crown of his closely cropped skull he used for nothing less than the psychological, or you might even say the pathological, purpose of reminding himself when the animal magnetism that surged up within his excitable nerves grew uncontrollable, of the particular individuals among his patients into whose absent souls he wished to project certain magnetic waves of comfort and healing.

The more discomfort he inflicted upon himself by tugging at this luckless twist of thick coarse black hair, the more therapeutic magic — so in his fabulous fancifying he tried to believe — he could project into these unfortunate people.

“Red from the reeds! Red from the reeds! Red from the reeds!” Lot-el-Azziz now began chanting in the voice that his employer, the Greek sea captain, used to call his “orgiastic” voice; and as he chanted he tugged viciously at that twist of hair with one hand, while with the other he pressed the mouthpiece of the ram’s horn to his ear and its orifice to the side of the white horse. He felt no surprise, for his rooted faith in his psychic power had been strengthened by many such experiences, and he certainly felt no increase of self-esteem, for to be made into a laughingstock by youth is no gratifying sensation, when he became obscurely aware, though it was too dark to catch them exchanging humorous glances, of a conscious reciprocity of amusement — conventional amusement in both cases — between the young eques and the young gwas at the sight of that horn pressed against the horse’s side and those painful tugs administered to that wisp of hair.

Before the Jew had finished indulging in this grotesque performance there had risen from that spot — apart from the consciousness of the horse whose faint pantings were now only audible to the ear at the mouthpiece of the horn — three towering and quivering spirits of human desire; namely, Mabsant’s desire to tell the doctor that Myrddin Wyllt must be even now deciding whom to appoint as their captain at this crisis; Gwythyr’s desire to end forever the nervous apprehension created in Nesta’s mind by the old nurse’s words; and finally the doctor’s own passionate craving that his Zora’s living burden should turn out to be no other than their son Magog, a proper mate and natural companion for their son Gog.

That the body of the horse was now between him and the blood-red moon meant little to him, for he felt as if he possessed a power of visualization independent of his physical eyesight. He felt as if he could see these world-old waters, that people had come to call Saint Julian’s Fount, descending to the very centre of this planetary globe. And what was this bloodstained moon, that seemed so reluctant to attain its destined rondure, if not the precursor of a turbulent host of life-obsessed entities struggling up from those depths in obedience to the erotic summons of tomorrow’s Feast. The Feast of the Sowing? What could there be in this simple forest mystery to make him think of the desert and the smell of incense and the taste of unleavened bread?

“Blood red through the reeds!” And he suddenly recalled a passage in one of the oldest Cabbalistical commentators explaining the precise process, excited by which the faith of any population in any place could generate enough erotic magnetism to draw unborn souls out of the Limbo of water, though not perhaps out of that of air or that of fire.

“Blood red through the reeds!” And giving his topknot a tug so violent that it caused his luckless cranium a really vicious twinge, he straightened his back and replaced his ram’s horn in the fold of the sash about his waist.

“Which one of us at the camp,” cried the young rider, the moment he felt the older man’s psychic power relax, “would you advise the counsellor to appoint as chief over us, now that the moment has come?"

"I wonder," replied the Jew deliberately, "what answer our friend Gwythyr here would give to that question! Unlike us, he's a native of these parts and a Gaer man too. But perhaps you haven't seen enough of us yet, lad" — and he gave the gwas a smile that implied at once a special confraternity with him as opposed to young Mabsant, and a general confraternity with all skilled workmen and patient professionals as opposed to princes and courtiers and spectacular heroes— "to be able to decide such a nice point. I am myself inclined to think that the counsellor will be making a great mistake if he delegates his authority to anybody at all. 'Let him play captain himself is what I say; and I know that's what Zora-and-Gog would say too; and when it comes to appointing men to rule over men, women are the best judges."

The moon had by this time risen clear above the reeds, and in doing so appeared to have left behind her in the water all those stains of blood; and as Lot-el-Azziz drew out his ram's horn again from the sash that muffled it at his hip, and after licking one of his fingers set himself to rubbing first the small mother-of-pearl mouthpiece and then, yet more carefully, the wider unadorned orifice, it began to seem to him as if the attempt he had been making to bridge, by the oldest and most familiar trick in Cabbalistic art, this ridiculous gulf between master class and serf class, which had no parallel among the tents of Israel, had already achieved a sort of half-success.

The expression that was so often on his lips, "Zora-and-Gog," had, by the law of euphonious repetition, recently developed into the sonorous single word "Zorangog," a word which, as they caught it now, "crossing the barrier of his teeth," struck both these boys — the Gaer serf and the imperial horseman — as extremely comical; and in the relaxed fusion of this comicality they were momently united.

But the ironic thing was that this silent coming together of the souls of eques and gwas promptly thrust into the doctor's mind — for intrinsically they were as crude and simple a pair of lads as could be found west of the Apennines — the ribald question as to what would happen at Constantinople, or indeed before they reached it, if this great shy Samson of a Porius, together with his touchy Mithraic cousin, both of them in love, as the camp gossips swore they were, with the former's bride, did really sail with Dion Dionides and himself?

What would "Zorangog" make of such companions? And from Zora-and-Gog his thoughts naturally turned to the expected Magog. Would Magog be as good a sailor as his elder brother had proved himself? And then as he raised one of his hands for a second to pass his fingers gently round the roots of the lock on his skull, where he was now aware of a natural tenderness in the skin, he began wondering about this great British philosopher Pelagius of whom Brother John had been the pupil.

One of his local patients had sworn to him that Pelagius used to come at night to this lake — a much larger stretch of water, the man declared, in those days — and preach to the lake spirits and lake maidens and lake monsters, and even to the lake gods, who might still, for to a philosopher everything was possible, have their existence here.

"But how on earth," he thought, "will this hulking young Samson of a Gaer Prince defend this wild preacher to lake spirits and lake monsters against a legal-minded pope and before the most theological of all Byzantine emperors?"

Whether there could be found in any commentary on the Cabbala an explanation of the occult cause that at this crucial second, as his fingers returned from his head to his ram’s horn, flung into his mind a new inspiration as how to bridge the gulf between gwas and eques is more than doubtful; but such an inspiration certainly came. And in good time it came, for this social gulf had been for years on all his visits to Britain a deep nervous annoyance to Lot-el-Azziz, in fact the most troublesome of all the drawbacks to his ease and pleasure in this island.

The truth is he was a man who derived a curious satisfaction from the overflowing of his soul into the souls of others, and from the consciousness that there was going on around him a similar overflowing.

“Weren’t you asking someone at dinner last night, Mabsant, how you could get hold of a hound-puppy?”

“I certainly was, Doctor, I certainly was. Do you know anybody who’s got one?”

The Jew turned lazily round and surveyed the bridal tent. This erection had assumed just then a very special and peculiar look. The newness of its fabric, though its imperial colours of green and yellow showed in the moonlight merely as black and white, the shock of its appearance in a spot that had remained unchanged for a thousand years, the knowledge that its purpose was to protect the seclusion of one particular woman from the ritualistic licence of the Feast of the Sowing — all these things gave Porius’s bridal tent the look of a frightened modern creature lost in the twilight of an antiquity to which it could not adapt itself, but against which it could only utter stiff and awkward and bewildered protests.

Indeed it seemed to be summoning to its aid just then — at least such was the doctor’s memory of his impression of it, for at the moment he made no attempt to articulate what he felt — every influence of the night that was sympathetic to human courtesy, as against the chaotic heathen powers that were even now rising behind that bloodstained moon like phantom leeches licked up out of unfathomable mud by some monstrous Avanc's saurian tongue.

"Do you know anyone round here who's got one?"

Whether the young rider's question had been repeated more than once the doctor would have been hard put to it to say; but his reply was firm and clear, and the gesture with which he now pulled Gwythyr forward was dominant and compelling.

"Our friend here," he said, "was chosen by Rhun ap Gwrnach — I heard this from little Neb who saw it happen — to take care of that great white hound Drudwyn that he used to keep in the Cave of Mithras to guard its treasures. You're keeping it still for him somewhere in the Gaer, aren't you, my lad?"

But the ancient wisdom of the desert had worked its spell. There was no need for further bridging of gulfs by outsiders. Gwythyr began telling Mabsant more about white hounds, together with their bitches and their puppies and how best to feed them, than Lot-el-Azziz supposed the lake and the reeds and the moonlight and that weirdly alien tent could ever have tolerated at that enchanted hour.

He hardly had the patience to wait till the two young men had arranged to meet again; for as far as they were concerned the Feast of the Sowing and the approach of the Saeson seemed to recede beyond some misty and wavering horizon now that Drudwyn, the white hound, occupied the foreground, but he decided that since his ancient desert tricks had really begun to exert their spell, it would be a pity not to give them their full chance. So he waited, licking one of his fingers and stroking with its wet tip the tender skin round the roots of his persecuted topknot.

"From what I've seen of him," he said to himself, watching the curious effect of the moon as it hung above the undulant ridge of the horse's back, “this old Brother of theirs can’t last much longer. The creature inside him’s got its claws into his vitals. Sucking his lifeblood it’ll soon be, the vicious death crab! He had better be giving their young Hercules his final instructions as to Pelagius. I would tell him, if I were he, that Pelagius was an out-and-out Monophysite! I’d make him add the words: ‘Who was crucified for us’ to his Tris-Hagion!”

But the Jew’s thoughts were now interrupted. For Gwythyr’s pride in his new role as an authority on dog breeding and Mabsant’s fascinated interest in what his fellow Brython — eques versus gwas notwithstanding — could tell him of white hounds, white bitches, and white puppies, were holding both the youths so absorbed in each other that it was the foreigner and not the natives who now heard the sound of a horn from the direction of the mission camp.

The suddenness of the sound, its warlike implication of attack and defence, the rush of reckless and heroical memories it conjured up, swung the doctor’s apprehensive mind to the news he had just received of the approach of Colgrim.

“I don’t believe it,” he thought. “Twould be a masterly stroke of those yellow-haired savages, but they never could have outwitted and outmarched the emperor to such a tune!”

His ram’s horn was back upon his hip now, held close to his body by the brown scarf that was of almost the same dead-leaf shade as his neat professional habit, and the fingers of both his hands, resting on the horse’s back, were moving mechanically up and down as though smoothing out the wrinkles from a badly tied bandage.

“The old Brother with that death crab in his vitals,” he thought, “can never be moved! If Colgrim has outmarched us and is really near, we’ll all have to crowd into the Gaer, I suppose, or make a bolt for it through the forest! But which side will the forest people take? Are their princesses and druids ready to be the serfs of the Sais?”

With his fingers stroking the back of the horse, and with his heavy eyebrows and long pendulous nose tilted up so high that the moon, which looked as if it had not only purged itself of all stains of blood but by some creative potency in the higher air had rounded itself into premature plenitude, began to daze and drug him, Lot-el-Azziz fell to comparing his sea life, alone with Dion Dionides and Zora-and-Gog, with all these bewildering tribal agitations; and he recalled how much more disturbed he had been at some ominous change in the wind than he was now when he and his friends were in danger of being caught between Christian arrows and heathen axes.

“But maybe that only shows,” he thought, “what a true Jew I am, completely at ease in the maddest tribal confusions on land, but scared as a wild goat of Horeb by the flapping of a sail at sea!”

He was roused from his trance by a second horn blast from the camp, a blast that was even more warlike and menacing than the first. This time Mabsant heard it.

“I must go and see what’s up!” he cried, catching at his reins while the horse lifted his head. “God knows what the counsellor has decided! See you tomorrow or on Monday, Gwythyr! See you later at the camp, Doctor! Who would have thought these Saeson could fool the emperor so?”

His final murmur of puzzled indignation was lost in the leap of his horse and the rattle of his accoutrements. And at last Gwythyr was free to lead Lot-el-Azziz into the tent.

Meanwhile within this newly erected retreat Nesta ferch Aulus was struggling helplessly, irritably, and finally quite hopelessly, with the torches fastened to the bedposts. Both of these kept emitting thick fumes of extremely foul-smelling smoke, and nothing she seemed able to do short of extinguishing them could stop this disastrous phenomenon.

With tears of vexation in her eyes, as she tried desperately in one way after another to arrest this evil smoke, the girl imagined herself in the place of Morfydd ferch Brochvael, feeling as that proud girl would doubtless feel if these torches revolted like this just at the moment when Prince Porius laid her on her marriage bed.

Between her imaginative fears of being "examined" and her desperate vexation over this devastating smoke, Nesta came near to losing not only her inherited self-possession but her instinctive Italian aplomb and grace.

But Lot-el-Azziz displayed not the faintest sign of being aware of her agitated distress. He bowed to her, indeed, with oriental courtesy — bowed lower than anyone had ever bowed to the old centurion's daughter — but his smile was so frank and disarming and his manner so easy and direct that, as he sat down by her side upon the bed, the tears of vexation that still glittered on her eyelids were insensibly enlarged by a new emotion, that of incredible relief.

"Pull the tent curtains tight, Gwythyr, will you," el-Azziz said, "and for God's sake trim the wicks of those torches! We don't want any of these young equites peering in, but we mustn't suffocate your bride with smoke."

It was with anything but a firm and indifferent hand that Gwythyr obeyed this command and proceeded to busy himself with the torches; for though he kept his back turned, he had no doubt from what he could catch at such close quarters that the bridal couch of the House of Cunedda was being used for some sort of medical investigation.

To his surprise he found that the knowledge of this caused him serious agitation and nervous uneasiness. But the care of torches was a speciality of his; and in his determination not to think of what was going on behind him, he forced himself to concentrate so effectively on his task that long before they were ready for him to turn round both torches were burning with a beautiful smoothness, sweetness, and clarity.

There followed some anxious and pregnant moments; and to help them to pass he proceeded to busy himself — not mechanically or absentmindedly, but with the eager concentration of a boy of twelve — in cutting out with the point of his hunting knife a small peephole through the sailcloth of the tent.

He instinctively selected one particular strip of green material for the ground of his attack, a strip that had by some accident been dyed a deeper green than the others and in which, therefore, the slit he was making was less observable than it would have been elsewhere since what it opened upon was a clump of small evergreen pines.

He had indeed been the one to decide the position of the tent, which was octagonal in shape, but this ocular justification of his intuitive confidence that the slit he was making would face this group of firs gave him a curious glow of self-confidence. It was therefore with some surprise that Nesta noted the unexpected ease with which he did finally rejoin them and the lack of awkwardness with which he received the friendly quip wherewith the doctor assured him that his wife could give birth, without hurting herself or disgracing him, to as many sons as Leah bare to Jacob.

It was indeed to his own surprise as well as to Nesta's that Gwythyr found himself standing so much at ease before the two of them as they sat side by side on the edge of the bed, found himself talking as freely and naturally to this learned man as he might have done to their friend Amreu of Ogof-y-Gawr, or even to old Gwrgi at Ty Cerrig.

The light of the torches, that were now burning with perfect smoothness and exhaling a delicious fragrance, fell most happily upon the doctor's form as he sat with his right hand resting upon Nesta’s knee and his left caressing with the infatuated tenderness of a fetish worshipper his precious thrice-curved ram’s horn, a horn that had been clamped round in so many places by silver ornamentation that there was little of its original material left visible.

What the torchlight really did, for the light of both torches fell on the same side of the man, was to divide his face into clear-cut outlines of emphatic contours and hollow shadows, an emphasis that lent itself peculiarly well to his enormous downward-curving nose, to his narrow retreating forehead, to his lean neck with its curiously knotted, ropelike protuberances, protuberances that seemed to distend or diminish according to the degree of mental intensity in the brainwaves within the skull above them, and above all to that tormented lock of twisted black hair which still swung about on the top of his head, though he had made its roots so tender that he was trying to stop twisting it at every sort of odd moment between finger and thumb.

Upon both these objects, the ram’s horn in the man’s hand and the horn of hair on the top of his head, the light of Morfydd’s nuptial torches shone resplendently, but it seemed to Gwythyr as he stood in front of all these features that it was upon the man’s great drooping nose, with its shadow resting upon Nesta’s shoulder, that this illumination fell with its friendliest unction and benediction.

There was something curiously reassuring to Gwythyr about the curve of that nose. It would have puzzled him to explain what it was. Indeed, when he tried to do so later to Nesta, the girl’s amusement so disconcerted him that he gave it up as hopeless. But what he was trying to express when she couldn’t help laughing at him was that the doctor’s nose made him think of vague rumours that had come to him about pyramids and sphinxes and palm trees and camels.

Another thing in addition to these subtler beneficent influences that made him feel at ease with Lot-el-Azziz was the man's way of talking about his wife and child and their expectation of having another child ere long. The doctor explained to Gwythyr and Nesta that their son Gog was already three years old and that when their unborn son Magog saw the light — which they anticipated would happen any day now — there would be exactly the proper distance between them; so that Magog would look up to Gog, and the wisdom of Gog's ways would be enhanced in conformity with Magog's ideal of him.

"I heard from the Cymry at your camp, my Lord Doctor," Gwythyr threw in, "about your son, Gog. All the serfs and servants up there seem to think the world of him, and they tell me it's wonderful how he keeps his good manners and isn't spoilt by being noticed so much."

"By the way, my friend," Lot-el-Azziz threw in, "I've heard others beside yourself all over this island, yes, even among my own Punic relatives in Cornwall, talking of Cymry, or 'Comrades'. Now am I right in assuming that by this word you refer to the ordinary inhabitants of Ynys Prydein, who are neither Roman aristocrats nor Brythonic princes nor Gwyddyl-Ffichti outlaws? You people all seem to use the word naturally and casually, but I've never seen it in writing; and when I asked this learned chronicler, the Henog from Dyfed, he said it was a vulgar expression, popular at the moment in certain districts of the country among the forest people, but of no permanent importance, and not likely to survive the present wars and invasions."

Gwythyr and Nesta exchanged glances. "I think I could best make it clear to our Lord Doctor," he said quickly, addressing his wife as well as

Lot-el-Azziz, "if I explained that it's a word we use to mark the difference between us who have been in the country from the beginning and yet now have to serve others, and all these upstarts and invaders, like this same House of Cunedda about whom the trouble is going on now, not to mention these proud Arthurian princes who ride over us as if we were as new to the land as these yellow-haired Saeson from Germania!"

Lot-el-Azziz now rose to his feet muttering what certainly sounded like "Zorangog." But a second later he was speaking more distinctly. "Zora and Gog," he was saying, "will want to hear all about my visit to you two. They're interested in everything and everybody round here. Zora thinks Edeyrnion's a much nicer place than Caerleon or even Caergwynt, and Gog's always asking about the Derwydd and the Three Princesses. Well, children, I must hurry on. Young Porius will be anxious for my appearance at Brother John's so that he can get off to dine at the camp. I hope he likes our modern dishes. Is it true that at the Gaer you still stew your venison and spice your mead as you did in the days of Rhitta Gawr?"

Gwythyr and Nesta exchanged a quick look. "Keep Prince Porius as long as you can, Lord Doctor," cried the girl, "so that we can fix up everything here and be clear away before he comes!"

El-Azziz looked from one to another and smiled at them both.

"I find it hard," he said, "to imagine friend Porius taking the least interest in his wedding tent. In fact I'm prepared to wager you, Mistress, and you too, Master Gwythyr, that your young Samson of a chieftain will pass this place on his way to the camp without so much as a look. What he'll be thinking of, if I've got his character right, will be the danger of the druid's people attacking the camp. He'll want to find out just what we'll do if we are attacked. He'll want to find out who'll lead us and arrange our defence and give orders to our young horsemen when to advance and when to retreat. No, I don’t think you need have the least fear that he’ll give your labours in this tent a single thought! But I’ll keep him, all the same, as long as I can.”

He moved away to the tent door. “If I were you, Gwythyr,” he added, pausing at the threshold, while the curious resemblance between the lock of hair on the top of his skull and the twisted ram’s horn under his arm became grotesquely emphatic, “I’d put out those torches at once, so that whenever they’re wanted tomorrow, though of course that may not be till nightfall, they’ll burn as well as they’re doing now. The moon’s already high over the water, so you won’t lose your way back to the Gaer!”

Both the young people came instinctively to the entrance and stood there watching his departure. His figure was anyway an extraordinary one, but its strangeness was doubled by the effect of the moonlight that was now pouring across the lake.

At the camp they had grown by now fairly accustomed to his appearance, but few of the Gaer Cymry had ever seen him, and Gwythyr and Nesta stared after him in fascinated interest.

The moonlight certainly threw the retreating figure into magical relief; and the further he removed himself from them, the more remarkable did his personality seem. Of the two, Nesta was the more impressed. The bridal tent, the water and the reeds, the moon, so nearly at its full, floating like a lost heavily tinted shield on a tidal drift of ragged yellow vapour, had lured her mind back to her earliest romantic memories. She recalled how once, when left alone in Ty Cerrig with old Canna, she had looked at some grotesque illustrations of one of Brochvael’s monk-edited classic scrolls, where fantastically garbed human shapes were sailing in strange ships up fabulous harbours, and the feeling invaded her that she and Gwythyr were now voyaging in such a ship, up such a harbour — or perhaps out of it — and that it was among the moss-grown stumps of the trees of forgotten gardens, and the wave-washed bases of the pillars of unknown shrines, that she saw the figure of Lot-el-Azziz recede; recede until the horn protruding from his head and the horn protruding from his hip were both indistinguishable from the remainder of his vanishing form.

It was Gwythyr's voice that broke the spell.

"Shall we do what he said," he whispered, "put out the torches and clear off?"

But Nesta seemed unable to make any move, either physical or mental. Apparently all she could do was to watch the dwindling into nothingness between trees and water of a small, subhuman shadow that seemed to her to be gliding from the world without any movement of its legs.

"Is his wife a Jewess?" she suddenly enquired of Gwythyr.

He looked at her quickly. "How the devil do I know? I've never set eyes on her, nor on her boy either. Think of calling those boys Gog and Magog! And how sure he is that the unborn one's a boy! He'll feel silly if it's a girl."

Nesta looked at him with a vague smile.

"I wonder," she said, "if our first one will be a boy or a girl?"

"It'll be a girl if you go on staring into this moonlight! Well! I'll put the torches out and collect our things. You don't want to leave any of those sacks behind, do you? Anyway, if you do, we can throw them away in the forest."

He left her and re-entered the tent; but he was soon by her side again.

"Do you think those logs will be dry enough? They swore at the camp that they came from the pile at the back of the kitchen. And do you think I've left enough bracken and kindling?"

Nesta's tone was cross when she replied to these questions.

"How fussy you are, Gwythyr! You're always telling me the Cymry are put upon by these Cunedda people and here you are fussing and fretting for fear Prince Porius won't be warm on his wedding night! He'll have his bride to keep him warm, won't he?"

He made no retort to this and continued silent while he folded up one empty sack and moved another that had several heavy things in it from his left shoulder to his right.

"Come on, girl," he said when he'd made these preparations. "If Prince Porius finds us here the Lord knows what he'll think up for us to do! Don't you remember the triad, the three worst things for a lord: a cantref that pays no tax, a cow that gives no milk, and a servant that does nothing?"

"Gwythyr!"

"Yes, my dear?"

"Do you think the doctor's wife is as old as the doctor, or do you suppose she's much younger?"

His only answer to this was to fling round her a motley mantle, made of patches of wolfskin and foxskin and wildcatskin, in the making of which he had been both hunter and tailor, and which he hadn't forgotten to bring with them in view of their return by night.

The adjustment of this mantle took a minute or two as they were both proud of it; but Nesta could still see in her mind the vanishing figure of the doctor departing like a harmless Chimaera, horned both at head and at waist, amid the moonlit trees, so she allowed its maker to smooth down its creases and ruffle out its furs in passive abstraction. They were just setting off — not hand in hand, for Gwythyr had too much to carry, but in good spirits and side by side — when they were disturbed by laughter and cries, voices, and the sound of horses' hooves, from the direction of the camp.

Two richly attired young horsemen, each of them brandishing a long lance ornamented with a resplendent pennon, came riding up, side by side, on two black horses, the moonlight throwing both themselves and their lances into unearthly prominence. They were both very youthful and both full of the wildest gaiety and recklessness. One of them held a young woman against his breast whose short and engagingly moulded form he had evidently only that minute snatched up from the ground. The woman's husband — who was none other than Amreu, the laughing curly-headed steward of Ogof-y-Gawr — was running along by the side of the second young man, evidently more concerned about obtaining a favourable response to some appeal he was making than about what was happening to his wife.

In fact, as the party caught up with Gwythyr and Nesta, Nesta heard Amreu call out almost reproachfully: "It's all right, Lela, you silly! Can't you look after yourself for one moment? I've got something to say to my Lord Peredur. I'll lift you down in a second! Prince Galahaut's only giving you a ride" — and then when a scream, obviously not devoid of real alarm, went wavering like the startling splash of a moorhen across the water— "the prince is only teasing you, Lela! Don't be such a little goose! For Jesus' sake let me finish with Lord Peredur! It's only for a minute. I'll lift you down before anything can—"

But Lela had now recognized her friends from the Gaer and was crying out to them to help her; and Gwythyr, feeling that this was a dedicated moment for impressing Nesta with both his principles and his spirit, advanced so boldly upon the abductor that his horse began rearing up.

"God's holy spittle!" cried the angry boy. "What impertinence is here? Get back, villain! Get back, you ill-begotten son of a water rat!"

But the presence of Nesta, wrapped round in the wild skins he had himself sown together for her, so worked upon him, that, in place of drawing back, Gwythyr actually went so far as to lay his hand upon the horse's bridle. This produced an electric result; for the agitation of the horse under this strange touch combined with the writhings and twistings of Lela, and the man's own complete astonishment that one of these Edeyrnion taeogau, one of those churlish serfs of the north, should presume to meddle with the little pleasures of Prince Galahaut of Surluse, caused that idiotic youth to tighten his grip upon his lance to such a degree that it relaxed his hold upon the reins.

This instinctive and angry concentration upon his great weapon had another result. It diminished the firmness of his hold on the soft body of Lela. Of this relaxation the girl took immediate advantage; and slipping down to the ground she plunged into a torrent of half-indignant, half-provocative raillery, to which his difficulties with his enormous lance and his agitated steed, not to mention the interference of Gwythyr, completely prevented the young rider from retorting.

The Prince of Surluse became in fact speechless with embarrassed fury. To the observant Nesta, whose only fear was that Gwythyr should fall into a hand-to-hand struggle with one or other of these reckless lads, it was a revelation as to the careless rough-and-tumble life of these Arthurian horsemen when she noted how little the conversation between Amreu and Peredur was affected by all this disturbance.

Peredur's lance remained in its resting place at the back of his saddle, while his hands were so firmly on the reins that without letting his horse move away a yard from its plunging and struggling companion he kept it in absolute control. Nor was this control merely the effect of the young rider's firm will and firmer hand. It was a psychic phenomenon. Peredur's soul had indeed a good deal in common with the soul of a horse.

It had a quality that kept certain particular human nerves — especially those connected with sex, race, and religion — in an unruffled state of beatific harmlessness. It had the power not only of numbing these dangerous nerves, but of transforming and transferring the magnetic urge behind them till it increased the physical sensations of sight and touch and smell, especially where the face of the earth was concerned, to a degree of unbelievably intense animal enjoyment.

It was a great comfort to Nesta when Gwythyr let go the bridle of Prince Galahaut's horse and drew both herself and Lela out of reach of its plunging hooves. Galahaut himself, she could see, was still in a furious temper but she could see too that he was now, with an angry boy's vanity, pretending to be polishing the silver circlets that strengthened the naked ash wood of his great weapon, pretending, in fact, that the incident of Lela's escape had already sunk into oblivion.

Gwythyr too had begun to listen with interest to the talk between the big steward of Ogof-y-Gawr and the good-natured Peredur.

"But how on earth did you know the counsellor would make me chief of the emperor's men?" this latter was asking now.

"He has, hasn't he?" repeated the other.

"Well, Amreu, my friend, as a matter of fact he has; but he has only just done so, done so this very evening, and it's a mystery to me how you and your wife heard of it so quickly."

"Lela heard the Derwydd tell the eldest princess."

The simple countenance of the newly appointed representative of the emperor expressed puzzled incredulity.

"When did she hear him tell her?"

"Early this afternoon."

"But, my friend, the counsellor only left me an hour ago when the sun was already low."

Amreu's dark-complexioned face assumed the self-satisfied expression of an older child who knows the termination of a tale whose confused occurrences have begun to be too much for a younger listener.

The comfortable smile of benevolent unction which creased the corners of his full lips as he stroked the horse and gazed up at its young rider endowed his face with the premonition of a complacent double chin.

"The Derwydd," he murmured proudly, "must have known it before it happened."

Peredur's frown of bewilderment deepened.

"Do you mean," he said, "when I was in the stables and the counsellor was in his sister's tent?"

Amreu nodded.

"But, man," protested Peredur, "I had no idea of it then myself."

In Amreu's lustrous dark eyes appeared a look of exultant pity. He evidently felt that this sturdy champion from the emperor's court had been brought up in disgraceful ignorance of the druids of Edeyrnion.

"You believe," said Peredur, uttering the words nervously and with hesitation as if even to speak of so great and mysterious a being as the counsellor concentrating his thoughts upon an inexperienced young horseman like himself was improper and immodest, "you believe that he was thinking so hard about me at that moment that the Derwydd caught it out of the air?"

The ex-steward of the Three Princesses nodded vigorously; and then, as if recognizing that the flame of this surprising boy's secret pride needed some especial fanning, he declared, "The counsellor must have been saying to himself: ‘As soon as the sun goes down I shall go over to the camp and tell Peredur that I’ve decided to appoint him its leader; for I can see he’s the only one there who can keep his head in a crisis and think quickly what to do.’”

In his warm desire to stir up the self-esteem of the man he had selected as his future master, Amreu had raised his voice, and this caused Peredur to cast a nervous glance at his fellow horseman.

But the Prince of Surluse had apparently succeeded in attaining that point of philosophical indifference which was known to the Stoics as ataraxia; for now that his horse was quiescent it seemed as important to him that the moonlight should be perfectly reflected in the polished silver upon his lance as that the emperor’s camp should find a clear-headed leader.

“But how did the Derwydd know,” enquired Peredur in a whisper, “that I would obey the counsellor?”

There was something about this question that so tickled Amreu’s fancy that he had difficulty in suppressing one of his prehistoric outbursts of laughter, such as might have come from some Iberian camel driver between Marrakesh and the Mountains of Atlas. Lela and Nesta smiled at each other as they listened.

“What did he say?” their white faces asked each other in the moonlight as the runaway steward clinched his argument with the old Iberian proverb: “When a prophet understands a prophet, the stars move.”

It was at this point that Gwythyr made an impolite attempt to interrupt the whispered dialogue that was now proceeding between the two women. But his rough effort to drag Nesta away was frustrated not only by an angry “Hush!” from one of the girls and a murmured “Just one minute!” from the other, but by an unexpected spasm of human curiosity in his own impatient breast.

For Amreu, as heedless of the claim to seniority of the absorbed adventurer from Surluse as the counsellor himself, had reverted to the impassioned appeal that had been disturbed by Galahaut's behaviour to Lela. The man went into all the most personal aspects of his and Lela's flight from Ogof-y-Gawr. He confessed his hatred of violence, and his personal lack of courage. He confessed his profound distrust of the silentiary to whose secret machinations with the Derwydd he attributed this sudden coming of the Saxons, every detail of which had already spread through the forest as if carried by Coranian magic.

He poured out to the new captain of the camp the passionate faith that both he and his wife had in the cause of the emperor; and he ended by declaring — and tears big as wrens' eggs ran down his cheeks as with convincing sincerity he sobbed out this admission — that he and Lela hated every sort of war and confusion; that when they were both young they had been converted to the real spirit of Christ by the teaching of Brother John, who himself had been taught by the great Pelagius; that they had been for many months dissatisfied with the way things were going at Ogof-y-Gawr; but that it was the appearance that very morning of Gunhorst the Sais along with the treacherous silentiary that had decided them; and at the risk of being left without any master or any service or any roof to cover their heads they had fled from that fatal place!

What they wanted, for he would be frank with the young captain, yes, what they wanted in the depths of their hearts — and here, as in his reference to the teaching of Brother John, there was a quiver of real emotion in the man's voice — was to serve, not the House of Cunedda — and it was at this point that he lowered his tone and made a scarcely perceptible movement with his head in the direction of Nesta and Gwythyr, as much as to say: “You see what poor prospects there are in that quarter!” — but in the household of the Emperor of Ynys Prydein himself.

It was at this point that the guileless Peredur showed how correctly the counsellor had divined the vein of shrewd common sense that mingled with his boyish simplicity. It was indeed by a stroke worthy of the tact of a born statesman that he now broke up the awkward silence that fell upon them all, following the ex-steward’s confession; a silence enhanced by the fact that the two girls and young Gwythyr were fairly caught in their absorbed attention while even the Prince of Surluse revealed by the expression on his face that philosophical polishing did not necessarily exclude suspicious listening.

“Well, Amreu,” cried the camp’s new leader, “you and your wife will be doing me a great favour if you’ll help us with our banquet tonight, and you’ll be doing us all a particular courtesy if you’ll tell our friends in the kitchen that Prince Porius as well as his cousin Rhun will be dining with us, and that they should be seated next to the counsellor’s chair even if the counsellor himself is absent.”

He paused as if in profound cogitation. Then he added, “With the experience you’ve had you will know how to arrange these seats so as not to hurt the feelings of either the Henog of Dyfed or Rhun ap Gwrnach. They should neither of them be placed below Dion Dionides or above Doctor Lot-el-Azziz. Oh, yes! and we mustn’t put Rhun ap Gwrnach next to the doctor either, for the Jewish god and the Persian god loathe each other; and Rhun hates a joke, while the doctor’s always joking.”

Then the youth turned to his friend. “Well, Galahaut, have we time to ride round the lake?”

His companion lifted his head, tightened his reins, and twisting round in his seat fitted the handle of his lance, whose silver bands now glittered like the bands of Orion, within the leather saddle strap beside him, thus leaving both his hands free.

“We’ll take it, anyway,” he responded, “and for Christ’s sake let’s be off, or we’ll be caught by this hulking idiot of a Gaer Prince!”

The riders on the two black horses were however spared the undesired encounter with the great-grandson of Creiddylad the giantess; for though when they plunged into the mud and reeds to reach the northern end of the water they passed close to the walls of the sick Brother’s cell, there was no sign of any man leaving, nor indeed of any man entering that massive retreat.

Brother John had never seemed very different to Porius from what he looked now. His old teacher had always been for him of a gaunt and skeletonlike frame, and the features of his face had always seemed to emerge with a startling directness, almost independent of flesh and blood, from the osseous structure of the skull. From childhood he had been familiar with the bony leanness of the arms and legs now lying before him so motionless beneath the blankets; nor was there anything new to him in the intensity of the disturbing eyes, gazing so meditatively and judicially, first at the doctor and then at himself, as if it had been their souls, and not the man’s own, that waited on the brink of a plunge into the abyss.

Brother John’s head — so skull-like save for its prominent nose, protruding chin, and sensitive equine ears — rested on what his pupil recognized at once as his second best pillow, not the one stuffed with wild-goose feathers but the one stuffed with bog moss.

Porius could see he was thinking of other things than those which el-Azziz was explaining to him, and yet he clearly wasn’t oblivious to what the doctor was saying.

Porius himself was oblivious to the Jew's fantastic talk about a dangerous insatiable living creature that was feeding on the old man's lifeblood. Not that he didn't know his master's days were numbered. He had known it ever since the middle of last night when he had been on the brink of summoning Myrddin Wyllt to the Brother's side, and indeed would have done so if the old man hadn't sternly forbade him. But he had so long regarded his master as one who had an absolute power of life and death over the gaunt and aged image that called itself Brother John that when, soon after midnight, the old man had cried out in a loud voice, a greater voice than any he'd ever before heard from his lips, that he would be dead before the magic of Myrddin Wyllt had overcome the Derwydd of Edeyrnion, he assumed that his friend had decided, in his sick weariness of these everlasting contests, to return his soul to a god whose miraculous power reduced all human magic to impotence.

"He'll live to marry Morfydd and me," Porius thought, as the doctor, caressing his ram's horn and bending his high forehead, his great pendulous nose, his swaying topknot towards the spot beneath the blankets where was the dying man's navel, transformed his warnings about the "death crab" addressed to his patient into a Cabbalistical exhortation directed to the creature itself, not so much exorcizing it from its present vantage ground as commanding it to turn its scorpion's sting against itself and perish where it was by its own volition.

Porius was seated on his own bed as he watched all this, with his heels drawn up beneath him and his hands clasped round his ankles; and for the reason that his enormous bodily strength was so absolutely quiescent his mind became abnormally active.

And, in proportion as its activity increased, this cold-blooded mind in him seemed more and more able to regard both his own emotions and the emotions of others with a curiously inhuman detachment. This detachment did not, oddly enough, apply at all to the inanimate objects surrounding his quiescent form in the Brother's cell. The low-curved stone arches of the roof, black with the smoke of ancient fires, the darkly protruding ends of the oak beams, blacker with a more velvety blackness than the arches, the numerous iron hooks, brazen bars, wooden cupboards with which a simple human necessity for unspoilt books, dry clothes, and unmouldy bread had transformed those grey walls, all these accentuated by the disturbing stare of the old man's eyes as Porius surveyed them with inconsequent casualness seemed perfectly adapted to afford wooden, iron, or brazen forms for the imponderable essences of his reckless, unscrupulous, shameless thoughts. So also did the greenish light emanating from an unusual sort of ship's lantern which the doctor had persuaded the sea merchant from the Piraeus to lend him for the dying man's use. So not less did the warm red glow of the alder logs on the cindery flagstones near the foot of his own bed. All these presences, including certain wavering wisps of smoke under the arches, seemed to become only too willing bodies for his unregulated thoughts.

He turned for instance his analytical intelligence with a cold fury of disillusionment upon his feelings of only a couple of evenings ago when, in the company of Rhun, he had visited the Cave of Mithras. And now — for the two women between them had finally got the whole story out of little Neb — he had to face the fact that, on the final day of her maidenhood, his bride had rushed across hill and dale at dawn to a tryst with his best friend.

"I must have a talk with old Rhun after supper tonight," he thought, while the Piraean ship's lantern at the sick man's side became an untimely and unholy hearth fire, lit by himself in his bridal tent; while the pain-quelling drug which just then Lot-el-Azziz was persuading Brother John to swallow became a great bowl of mead, borrowed — for he was already making up his mind what he was going to do and how he would bring matters to a head — from the Arthurian camp, over which two sworn milites of Mithras must settle their differences about a woman by the side of that woman's marriage bed. For where else could they be alone? And alone — he had definitely made up his mind on that point — he and old Rhun must be.

A low-voiced murmur now came from the lips of the dying man, and Porius interpreted it as the natural question: "When will this devil crab reach my heart and finish me off?"

But el-Azziz, twisting his head round so as to see Porius's face, explained in a hurried and fretful tone that in these cases no doctor could possibly predict the day or the hour; all he could do was to excite the fury of the creature to such a pitch by the use of the proper conjurations that it would either turn its sting against itself or strike at its victim's heart with such desperate violence that the man's death would be instantaneous and painless.

For all the incoherence of Brother John's words and for all his wild and excited stare, it was plain to Porius that even before he swallowed whatever it may have been that el-Azziz produced from some interior pocket in his brown habit, his old friend wasn't in any acute distress either of mind or body.

What Porius couldn't know was that so far from being "incoherent," as in his quiet assurance he had assumed his teacher to be, and so far from making frantic enquiries as to how many more days he had to live, as the doctor interpreted his utterance, Brother John was in reality carrying on a quiet, reasonable, and self-possessed conversation.

The mistake the old Brother made was a purely technical one. He fancied he was using the inaudible speech of thought, when in reality he was uttering grotesque and gabbling syllables neither agreeable to the ear nor intelligible to the mind. But Brother John wasn't merely thinking. He was talking. He was talking to Pelagius. He was assuring Pelagius that there was no need for him to be anxious or uneasy. He was giving Pelagius a careful and exact account of how he dealt with the pain caused by the devil crab.

"You must remember," he was saying, "I don't think of him at all. I reduce him to nothingness. He doesn't exist. What exists is only the pain — the pain alone, Pelagius, my Master! And the pain, Pelagius, is a material thing. It is an element, my Master. But it is a Protean element. It is colour, substance, texture, taste, smell — all of them by turns! And I who move about in this element change too. I swim, I fly, I wade, I float. Very often I climb.

"What I've learnt to know, Pelagius, are the weather signs in this element, signs that tell you what's best to do. Sometimes it's best to wriggle like a snake in the grass; sometimes it's best to curl up like a hedgehog. And there are times, Pelagius, when the only thing for me to do is to grow numb and dumb and mum, and in that condition jerk myself round, first on one side, then on the other! And it's even a good thing now and again to catch hold of your ankles — of one of them at any rate, Master, and with all your fingers cling fast and tight! You'd never guess what assuagement it is to the bites of the creature. It's a case of bone to bone; as you always used to say, a man's not a man till he lives from his bones.

"At its worst, Master, the pain's shot through in a very odd way with black and white coruscations; and then it's best to stretch yourself out as stiffly as you can. But I always know when it's going to lessen, because then it turns into a curious pinkish mass, like a huge sandbank of solid paste made of chopped-up shells; and then I can stroke its surface with my hand and pat it gently and smooth it down, till it’s as soft as velvet!

“Don’t be too sorry for me, Master, for I very, very often have moments when not to be in pain is so perfectly delicious that I feel as if my old heart would burst for the happiness of life. It’s at those moments that I try to bribe God, Master. Don’t be angry with me for this, Pelagius! You know how it is with me. I’m never as much at ease with him as you are, and I try to bribe him not to come back upon me with his pain by feeding him with nuggets of my happiness. Sometimes when I can feel he’s coming back I positively throw my happiness away! ‘Here! Here!’ I cry. ‘Anyone can have this who wants it!’”

It was at this particular moment in Brother John’s cell, when the old Brother was making the scientific mistake of supposing he was only thinking the sensible thoughts just recorded, when all the while there was automatically issuing from his gullet a sequence of irrational sounds such as the few moths and spiders as had escaped the brooms of his boy-pupils must have confused with the bubbling of bubbles, the boiling of barley, the cracking of sticks, the pattering of rain, the moaning of wind, the creaking of bolts, the dripping of oil, the squeaking of mice, the gibbering of phantoms, together with all the other subhuman utterances that such insects can hardly fail to catch issuing from the objects of straw, of wood, of iron, of brass, of silver, of clay, that give to any human habitation its peculiar character, that Lot-el-Azziz, whose conjurations of the “devil crab” within his patient had been followed by the application of one end of his ram’s horn to that patient’s navel and of the other to his own lowered head, grew aware that somebody or something was moving about on the flagstones outside.

Brother John's dialogue with Pelagius prevented him from catching this sound, while Porius was too absorbed in imagining what he and Rhun would say to each other about Morfydd to hear anything but the burning of the fire over which they would face each other that night in Morfydd's bridal tent.

"I believe there's somebody at the door!" cried the Jew at last, thrusting the ram's horn into its place at his hip and hurriedly rising to his feet. "May I see who it is? There may have been an accident at the camp and they want me at once."

"I'll soon see," said Porius, rising more slowly. "It's more likely somebody for the Brother who doesn't know he's ill."

It turned out to be nobody less than the Henog from Dyfed; and since the man was his father's official guest at the Gaer, Porius felt compelled to let him enter, rapidly explaining to him as he did so how ill the old Brother was.

The Henog was completely undisturbed. He had come from the camp to the cell moved by the same fixed purpose as the one that had driven him from the Gaer to the camp. He might waver in his manner of approach and be sidetracked a hundred times, but no man in the world could make the Henog forget what at the back of his mind was his main purpose.

"They tell me you're coming to the camp for dinner, Prince," he said, repelling with a wave of his hand Porius's offer of a seat on his bed, "so we can talk about it as we walk over there together, but what I wanted to ask Brother John is a quite plain and simple question that no sickness could hinder a man from answering. It's a question that has to do with—"

Here the old Brother himself, making a feeble and quite ineffectual attempt to lift himself up on his elbow but fixing a gaze of the liveliest intelligence upon the man, broke into his sentence. "To do with Pelagius?

Anything to do with Pelagius I am ready to answer... It is the one thing I want to do thoroughly and completely before my end comes... It is the one thing I have been commanded, by the powers above us all, to do before I leave this world. What is it then, Master Henog, that you want to know about Pelagius? Are you also thinking of visiting Constantinople on this great mission of justice?”

It became clear at once to Porius — though not so to the Jewish doctor who had had less opportunity of studying the ways of the chronicler from the south — that the man had in his mind no question of any sort about Pelagius.

It was not that the Henog, as he stood there before the three of them, with the curious greenish lustre of the ship’s lamp from the Piraeus enveloping his dedicated and sacerdotal figure, looked in the smallest degree staggered or ruffled or confused. He looked patiently and indulgently expectant. He looked as if the dying man’s frivolity, in thus dragging in theological controversy when the very foundations of human civilization, that is to say, the facts and fables of history, were awaiting discussion, must soon yield, if he remained quiescent, to a seriousness more proper to the occasion.

And his faith was soon justified; for Brother John, with the psychic clairvoyance of a dying man, quickly realized that there was something in the mind of this singular intruder which had nothing at all to do with Pelagius.

Some while before either el-Azziz or Porius could realize what he wanted, the old man had begun making frantic signs to them; and Porius, who had known him as few sons know their fathers, saw that their inability to catch the drift of these signs was making him really angry.

Suddenly he understood. He wanted them to leave him alone with the Henog. This was something he felt very reluctant to do; but taking the doctor by the arm he did at least go so far as to draw him into the portion of the entrance that was invisible to the man in the bed. Here he held him by the arm, and the doctor thought, “I must look at my arm tonight. I warrant he’s bruised it. What a grip the fellow has!” And then he thought, “It’s his feeling for the old man. He’s hurt by his end; and his end it’ll be, unless the devil turns on itself first. But you don’t know your own strength. That’s what’s the matter with you, Prince Porius of Edeyrnion!”

But whether he dropped the man’s arm consciously or unconsciously, the great-grandson of the giantess Creiddylad was now destined to pass through an experience which pushed the dark tide level of the Brother’s death bed with all its broken shells into a momentary oblivion.

What in fact the Henog was boldly and bluntly enquiring of Brother John, without hesitation, without circumlocution, without asking leave of anyone, was a crucial enquiry that Porius himself had often longed to put to Prince Einion. Yes, his father would have been a far subtler and more comprehensive authority on this matter than any pupil of Pelagius, more subtle in fact and more likely to come near the truth than Pelagius himself, yet something had always prevented him from asking his father this crucial question. This “something” was in fact the darkest, deepest, most inexplicable inhibition to be found in the whole of Edeyrnion. Probably nowhere else in Europe had the Lethean influence of Christianity worked so like a magical nepenthe or mandragora in bringing forgetfulness of the old incestuous gods of magic and illusion.

The forest people had acquired crazy and painful and repulsive manias and had been burdened by insane obligations, because of these old gods of theirs. In place of being a proud memory or a storehouse of fabulous beauty, their ancient religions had become for them a dark horrible sensitive bruise lying at the bottom of their soul; a bruise upon which the new cult of the gentle physician-god of Bethlehem and Calvary was forever pouring oil and spreading the poppied ointment of oblivion.

With the forest people who “embraced” Christianity, their conversion was literally an “embrace.” It was an embrace of their souls by Christianity to such an extent that while the Romanized Brythons in other portions of Ynys Prydein were the most secular and irreligious “Christians” in all Christendom, the forest people from Dinas Bran to Saint David’s became the most utterly Christian race in the world.

And this they became in the most natural way in the world — from a terrific desire to escape the ferocious heathenism which had been thrust upon them by historic conditions, conditions that were totally alien to their natural introverted pacifism and inborn harmlessness.

This inherited inhibition, this bruise in the racial psyche that made everybody in Edeyrnion reluctant to speak of Math or Gwydion or Arianrod, was well known to Porius. He had suffered from it from his childhood in others, and he felt it deeply in himself. It was akin to his most personal, most secret, most private reluctance to confess to anyone his feeling about the giants of Cader Idris, his abnormal interest in everything he could pick up about Rhitta Gawr, his weird mania for the south-west wind, and above all, or rather below all, his nostalgic longing for some vague feminine creature inhabiting the mountains whom he could associate with his ancestress Creiddylad.

Already by slow degrees in the passage of the centuries, as generation after generation of children were discouraged from asking questions about Math and Gwydion or about their victim Pryderi, as if merely to name these names might bring down some appalling disaster, this dark race bruise was disappearing; but enough of it remained to constitute what the forest people called a tynged; in other words, a neurotic inhibition against the whole topic.

But the Henog of Dyfed had no such inhibition. How should he have? He came from the part of Ynys Prydein that had known Pryderi under his happier appellation of Gwri Wallt Euryn, and his soul was free from any tynged concerning this mysterious god's victimization and death.

Thus he had already made up his mind that, when his official Life of Myrddin Wyllt was finished for the emperor, he would at once undertake — introducing every fragment of information he could scrape together from every quarter — a patched-up history imperfect and uneven — for what could you hope for? — of that dim, far-off, mysterious struggle between the beneficent gods of the south, Pwyll the husband of Rhiannon and Pryderi her son, and the older, darker, less human deities of the magical north, who though their temporary abode might be Caer Dathyl in Arfon, and though they might call themselves Lords of Gwynedd, really came from a north that was far further away.

Stronger in their magic and in their savagery than Pwyll Pen Annwn and his son Pryderi were these terrible gods of the northern mists, and their women were like unto them; and the Henog felt that destiny had dedicated him to write of these things.

What at this moment caused Porius to drop the doctor's arm and move forward was the effect upon the man in the bed of the Henog's words. Porius kept his head however and only advanced a step. The last thing he desired was to create a diversion by drawing Brother John's attention to himself. But as he watched the sick man's extreme excitement it was anything but easy to hold himself back. In fact he couldn't have done so if it hadn't been that the exceptional gulf between his somnolent Herculean body and his alert and restless mind made the retarding of all impulsive responses a natural instinct with him.

A muttered exclamation from el-Azziz conveying to him, however, in a lightning flash that the doctor would interfere if he weren't immediately prevented, made him hurriedly step back to the latter's side and resume his clutch on his arm. This was bruise on bruise, but there was nothing else to be done.

His knowledge of the Henog was limited; but his knowledge of Brother John, if not unlimited, was sufficient to teach him that the most skilful meddling with the tide of events, the most tactful attempt to dam the current of destiny, was at this particular moment likely to be disastrous.

Thus he held himself, as well as Lot-el-Azziz, in firm control while he watched what was going on and heard what was being uttered. How well he knew every object in this ancient chamber! And not only the separate and separable objects. For he knew too all manner of curious marks and stains and curves and projections and angles and shadows and blotches and convexities and concavities such as the original builders of the chamber could never have foreseen, either in regard to effects by day or in regard to effects — as now — by firelight or lamplight.

What had not been anticipated by the old workers in stone, who so roughly — but oh, so cunningly! — had hammered out those massively curving arches and those delicately moulded recesses, was that the work of their Edeyrnion-born hands and brains should ever come to be illuminated by the Greek lantern of a sea-voyaging vessel built in the Piraeus!

But now it swept like a darting seagull's wing across Porius's consciousness that the greenish light emitted by this foreign ship's lantern gave an unholy effect to everything in the chamber. Something startling was happening. For no sooner had Brother John grasped what the Henog was saying than his whole countenance changed. In fact his whole head and body changed. His skull-like cranium, which in any case tended to resemble the outermost rind of some sun-bleached melon from the south of Gaul which the owners of an ancient villa have set up upon a broken herm to scare away thieves by means of a burning taper shining horribly through its eye sockets, looked now as though the two eye holes which pierced it were emitting a blaze of emotion such as the laws of Nature forbade to normal human heads.

Had all those cunningly moulded arches and all those blackened oak beams, now illuminated by that Piraean lantern, possessed the power of articulating the confused contrarieties about good and evil and free will and chance, to which they had been listening for centuries, a movement like the movement of the waves of the sea might well have flowed through that ancient cell; and had it done so the mystic excitement flaming from the eyes of Brother John as he turned from the "devil crab" in his vitals to confront those "devil crabs" in the cosmos, Math the son of Mathonwy and Gwydion the son of Don, would have been like the streaming light from some rock-based Pharos in the Aegean Sea!

Nor was this all. For with the holes in his skull blazing in this manner, and his thin hands shaking, and the tight-stretched skin over his ravaged stomach pulsating with excitement, Brother John actually struggled to his knees on the bed and lifted up his arms with the fists clenched high above his head, "just as though" — so Lot-el-Azziz explained later to the astonished Zora-and-Gog— "the wicked magicians of Caer Dathyl were descending upon the moonlit roof."

And in this position, while Porius held back el-Azziz from interfering, and the Henog's lean frame beneath its closely fitting black robe turned cold and stiff with the intensity of his mind's receptivity, the old theologian poured forth a scoriac flood of mythological passion. “Oh, if only,” thought Porius, “oh, if only he would carry Pelagius a little further and be brave enough to challenge and defy their One God, and his slave-love universe!” But once having realized the full meaning of what was happening, Porius’s restless soul sank quietly down upon his quiescent and somnolent muscles, and he found himself feeling not altogether displeased that these two outsiders, this clever Asiatic and this learned visitor from Dyfed, should hear what formidable storms of prophetic fury were still possible in Edeyrnion!

And the Henog’s attitude under this torrent of wild and desperate interpretation struck him as worthy of note. The man had been holding all the while some sort of leather-covered tablet and he was now mechanically scratching the cover of this with the fingernail of his first finger.

But Porius himself was now listening with almost equal concentration, and what he heard was no small shock to him. He had prided himself on knowing his old master better than anyone in the whole world knew him. But what was this? Brother John was throwing into a passionate, eloquent, mystical defence of Pwyll and Pryderi, as against Math and Gwydion, a savage intensity of emotion that Porius had never seen in him before; no, not even when he was championing Pelagius against the pope.

And the memory flashed through Porius’s head of how even the simple-minded Rhun had quoted to him a passage from Pelagius as they walked by the river a couple of days ago with the clear intention of making it serve as a prelude for his own revelations on the subject of Mithras.

Did the ideas of Pelagius, then, and the whole influence of the Pelagian method of thinking, as these things spread through the world after his death, inevitably disturb, counteract, and undermine the Christian faith?

Was a man whose soul was naturally Pelagian always liable to drift into becoming a devoted miles, or "participant," of Mithras, or a passionate champion of Pryderi, or even into what the young Pen Beirdd, Taliesin, was accused of being by those who believed the fantastic tales of his infancy in Caer Einion, an actual worshipper of the earth goddess, Ceridwen?

A little shocked and startled in what his reason soon told him was nothing but childish and even conventional respect for his master, Porius's mind took some wild leaps as he listened to the old man's unexpected outburst. Was his own secret mania for the southwest wind, was his obsession for Iddawc's mother, Creiddylad y Gawres of the Cader, a natural result of the influence of Pelagius, or was it something deeper still, something that, like the practise of "cavoseniargizing," was integral to his whole nature?

"Where will you find the truth about Pryderi, do you say?"

The old Brother's voice was weaker now, and his hands had fallen to his side. But his eyes in his grey, drawn, skull-bone face had still the look of burning tapers inside a hollow mask; and still as he swayed backwards and forwards upon his knees he addressed his words entirely to the bewitched Henog, who in his petrified immobility had become a creature of one sense only, a stone image, a stone dolphin, you might say, whose sole life was the catching of water drops from a fountain.

"Where will you find it? You'll find it, if you're the man with the tynged on him to find it, across every threshold and at every hearthstone in our land! You'll find it in Edeyrnion; in Ardudwy and Eivionydd; you'll find it in Aberffraw and Pengwern; you'll find it in Maenor-Coed-Alun and Nantcoll. You'll find it from Nantcoll to Dol-Pen-Maen — and from there to... to... to Maen Tyriawc above Melenryd, where he was slain and buried!"

When Brother John came in his mounting agitation to the stream known as Nantcoll and the fatal field called Dol-Pen-Maen, his voice was broken by deep-breathed sobs; and when he came to "the rock Tyriawc above Melenryd," he could scarcely articulate the words.

"And there," he added, in a voice so twisted and contorted by the emotion he felt that it almost ceased to be a human voice at all, and became like a far-drawn cry of lamentation from the ridges and peaks and caves and cairns and tarns and precipices of the Arans and the Arenigs and from the yet more unearthly recesses of Cader Idris— "and there is his grave... until... until..." — but here his power failed him and he sank heavily down upon his side.

At this both Porius and el-Azziz rushed forward; while the Henog, still standing close to the bed, remained as if paralyzed. Porius in fact pushed past him as if he had really been an open-mouthed marble dolphin left in patient quiescence when its fountain had ceased to play. For the Henog's eyes continued to stare at the prostrate figure on the bed, whose legs were hidden but whose mouth in the unconscious skull that was hanging over the bed's edge emitted a thin dribble of saliva which trickled drop by drop to the stone floor, where it formed a miniature pool into which an infinitesimally small insect promptly thrust a bold pair of tentative antennae.

"He's alive then?" whispered Porius after they'd got the Brother's head on his pillow, and the doctor nodded. From the heart of that emaciated body, which had now assumed the look of the everlasting acquiescence of a granite figure in an open sarcophagus, he had extracted a faint indication that the rhythm of life had not yet been superseded by the less familiar rhythm of death.

“Yes, and will sleep most of this night now, I fancy,” concluded the Jew. “If the end had to come tonight it would have come already. I would predict you’ll not be disturbed. He’ll sleep like an infant after that outburst and awake tomorrow morning ready to marry you all!”

This not very well-timed jocularity was, all the same, a considerable comfort to Porius, whose faith in the physician was accentuated now by the even breathing of the exhausted Brother. The lightness of the Jew’s tone had the additional effect of rousing the Henog from his stone-dolphin trance.

“You don’t think our young equites will mind,” he murmured, addressing Lot-el-Azziz, “if I leave their board tonight before the drinking begins?”

The Jew replied with an oriental shrug of his shoulders and a careless flip of his ram’s horn against one of his knees.

“I’m a foreigner, you know, my Lord, so you’d better not ask me such a question. But I should have supposed” — and he turned his rabbinical profile towards Porius, bowing over the side of the bed upon which one of the Brother’s hollow cheeks was now indenting the fern-stuffed pillow as if it might rest there for thousands of years and eventually leave its impress in the shape of a petrified fossil— “I should have supposed that a renowned historian like the Henog of Dyfed” — and the implication Porius received at this point from the smile beneath the long pendulous nose, a smile which was accentuated by the thick, Mesopotamian, heavily drooping underlip, was that to a descendant of the patriarchal tribe of Isaac and Jacob the social touchiness of a troop of wild mead-drinking riders from the hill fortresses of Caergwynt or Caerleon was scarcely a matter for serious consideration— “and an historian too,” he went on, “who has been given the task of collecting the sad and sacred mneesikakia, or the memories of wrongs, wrongs done to the heroic and unhappy god of an ancient people, was of such honourable distinction that like my Zora's ancestor, Rabbi Penuel Zodotokos, at the court of the Great King, he — I mean you, my revered Lord Henog — could come and go as it suited yourself, and as it was most convenient for the celestial visitations, whether frequent or infrequent, of your divine Muse."

The Henog gave el-Azziz a pretty searching look after this flattering oration, but he showed no sign of being anything but fully content with what he beheld in that kindly but extremely un-European physiognomy. At any rate, he began putting question after question to the doctor about the sleeping man's condition and the chances of his surviving the agitations of the morrow's dramatic happenings.

Indeed the two of them proceeded to enter into such a learned discussion as to the dark and ambiguous borderland between life and death, and how long this strange condition could be induced to last, and whether there were any authentic cases in history of it ending in a return to life, that Porius decided to delay his departure no longer. El-Azziz had promised to look after Brother John till he returned, and though he knew that as a rule the man dined at the camp table, he felt no compunction about making him too late for this meal. The doctor's wife and little boy had a tent of their own, and a woman would always be able to give her husband some sort of supper.

Where he did feel compunction was in the matter of the Henog, for he had no wife to see that he didn't go hungry to bed. For himself on this night of all nights, which was the eve of his union with Morfydd, what he must do was to swallow some sort of a hurried meal with those young equites at the camp, get hold of old Rhun, get hold of some mead for them both to drink, find some logs — young Gwythyr was sure to have forgotten them — and then, for that was the crux of this fatal night, find out just why Morfydd had gone to the Cave of Mithras; and after he knew that — well, if she did prefer old Rhun to him — he would see!

The question was, what would old Rhun say for himself, with his weird notions of Mithraic comradeship and his absurd infatuation for that proud image of chastity, the counsellor's sister?

"No, I won't interrupt them," he said to himself as he saw el-Azziz graciously make room for the still somewhat dazed Henog and induce him to sit down by his side on the edge of Brother John's bed. When he reached the entrance, however, he turned again, still hesitating.

"How do I know," he said to himself, "that she and old Rhun didn't go through some crazy Mithraic marriage, of which I shan't hear a word till she forbids me her bed tomorrow?"

His doubt as to whether to take the Henog off with him went on increasing till it amounted to a fury of indecision.

"Curse it!" he groaned. "Not to be able to decide a little thing like this is the devil!" He saw himself dragging away his father's guest from this congenial discussion and realized how helpless he'd feel as they walked side by side to the camp, while the Henog questioned him about Pwyll and Pryderi. Mother of God! He'd be tempted to answer him in the mocking intonation of that drunken voice which always made him think of yellow mist and the urine of cattle!

Yes, his father had always mocked and jeered at Henogs and Mabinogs of every kind. His father despised historians, chroniclers, and bards as much as he despised priests and theologians. It is true Brother John had always been an exception with him. But the Brother was not so much a theologian as a preacher.

But it was against bards that Einion had his chief prejudice. Porius could remember the angry disputes and disturbances there had been in the Gaer when, only a year ago, his father had refused to take the youthful bard Taliesin into his service when that proud young poet's passion for independence had driven him to quarrel with the elder branch of the House of Cunedda and turn his back upon the massive towers of Deganwy.

This Einion had done in face of the fact that the inspired boy's obscure modern chants were being carried, you might almost say, on the wind he worshipped, from Caer to Caer and llys to llys throughout the whole of the north. But though he refused so obstinately to take this troublesome genius into his household, Einion seemed to understand the lad's productions better than anybody else. At any rate he kept very carefully every verse he could lay hold of, and it wasn't long before he knew several of them by heart.

The more obscure they were the more he seemed to enjoy them, and the more he enjoyed them the more he mocked at them, especially when he was drunk. Yes! Porius could see himself walking in the moonlight by the side of the Henog and struggling to answer his questions patiently.

But what effect upon this devoted fanatic would his own secret fancies about Pryderi have, if he could bring himself to reveal them? Would the man turn again into a petrified dolphin of enchanted attention under this very different fountain of mystical intimation? And what would the Henog think if he quoted to him the new bard's obscurities with the very intonation of the prince's mockery when he was drunk and blaspheming?

Ys kyweir vyg kadeir ygkaer sidi
Nis plawd heint a heneint a vo yndi:
Ys gwyr manawyt a phryderi!
Complete is my chair in Caer Sidi
Disease and old age hurt no one in it,

They know — Manawyddan and Pryderi!

At that moment in the restless uneasiness of his indecision, he caught sight of the elder Porius's Roman water bottle which he had left in Brother John's porch; and either because he associated this object with the proud endurance of the legionaries who had used it, or because it reminded him of his feelings a couple of nights ago when, as if in answer to his prayer to the southwest wind, the wind itself came to him from Cader Idris, he suddenly made up his mind. With a final hurried glance at the two men sitting on the bed, he picked up the bottle and departed.

CHAPTER XIX. Taliesin Pen Beirdd

ON LEAVING BROTHER JOHN'S CELL Porius set off at a run. It was at a run he passed his marriage tent; not with the idea of avoiding it, whether out of sentiment, or out of piety, or out of superstition — for he had already decided, nor was the decision a very hard one for him, to throw these inhibitions to the crows — but out of a desire to visit the camp's buttery and obtain a goodly supply of mead while the pressure of satisfying the diners with cooked meats occupied the whole attention of the kitchen.

He couldn't help chuckling to himself as he ran, swallowing deep gulps of moonlit air and giving way to the feeling that he was swimming through the gleaming water rather than running by its side, when he thought of old Rhun's embarrassment at having to submit to the questioning he had in his mind. And luck was with him that night. For when he reached the camp he obtained a huge vessel of mead without difficulty, and it was mead too for which the honey of Gwlad-yr-Haf and the honey of Gwent had each supplied their quota of southern sweetness; nor did he and Rhun experience any difficulty in finding seats side by side, nor in satisfying their hunger long before the bulk of the company had begun to turn their attention from food to drink.

"If only those young people of Mother's," he was soon saying to himself as Rhun and he walked back in silence to the tent, "have remembered to pile up plenty of kindling and to trim and oil the torches, I'll get to the bottom of this meeting at dawn, and to the bottom of Myrddin Wyllt and young Neb being on the scene at the same time. You're a silent one, Rhun, old friend, but we generally end by understanding each other pretty well!"

In the business of lighting the fire and torches, in the business of filling his Roman flask from the great stone vessel which by thrusting an oak stick through its double handles they had carried between them, in the business of getting Rhun comfortably ensconced on a pile of rugs facing the bed, while he arranged for himself a somewhat harder seat on a couple of logs, with his back against the bed, Porius's attention was completely occupied for the first twenty minutes of this unusual session.

And not only so, but "Mother of God!" he found himself able to murmur with easy satisfaction as he handed back the legion's flask to his foster-brother across the crackling sticks and the sweet-smelling smoke, "but this southern drink has a better taste than ours! Don't you think so, Rhun?"

Rhun nodded. "I'll know better in a minute or two," he said. "My taste is slower than yours."

And Porius, as he watched him sipping and frowning and staring at the fire, couldn't help wondering how far old Rhun's feelings were "slower" than his own in other aspects of life.

"I'm glad the future's so far out of our reach," he thought. And he was even aware of a vague trouble in his mind that had little or nothing to do with Morfydd or with their union tomorrow; little or nothing to do with that heavy frowning face bending over the drink and over the swift-footed Grecian limbs that could carry that heavy face across all the moors and mountains and rivers and swamps of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy and Eivionydd before tomorrow's dawn.

What he really felt at that moment — and what a moment to feel it! — was that in these last two days, in fact ever since he'd known of that letter from Anastasius, he had broken loose from his whole past.

As one wisp of smoke after another rose up between himself and the familiar figure opposite him, he felt as if by some weird accident he had flung upon this particular fire a magic branch of balsam fir, under the impact of whose enchanted smoke he was doomed to see all the people of his life, conjured up there before him, one after another; and each one as self-absorbed, as remote from him and his real feelings as if they were images formed from clouds in the air, Rhun yielding place to Morfydd, Morfydd to his mother, his mother to Porius Manlius; till finally nothing would be left to him in that sweet-smelling smoke but the Henog and the Jew seated on the deathbed of Brother John.

Leaning back, so that his head rested against the edge of the bed, he began to wonder whether, in spite of his unlimited physical strength and his restless mind, he had grown to be so submissive to his mother and Morfydd as to be at a complete loss if neither the one nor the other was directing his course of action.

He was so dazed and confused by the weird sensation that had fallen upon him, as if he himself were turning into an image of vapour, that it was with something of a shock that he felt the legion's water flask tapping his knee and saw Rhun's arm stretched out towards him.

"What if I sailed away alone with Dion Dionides," he thought, "and left Morfydd and Rhun to console each other?"

But he must find out about this morning's visit to the Cave. It was no use leaving everything unsettled.

"Rhun, old friend!"

"Yes, Porius ab Einion."

"Have you talked at all yet with this Jew who came with Dion Dionides?"

"The doctor?"

Porius nodded, handing back the flask after a long gulp.

Rhun smiled rather wryly.

"Well, yes! I have once or twice. But the last time I didn't behave very nicely to him... in fact I got angry with him... in fact I... threatened him."

The corrugated countenance on the other side of the fire began to look uncomfortable.

"And now you wish you hadn't?"

"I didn't hit him, Porius ab Einion."

"What did he say to annoy you?"

"It was about religion."

"About Mithras?"

"I can't explain in one word, Porius. I'm bad at explaining things like this. Besides, you'd have to know a lot more. You'd have to know how he was drinking and how I was drinking. You'd have to know what those lads had been saying before it began. I think really, Porius, it was those silly boys started the whole thing — worked us up, as you might say, for their own sport. I didn't see it then. But now I do, and I've been thinking I'd like to tell the man so. They were making fools of us both — well, a fool of me anyhow! I think it's hard to make a fool of him because he's always making a fool of himself; and he does it on purpose, if you see what I mean, and I wouldn't be surprised if he wasn't secretly, in his own mind, you know, making fools of those lads! They're a queer lot, Porius ab Einion, these horsemen of Arthur's! They're certainly very proud. And they're brave. I can't deny that. Mind you, I haven't seen with my own eyes anything particular in that way, but — you know how it is? — you can get a good idea of what men are from the way they talk to each other and the way they talk about each other and the way—"

Porius suddenly stood up and emptied the Roman flask with an angry swing of his arm into the fire. Then, while the logs hissed and spluttered, he said in an oddly brusque tone: "Libation to Mithras that was, and a serious one too! May all the gods ever worshipped in Edeyrnion plague these skipping rogues! 'Proud,' are they? 'Brave,' are they? I tell you, brother, there's more real courage in our old Afagddu, or in Uncle Brochvael's crazy-dazy Gwrgi, than in this whole pack of young daredevils wild with wine and war and witchery and wonders! And as for real pride, why, brother, my brother, you yourself, when you're thinking of your father whom Uncle Brochvael swore was descended from the son of Peleus, and when your own feet are in the wind rut of the race, why, you live in a pulse of life worth the heart throbs of a score of these capering horseflies!"

Rhun sighed a long sigh of relief as Porius sat down again and began tilting the great stone vessel to one side as he poured out more mead into the empty flask. A vague anxiety had been troubling the older man since he had been invited into this marriage tent.

All that afternoon he had expected an interrogation of some sort from somebody; but Gwendydd had avoided him, Nineue had courted him and made much of him in a most puzzling manner but had asked him no questions, and of what, even now, was in Porius's mind he had no idea. It was therefore with considerable though rather obscure comfort that he had listened to his foster-brother's outburst about his courtly companions, for it would have taken a Platonic Timaeus to detect that the cause of his cousin's diatribe was completely unconnected with its ostensible subject.

"Yes, you're right there," Porius gtumbled, ashamed of his outburst. "I fancy this Lot-el-Azziz does enjoy playing the fool! He annoys many people by it. He carries it too far. But he can be serious. And he knows much more than he lets people see. Of that I'm certain. He's a clever physician; and if he sees you're listening to him and treating him respectfully he'll tell many strange things. If anybody could save Brother

John’s life he could. I don’t believe Dion Dionides does him justice at all. He treats him more like a servant than a friend.

“One day I shall ask el-Azziz why he goes about with a man who doesn’t treat him as he deserves. Any discerning prince would be proud to have him, and Dion after all is only a merchant-captain, though he says he’s the cousin of a philosopher in Athens. Why didn’t Arthur bribe el-Azziz to leave this Greek? There’s something queer about it, Rhun. It’s not natural; a man who could live with Anastasius or Arthur sharing the sea trips of a trader in dates and olives!”

Dimly, faintly, and from somewhere down deep among the nerve centres of his paternal blood, there arose in Rhun an unuttered protest against his cousin’s slighting words.

Dates and olives and wine and oil — wasn’t it a privilege to carry these precious delights to the misty coasts of the rain-soaked islands of the west? Didn’t it need as much philosophy and inspiration to sail from the Piraeus to the Pillars of Hercules as to sit by the bedsides of emperors and harlots, purging their surfeits, cooling their fevers, and mixing poisons for their rivals?

All this and a good deal more, though without articulation, rose up in a groundswell of protest in Rhun’s heart; and just as Porius had expressed his own secret discomforts by his abuse of Arthur’s horsemen, so Rhun found himself fostering an irrelevant if not an irrational anger against this Jew who “enjoyed making a fool of himself,” but was too great a medicine man to serve the master of the Greek ship Calypso, carrying olives and wine and purple blankets and amber beads and the scrolls of tragedies and comedies to island chiefs who couldn’t write their own names!

“This man swore,” Rhun now declared, staring through the smoke so gravely that Porius was aroused to a faint alertness, “that the priests of Babylon changed our Mysteries. He said the changes came from Jews who had been taken captive by the Babylonians. He said the god of the Jews was older than the gods of Persia."

The flicker of interest in the mind of Porius died down as quickly as it had risen; and this solemnly uttered, sulkily downright grievance sounded more remote to his ears than the sighing of the wind in the reeds.

"What if all the time till now," he thought, "my real life has been in this 'cavoseniargizing?' What if I've just done what Mother and Morfydd have made me do — first one and then the other — while all the while —? What if I've propitiated Porius Manlius, dodged Father's mockery, patronized old Rhun, been betrothed to Morfydd, when all the while, by some weird tynged, my real, secret life has been more like what Iddawc's mother, the giantess from the Cader, would understand?"

"Did you hit him?" Had he asked Rhun this question before? He felt as if he had done so a thousand years ago and he could clearly see the grotesque scene. He could see the blow and the reeling figure of Lot, and the man's gasping laugh at the whole absurdity of their misunderstanding! But he didn't wait for the answer. He had to say what he had brought Rhun into his tent to say, and he now plunged into it.

"Were you surprised," he asked him, bending down while he spoke and beating up the logs into flame with the nearest half-burnt one under his hand, "when Morfydd sent Gwythyr to tell you to meet her at the Cave this morning?"

Rhun's answer was direct and immediate; but he too, on his side of the fire, bent down and struck at it with a half-burnt stick. It was as if the arbitrary, wilful, incalculable soul of the girl between them might escape from them both and drift away in smoke over the moonlit water if they let those red flames die down.

"Yes, Porius ab Einion, I was."

"Did she come alone?"

"Oh, no! Old Canna was with her, and a fair-haired little girl I'd never seen before."

What Rhun was poking at now with his stick was that shameful suspicion about their playmate that had crossed his mind like a wicked shadow. He knocked that bit of blackness into the red gulf.

"I can't think why they brought her," he said. "She had a doll in her arms."

At that moment he would have given a good deal to know more about that doll. It would have been a comfort to enlarge upon it. But Porius was speaking again. "Morfydd wasn't upset about our marriage tomorrow?"

Both the men's heads were now bent so low over the fire that it was as if they were talking to its flames rather than to each other. Any observer watching them would have been impressed by their striking resemblance; and this resemblance was enhanced rather than diminished by the ascending smoke which seemed to emphasize the massive weight of their low corrugated foreheads while it obscured the yellow glint in Porius's little bearish eyes and darkened the other's wider and greyer and sadder stare.

"She was rather upset," replied Rhun simply, thinking to himself, "I'm ready to tell him everything except about the blood."

"She didn't say anything about being forced into it," Porius went on, "I mean so quickly, you know, and at the Feast too, when there's all this excitement, forced into it, I mean, by my mother and her father?"

Rhun uttered a heartfelt sigh of relief at this, and lifting his head looked straight across the flames at the other's lowered brow.

"No," he replied firmly and calmly, "no, she said nothing about it at all. From her manner I got the impression that it was her own doing, her own wish. But she didn’t say a word. She seemed in that mood — you know the way she is — when she has made up her mind. She said she wanted to see me and say goodbye. She didn’t say she wanted to talk about it. And she didn’t talk about it. From what Uncle Brochvael said I got the impression that she and your mother had made up their minds before they told him or the prince or your grandfather.”

Rhun paused for a second after this long speech and then he added, “She came to say goodbye to me; that was all.”

Porius rose slowly to his feet. “I want time to think this out,” he said to himself. His foster-brother’s reiterated “to say goodbye to me” could be taken in more ways than one. “I want time,” he thought, “to get this clear. We’ve always been three. It was only in that last year before they killed him that Morfydd and Morvran were so much together.”

He swung round and surveyed their marriage bed. Raised from the earth floor on wooden boards to the height of about three feet, the heavy black-and-gold rug that covered it suggested death rather than life. He became aware now, as he had not been before in the first rush of his impulse to talk to Rhun, that there was something unnatural in this intimate encounter of two comrades-in-arms taking place beside the marriage bed of their boyhood’s playmate. But perhaps it was only those two torches that made the scene so profane.

“We’d have light enough by the fire to finish our drink, brother, wouldn’t we?” he said, looking across at Rhun. “What about putting out those torches?”

Rhun made a motion to rise. He was accustomed to being the one to do the things that had to be done when the two of them were together. But he repressed this instinctive movement and sank again on his heap of rugs leaning his back against one of the tent pegs.

“If you lit them,” he said gravely, “it oughtn’t to be unlucky to put them out.”

Porius removed one of the torches from its sconce, extinguished it in a bowl of water, and returned it to its place. But when he did the same thing with the other, the black-and-gold coverlet assumed a look as if what had lain beneath it had sunk into the earth.

“Christ and God!” he cried, “the place certainly does look gloomy! Let’s make a real blaze! And I’ll let out the smoke.” He pulled open the tent folds and fastened them so that they shouldn’t flap every time the wind stirred. But the wind became audible at once, rustling each tall reed against its neighbour and causing the long ripples from the deeper water to make a faint lapping sound against the half-submerged stumps of the leafless willows.

The two men stirred the fire and flung upon it all the remaining logs. Flames and smoke rose together. “Hold the bottle, Rhun, while I empty this.”

Clumsily and carelessly he lifted up the huge stone vessel, and tilting it so awkwardly that he spilled half its contents over the other’s hands and down on the floor, he filled the Roman flask to overflowing.

“You first,” he muttered, putting it into Rhun’s hands, “and drink deep! Who can tell when you and I will drink alone together, again?”

They exchanged the bottle several times in silence, while the wind, driving the smoke round their heads and the flames against their knees, made a low protracted wailing through the interstices of the tent.

“I was angry with her,” said Rhun suddenly. “It wasn’t a happy goodbye. I got angry and spoilt it.”

Porius could not help noting, though not without a faint shame at what he noted, that there was a feeling of elation mounting up within him. So

Rhun had quarrelled with Morfydd on the occasion of her "coming to say goodbye." A secret complacency, and a complacency all the more satisfactory because it really had a solid justification in his whole temperament, assured him that if their position had been reversed, no impulse, blunder, outburst, collapse, or reproach could have made him angry.

"Do you want to tell me how she annoyed you? Don't if you don't want to."

There was something about Rhun's expression as the blaze of their fire lit up his face that made Porius think of one occasion at their favourite rock-peak game, when Morfydd had run away to her real "home" instead of to their imaginary one, and he had uttered these very same words. He had felt then that if there were secrets between Morfydd and Rhun he didn't want to know what they were; and he had felt then, as he felt now, that such secrets, even though they implied her running in her recklessness to her real "home" rather than to her pretended one, or her having angry "goodbyes" before her wedding day, need not alter the destined course of events, nor even, if handled as he naturally and instinctively would always handle them, lead to tragedy.

"I don't mind telling you, Porius ab Einion," announced the other gravely and stubbornly. "I thought she had eaten the honey of Mithras."

Porius suppressed an inclination to burst into a gross laugh. "Well? And hadn't she? After all, people can't blaspheme what they don't believe."

"No," confessed his foster-brother gloomily, leaving the latter portion of these words unregarded, "she hadn't. Old Canna wanted her to, but she wouldn't."

"And she didn't like to be accused of this... 'sacrilege', when she'd come so far and so early to see you? I can certainly understand that."

A long silence fell between them, only broken by the flames of the fire as they licked the logs within the tent, and by the ripples of the water as it lapped against-the stumps of the ancient willows outside the tent. Ever since the two men had bent their heads over the logs that were burning between them, Porius had been aware of the movements of a small, faint, scarcely perceptible wind, that seemed to be blowing the ashes across his feet and every now and then lifting and letting fall the embroidered fringe of the black-and-gold coverlet behind his neck. But this little wind had now ceased from making the faintest stir. Either it had fallen asleep on the dark coverlet behind him or it had returned to its moonlit bed among the reeds.

Rhun too, though no stirring and subsiding of a breath of air from the lake's surface had disturbed him, felt troubled and perplexed. There arose within him a dumb protest against the unfairness with which Mithras was treating him. Why should a loyal and faithful miles, whose sole desire was to be a single-hearted servant of the god of all true soldiers, find himself torn like this between the only two people on earth whom he really loved, and had loved since his boyhood? Morfydd's outburst of feeling had frightened him by its intensity.

There could be no mistaking the nature of that embrace, or what was implied in that exchange of blood. But to the desperateness of the girl's gesture he felt no reciprocal response. Not a jot. What he actually did feel was a faintly superstitious and somewhat shameful fear that in tasting his blood she had fatally linked their destinies together by a tynged, from which he could never escape. He had only to think of Gwendydd to realize how little of a lover's emotion there was in his feeling for Morfydd. Not even in the heat of those youthful games when his swift-foot pursuit had overtaken her had he felt anything resembling what in these last two days he had come to feel for the sister of Myrddin Wyllt.

The emotion he experienced in the presence of this proud and ambitious girl, who struck his imagination as so nobly and tragically alone in a corrupt and degenerate court, and whose peace of mind he felt sure was perpetually being outraged by the manias and exactions of her brother and by the serpentine treacheries of her handmaid, was an emotion he had to struggle to keep within bounds. After all, though not yet a "participant", he had the privilege of wearing a Phrygian cap, and a soldier of Mithras, though not sworn to celibacy, was dedicated by his vows to take love very seriously.

Well! A legitimate aspect of this seriousness was, he naturally felt, such plans and considerations about the future as marriage, whether Christian or Mithraic, must entail; and to these plans, as he shifted his position a little so as to offer a different portion of the small of his back to the unyielding tent peg against which he leaned, he now gave himself up with a delicious recklessness.

His foster-brother — whether satisfied or not by his cursory account of the morning's happenings — had clearly decided to ask him no more questions but at the same time appeared reluctant, while any mead remained in their stone jug, to relieve the Jew from his vigil at the bedside of Brother John.

Thus as he allowed the smouldering logs to darken at his feet Rhun began telling himself a long and complicated story about himself and Gwendydd, and how when the emperor's campaign against the invaders was over, and Porius, released from active service, took Morfydd to Constantinople, he himself would take Gwendydd to that same city and renew his service of Mithras in a spot nearer the god's own home. He had not failed to notice the way in which the girl's eyes lit up with interest whenever he talked about Anastasius's letter and about Porius's quest for the reopening of the Pelagian case.

She had countered his questions about what life was like at Caergwynt and Caerleon by her excited eagerness to find out all he knew about the shores of the Bosporus and the Sea of Marmora.

It was indeed to the rocking of no western waves that the descendant of the athletic clan of the Attic Agenorides allowed his head to nod as he thought of Gwendydd's excitement in those royal cities and magic harbours.

Drugged by the fragrant smell of the smouldering fir logs and too drowsy at last to take his turn at the enchanted mead of Gwlad-yr-Haf, for the stone vessel seemed inexhaustible, it was not long before he was fast asleep.

Porius remained wakeful enough, but with his back to the black-and-gold bed and his senses strangely at peace as he watched the stream of moonlight floating in from the entrance and slowly approaching his foster-brother's outstretched legs, he gave himself up to his old secret trick, that peculiar embrace of the material elements and objects that happened to be around him at the moment, for which, through his boyish awareness of a chance occurrence when searching the hills with the elder Porius, he had invented the odd verb "cavoseniargize."

From where he now sat he could discern a small patch of ground between the folds of the tent where the grass, intersected by wheel tracks and trodden into mud by the hooves of cattle and the feet of men, was flooded by the unsympathetic lustre of the coldly remote moon. This he could see through an opening just above the smouldering logs that were still faintly red but were waiting their turn to grow as black as the rest; while a little to the right or the north of these logs a certain bulging of the canvas above his companion's drooping head suggested a suction of cold from outside the tent, or an expansion of heat within the tent, or perhaps some boldly wandering eddy of air from clear across the lake.

He could see the intermittent reflections of spurts of small flickering red flames on the smooth side of the almost empty mead jug. In the centre of all this was the hunched-up, gently heaving breast and the athletic outstretched limbs of the man in front of him.

And the whole pressure of the moment as he gave himself up to his “cavoseniargizing” was fragrant with the odour of pines, was pungent with the sour-smelling mud at the roots of the reeds, was aromatic with the autumnal growths between the stumps of the willows.

He had a subtle philosophical motive in making much of this ridiculous word, and in thinking of his secret pleasure in this absurd way, for by so doing he drained it of all religious mysticism and purged it of all spiritual illusions. And tonight, for instance, without being in the faintest degree mystical, it came much nearer than he had ever known it to the circumstances of his life and his attitude to the people of his life.

What vaguely insinuated itself into him at that moment, and did so rather into his blood and bones than into his conscience, was the notion that if there was something in the unselected, indiscriminate impact of inanimate elements and inanimate objects upon his senses which gave him such intense pleasure that he was unable to imagine any pleasure that was more intense, it was foolishness to plot and plan for ends and purposes that had nothing to do with “cavoseniargizing” and nothing about them that could increase his opportunities for “cavoseniargizing.”

And if, thus his obscure thoughts drifted on, the real pleasure of his life was a lonely and solitary pleasure and completely independent of the people of his life, while the happiness of the people of his life depended so much — at least that was what he had been brought up to believe — on the way he behaved to them, was not his instinctive habit of doing obediently, patiently, and without malice or irony, all that he was told to do, all that he was wanted to do, all that it was taken for granted he would do, the precise sort of behaviour, the precise method of conducting his affairs, to which not only Nature, by giving him such responsive senses, not only common sense by enabling him to live at peace with his mother and his wife, not only animal caution and vegetative placidity by saving him from human agitations, but the subtle scope offered to a life devoid of personal passions and ambitious aims, all pointed?

If it was true, as he had been assured, that both the women wanted this marriage to take place tomorrow in accordance with the old tradition — well! he would obey them; but if he found that Morfydd loved old Rhun and wished to be the mother of Rhun's child rather than of his — well! he would see what he would do! When the day and the hour came, whatever the Erinyes did then or after, he would deal with the day and the hour!

With his thoughts at this particular point and his eyes fixed upon the crisscross leather straps that enhanced the Attic beauty of his foster-brother's long legs, he was suddenly aware of a tall dark form blotting out the moonlight.

"My Lords!" murmured the intruder in a low hoarse voice.

Porius had just time to note the swift wild-animal leap to his feet of his dazed companion ere more leisurely he himself scrambled up.

Myrddin Wyllt was dressed in his long black mantle; and at the place where his great beard reached the level of his navel it was tied with the usual gold thread whose tassels hung down to his knees. His head was bare, and his bony fingers at the end of his long curved arms were making slow majestic movements as if writing upon the interior darkness of the tent. He gave the impression that he had been searching anxiously and even desperately for some time for just such an expanse of darkness untroubled by human-made lamps and lanterns or even by the light of the moon. It was as if he were inscribing runic letters in the manner of one who carves a prophecy in the ogam script.

But it soon occurred to Porius that what the man was doing lent itself to another and quite different interpretation; namely, that instead of inscribing things on the air now that he had found a hollow place dark enough for his purpose, he was tracing out things that had already been written upon it!

The foster-brothers stood awkwardly by the big man's side as he went through this singular performance. "He needs no one to hold him up tonight," thought Porius.

"Has Gwendydd sent him for me?" thought Rhun.

Then the prophet dropped his hands and turned upon them with a question that embarrassed them even more than his reading with his fingers like a blind man what destiny had written on the air.

"What woman has been weeping here?"

The man's hearers exchanged uneasy looks which the moonlight on their faces — for they were both between him and the head of the bed — rendered startlingly clear. But he moved a step forward and laid one hand on the shoulder of one of them and the other hand on the shoulder of the other.

"My Lords," he murmured, and his voice was gentle and almost cajoling, "which of you two strong men wants to give an old wanderer a brand from those warm embers? I can see some of them are still alive, well! alive as a woman's heart, and they — when there is one, there isn't always; sometimes there's a cold stone instead — did you know that, my Lords? — a stone that's been dripped upon for ten thousand years by the waters of grandmother Styx — can endure water and air and earth and yet can go on burning; and I'll tell you something else, my Lords, that you can't know, because a man's got to be old to know this, that the more ashes there are on the top of a living heart the longer it'll burn. Oh, thank you, Rhun ap Gwrnach. You're my true friend indeed! This is the second time today you've come to the rescue of the wanderer — there! it'll burn now — no! one of them's enough — one torch, one bed, one heart! — there! you've lit it; it'll burn now till dawn."

Both the foster-brothers had endeavoured to do what he'd asked; but whether because Porius was more alive to the words of the queer monologue that accompanied their attempts, or because he was less of an adept in the ways of fire than the soldier of Mithras, he was as poor a second in this torch-lighting race as he had been in the races where Morfydd was concerned.

Planks, boards, posts, logs, sticks, roots, and twigs — they all had to be very considerably burnt for Rhun not to recognize them, and not to know their nature and their particular behaviour as they passed on their fiery journey to the Limbo of departed trees.

Porius, therefore, throwing down the flaring alder branch he had just succeeded in igniting, could only stand and stare as Rhun, slowly and solemnly as if he were still in the Cave of Mithras, illuminated Morfydd's bridal bed.

The next words uttered by the counsellor were of a simple and practical kind. "My sister," he said, embracing both of them in a glance of such godlike geniality that his eyes in the newly lit torchlight shone like a couple of emeralds in the head of an African idol, "my sister has a wonder to show you two, a curious wonder, a striking marvel; but she says she can only show it you over the pouring out of Greek wine. The Lady Nineue wants to pledge you both too in wine of another kind — though exactly in what kind I can't" — here he paused and the light went out of his green eyes, and his hearers could not help becoming aware of the extraordinary lowness of his forehead and the shocking enormity of his ears— “I can’t... for you know how it is with me, my Lords... I can’t at this moment... for I am what I am, and what I am I have made myself always by the help of the Great Mother... and what I am I can’t at this moment tell you... another moment I might tell you, but at this moment I can’t tell you... nor what Nineue’s wine is.”

Again there came into Porius’s head, as he thought of Nineue and the wine of Annwn, his father’s drunken voice, at once jeering and ecstatic, as it chanted the obscure verses of this modern Pen Beirdd, their Deganwy cousins’ discovery, “the runaway ‘Stir-the-Pot’ from Caer Einion” as his defeated rivals called him when his genius put them to shame:

Ar ffynnhawn ffrwythlawn yssyd oduchti;
Ys whegach nor gwin gwyn yllyn yndi.
And above it is a fruitful fountain;
Sweeter than white wine is the liquor in it.

So far neither of the foster-brothers had addressed a word to their visitor; but Porius had kept his wits about him, and in spite of the mead from Gwlad-yr-Haf his mind was clear.

“You must entreat the ladies to excuse me tonight, Arglwydd,” he said quietly. “I dare not leave Brother John any longer. Lot-el-Azziz is with him and the Henog of Dyfed may be there too. But neither of them have had their dinner, and how they are going to get any supper as late as this I don’t know, unless the doctor takes the Henog to his own tent. But all this only affects myself. I am sure my cousin will rejoice to come. Isn’t that true, Rhun?”

All that could be seen of the dutiful miles of Mithras, as he stood between the torchlit bed and the moonlit sky, revealed that it was true. From the springing alacrity of his lithe figure to the irrepressible eagerness on his guileless face there emanated such a rush of pleasure that his nervously grateful words were quite unnecessary: “Indeed and I will; and indeed and I do thank you, my Lord.”

At this the counsellor, taking Rhun by the arm, moved incontinently out of the tent; and Porius for the moment was left alone. He was aware that the prophet had been anything but pleased by his refusal to follow him and his lack of interest in the “wonder” to be revealed by Gwendydd. “I can’t help it!” he thought. “There’ll be plenty of time before I’ve done with him! In fact, I’d have him leaning too heavily on me if I went with them now. There’s a link between us, a link that goes far back; and where this link operates I’m stronger than he is — and not in physical strength only!”

He proceeded without haste to put out the torch and to empty the last drop of mead from the stone jug upon the only log from which smoke still rose. Then, with the jug in one hand and his grandfather’s bottle in the other, he too went out, letting the tent folds fall behind him.

He was prepared to find that the counsellor had carried Rhun off, but he had not done so and they were standing there in silence side by side, evidently waiting to bid him good night.

“So it was the Jew,” said Myrddin Wyllt, “who brought the old Brother back to life? I had an instinct something was wrong and I very nearly came myself. I’m a wretchedly poor prophet, but I am what I am, and the earth is always murmuring and muttering in my ears. Yes, she is telling me things all the time; only I’m so foolish and feeble and weak and muddle-headed and mad that I miss the drift of half the things she tells me. I’m a poor magician, Prince Porius, and a bad prophet and a crazy counsellor; but none of this worries me. Why not, do you say? Because I am what I am and my fate is what it is. It’s my creatures who worry me. Sometimes I feel they might just as well not be born at all. Too much pain, Prince Porius, too much pain, and not enough pleasure. But tell me about this Jew, Prince Porius. Is it still in his mind to sail with the Greek?"

"That's what he says, my Lord."

It was at that point that Myrddin Wyllt began to lean quite heavily on Rhun's arm; so heavily in fact that the son of Gwrnach was forced to shift one of his feet to steady himself, and Porius was surprised to find himself experiencing a faint spasm of jealous anger as he watched these harmless movements.

"Good night, my Lord Counsellor," he said as he turned to go, and "Good night, Rhun," he added.

But Myrddin Wyllt's face was already distorted in one of his paroxysms, and he had begun with outstretched arm and extended fingers writing, or as Porius had decided it was, reading, invisible runes on the air. Porius watched the scene curiously but offered no help, although it was plain that his foster-brother was hard put to it to support that extremely heavy and now so shaken and so violently gesticulating form.

"If he wants proud and ambitious court beauties," he thought, "let him pay the price."

But "the price" this time proved both light in substance and brief in passage. The counsellor was in fact very soon in complete possession of himself; but he had had, he explained, a communication which made it necessary for him to go to the camp again and take counsel at once with Peredur ab Evrawc.

"Colgrim is nearer than any of us thought," he said, and there was something in the hoarse chuckle that shook his unwieldy body that suggested to Porius with irresistible force the gurgling sound of a certain underground stream that kept appearing and disappearing beneath the grassy tussocks of a marshy field at the foot of Mynydd-y-Gaer.

"If you don't mind, my Lord," he added, addressing Rhun, "you might go straight on to my sister and tell her the news and warn her that I'll be back late tonight. And now with your permission, Prince Porius, I think I'll accompany you to the Brother's cell and carry off the doctor and the Henog."

Porius stared at him. What did he mean by "carry off?" The doctor would be there still, but surely the Henog would be gone? Hunger alone would have — and besides what did a foreigner like el-Azziz know of Pwyll and Pryderi or the white wine of Caer Sidi?

"I'll give your message, sir, to the ladies. Good night, Porius!" Rhun was far too excited to let his departure be chilled by the small attention it aroused.

Myrddin Wyllt seemed delighted by a sudden idea that had come into his head. "The truth is," he said, "the moment you spoke just now of these men not having had their supper I thought of young Taliesin. I don't know whether you know — probably not, as it must be a delicate subject with you all — that since the boy-bard quarrelled with your cousins at Deganwy he has attached himself to Cynan ap Clydno, Owain ab Uryen's closest friend. In Cynan's service he sees Owain constantly and he hears all the latest news about the Lord of yr Echwydd whom in his imaginative hero worship he has turned into a sort of demigod.

"Incidentally he is such an extremely good cook that nothing will ever induce Cynan to part with him, and being thus secure in a position that has nothing to do with poetry he can write what poetry he likes, and as much and little of it as he likes, and at any time he likes. Nor can any Uryen or any Arthur or any prince of the House of Cunedda take the bread out of his mouth if he does not please him.

"You know how it is with us, my Lord: all our bards have been, until this new age, absolutely dependent on their patrons. But in these days with this religion of Christ like a flood tide in every direction, everything is changing. We're living in revolutionary days, Prince Porius, and we've got to face the fact that things are going to be very different from what they were. Our ancient heroes, if not demigods themselves, listened to the wisdom of prophets and were inspired by the Muses. But Uryen of Rheged is completely illiterate. It would be absurd for him to have anything to do with judging the value of poetry.

"This Deganwy bard of yours has been wise in establishing himself with young Cynan. He's the richest of all our princes, but almost as illiterate as Uryen and his brave son; and I tell you, Prince, the less a patron knows about poetry the less he'll meddle with his poet. Cynan isn't as rash and adventurous as young Owain ab Uryen. In fact, Cynan is a deep one; few of his friends realize how deep. But he's an impassioned friend of Owain, and both the young men are sociable and gregarious and extremely fond of good meals.

"So all the Caer Einion bard has to do, if your relations don't drag him back by force which they wouldn't find an easy job, is to satisfy this fantastical pair with his cooking. And it appears he's an astonishingly good cook! Meanwhile he can write all the obscure, modern poetry he likes — for the benefit, as Homer would say, 'of men yet unborn!' It's a queer kind of writing, Prince Porius; as different from Hesiod — did your Bishop's School over the mountains read Hesiod with you? — as it is from Homer. I sometimes feel as if it were the sort of writing the old Greek prophet Tiresias might have dictated to his disciples.

"But I must't keep you standing any longer in this chilly wind. It's clear that what the wise Henog and your worthy doctor want at this juncture is their supper; and I can't believe that this young prodigy would have come so vividly into my mind if there weren't a good chance of such a meal at Cynan ap Clydno's tent. Taliesin's reputation has travelled already to all Arthur's camps; and though Arthur himself is too practical a soldier to understand this new style, the ladies of his court have been quick to see that something new has come into the world. Women are quicker than men in these things."

Porius made no comment on all this. It had been a shock to him when Einion refused the Gaer's hospitality to this runaway from Deganwy, and he felt touchy about finding the boy in the service of the son of Clydno. But when a little later — for the doctor and the Henog soon reached the point in their intercourse when a distraction from outside is welcome — the counsellor had carried off both of them to the camp and Porius was left alone with the sleeping Brother, the assuaging understanding that passed between him and every material object surrounding that motionless form, together with the soothing effect of slowly divesting himself of his outer garments ere lying down by the fire, seemed to give his soul a sort of golden embarkation upon the mysterious outflowing tide of all his secret desires; desires that were vague and nebulous, desires that in some strange way were connected with Cader Idris and with Creiddylad's gigantic race, desires that had little to do with Morfydd or his marriage tent.

The warmth of the fire so close to his couch, the quiet breathing of the sleeping Brother, the decision he had already reached of leaving the question of the consummation of their marriage entirely to Morfydd, all these things combined to make a gently sliding avalanche of fallen leaves, sweet-scented and soft and deep, upon which he sank into oblivion.

As he approached the borderline of unconsciousness it seemed to him that the wind veered from the east to the quarter he loved best and began to reach the Brother's cell from the southwest! And he wondered vaguely whether it was in the scope of some stretched-out cantref of possibility that there were women among the last remnants of the old race of Cewri — the true owners of Ynys Prydein — and that sometimes, by some incredible miracle of magnetic attraction, these beautiful children of Eryri and Cader, fairer and larger than the daughters of the ordinary tribes of men, and with all the mists of those mountain chasms, and all the depths and silences of those mountain tarns, and all the sun radiances of those mountain ridges, and all the moon remotenesses of those mountain peaks gathered up into their flesh and blood, might come down into the forest and be seen and known of such as, like himself, had been calling to them for so long!

Porius's unsympathetic mood had not been lost on Myrddin Wyllt, and his mind reverted to it as he escorted the doctor and the historian along the edge of the lake.

"Once again," he thought, "I've babbled where I ought to have held my tongue! What a fool I am! It wasn't my tongue that gave the creatures of the earth their first Golden Age, and it won't be my tongue, if I'm still the 'crooked counsellor' that'll give them their second. The Great Mother put it into my head then and she will do so again. But there's some link between this young Porius and me. That's why I babble to him like a fool! What a Venedotian Hercules the man is! Our association must go back a long way, but what he was to me or what he's destined to be to me the Mother alone knows!"

The agitated prophet seemed to himself increasingly foolish and incompetent as he walked between the Silurian and the Jew. Nor was the mood of the two men at that particular moment calculated to restore his self-respect.

It was of the coming of Magog in relation to the well-being of Zora and Gog that el-Azziz was thinking as he serenely caressed the ram's horn at his hip and lifted his topknot to the moon; nor had the Henog given up hope that by roundabout means, even if he had to compare the rocks of Sinai with the forests of Gwent and to ask his questions about the past across the unwieldy bulk of this maniac for the future, he might yet get some light from the learned foreigner as to why it was that Pendaran of Dyfed should be old enough to have the deciding word about Pryderi's heathen name being changed to his Christian name, and yet young enough to act as page for those Saith Marchog, or Seven Horsemen, when Caradoc the son of Bran died of a broken heart.

Meanwhile, either by pure chance or by that strange pressure upon destiny which his soul seemed to exert independently of his will and which Myrddin Wyllt had come at last wearily to accept as a necessary part of his exhausting existence, the youngest bard of Ynys Prydein was really and actually preparing, as if the emperor's counsellor had arranged the whole thing, a most exquisite late meal for his rich young patron and for that patron's bosom crony, the eccentric and vagabond son of Uryen of Rheged. The tent of Cynan the son of Clydno was the largest of all the tents in that camp of princely young equites, larger even than that of Prince Galahaut of Surluse.

The colours of its canvas were black and silver and it was supported upon six posts of a special sort of black oak brought from Iwerdon, while the kitchen, of which this formidable young poet was the supreme ruler, was a completely separate erection; but there was still to be discovered, large as this annexe was and with plenty of sleeping space for two persons, any man or any boy bold enough to work there under the orders of Taliesin the bard.

As for Cynan ap Clydno, while his glory with the modern-minded as a patron of the new poetry was increased by the excellence of his prodigy's cooking, he was not the kind of man to feel the faintest annoyance, though for his life he dared not enter his own kitchen. But when one of his much prized meals was over and his guests — for the more fashionable of the young equites always regarded his invitations as more desirable than any banquet that was common to all — were at their mead or their wine, it was his custom to call upon Taliesin to recite some of the more daring, modern, and mystical verses he might recently have composed.

At the very moment — such was Myrddin Wyllt's premonition or, shall we say, predestination — when that ambiguous prognosticator was escorting along the water's edge, like Hermes conducting a pair of souls to Hades, the Henog and the doctor, the youthful Taliesin had just laid before Cynan ap Clydno and Owain ab Uryen the first course of one of his most daintily contrived suppers.

He himself partook of these meals alone, casually, negligently, and as a rule sparingly, though there were occasions when, the dish being a favourite, he ate of it silently, greedily, and very fast.

When Cynan ap Clydno's guests wanted to hear some new stanzas, or, as sometimes happened, he himself wanted to try out upon them some specially daring experiment in assonance and alliteration, they had to wait till he had washed the dishes, put away or thrown away what was left, and by cooling his head for a while in the air or by draining a flask over his fire in a brief moment of trancelike beatitude, had got himself into a mood when he cared nothing for anything except the expression of his visions, his inventions, his sensations.

Not unfrequently it was when he was actually feeling this mood coming on that Cynan and Owain got their most perfectly cooked meal. The young man's genius seemed to brim over at those times, and the inspiration that was fulfilling itself in his poem flowed outwards naturally and spontaneously into the preparation of the meal.

And when he sank down by the fire or on his bench in the air, caring nothing how long he kept these young chieftains waiting, it seemed to his curiously sensitized nerves that the two wooden water troughs he had come to call Adam and Eve, and the saucepan he called Claudius Caesar, and the bronze pot hung over the fire he called Zeno, and the oven he called Satan, were as much aware of the intense feelings that vibrated through him as he was himself.

He derived in fact, the longer he remained in this smoky annexe of the great black-and-silver tent, an exquisite satisfaction from his curiously occult familiarity with every knife and every spoon, every platter and every pot with which he was in a daily habit of working.

To imagine himself into all the inanimate things to which the earth gives birth or which man makes with his hands was his liveliest delight, and there were few of these inanimates through which he had not at one time or another felt the stream of mortal lives and the rush of mortal worlds pass by.

Taliesin was small in stature but very muscular and wiry. He wore his hair cropped unusually close to his skull, and he not only scraped all the hair from his face but as far as he was able to do so from every other portion of his body. In addition to projecting his soul from its physical envelope, he seemed to use all the power of his imagination to project the whole of his small, slight, fibrous, and sinewy identity into the particular inanimate or elemental substance whose existence he was at that moment anxious to share.

But the most curious thing about Cynan ap Clydno's unusual king of the kitchen was that he had no relations or friends. He seemed to have no sex either. He resembled not so much an hermaphroditic idol come to conscious life with the vivid intensity of both its sexes as an elemental creature entirely devoid of all sex instincts and of both the sex organs.

Thus he was enabled to compose a species of poetry whose peculiarity was that it was not only absolutely “a-sexual,” or devoid of sex, but devoid of all the emotions connected with religion and piety where sex enters.

Myrddin Wyllt’s comment upon this youthful prodigy was that Taliesin was an undying child; and it may well have been that it was this childishness, showing itself in a stripped and naked objectivity, that explained the magical appeal of the boy-bard and his victory over his rivals. So primeval, so artless, so unadorned, so content with the immediate impression of the object or situation or event was Taliesin’s verse that it left upon the mind a curious feeling of paradisic obscurity, the ecstatic sufficiency in fact of pure sensation about which it is impossible to say anything except what is implied in those childish proclamations so often repeated: “I was,” or “I was there,” or “I was with,” or “I saw.”

It would seem that the idea that Myrddin Wyllt had in his mind when he uttered the word “childishness” was that what so many practical, logical, and rational people called Taliesin’s “mysticism” was not mysticism at all but, on the contrary, an almost babyish abandonment to pure unadulterated sensation.

Myrddin Wyllt appears to have thought that Taliesin’s poetry was the enjoyment of a particular essence, an essence to be found not only in things and persons but in historical and mythological events, and that this essence could best be reached by so close and intimate an identification of the poet with the thing alluded to or with the event described, that it was as if, stripped to the skin but not disembodied, he plunged into the thing’s essential being and became a conscious part of it, carrying the impressionability of his human senses into something which to the uninitiated might be merely a drop of lifeless water, or a piece of inanimate wood, or some formal grouping of traditional symbols grown fabulous and dim in the remote past.

What Myrddin Wyllt's clue word "childish" brought to light is focussed in the boy-bard's absolute immunity to all the human emotions where sex plays a dominant part, as it does in love, in hate, in race, in religion, and in almost all forms of cruelty; and the curious thrill of pleasure, as of a new exciting sensation that his poetry produced, showed what a mass of subjects is left when sex is cut out.

On this particular night of Saturn, the twentieth of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, Taliesin's brain was so full of the experiments in assonance and alliteration which he had been making in relation, not only to certain physical tones, but to the psychological effect of these same physical tones in various processes of repetition, that he served Cynan ap Clydno's guests in what really was a completely abstracted, though automatically competent, trance. When he was in this mood he used his materials with extravagant carelessness, and it bothered him not in the least that a lot of well-cooked food should be given to beggars or even to pigs.

One of the peculiarities for which his fellow retainers used to mock him in the halls and kitchens of Deganwy was a trick he had of preserving in pots and jars the petals and leaves of various wild shrubs and flowers, plucked in their tender freshness but kept till they were withered, crumbling, black, and quite unrecognizable.

Upon spoonfuls of this aromatic dust he would subsequently pour boiling water, and then he would sip for hours the fragrant drink thus distilled, nibbling as he did so certain special loaves of bread baked by himself from barley and rye. Caught tonight in his inspired mood on this moonlit eve of the Feast of the Sowing, Taliesin barely tasted the dishes he laid before Cynan's guests, nor cared greatly how many guests or dishes there were. At intervals he made his drink of dried petals and leaves. At intervals he nibbled his special bread.

But if Myrddin Wyllt could have watched his thin little body, his bony face, his cropped skull, and all the deft mechanical movements with which he went on preparing an exquisite meal for an uncertain number of people, while with the taste of that aromatic infusion on his tongue he was enjoying an orgy of secret poetical sensations, he might well have thought: "Here is one who could lift up his voice in prophecy!"

But Taliesin was as totally indifferent to prophecy as he was indifferent to love and religion. The cold and formal obeisance he sometimes made to the Christian faith, and especially to the doctrine of the Trinity, resembled the uneasy respect of a heathen priest in the presence of an alien ritual. What he was striving for was a particular magic of measured metre, upon which he could ride or sail or float or sink into the essence of the thing, or event, or encounter, or situation, about which he was concerned.

To so ravish the symbolic essences of certain primeval objects by the magic of his verse that all who heard him should share his intimations was what he wanted. There is no doubt that something in the mysterious personality of Uryen had a peculiar fascination for him. It was not merely because the Lord of Rheged or of yr Echwydd had saved him from his Deganwy humiliations that he addressed such passionate eulogies to him; nor did he compose his elaborate eulogies upon Owain ab Uryen simply because the young man had got him a job in the luxurious kitchen of the rich son of Clydno.

But what he constantly and exultantly felt in the depths of his half-mad soul was that he himself, Taliesin Pen Beirdd, was a being set apart from others, a being whose mission it was to reveal to the world what only the mystery poetry could reveal, that is to say, a certain secret life of planetary sensation, totally independent of love and religion and nationality and power and fame and glory and learning, a life of sensation that lifted the elements to the level of vegetation, vegetation to the level of animals, animals to the level of men, and men not only to the level of one another but to the level of the immortal gods.

The much mocked and cruelly humiliated ex-kitchen boy from Deganwy had indeed discovered his own way of life a couple of years before, and in the frenzy of his devotion he flung himself at the feet of his childhood's hero. He had discovered the very thing that life itself conspired with destiny to verify from every angle of his knowledge of Uryen of Rheged.

It was at the zenith of Uryen's strange powers, at the beginning, that is to say, of his thirty-fifth year, and when his son Owain was only a year older than Taliesin himself, that this desperate suppliant approached him; and it was with a royal and grandiose gesture that the reckless hero promptly replied by despatching the two lads together to the emperor's camp.

It established a queer relation between the young men, this act of Uryen's, but it justified itself thanks to the magnanimity of all concerned. Owain ab Uryen had no difficulty in persuading his bosom crony, Cynan ap Clydno, to accept his new friend as his bard and cook; and both the young lords were swept away by the magnetic charm, not to speak of his popularity with their sophisticated friends, of this astonishing Pen Beirdd.

Taliesin had indeed worked out for himself, quite apart from his power of expressing it in such assonances and alliterations as had never been heard before, a really startling philosophy of his own. This philosophy depended upon a particular and special use of sensation; and its secret had the power of rendering all matter sacred and pleasure-giving to the individual soul.

And it had the power — at least, that is what its youthful exponent held — of fusing the immense past with the immeasurable future and of doing this, moreover, not by means of an “eternity” beyond experience and imagination, but by means of a quivering, vibrating, yet infinitely quiescent moment of real Time, a moment of Time so satisfying that it surpassed all the pleasures of sex, while it reduced to something unnatural, distorted, and perverted, every scruple of chastity.

By slow degrees under his double concentration upon an almost equally subtle art of cooking and art of assonance, the poison of the mockery he had suffered at Deganwy — all their references to the cauldron of Ceridwen and the wild hunt after the little boy from Caer Einion — disappeared. The hunted glare in his excited eyes grew daily less and less. Save for inspiring or entertaining Cynan’s friends — chief of whom was his own friend Owain — he was left absolutely alone with his cooking and his poetry.

Thus on this night of the eve of the Feast, in order that he might enjoy in peace his infusion of dried petals from a curiously moulded earthenware mug which he had long ago appropriated to his private use from the kitchens of Deganwy, he pulled his four-legged wooden stool into a position so nicely calculated that he who sat upon it felt the full warmth of the fire and also saw the glittering path of moonlight on the wind-ruffled water.

From this position there could also be seen not only a towering pine whose trunk, reddish in the daylight, was now, with the lake behind it, black as night, but also, outlined clearly against the moonlit water, what looked like a grave-mound cross, but what really was an ancestral sword of Cynan ap Clydno, thrust to the depth of half its blade, in the buried stump of a vanished oak tree.

Here, happily ensconced, while the talk of Cynan ap Clydno’s guests came only as a soothing sea shell murmur to his ears, and while from the lap of the pigskin apron between his knees he kept picking out morsels from one of his favourite barley loaves, concentrating on the underside of the thick crust, and presenting, as he lifted these fragments to his lips, the sulky appearance of an unsociable monkey who in defiance of its tribe has got at last what it wants.

The wind was still blowing from the east as it had done all day, and it carried upon it no trace of that sickly reek of human ordure — for the camp had had no time to deal adequately with its refuse — by which his nostrils were so often assailed. He was therefore in just the mood to repeat to himself to make sure he remembered it, even in the mood perhaps to continue a little further, the rough, harsh, tentative beginning of one of his queer litanies of metamorphosical metaphysic, which he had been composing and improving and scribbling down and learning by heart for the last couple of weeks.

His eyes, as he sat nibbling his loaf and sipping the steaming contents of his Deganwy mug, were fixed on a small black excrescence on one of the higher branches of the pine in front of him. A hawk’s nest he took this to be; but whether of last spring’s building, or of more than one spring, and whether it had ever contained eggs or nestlings, he had no notion.

Indeed it is doubtful even if it had been the spring feast rather than the autumn one, whether any mother hawk would have been aware of a human voice at the entrance to the kitchen in any way different from those that were rising from the supper board so close by. The crosshandle of the embedded sword had certainly at that moment more of an air of attention than the nest in the tree, but any sort of thing happening near a cross, not to speak of a sword, always seems in some odd way to be watched — if not heard and guarded against.

And indeed, considering the nature of both sword and cross, the moonlit space between that figure on the four-legged stool and Clydno's rusty weapon may well have vibrated with occult currents of dangerous antipathy as the words "the Mothers" and "Nothingness" and "Annwfyn" floated away towards the lake:

With the roots of a thousand worlds dangling beneath me,
With the mouths of a thousand worlds sucking the nipples
Of Nothingness round me, I've fled from the Mothers
To ride on the life winds that whirl round Annwfyn!
Take the grey from the dawn, take the red from the sunset,
Take the purple-black bloom from the vine press of thunder,
And pour them all out in the swine troughs of Annwn!
I'd darkened those beaches with the shadow of my main sail —
Sea drift and sea wrack and seaweeds and sea shells! —
Ere another ship's keel on Caer Sidi had grounded
Or another ship anchored by Carbonek's wharf.
I was the blood bubble in the throat of the Kraken
When the spout of its bursting engulfed Lost Atlantis:
I was the last thought in the mind of Tithonus
Ere he turned to cold stone on the breast of the morning;
I was the first word on the lips of Tiresias
When he lapped at the blood between Ocean and Hades;
Have I herded the worms of the earth in their millions
Have I followed the eels in their ocean migrations
Have I crouched with the curving of the wave crests that covered
The gulf-swallowed coast cliffs of continents sunken
Not to share with the cliffs and the waves and the whirlpools
Not to share with the eels in their twists and their turnings

Not to share with the swine at the troughs of Annwfyn
Not to share with the spout from the throat of the Kraken
Not to share with the worms of the earth in their gropings
Not to share with the roots of the worlds in their fumblings
Not to share with the life winds that whirl round Annwfyn
Not to share with the last thought that came to Tithonus
Not to share with the first word that came to Tiresias
The thing none can utter, the thing inexpressible,
That bird-wing and man-skin and fish-scale conniving
Convey to all lost souls curled up in their prisons,
Like Mabon ap Modron in his prison at Caerloyw,
The thing that was known from before the beginning,
And will be still known when the end is forgotten;
Known to starfish and sunfish and seaworms and earthworms,
Known to sky gods and earthmen and all living creatures!
He knew it, Pelagius, and I, Taliesin,
Who praise till I perish the Lord of yr Echwydd
Who serve, while strength's in me, the feast-giving Cynan,
I know it from pond slime and frog spawn and grub spit,
From bracken's green coral, white lichen, yellow mosses,
Newts sinking with their arms out to reedy pools' bottoms,
Swords rusting in their oak stumps, wrapped in the long rains,
Eggs rotting in their lost nests, enjoying the wild mists,
I know it from all these, and to men I proclaim it:
The ending forever of the Guilt sense and God sense,
The ending forever of the Sin sense and Shame sense,
The ending forever of the Love sense and Loss sense,
The beginning forever of the Peace paradisic,

The “I feel” without question, the “I am” without purpose,
The “It is” that leads nowhere, the life with no climax,
The “Enough” that leads forward to no consummation,
The answer to all things, that yet answers nothing,
The centre of all things, yet all on the surface,
The secret of Nature, yet Nature goes blabbing it
With all of her voices from earth, fire, air, water!
Whence comes it? Whither goes it? It is nameless; it is shameless;
It is Time free at last from its Ghostly Accuser,
Time haunted no more by a Phantom Eternal;
It is godless; but its gods are as sea sands in number;
It’s the Square with four sides that encloses all circles;
Four horizons hath this Tetrad that swallows all Triads;
It includes every creature that Nature can summon.
It excludes from Annwfyn nor man, beast, nor woman!”

It was a curious thing, but a thing not inexplicable in the light of the wonders he had survived in Caer Einion and the outrages to his deepest soul he had suffered in Deganwy, but in place of experiencing any particular exaltation after rounding off in this wholesale manner his fabulous and exhaustive litany, he simply felt the familiar sensation, for it was one that usually followed these windy gusts of oracular obsession, of entering into an intimate relation with some small inanimate object that happened by the purest chance to be just then under his eye!

On this occasion the object that met the gaze of Cynan ap Clydno’s bard was a straw of wheat, dirty and split, crooked and crushed flat, with only a couple of empty husks adhering to its head end, and its tail end not only flattened out beyond all semblance of the hollow reed it once had been, but polished, in its enforced travels over the earth, to such a degree of thinness, smoothness, and whiteness, as to be almost transparent.

Taliesin swallowed a mouthful of bread, drained carefully the last and sweetest drops of his leaf-petal drug — for the honey he always put into it had a tendency to sink to the bottom — and laying both mug and loaf crust on the ground and clasping his strong, square, spatulate fingers round his knees, stared in comatose reverie at the straw. And by degrees, though of course the chances were entirely in favour of it being a one-sided affair, a relation began to establish itself between the man in his quiescence on the warm dry stool and the straw in its quiescence on the damp ground.

The young bard let his whole soul sink into a multiple consciousness of the material of our planet in its various immediate manifestations. The petal-scented honey still lingering on his tongue, the barley bread dissolving at its leisure in his stomach, the dry resinous odours from the distant fir trees, the vague aromatic fragrances from various growths at the water's edge, the feeling of the empty air receding into fabulous distances in every direction, the feeling of the wet, deep-sunken rocks, sprawled over by the cool roots of vegetation, but leading down at last, ledge by vertiginous ledge, to the dry scoriac bones of the Great Mother, all these — though he was himself a somewhat voluble oracle, and the straw had been flattened out too long to permit of a single breath passing through it — all these Taliesin seemed to share on something like equal terms with his unresponsive fellow tellurian. But the mere fact that chance had led him to single out a particular piece of inanimate but organic matter, a wind-tossed wheat stalk, whose non-sentience was on a par with that of any fragment from his own skeleton when once that skeleton was scattered to the winds, gave him a reason for saying "you and I" or "you and me" to this lifeless object.

It was while he was communing in such one-sided fashion with this fellow occupier of Space and Time that he was disturbed by the voice of an extremely babyish but extremely self-assured little boy, and by a response to the child from a woman who was obviously as little perturbed as her son, either by the presence of the black-and-silver tent and its crowded and stately supper table, or by the solitary figure at the entrance to the kitchen.

Rising to his feet with a muttered curse the bard beheld advancing towards him a plump, short, and, as far as he could make out, handsome young woman in advanced pregnancy, who, though she wore no veil, showed at once by the richly gilded ornaments twisted amid the masses of magnificent black hair which she wore coiled up round her head, as well as by the lavish folds of her flowing garments, so fantastically unsuitable to the hour, the occasion, and the place, that she belonged to none of the tribes of Ynys Prydein.

“But why mustn’t I go to my dad, Mummy?” the little boy kept repeating. “And why didn’t my dad answer when I called out to him? I know he heard me, for I saw Myrddin Wyllt look at him after he’d looked at me! Can Myrddin Wyllt see out of the back of his head, Mummy? Didn’t my dad want us to come and find him, Mummy? Was he hiding from us?”

These questions were asked in the particular dialect of the Brythonic tongue used in the coastal harbours of Gwent from which the Roman, Greek, and Carthaginian merchants were in the habit of replenishing their crews; but the caressing syllables with which Zora subdued and soothed, if she didn’t satisfy, the puzzled intelligence of Gog had no significance for Taliesin for they were uttered in Hebrew.

“You’ve come for Lot-el-Azziz, Lady, I expect,” the young man began hurriedly, “and you couldn’t have come at a better time.”

“Mummy wants my dad—” Gog brought out before he had glimpsed the face or the speaker. But when he had taken in something of the extraordinary countenance confronting him he became silent and stared with wide eyes and open mouth.

“I don’t want to make a disturbance,” the woman began. Then she too stopped. Describing it later to her husband she said it was like being shown your course by a fire at the mast’s head. “I could no more have argued with him,” she said, “than with one of those Northern Lights.”

“But I’ll tell you why it’s such a good time,” the young bard went on. “Because I’ve got to go in to them myself now, and I’ll send the doctor out to you.”

“Oh, don’t trouble yourself, young man,” cried Zora. “I don’t want to make a disturbance. I only thought if somebody could sneak in on tiptoe and whisper in Lot’s ear that Zor-n’-Gog were outside, he could slip away like God’s smoke and nobody be the worse.”

Taliesin picked up his stool with one hand and his mug and loaf crust with the other.

“Come to the fire while I get ready,” he said, “and I’ll soon send him out to you.”

He seated them on a bench by the big cauldron and brought them two little platters of the sweetmeat he’d prepared for Cynan’s guests. He took it for granted, as indeed his visitors did too, that there was no need that the few small changes he had to make in his attire should interrupt their colloquy.

“Why didn’t God make my dad a cook instead of a doctor?” enquired Gog gravely and pensively, the Brythonic syllables with their Aegean intonation forcing their way through the spongy substance that filled his mouth.

“You don’t get all his meals for Cynan ap Clydno, do you?” enquired Zora with painful sympathy.

“Oh, no, Arglwyddes, no! no! On about half the days of the week he dines with the others at the general board.”

“And you too, I suppose?”

“Holy Jesus! I should hope not!” And the youthful philosopher made a grimace of unfeigned horror. “Oh, no, beautiful Lady! When Cynan ap Clydno dines with the others in the general hall, Owain ab Uryen and I have a private picnic here. Even when both of them have to go, I stay. People disturb my mind, Arglwyddes.”

“Are you really the Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein?”

“That’s not for anyone to say, beautiful Lady. In two thousand years perhaps — but not very likely even then.”

“What do you think of these frightening stories they tell us about tomorrow?”

“What stories, beautiful Lady?”

“That every woman round here will be... in danger from Colgrim. That the druid has a host of archers with poisoned arrows. That at noon tomorrow when the Feast’s over and all the women have been outraged there’ll be a general massacre.”

“What does ‘outrage’ really mean, Mummy? When I asked Neb ap Digon he said it meant giving people what they like best of all. If the forest people give you figs in honey will you let me have some?”

Taliesin tied the twisted bardic cord with its green tassels round his waist and surveyed them both with a smile. “Shall I tell your pretty mummy what I predict will happen tomorrow?”

Gog clapped his hands. “I know what you’re going to say!”

“What, sonny?” asked the young man in genuine gravity.

"What, you little demon?" asked the young woman with equal seriousness.

"You're going to say that the emperor will come and save Mummy and my dad, and cut off Colgrim's head and make the druid throw his arrows in the lake!"

The young Pen Beirdd looked at Zora. "I was going to say something like that, something that amounts to the same thing. I was going to say what I know for certain." He was so grave now that the little Gog opened his eyes till they grew round again and his mouth till its corners dribbled.

"I was going to prophesy that Myrddin Wyllt will astonish us all tomorrow!"

At this he made so low a bow to the doctor's young wife that though she could discuss intelligently with any Greek sailor every wind and current in the Mediterranean, she hadn't the remotest notion whether he was impressed by her or whether he was mocking her.

"Well! I leave you in possession, Lady!" he said lightly as he went out. "And I'll tell the doctor where to find you. He won't be missing much. Our Brythonic poetry is no more like the Psalms of David than it's like Homer; and I've quite a long poem to recite to them and discuss with them tonight, for it's my time for entertaining them, you understand, after their supper. They sleep the better for it. And if they sleep while it's going on I don't mind. I get new ideas from hearing my own voice, and I'm never annoyed at anybody's going to sleep. Going to sleep is one of the things we all enjoy best in the world — like Neb's 'outrage.'

"For myself I like it more than any possible 'outrage.' But I'm old-fashioned in these things. I'm old-fashioned in everything except writing poetry for future generations; and sometimes even then! One thing I'm fond of doing which I expect you'll think a very funny thing, Lady. I like shouting the poems I invent into those deep cracks you see in rocks and into those holes you see in hollow trees.

"Only the other day a woman told me that if she ever came to love a man she would work such a spell on him as to keep him shut up, as the Witches of Caerloyw kept Mabon ap Modron, where she could always go to him, but he couldn't get out, and no one else could ever find him.

"Well! What I like doing, pretty Lady, with my verses is the opposite of that. I like freeing people from love. Instead of keeping them shut up for thousands and thousands of years, I tell them to rush out when the winds blow free, especially my favourite wind, the northeast wind, and to fill all they meet, with the magic of liberation!

"Well! Good night, sweet Lady, and maybe goodbye! I caught a glimpse of Myrddin Wyllt just now, and I can tell from the look of that man's body, and the way it jerked and heaved and swayed and shivered as he greeted Cynan ap Clydno, we may find tomorrow what we least expect! I tell you, when that man looks-like that anything may happen. I'll be sending the doctor in a few minutes. Take care of Mummy, Gog!"

If the Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein had assumed too great a liberty in calling the young wife of Lot-el-Azziz "pretty lady," it cannot be denied that with the putting off of his pigskin apron and the putting on of his poetic mantle Taliesin did more than drop the scullery for the court; he became a courtier, and a courtier of a perfection that only Gallic and Brythonic poets can ever reach.

Thus it was not long before Lot-el-Azziz, with the amiable consent of his host, a gratified smile from the Greek captain, a significant nod from the counsellor, and an anxious wish from the Henog that they might soon meet again, had been ushered out; nor was it long before the whole atmosphere of the supper table had been changed for the better.

Whether as chieftain and bard or as master and servant, both Cynan and Taliesin were so impetuous and extravagant, that when in addition to Owain ab Uryen and the merchant-captain from Athens who had been especially invited Myrddin Wyllt appeared with the Henog and the doctor, so that there were few scraps of food left when the meal was over and the drinking began, neither of the two congratulated himself on things falling out so evenly and luckily. In one quite unexpected way the presence of the emperor's counsellor at Cynan's board that night was a stroke of luck; for when after the doctor's departure Taliesin began his performance — and performance it was, although it was constantly being interrupted by puzzled interrogations, startled criticisms, subtle interpretations, and eloquent justifications — the five men who were listening to him in that black-and-silver tent were disturbed by such an excited inrush of a breathless personage from the Gaer that it needed Myrddin Wyllt's calm to balance their various reactions.

When the man first appeared — and he was none other than Owain Pen Uchel, the owner of the dapple-grey mare upon whom that very afternoon the emperor himself had bestowed the name of Valkyrie — he was so breathless and agitated and began talking so wildly that all of them save Myrddin Wyllt leapt to their feet.

Taliesin, however, with his long sharp nose, his pointed satyrlike ears, his retreating chin reduced to negligible and unnoticeable appendages by the dangerous gleam in his blue eyes, sank down on the arm of the chair vacated by the Greek and scowled at the agitated horse breeder from Deganwy.

All the old insults and humiliations, all the old savageries and mockeries and rebuffs, all the old desperate rivalries, all the old miserable struggles for bardic supremacy swept over him in a sudden dark wave at the sight of Owain Pen Uchel.

Valkyrie’s trainer was, however, too obsessed by what he had to announce to do more than recognize the rebel runaway from the elder branch of the House of Cunedda, but in this case recognition was enough; for like some deliberately discordant note in the young man’s daring modern poetry the mere presence of the scullion-bard’s singular physiognomy in the midst of this company, though neither fully realized nor entirely unexpected, brought an obscure reminder of ancient feuds, follies, and furies that tended to increase rather than diminish the turbulence of the man’s feelings.

Spluttering and gasping and talking so fast as hardly to be coherent, Owain Pen Uchel’s gaze wandered in vain from one face to another of the men before him, searching for the sort of sympathy of which he felt in such desperate need.

With senses quickened by this need — which indeed was one that asked for moral support rather than anything else — he looked at the warm glowing dusky face of his namesake Owain, whose upper lip, young as he was, showed the beginning of that dark, heavy, drooping moustache that the heroic defenders of yr Echwydd were to know so well as the years went on. He looked at the pale, white, proud face of Cynan ap Clydno, with its large, placid, violet-coloured eyes, and its small, carefully trimmed, glossy black, pointed beard.

He looked at the clean-shaven, weather-beaten, inscrutable face of Dion Dionides, from whose inhumanly pale eyes — eyes that seemed from long staring into the four winds to have been drained of every tinge of colour — few men and fewer women would have sought comfort. At all these faces did the breathless and agitated trainer of horses throw a pathetically appealing glance, while he stammered out his disturbing news; but it was to his namesake, the son of Uryen, that he instinctively drew near.

"What are you saying?" cried the master of the tent. "Calm yourself, for God's sake. Gather your wits together, man! Where's Taliesin? Oh, there you are! If you love me, sonny, give this fellow a cup of mead. None, do you say? None of it left? Well, a cup of wine then, and quickly too, for Jesus' sake! What does he say, Owain ab Uryen? Have we got to spend the night in the saddle? That's what you have been hoping for, for weeks! Has he come here against the prince's orders? Make him swallow down that stuff, Taliesin, for Jesus' sake! Make him whisper his trouble to you or to Owain ab Uryen, if he doesn't want to blurt it out to us all!"

But Taliesin had already left the son of Uryen to deal with the man alone and was back at his master's side.

"It's about that envoy from Colgrim," he told Cynan. "He's killed him or imprisoned him or something; and this man's sure that to treat an envoy like that will bring ruin on us all. Listen, my Lord — you can hear what they're saying. Owain ab Uryen's arguing with him now. He's telling him that though the princesses and the druid may have made the man a protected, pledged, and privileged person, this didn't affect the Prince of Edeyrnion. Nor does it affect him — nor us either! Colgrim should have sent his envoy to us here if he wanted to talk of terms. He wanted treachery, Cynan ap Clydno, that's what he wanted; and as far as I can see that's what he's found! If all these rumours aren't lies, and I don't see how they can be, we" — he glanced quickly round; Myrddin Wyllt had stretched himself out backwards in his chair with his hand over his eyes and seemed oblivious to everything— "we're not going to have a very comfortable time of it tomorrow, Cynan ap Clydno! It looks as if you were right in taking it seriously, and I was wrong in swearing it would all die down to nothing.

We're all foreigners to Edeyrnion and its ways, and that's the truth! You see how this fool of a horse breeder is rattled. Shocked in his conscience — Holy Jesus! — is what he is, in his conscience and his sense of order and decency and civilization! Don't let him see I'm talking about him" — here the Pen Beirdd lowered his voice to a whisper— "but for God's sake look at him now! He's begging Owain ab Uryen to take him into his service, and why? Simply because the Prince of Edeyrnion has had Colgrim's envoy killed or clapped into gaol. That's what they don't do to ambassadors in Deganwy; and therefore it makes this sturdy rogue feel as if all human decency were crashing down, and the devil have him if he didn't bolt from Mynydd-y-Gaer!

"Don't turn your head, my Lord, or let them see you're looking at them. There! Dion Dionides is weary of it and is sitting down by the Henog. Good God! I believe Owain ab Uryen — angels guard his sweet soul — is going to agree and take him on! Well! Owain's in need of a good horse. He's never had a good horse — I know that. So perhaps it's not only mercy and kindness!

"But about tomorrow, my dear Lord — I tell you we're all foreigners to the people here. They're the most primeval and prehistoric set of people in all this land! I don't know them; and in Caer Einion, where I was born only just across these mountains, all these orgies and crazy rituals, all these marriage mummeries and maidenhead mummeries, all this business of making the corn seed grow by pouring out human seed, would appear pure savagery and monstrous heathenism!"

He had lowered his voice by this time to such a conspiring whisper that out of Cynan ap Clydno's white, plump visage his imperturbable violet eyes contemplated his bard with a sort of quizzical enjoyment, as if the young man’s nervous apprehensions and excited qualms were more amusing than any possible event that could occur to justify them.

“Sit down here with me for a second, sonny,” Cynan said. “Your scullion activities can very well wait till midnight. None of us will sleep much tonight anyway, I expect; and I want to ask you something, for you’re as discerning as a woman in certain things. Have you gathered from the counsellor’s words and silences since you’ve been with us that he’s worried or not worried, by the nearness of Colgrim?”

Relapsing eagerly into the place indicated, Taliesin promptly plunged into an elaborate and complicated interpretation of the one single sentence uttered by Myrddin Wyllt which he had been in time to hear.

“You can ask me anything you please,” he had caught the counsellor saying, “and I’m never too proud to risk a prediction, but when you’re begetting a child it is not of him you’re thinking; and, when he’s born, ugly and formless are his features.”

Largely due to the mead being exhausted and his having been given wine, a drink to which he was totally unused, but also due to Owain ab Uryen’s impulsive kindness and his interest in a breeder and trainer of horses, it was not long before Owain Pen Uchel, too drunk to know anything but that he had appealed to the right person and was in great good luck, had been carried off by his namesake, the son of Uryen of Rheged, to the young adventurer’s own tent.

Meanwhile seated in full view of the abstracted Myrddin Wyllt, who had now removed his hand from his eyes and was gazing up at certain wisps of torch smoke and wood smoke that were waving and undulating in a sort of mystic dance under the incitement of a flicker of moonlight, the Henog of Dyfed, who alone among Cynan’s guests retained, unaffected by mead or wine, the normal activity of his mind, was increasing his vast treasure of memorable events by interrogating a new source of historic information. This was none other than Dion Dionides; and if the counsellor was too absorbed in his own thoughts to observe this quaint encounter, Cynan and his Pen Beirdd smiled at each other more than once as they noted its quaint growth in intensity and intimacy.

The much-enduring wily Greek trader, owner as well as captain of the Athenian ship Calypso, now in dock in London, was feeling the usual effect upon him of drinking wine on the top of mead, and his brain was growing abnormally alert while his body experienced an extreme unwillingness to make the smallest move.

The implication behind the looks exchanged between Cynan and Taliesin was that here was a perfect case of guileless curiosity, eliciting extravagant inventions and cynical lies; but this was a totally mistaken summary of the situation, and the questioning was by no means confined to one side.

“What I can’t understand in this extraordinary country of yours—” the Greek was saying, when the Henog cut him short. “Don’t call it my country, Dion Dionides! You forget what I’ve been telling you about Gwri Walk Euryn, otherwise Pryderi. He was a real god of our people, kind and humane like your Prometheus, but he came from Dyfed, and these northern druids and magicians killed him.”

“But surely, Lord Henog, with Colgrim’s Saeson marching fast upon the place all the Edeyrnion tribes ought to join up against him.”

“You don’t understand, Dion Dionides, how we aboriginals regard these Romanized Brythons who at present rule us and of whom” — he glanced at the broad low forehead and inhumanly green eyes of the abstracted counsellor, but they were still fixed on the undulating smoke— “of whom the emperor is the only real military brain. I’m a chronicler, not a prophet. I study the past and in it seek the causes of the present and the possibilities of the future. My interest in him" — and he made a slight motion of his head towards Myrddin Wyllt— "is in the events of his life, not in his predictions. And what I am continually finding in the past are dramatic moments just like tonight, with some Gwyddyl invasion, some Brython invasion, some Roman invasion, interrupting, as Colgrim's Saeson are doing now, some old religious orgy, earth worship, magic fertilizing of the ploughed-up fields."

The Greek's pale eyes wandered from the long stringy neck before him to the chronicler's fanatical visage, which made him think of the preposterous faces — grave and intent in their grotesque peering — that used to be carved on phallic poles in his boyhood and carried through the by-streets of the Piraeus; poles that were denounced by the respectable, cursed by the priests, winked at by the authorities, and mystically interpreted by the few remaining successors of Plato.

"But, my dear Lord, do for Christ's sake consider the situation we're in tonight in this crazy and barbarous corner of your precious island. Here we are, with our horses and lances and luxurious tents, absolutely surrounded, so everybody assures me, though, mind you, I've not myself seen a single one of these gentry, by thousands of sharpshooters with poisoned arrows, all under the authority of people who are in league with Colgrim just as Gortheyrn was in league with Hengyst.

"What do you yourself really think of this Prince Einion whose Hercules of a son is to sail with me to Constantinople? You're his guest, I understand, and have been quite a long time at the Gaer, so you must have observed him pretty closely. Besides, you must be a great discerner of spirits, Lord Henog, or the emperor would never have entrusted you with the Life of our friend over there."

He nodded towards the abstracted figure in front of them, but the soul of Myrddin Wyllt was still undulating with the undulating smoke in the roof of the tent; so that, though there was one particular torch which gave the prophet's green eyes something of the same luminosity that night by night in the cabin of the Calypso emanated from the emeralds in the lion-headed image of Cronos before Dion extinguished his swaying lantern, neither the historian nor the voyager felt that their words were heard, their thoughts caught, or even their presence recognized.

"You don't suppose, do you — mind you, I don't suggest it, but these Edeyrnion forests, this Gaer, these mountains, this river that catches the sun and the moon like a torrent of giants' shields, strike a sailor's mind as a world where the subtlest, wildest, and most motiveless treacheries and betrayals could occur! — that the prince is himself in league with Colgrim and ready to yield up the Gaer to him the moment his yellow-haired plunderers reach its foot?

"Have you seen enough of the man during your visit, my dear Lord Henog, to assure me that such a thing is out of the question? He must anyway have given permission to these forest people to hold their old orgiastic seminal earth-feast while we were here, and pregnant as it is with causes of violence between us!

"And what in the devil's name is the meaning of this marriage of which we hear so much? I've brought a handsomely copied script, by the way, of all the Eleven Comedies of Aristophanes as a present from my uncle Damascius, from whose work on 'The Beginning of Things' showing that both the origin of the world and its inner truth are entirely unknowable he has already received several chapters, to this bride's father, Brochvael ab Iddawc; but, 'by the two goddesses!' as the women in Aristophanes are forever swearing, we may be all in Hades by this time tomorrow, and some yellow-haired Sais or druid's drab may be lighting fires with the Lysistrata!"

Watching closely what he could make out in the flickering torchlight of the Henog’s expression, the crafty captain was aware of an unpleasant jar to his own deepest self-esteem.

If there was anything upon which he prided himself beyond his cleverly calculated moves in the great chess game of worldly success, it was his light touch in intellectual matters. In this subtle sphere he regarded himself as no mean conversationalist, and where he felt himself to be especially effective was in the casually dropped literary allusion.

No fifth cousin of a Roman emperor, even if this latter had been master of the legions for no more than a month, could have made a more artful use of such an imperial connection than Dion Dionides did of his academic uncle. He had in reality read nothing of the great ribald pacifist save a few passages like that of the seduction of the Scythian official by Euripides’ dancing girl at the end of the Thesmophoriazusae; but it caused him a real twinge in his self-lover’s most touchy nerve to note how little his reference to the Lysistrata or to his relative’s proof of the necessity of agnosticism impressed the biographer of Myrddin Wyllt.

It was under the pressure of this hurt nerve that the Greek became more reckless as to what he said to this insensitive old pedant, and after a quick glance to make sure the green eyes under the low forehead were still staring in lost abstraction at the smoke spirals in the canvas roof, he asked the historian point blank a crucial question that had really been bothering him for the last twelve hours. Did he think, from his knowledge of this weird place, that there was any danger for “our women,” danger for the Jewish doctor’s wife, for instance, or for the counsellor’s sister? He threw all the airy casualness he could assume into these words, but his thoughts behind them were of a drastic and formidable intensity.

He knew well that the counsellor's sister held a somewhat equivocal position at Arthur's court; but it had more than once crossed his long-sighted and far-calculating intelligence that for that very reason this beautiful and lonely woman — for the Athenian hadn't missed what he regarded as the fatal power over her possessed by her handmaid Nineue — might be in her hidden mind as calmly and desperately ambitious as he was himself.

His voyages had not been for love of the sea or for love of travel. They had been for the piling up of drachmas as a preliminary preparation for the sort of political career open to all rich men, but especially open to unscrupulous rich men in the present conditions of the imperial household at Constantinople.

During the last three or four days he hadn't hesitated to divest himself of almost all the rare and precious wines, sweetmeats, and delicacies which he had brought with him to this barbarous place with a view to propitiating this desirable woman to whom he felt sure Constantinople would open her secretest chambers. He had not failed to mark the lady's interest in Rhun ap Gwrnach; but he had an inkling that if it came to offers of marriage a rich merchant with connections all over the Eastern Empire had nothing to dread from an officer of the Gosgordd of Mynydd-y-Gaer, or a mere miles of the god Mithras!

What bothered him just now was tomorrow's accurst sex orgy. He didn't know — and he gave credit to none of the popular rumours or tales or legends that he heard on the subject from all sides — how far these barbarians were likely to go in their mad parodies of the Hellenic Mysteries, nor what might happen to a woman as beautiful as that green-eyed magician's sister if the revellers got out of hand. But he had never felt as sure as he felt tonight that with her by his side he could go as far as the daimon in him incited him to go; and that might be very far indeed!

He decided that from this moment he would give up all attempts to analyze the various elements in his resolve to get hold of this woman and to link their destiny forever. He had seen enough of her to know that she lived — just as he did — in secret purposes of her own, and he suspected, as was the case with himself, that these purposes were practical and external rather than emotional or sensual.

Heavens! How long this Henog took answering his simple question about the danger to their women! He turned his sea-mist eyes from the Henog to the prophet, and from the prophet to the Henog. What extraordinary people these natives of this mad Ultima Thule were!

Then he shifted his glance to the more distant forms of his young host and the still younger bard. These two were now bending their heads close to each other and trying to hide their laughter, just as a couple of young women might have done.

While Dion Dionides thus awaited his answer, the Henog was pondering hard and long on the most suitable words wherewith to respond to this ticklish question about the "danger" that tomorrow's mystery orgy might bring to their women.

The Henog found it not only a delicate question but a question about which by reason of something in his own temperament he disliked being forced to think. So distasteful to him personally was all intercourse with the opposite sex that for a women to be forcibly ravished was no more painful to him than for her to be possessed by a man under the most normal circumstances. The thought of any kind of contact between the two had in fact under certain conditions the power of making him feel physically sick.

“You will pardon me, Master Dion,” he said, “if I answer the questions that seem most upon your mind tonight in the reverse order, and if I answer as an historian. And first as to Prince Einion. You saw the shock that man from the Gaer had received — and I’m sure you’ll agree he wasn’t pretending — from the slaying or even from the imprisoning of an official ambassador. Well, if the prince were, as you suggested just now, secretly on the side of Colgrim, he could never have done that. And in the same way with what you fear for our women.

“Neither the natural desire to drive imperial horsemen out of Edeyrnion — and to these people, you must remember, Dyfed and Gwent are places of menacing remoteness — nor the orgiastic spirit of the Feast could ever be strong enough to destroy the traditional bar that protects, in our island, women of these ladies’ rank.

“But apart altogether from these trifles, I want you to realize, Master Dion, exactly what I mean when I say ‘as an historian’. You may think I mean a careful sifting of fact from fable. I mean nothing of the kind! A true historian records fact and fable with philosophic indiscrimination. Who is he to decide between them? He leaves posterity to do that. Besides, he knows well that there are plenty of fables that in reality are far more” — here the Henog paused and frowned, pondering on the appropriate word; he even went so far as to begin a quaint fumbling movement of his hand towards the writing tablet at his belt but he caught himself up— “far more revealing of Nature’s secrets than many verified facts and unquestionable events.”

“I understand you completely, Lord Henog. Your method was the rule with Herodotus and in a large measure with Thucydides and Plutarch; and what I would like to have your opinion upon now as an historian is a very crucial point and one which, since few of us, I fancy, will get any sleep tonight, it may be worth discussing at large before we separate. The point is this: will the priest of Mynydd-y-Gaer and — what's the name of his new church here? — of Cor-weyn, take our side, I mean the imperial side, tomorrow, or the side of these Edeyrnion rebels?"

For the first time that evening, indeed for the first time that day, the Henog of Dyfed laughed aloud.

"Are your Greek ecclesiastics so different from our Roman and Brython ones that you don't know the answer to that? Of course the priest will side with the emperor, even though" — and he glanced at the motionless figure with its eyes still fixed on the dissolving smoke— "the emperor had a thousand devils at his command."

It was the Greek's turn to be amused, but his pale eyes only grew a shade paler still.

"Do you know, Master Historian," he said, "I think your — how shall I put it? — your professional prejudice runs away with you there. I had a word tonight with that red-headed young fool, Galahaut of Surluse, who had just heard, through Peredur ab Evrawc, who's our captain now, and who'd just heard from him" — and Dion nodded towards the abstracted prophet— "that the priest and the druid were in full accord. I'm not sure he didn't say that the priest had baptized the druid; but it may have been the other way round!

"Anyway, there are cases in history of God and the devil signing a pact against Caesar! I confess I agree with my relative, Damascius, in a striking new book of his, that there's nothing for any thinking man to be in these modern days but a complete agnostic. All the same, do let me ask you this, Lord Henog, quite apart from which side tomorrow morning the Church will take — and by the gods I wish it were now tomorrow evening, and you and I with whole skins and not too remorseful consciences discussing the complete overthrow of all the emperor’s enemies! — how long do you give this last and craziest of human religions to endure on the surface of the earth?”

“Do you mean the religion of Christ?”

“Of course, what else?”

“Do you ask me as an historian?”

“I ask you as an historian.”

“Well then, I will answer in round numbers, Master — about two thousand years.”

The Greek trader made a half-humorous gesture of despair. “As long as that?” he groaned. “And are we destined, my dear. Lord Henog, for two thousand more years to endure nights like this; nights with dawns hanging over us full of poisoned arrows, and the shrieks of raped women, and the howls of barbarians, and the burning of our houses and histories, our tragedies and our comedies, over our heads?”

But before the Henog, whether he decided to speak as a chronicler or as a Christian, could reply to this there came a vibration on the air, which, though as irrelevant and inconsequent as the counsellor’s random wisps of oil smoke and wood smoke, produced a much more startling effect.

This was the baying, just outside the tent, of some large deep-throated dog. In a second the whole pattern of things within that expanse of silver-and-black canvas changed its shape.

The staring green eyes of the emperor’s counsellor relaxed into normal alertness, while the man himself, rising unsteadily from his seat, tightened the tassels about his waist, shook out the creases of his black robe, straightened his heavy shoulders, and looked anxiously about him.

With equal suddenness Cynan and Taliesin ceased their whispering and began moving one after the other, down the side of the long table towards their chief guest. This latter movement was from necessity as well as from strategic politeness a somewhat slow one; for they had to project themselves sideways between the backs of the chairs and the sloping canvas of the tent.

"That dog howls as if it were lost!" thought the sea captain; and then as he watched the two young men squeezing themselves behind the elaborately carved backs of those princely chairs he told himself that Clydno must have left his son a fine hoard of gold pieces. "Good craftsmen in chairs," he thought, "are rarer in these disturbed times than good silversmiths or saddlers."

Thus by the time the equable-tempered son of the sagacious Clydno, followed by the Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein, had reached the tent's entrance, the chronicler from Dyfed, the trader from Athens, and the now fully aroused "crooked counsellor," who alone knew the measure of his difference from other counsellors, were already gathering about them their mantles and their weapons, preparatory to their return to their own quarters.

It was, however, to all the five men, Cynan and Taliesin having come forth into the night, not only to bid their visitors farewell but to discover what hound it was who had so deep-chested a voice, that Rhun ap Gwrnach, in a state of considerable irritation and holding Drudwyn by his own belt in place of a leash, told how the dog had sought him out, but instead of being at peace now that he'd found him was still restless and had insisted in dragging him about the camp in search of somebody else.

It was the youngest of the five who turned at once to Myrddin Wyllt, as the one who would know, since an animal was concerned.

"Take him to Owain ab Uryen," said the counsellor. "He's looking for a man from Deganwy who breeds horses. It's a horse the dog wants."

CHAPTER XX. The House of Stone

WHETHER DUE TO THE CHANGE in the wind, that blowing all night from the south as if it were following the tide of Dyfrdwy, the Divine River, had brought down from the ridges and precipices of Cader Idris the same curious straw-coloured mist that Porius had watched from the gate tower of the Gaer, or whether due to the tension of the feelings by which her heart was torn and his mind was troubled, neither Morfydd nor her father, at the close of their last day together, found themselves, when midnight caught them still seated opposite each other over Brochvael's fire, inclined to be first to bid the other good night.

During one of his visits to Rome in search of books, Brochvael had been presented by a certain rich and clever young aristocrat he met there called Boethius, then a lad still in his teens, with a carefully constructed water clock, put together by the boy himself and designed to work with greater precision than the commoner kind recently introduced at various European courts. It was to this clock that Brochvael felt at last impelled to direct his daughter's attention.

"You'll be as white tomorrow as sea foam, sweetheart," he said, "if you don't get some rest. The princesses, if not Einion himself, will be calling for us by six. Maybe they'll both come with all their followers, and we'll have a fight to the death at Ty Cerrig between our Gosgordd and the Derwydd's archers before any Fisher King's cry is raised, or any lance is ready for the plunge!

"A nice Feast of Seed scattering it'll be when all the strong men lie dead in their blood, and only maids like you and old dotards like me are left alive! Don’t ‘ee smile so sadly, honey. That’s the way your mother used to smile when I talked politics! All may yet be well. The old Gaer and the House of Cunedda have survived worse moments than this.”

Morfydd loosened her hair as naturally and unconcernedly as if she’d been with her nurse rather than her father. Then she stretched out both her thin bare arms above her head with what was at once an exhausted animal’s half-yawn and a proud sophisticated woman’s hopeless sigh. Then she let her arms sink down on Ovid’s Metamorphoses, a book that almost covered the small wooden table, and leant forward with a puckered forehead and twitching mouth.

“Canna says Gwrgi says,” she brought out bitterly, “that Colgrim and his Saeson will be here by dawn, and that the forest people will all go over to them, and that together they’ll massacre us all, men, women, and children — and I hope they will!”

Brochvael lifted his arm when he heard that and gently stroked with his long lean fingers the girl’s tightly twisted knuckles resting on the beautifully copied text of the myth-loving poet.

The light from a single small torch in a silver sconce above her father’s head fell upon the girl’s face, and Brochvael was shocked at the violence of the feeling he saw in it.

He drew back his hand from the unnoticed and rejected caress and straightened his shoulders.

“Morfydd!” he began very seriously.

“Oh, what’s the use of talking, Father?”

“I’m not talking,” he countered gently. “I’m making a suggestion, and I must ask my girl to give what I say her fullest attention.”

The faintest flicker of interest — the first he had seen in her all that long evening — wavered across Morfydd’s face.

“Well, Father dear,” she whispered. “I’m ready to consider anything; even if you’re going to explain to me what will be the quickest and easiest way for a couple of good Romanized Brythons to commit suicide rather than fall into the hands of barbarians.”

Her tone was so hopeless and so reckless that Brochvael spoke rapidly as well as gravely.

“I don’t know whether you know it, child,” he said, “but I’ve got quite a good sum of Roman money hidden away — and it’s gold that could carry us anywhere — and if tomorrow’s marriage is as hateful to you as I think it must be from your mood tonight, why don’t we carry off Canna, or even Gwrgi and Canna, and take refuge in Arverne with my friend Sidonius? I don’t believe Einion would be greatly upset or would feel we were deserting him. You know better than I do what Porius would feel; but I confess I don’t see him breaking his heart.”

Before he’d reached the words “better than I do,” the girl on the other side of that rich Ovidian scroll covered her face with her hands.

Did she do this to conceal an emotion — and what sort of emotion? — that she felt it imperative he shouldn’t see? Or did she do it to make it easier for her to think quickly, clearly, desperately, decisively? Brochvael had not the faintest inkling of a clue. So he did the best he could. He had had enough of long hopeless silences that night; and even if his words were indiscreet, if they were intrusive, insensitive, ill-advised, if they were such as to make her seriously angry with him, he felt impelled to risk it.

“You see, child,” he continued, addressing the delicately outlined knuckles of those uplifted hands and the strip of white forehead above the tips of her fingers and the glossy tints, deepened by the flickerings of the firelight, in the filmy brown hair that now hung loose on her shoulders and even fell, lustrous and warm, on the illuminated text of the amorous poet.

"You see, child, things have changed a good deal in these last twelve hours; and the grand advantage to us all of you and Porius getting quickly married isn't any longer what you might call the 'queen's move' in our chess game. I almost feel, child, as if you couldn't have been listening to all that Einion told us when he was here just now! Didn't you hear how he'd chained Colgrim's ambassador to the wall, and how Auntie Esyllt's whole household had deserted her, some to the forest, some to the Gaer, but most of them, wily devils that they are, to Saint Julian's Fount? Didn't you take it in that Auntie Tonwen and her old mystery man of the Avanc's Cave have ridden off to meet the emperor?"

At the mention of the youngest princess, for whom Morfydd had always felt an unrevealed, unformulated attraction, she removed her hands from her face; but it was on the fire, not on him, that she fixed her gaze.

"Didn't you hear," he continued, "what he said about Colgrim having already got to Saint Tysilio's? But of course your first feeling, like mine, was a grievance against the emperor! Well! Anyway, that's what happens to people like us when we meddle in politics. Old Einion was much wiser. He just waited on events. Besides, he understands the forest people better than we do.

"And I warrant he knows the Gwyddyl-Ffichti better than you do, though your mother was half of one herself! It gave me a shock at first when he said all that about what he'd done to this wretch Gunhorst. But your grandfather Iddawc would probably have killed the fellow. Cunedda certainly would! When I caught that glimpse of him myself I thought him more like a spy than an ambassador. Well, never mind that! What I'm saying is that everything's changed since you and Euronwy and the old man packed me off to tell Porius that your marriage must be tomorrow!

"As things look now it's a case of fighting for our lives, all of us — forest people and Brythons and Gwyddyl-Ffichti, Gaer men and emperor men — for our lives, I tell you, against these Saeson! We've heard about these people, you remember, from Sidonius. In one letter he said that for savage fighting they've no rivals this side of the Bosporus. I fancy this must be the first time the emperor's been fairly outwitted in military strategy. He thought Colgrim was marching day and night to meet his brother at Badon, when all the while the man was debouching with still greater speed to conquer Edeyrnion, Deganwy, and Mona!

"But that's not at all what I wanted to say to my only child before Boethius's water clock tells us that the first hour of Sunday the twenty-first of October is drowned in oblivion. Your old dad may be a fool at understanding women — especially a clever girl like you — but he'd be an absolute idiot not to see that this marriage with Porius is doing worse than upsetting you. It's driving you crazy. I've never seen you like this before! I don't believe you realize how completely you're giving yourself away. At least you are to me, who've watched you from your infancy. Come now, look at me, Morfydd. That's the girl!

"You'd much better confide in me completely. Morvran never did, I know. It's the custom these days for children to keep their own counsel. You'd think it hopelessly old-fashioned to ask my advice where your heart's concerned. I doubt if you'd ask your mother's, if she were with us today! But I'm not blind. And, as things are now, I swear I could give you very excellent advice.

"This whole business, my dear, of your betrothal to Porius was a mistake. I see it clearly now! I was led away by Euronwy; and so, apparently, have you been — and Porius himself, I dare say! It's Euronwy's idea — well! it's the old Roman idea and our Brythonic one too — that the power and peace of tribes and nations are cemented by marriages. Looking at you now and thinking of the damage done to Ynys Prydein by Ronwen ferch Hengyst, I'm prepared to say: 'Let it all go! Break it off! Tell Porius you've changed your mind.' And, as I say, if you shrink from Euronwy's anger and want to avoid Porius and make him forget you, I'm quite ready to be cursed by everyone as a coward — old Einion and the Modrybedd would know better; at least Erddud would, though I'm not so sure about Esyllt! — and carry you off this very day to Dover and across Gaul to Sidonius!

"You're all I've got in the world, my dear, and I'd willingly sell my reputation for heroism and patriotism and all the rest to see you happy again and as you were in the old days. Who can tell what destiny may be waiting for you over there; and as you know — as you've seen — I'm not one to be a drag on you in my old age."

But the tears that were in his eyes as he concluded this speech, and leaning forward stretched out one of his hands towards her, were dried suddenly and unexpectedly. Her hands had been dropped side by side like a couple of dead poplar leaves upon the illuminated volume that lay open before her, and such was the erratic nature of Brochvael's mind that even after she had given him the look that made him draw back, he couldn't help wondering what particular passage those hands were concealing.

He wondered too, in a lapse of time far too rapid for its passing to be registered by his Boethian water clock, what drastic "metamorphosis" was affecting a small ivory-coloured moth that, resisting the temptation to flutter round the torch flame above their heads, was now nervously and tentatively crossing a beautifully tinted capital letter at the beginning of a fresh imaginative flight by the amorous poet.

But the look that so abruptly cut short Brochvael's emotional gesture was only the first out-jetting from a dammed-up weir of accumulated repressions and seething miseries of revolt. The girl followed it by rising to her feet, and with clenched hands held taut to her sides and the lines on her forehead forming so deep and dark an angle that it added years to her age, she pierced him with a flash of such furious contempt that his whole identity drew back into itself and underwent a process not unlike that peculiar curling up which can be observed in thin shavings of dry wood when left near an oven, or in the curving tails of certain dead fish when the pan containing them reaches a particular and special degree of heat.

"What do you think I am?" she cried. "If you hadn't let them murder Morvran, at least I'd have one person now who understood! You've left me to these plotting and scheming women — oh, yes! you can make a pet of me sweetly enough when it suits your pleasure and when you need somebody to read your precious books with you; but when it comes to the heart — yes! my Lord and Master, there is such a thing in women as the heart! — you turn me over, you always have turned me over, to your darling and loving Auntie Erddud, whose mad passion for you everybody who knows her must see; and then, when Auntie Erddud joins up with Auntie Esyllt and her Derwydd, and plots against us all, you leave me to Euronwy, who for her dear Porius's sake would willingly see me raped by the whole Gosgordd!" She stopped for breath, swaying a little from side to side, her grey eyes grown so dark as to be almost pitch-black, her arms held straight and stiff against her body, the fingers clenched tight, while her wrath and pride seemed to drain from the very air all peace, all quiet, all acceptance.

While this storm went on, lashing the core of his cowering identity as if with a rain of the Derwydd's poisoned arrows, two small streams of saliva trickled down Brochvael's chin, one from the left side of his open lips and one from the right. The physical cause of this phenomenon was, of course, that since his gums contained no teeth it was harder for him than for most people not to dribble when his mouth was open and he was thunderstruck by something. But the shock that reduced him to this humiliating state was the sense of bewildered shame and paralyzing remorse into which her indictment flung him.

He was so confounded by this completely unexpected view of things, thus revealed to him as if by a flash of lightning, that for the moment he could do nothing but accept it as the horrid reality which his self-centred egoism and thick-skinned obtuseness had till that moment concealed from him.

"What do you think I am?" she burst out, the tide of her self-pity catching her up again and lifting her from her feet in its shoreward surge. "What I vowed in that chapel when the prince found me with Euronwy I'm not going to throw away because of the first hurt, or trap, or ambush, or madness, or misery, or pit of despair, into which its performance leads!

"Do you think I'm going to run away to Gaul with you like a sweet, pure, timid, shrinking virgin, whose heart flutters so at the words 'marriage bed' that she doesn't know whether she loves enough, or he loves enough, or anyone loves enough, to justify such things? Do you realize that I swore an oath in that chapel that no one has dared to swear for hundreds, maybe thousands, of years? Did you think I was a good, faithful, devoted daughter of the House of Cunedda, and that was all?

"They always called Mother the 'Gwyddyles,' and you let them call her that! What would they have thought if they'd known what Mother whispered in my ears the night Morvran was born — that she was a Gwyddyl-Ffichti? Yes, you may well look like that! You didn't realize, did you, that you'd got a daughter of the oldest race in Ynys Prydein, except the Cewri? One of those too, who when they served the Cewri, it was the Cewri that were afraid of them, not the other way round!

"You didn't realize, did you — though you may find it out before long! — that your 'Gwyddyles' was of the same race as Nineue, the famous whore who everybody says will one day put such a tynged on Myrddin Wyllt that he'll vanish from all men's sight but hers and be never seen again!

"Did you think — does Euronwy think — that the heart of a woman can be turned into a blood covenant, into a life-and-death contract, between two nations, and nothing happen to it? I tell you, the Morfydd you want to carry off so romantically, so easily, to a new life in Gaul is already dead — yes! dead as your other Gwyddyl-Ffichti child! Call to her to take ship with you and there'll be no answer! Tell her about all those gold coins of old Rome you've got hidden away — and there'll be no answer! Dead in her coffin is that girl with her maiden strewments of tags from Virgil, and scenes from Ovid, and pious memories of a Gwyddyles mother, and tender visions of the pure heart of Auntie Erddud! Sprinkled thick like the first with these holy fictions of yours, Father, is the body of your second child; and soon, perhaps, as Porius thinks happened to Morvran, the Cewri of the Cader will come down and carry the stinking thing away to their caves!"

Again Morfydd stopped, and this time the man rose slowly to his feet. Something was flowing back now into his veins and into the most intimate fibres of his outraged nature, something that made him know beyond reason or argument that, self-centred as he may have been, some sort of an injustice was being done to him.

"You've said enough," he brought out indignantly. "You have absolutely no right — and you know you have no right — to drag Morvran into all this! No one has ever suggested before that I could have saved him. God's Mother, girl! I might as well turn on you and ask you why you didn't save him, or why he didn't save himself, and so save us all, by joining Arthur's horsemen when the emperor wrote to Mynydd-y-Gaer, asking about him!

"No, no! We all know who stirred up those people to murder your brother. I've never spoken to that man since; nor have you, but we've always taken it, I thought, as something nobody could possibly have foreseen. To bring up our great trouble against me now and say these unjust things — just because you've let yourself in for a situation that hurts your feelings in some way — I think it's unworthy of your mother's child, my girl!"

His voice had grown more assured as he heard his own words, and the initial shock produced upon him by her startling and unexpected attack having diminished, his expression reassumed its patient air of philosophic self-respect.

This was unfortunate for him. It cannot be called, since his life illusion was philosophical rather than dramatic, a gross and clumsy mistake; but it certainly was unfortunate. It roused a new tide of anger in her, which if he had remained obviously ruffled and upset might have died down.

"Unworthy of my mother's child?" she repeated, throwing such a mocking emphasis into the words that like a stone thrown at a reflection in water they completely disturbed his returning dignity. "And what an effort," she went on, "it must have cost you to be so worthy of my mother — even if she were a Gwyddyl-Ffichti — as to offer to take me to Gaul when you've asked Uncle Einion's cast-off whore — another Gwyddyl-Ffichti like my mother and me! — to come here to console you when I've gone off with Porius! Oh, you needn't begin explaining! Canna couldn't wait to tell of all the preparations you've told her to make! She'd thought, you know — silly old woman! — that Porius would let her stay with me, but evidently she's to stay here to wait on my mother's successor! What a noble effort it must have cost you to think of taking Canna and Gwrgi — for you did mention that little plan, didn't you? — with us to Gaul! Perhaps you thought—"

"Morfydd!" And he broke into her string of laboured sarcasms, that were already dragging a little, with a hurried earnestness, speaking in a whisper. "I believe I heard a crackling of sticks in the kitchen just then. Our dispute must have roused those two in there! For Christ's sake, or your mother's sake, or your own sake — I feel so confused and troubled about you I don't know what to appeal to! — let's end all this; and you go up and get some sleep. You won't have a nerve left for tomorrow, whatever tomorrow brings, if you don't get a little sleep. Besides, you remember what Einion said about coming—"

He stopped abruptly, listening, and she listened too, the tension in her nerves clearly eased a little by the necessity for caution, and together they certainly did hear the various familiar sounds that indicated the emergence of Gwrgi from behind his curtain, and his opening and shutting of the back door of Ty Cerrig as he went out to relieve himself and on his return began attending to the fire, which, in that warm chamber, was never allowed to go out completely, but was nightly kept alive under a sprinkling of ashes.

The father and daughter were unable to help exchanging the ghost of a smile as they listened to these sounds, sounds which they were accustomed to hear as they lay luxuriously half-awake in the early morning; and to each of them it was clear that the other was prepared to prolong this moment indefinitely — a moment pregnant beyond the computation of any Boethian invention — and which easily might prove, as both knew well, the last time they would stand like this alone together, bidding each other good night over the pages of a poet of the ancient world.

So long in fact did they stand motionless together, Brochvael with his gaze fixed on a small crack between two of the most discoloured stones in the old wall that separated them from the kitchen, and Morfydd contemplating her father's face with a look that was still reproachful, but into which there had now crept a trace of mocking affection if not of tender indulgence, that when with the ebbing of her furious anger and the lapsing into hopeless fatalism of his not very formidable self-respect, she half-forgetfully, half-forgivingly, bent towards him and touched his elbow with her feverish forehead, the intensity of the kiss he pressed against her small skull, though it stirred no response in the magnetism of her brown hair, enabled her to escape to her room on the floor above without turning again and at least with a partially assuaged conscience.

But it did not enable Brochvael to sleep. More than a couple of hours later, according to the un-Christian magic of the youthful senator of Rome, as soon as he knew by the murmur of their voices that Gwrgi and Canna were exchanging dark and ravishing tales of wilder mysteries — come down to them from far-off Africa — than were likely to be performed between earth and sky in Edeyrnion, he kicked off his sandals, lest, soft as they were, they should betray his anxiety to the old couple, and stole up the narrow little staircase to his daughter's room.

Yes, she was asleep. He didn't dare to cross the threshold; but since the iron-barred and iron-nailed door had never possessed any sort of hinge, and since even in autumn, when the east wind loved to shriek across the Avanc's Cave and the Giant's Cave and to wail and whistle round that small turret, it remained open, and the rather sinister entrance to her chamber was protected by nothing more solid than a thick woollen curtain, he soon learnt through her steady breathing that she was safe out of reach of the demons of hysteria, if not of anxious and repulsive dreams.

He crept down the stone stairway again and sat for yet another hour over his fire of fragrant fir logs. Gwrgi peeped in once — sent by "yonder old gwrach," he explained, "to find out if your nobleness needed aught, whether warm or cold, or liquid or solid, till morning dawn" — but Brochvael wanted nothing but to sit on by the fire, thinking, thinking, thinking. He even gathered up from the table Cassiodorus's beautifully copied Metamorphoses and laid it reverently but unfalteringly on a silk-lined shelf against the wall.

There had arrived for him, it was clear enough, a moment in his life when nothing but thought, thought analytic, thought retrospective, thought premonitory, could satisfy the demands of the situation and win back for him that self-respecting continuity of emotion upon which his daughter had laid such violent hands.

Log after log, as he sat there, did he watch go through all its various metamorphoses, of blind smoke, of tongues of flames, of crackling flame, of burning flame, of red combustion, and of black cinders, but at last he too — like his daughter behind her immovably open door at the top of the stone steps — began to breathe heavily, steadily, monotonously, unconsciously, as far as this dimension was concerned, while invisibly he threaded his way, anxious and preoccupied, among the people and things of a world as intensely real as it was grotesquely fabulous.

Suddenly he found himself sitting up erect in his goatskin chair and staring across a dying fire and beneath a flickering and guttering torch at the small dark square of the window. The window was open to the night, save for a wooden shutter of antique design and elaborate carving, between which and the wall a space of several inches had been left.

And it was with the kind of confused yet concentrated attention which differs from the startled terror of the shocks we get when we are fully awake by being at once much less surprising and a good deal more fantastic, that Brochvael was now aware of a muscular arm and bony wrist, terminating in a fumbling hand and groping fingers, that were moving to and fro along the interior surface of the wall immediately opposite him.

The conclusion he arrived at with regard to this apparition was naturally reached; namely, that an unknown person, at present outside Ty Cerrig, was desirous of getting inside, and of doing so with as little disturbance as might be to those that lived within those walls. Whether it was his unusual personal experiences as a traveller through Gaul, Italy, the Peloponnese, and the Aegean Isles, or some congenital phlegm in his disposition as a princely Brython, or simply that he had been so stripped and exposed by Morfydd that he had reached a point of reckless indifference, the plain fact is that he got up noiselessly from his chair and for the second time that evening kicked off his sandals, and advancing hurriedly to the window, cautiously drew the shutter inwards, and even before he caught a glimpse of the intruder's face, laid a warning finger on his own lips and bade him in a whisper be silent.

Ready enough to obey this command was the person — none other in fact than Brochvael's nephew Rhun — who now scrambled into the room, and laying down carefully the heavy spear he was carrying — which as a matter of fact was not his own but Porius's and indeed had been given to Porius by the prince — laying it down with exquisite care upon the only soft receptacle he could see, which was a Gallic mat of woven cords thick enough to deaden the tinkle of any weapon, proceeded to bring to the table by the fire a singular-looking object wrapped up in a piece of blanket, an object which he gravely placed in the older man's hands with a gesture that was at once respectful and impersonal.

"It's an old Greek script, Uncle," he whispered, "that Dion Dionides gave me a few hours ago to hand over to you. He said it contained eleven plays of the Athenian Aristophanes, and was sent to you by his uncle, Damascius, the Platonic philosopher. I met him by chance outside the tent of one of those luxurious young horsemen who'd been entertaining Myrddin Wyllt.

"I couldn't get my dog to settle down. He kept dragging me round the whole camp. I was fairly unsettled myself. In fact I'd given up all thought of sleep. But Myrddin Wyllt told me to go and see Owain ab Uryen. And Dion Dionides went with me to show me the way, and as we passed his own tent, he asked if I knew any reliable person who might be passing your house. He said he wanted to get his uncle's present safe and sound into your hands before the Saeson barbarians reached the Gaer.

"I told him of course it would be quite impossible on a day like this, and with all these confusions, to find anybody to take it. But I said if Drudwyn settled down quietly to sleep as Myrddin Wyllt swore he would if I took him to that tent — and I have found out that much, Uncle, about our damned magician: he can read the minds of animals as easily as you can read Greek — and I still felt as restless as I did then, I would take it myself. So he said he'd give me half an hour to see what happened, and the dog did settle down. In fact he only blinked once with one eye and only tapped once with his tail when he saw me go. So you see what Myrddin Wyllt is with animals! Whether he's the same with people I don't know, and I greatly doubt it. But here's the Greek book, Uncle, though I doubt if any of your modern scholars would call it a book. It's more like one of those old Roman scrolls that Porius ab Einion used to bring back from the Bishop's School."

"Sit you down, boy, sit you down," whispered Brochvael. "Sit you down quietly, lad, for all our sakes!" And he pushed his nephew into the goatskin chair. Then with a sensation of indescribable relief, such as only a real bookworm knows when, clambering upon a literary raft, he allows all the troubles of life to roll past him whither they will, he turned to peer lovingly and intensely at the glimpses of curved and elongated lettering that were revealed to him through the shameful rents in the travel-stained strip of linen in which Dion or his pseudo-uncle — for the learned successor of the great Marinus, who was a pupil of the still greater Proclus, had himself informed him when he was in Athens that the ambitious merchant captain was no more than the son of Damascius's second cousin — had prepared this precious scroll for its hyperborean journey among barbarians in no more effective way than by wrapping it up in a flimsy covering that smelt of Arabian spices and Syrian oils.

Brochvael did, however, postpone this most blest escape till he had impressed on this nephew in a voice so low as to be nearly inaudible that they must talk in whispers, since not only was it essential not to disturb the exhausted Morfydd, but it would be wise to conceal his arrival as long as possible from the two old people in the kitchen.

When, however, the soldier of Mithras was comfortably ensconced for the second time that night in front of a fragrant-smelling fire and had consented to swallow a mouthful of Sidonius's Gallic wine out of his host's cup, Morfydd's incorrigible parent tore aside the tattered linen that surrounded Damascius's present and began eagerly unrolling the precious script upon the table, smoothing it out where the Metamorphoses had so lately been.

"You look as if you were taking the sortes Virgilianae, uncle," whispered Rhun complacently. He had been fearing he knew not what, nor had he cared to examine the curious urge, deeper than the wish to oblige a weather-beaten merchant or to give a literary thrill to Morfydd's much-travelled progenitor, that had led him in his sleepless excitement on this night of nights to break into the House of Stone like an outlawed thief; but warm and at ease, with this sweet heady wine under his hand and his uncle thrown into a trance of fascination by what he had brought, and no decision of any kind expected of him in regard to Morfydd, he felt more at one with himself and at one with his past than he had done for days.

Myrddin's sister was the first woman who had come near to "turning his head," as they called it in the horsemen's camp, or to putting a tynged on him, as they would say at Mynydd-y-Gaer; and intoxicating though the experience had been, and still was, it had been anything but "all honey." It had come near at moments to making a complete fool of him, as on that occasion when this very uncle of his had brought that message to him and Porius.

Here, with Brochvael drowned in Aristophanes and the incalculable Morfydd fast asleep, he knew where he was, as he had never quite done in the luxurious pavilion of those two court ladies. The sight of an elderly relative entranced in a Greek scroll seemed less alien to him just then than sucking crystallized sweetmeats from Lesbos and sipping spiced wine from Cyprus! And yet what a noble creature Gwendydd was — so proud and pure and simple and alone — among all those vicious and sophisticated people!

"I expect you're thinking," whispered the older man suddenly, "that I'm the most self-centred egoist you've ever known! Well! Perhaps I am, Rhun, my dear lad, yes, perhaps I am!" He turned back to the closely written passage he was scrutinizing and then again lifted his head.

"What about this in the Lysistrata, my boy, when you think of the attempts both Christian tyrants and heathen tyrants are always making to end our freedom of thought and speech, and to compel us by force to follow their particular principles and dogmas; yes! compel us by imprisonment and torture, and even the threat of death, to think and feel as they and not as we ourselves naturally think and feel! Listen to this, my dear lad—” And he murmured the syllables: “The use of force is the most horrible of all things.”

How far, even if the time and occasion had been under the influence of a different atmosphere, our moralistic ferryman of the Ford of Mithras would have responded with even a qualified agreement to this great saying is doubtful; but it was thus and not otherwise that he responded now, and not only responded but continued to touch the particular string of reciprocity, and to hold the special note of psychic sympathy with his uncle’s words in such uninterrupted assent that it was not long, as the older man went on examining his treasure trove, ere the same sort of comfortable sleep, which Drudwyn had found so hard to win till he regained the company of the dapple-grey mare’s trainer, fell upon Drudwyn’s master.

Brochvael, meanwhile, balanced less comfortably on Morfydd’s converted horse block, with his arms and chin stretched out above the Greek text, felt no desire for sleep, felt indeed nothing but the absorbed fascination that was drawing him on from headland to headland, ridge to ridge, glade to glade, of the enchanted continent of the supreme comedian’s imagination; though we must confess there were at the back of his consciousness certain vague, remote, obscure doubts as to what would happen when his household came to normal life again!

It must come to life — there was no avoiding that — and it would be wise — his obscure doubts did dally a little with this advisability — to stir it into activity before there was a chance of any of his relatives, either from the Gaer or from the Giant’s Cave, appearing on the scene.

But, meanwhile, here he was — and very quietly he got to his feet to make sure his one and only torch wouldn't go out till morning — in possession for the first time in his life of all the Eleven comedies of the greatest humorist there had ever been, or that there was ever likely to be, in our anxious world.

Turning from the Lysistrata, a comedy he was more familiar with than some of the others, he began searching for certain passages that had especially fascinated him when he had the temporary use of this scroll in his various Roman and Athenian friends' libraries, in such less known and more heavily entitled plays as the Thesmophoriazusae and the Ecclesiazusae.

It took him nearly an hour by his young Roman friend's water clock to find the particular wave crest of oceanic ribaldry wherein the pedantry and pomposity of men, and the naturalness and rebelliousness of women, and the confusion piled on confusion produced by the wayward gusts of temper from the puffed-out cheeks of the meddling gods, reached the sort of ultimate vortices and waterspouts of chaotic profanity that especially appealed to him.

And by the time some of the most recurrent revelations of human folly and indecency had been drained of their philosophic implications, and by the time some of the maddest human insanities — like those of nationalism and war — had been squeezed dry like ooze-grown sponges of the salty deep, yet another irrevocable hour had ebbed away.

"I must stop enjoying myself," he thought, "and come back to the accurst unreality of reality! It'll begin to get light in a moment, and those people will be here."

His muscles relaxed and tightened with several uneasy twinges as he straightened his back and stood up, and one of his bones creaked as if he were already an old man.

He looked at the sleeping Rhun and listened to his breathing. He looked at the entrance to the stone stairs. He looked at the entrance to the kitchen.

"Queer," he thought, "that I should be destined to await this dawn of all dawns, with her asleep up there and this one asleep down here! I wonder what Sibylla is doing at this moment? Sleeping? I doubt it! Carrying bread and wine more likely to that savage in Einion's dungeon! God! I'd like to know if Canna's got it right about that child being hers and about that Sais having been here in the days of Ronwen? Sibylla's a first-class liar, of course. I know that well enough. And if the child is hers she's a lot older than I thought.

"But what matter? She suits me, and I've always liked that little girl. They'll say, of course, that I've got her 'after Einion,' and that she snatched at me the moment Einion cast her off. But if she doesn't quarrel with Canna or tease Gwrgi, I don't see why I shouldn't have her here. It's this curst Gunhorst that's the cloud on the horizon. Will Einion set him free when Colgrim's dead or fled? And will she want to go back to him if he does?"

It seemed to him as if he could actually see Sibylla seated in the dark on the steps leading down to that dungeon-cave in the hillside of Mynydd-y-Gaer, full of pity for the man chained to the wall — the father of little Gunta — and with "her mind divided," as Homer would say, whether to settle down at the House of Stone, now devoid of a mistress, or to go on with her careless, irresponsible life as she was living it now. "If she does decide to come," he thought, as he began rolling up those eleven rhapsodies on the enthralling follies of human life, preparatory to cradling them on the Metamorphoses, "it won't be for love of me. It'll be to give Gunta a home and be in a position to help her beloved savage. But what do our motives matter? What matters is something quite different—" Here he placed the triumphant comedian on the top of the exiled amorist, and it seemed to his fanciful mind as if there instantaneously commenced a dialogue between the two, as though between two enormous drowsily subsiding moths, each well-satisfied to extol the sweetness of the honeyed juices of his long night's forage, but each content to keep the method of his pillaging locked in his own heart.

"I must have a word with those two in there," Brochvael said to himself. "Heavens! I wish this night could grow and expand like one of those great scarlet funguses I used to carry home for Auntie Erddud when I was young, grow and expand till it turns into tomorrow, and this curst day finds itself crowded out and over before it has time to do harm to anyone!"

He turned to his visitor with a grave and prolonged scrutiny. Yes! He was deeply and heavily asleep. And he had a nice honest rugged reliable face with his eyes fast shut.

And Morfydd was asleep upstairs too! What was it to anybody whether Sibylla was asleep or not? It all depended on what she felt for that Sais. A person could, he supposed, be the father of your child without taking your sleep away, even if he were chained to a wall dripping with water under Mynydd-y-Gaer!

By this time his dragging feet — for he had never felt so disinclined for any activity — were already conveying him into the kitchen of Ty Cerrig.

He found it warmer, lighter, and a great deal cheerfuller than the room he had just left. It was a large, low room, crowded with every sort of domestic and culinary utensil and with many objects of horticultural and even agricultural use — for it was Gwrgi's bedroom as well as Canna's kitchen; and, if it gleamed with polished copper and brass, these shining receptacles were rendered less awe inspiring by being seen through a comfortable haze of friendly smoke charged with the delicious fumes of stewed rabbit, which emerged from a battered and sooty pot of prodigious size suspended above the fire.

Coming in at that moment he couldn't help thinking — for his soul was still swimming in the halcyon sea of the great humorist's detached observation — how much more intimately the kitchen of Ty Cerrig, as he saw it now, seemed to respond to the tastes of Canna and Gwrgi than the room he had just left responded to his own.

"Canna's got a lot of her things in here," he told himself, thinking of his children's mother, "and Morfydd's got a lot of Morvran's treasures upstairs. I've always fought against women's tendency to get so cluttered up out of sentiment or whatever it is, but on my soul when I see—"

What broke off his ponderings at that precise moment was his sudden consciousness — though it had taken the best part of a minute for this consciousness to catch up with the flow of his subsequent impressions — that the two old people, with their subhuman, almost rodentlike sensitivity to what went on in the front part of the house, had missed nothing of Rhun's surreptitious entrance and indeed had been eagerly discussing all that it might imply, when his own movements made them break off and separate.

He knew them both so well that all manner of airy signs and imponderable tokens, such as none but an inmate of Ty Cerrig could possibly have detected, had gathered themselves into a cloud of evidence by the time what he had noticed without thinking about it overtook his awareness.

He had indeed drifted into this bright, warm, smoky, snug, rabbit-broth-fragrant retreat as if he'd been a somnambulist emerging from the mysterious but coherent symbols of the world of imagination into the equally mysterious, but a good deal less coherent, world of reality.

"It'll be a day of niwl, of what we call 'corpse-heavy mist,' my Lord," were the words with which Gwrgi greeted him.

The old man was now innocently polishing an agricultural instrument at some distance from both the swaying iron pot full of warm broth and this nodding female head full of warm scandal; and it seemed to Brochvael in his present mood, a mood prepared for the startling and hoping to escape the overwhelming, that it was a natural part of life's sequence of unpredictable shocks, endured amid unintelligible shapes and transformations, that Gwrgi should now put down his work and insist on his master's following him out of the house, even if it were only by the back entrance, so that the truth of his statement concerning the mist might be verified.

Once out in the air he entirely accepted the old man's view. The ghastly substitute for normal twilight that confronted him as he peered down the slope towards the river and the new church suggested that some elemental presence had come between the moon and the earth, and between the sky and the dawn; and when Gwrgi thickened out his discovery, by making him visit the uneasy donkey and the still uneasier ox, Brochvael was forced to confess, cautiously indeed to Gwrgi, but recklessly and with a kind of comforting violence to himself, that the Feast of the Sowing was going to be so darkened that it would be difficult for those at large in the forest, or in huts unprovided with Boethian water clocks, to know just when this fatal dawn, or this noon of which the Derwydd had made so much, were arising or descending upon Edeyrnion.

Gwrgi seemed reluctant to leave the shed where the ox and the ass had their stalls side by side, and it struck Brochvael that he was unwilling to let him leave this spot either. It was as if he wanted to give his gossip Canna a leisurely opportunity to carry to its furtive conclusion some domestic task more suitable to be concealed than revealed.

The two creatures had come to know each other's peculiarities as intimately on the animal level as Gwrgi and Canna knew theirs on the human one; and Brochvael, watching the mist, watching this wet, faintly yellowish presence, this bodiless alien intruder that was possessed of its own obscure, indefinite, inescapable identity, an identity not necessarily hostile but at this particular moment menacingly insistent, as if it had come seeking something that had been taken away from it and that it wanted back, felt that the two beasts were avoiding its intrusion by retreating behind Gwrgi's strokings, thumpings, scratchings, rubbings, and ticklings and were jealously watching each other's responses; as if the ox were thinking: "If I could only move my ears as dramatically as you do, you little hairy lubber, he'd go on scratching my forehead!" and as if the ass were thinking: "If only my nose were as cool and smooth and wet and slippery as yours, you great cloven-footed devil, he'd never stop standing between me and this smoke-dragon from the mountains!"

And as he pensively and abstractedly set himself to caress first one and then the other of these immemorial companions of man's planetary toil, and the two beasts showed their intelligence by treating these scholarly attentions with no more interest than if they were being brushed against, in her search for security, by a pregnant cat, some very curious thoughts began to cross Brochvael's brain.

"They know perfectly well," he told himself, "who's in the house. They've got me out here on purpose. Well! So be it! Now I am out here I'm not going to hurry to go in. I'm not the girl's mother, nor am I her husband. Let her look to herself. Gwrgi!"

"What are my Lord's commands?"

"You're quite right about the day. It's going to be the darkest Sowing Feast you and I've ever seen! You go in now and help Canna. I want her to be ready with some hot mead and hot milk and hot cakes before Erim and the princesses come. I'll wait a bit longer here, I think. I want to see if the sunrise makes any difference. I don't expect a ball of fire or anything; but this ghastly stuff ought to turn a little yellower when the sun's up, even if it doesn't clear off all day."

He could see nothing of Gwrgi's face, as they stood together in that shed where the smell of ox dung and ass dung mixed with the smell of hay and straw, save the presentation of a blur of oval greyness hanging suspended above an opaque image of oblong blackness.

But the psychic emanation of complete bewilderment, combined with guileless wonder, crafty confusion, profound suspicion, and a general wavering and hovering treachery that was ready like a salt-marsh estuary to turn in any direction, that reached him from that oval greyness above that oblong blackness compelled him to add: "My nephew Rhun is already here. He brought a message from the emperor's horsemen. He's asleep in my chair."

"Jesus Holy!" murmured Gwrgi. "And my Lady Morfydd asleep in her chamber, and she only waiting to be married to Prince Porius, and Lord Rhun the vowed priest of Mithras!"

With this he went off; and Brochvael, with his back against the worm-eaten post which terminated the single wooden bar between the two stalls, was left to stare through the open shed-door into the mist.

The door faced a gap in the tumbled and jagged rocks that immediately surrounded Ty Cerrig, a gap through which, if it hadn't been for the mist, he would have seen, as the moonlight faded in the more comfortable and serviceable light of day, an alluring segment of the winding river as it went curving away on its eastern course between the hills.

A curious fatalism had taken possession of him. He felt that nothing would induce him to meddle, at least today, with the stream of events. Who was he to fight against Destiny, that great god, or against Chance, that still greater one? Let Morfydd's honour go; let Porius's pride go; let the reputation of the House of Cunedda go! Let happen what would happen — to him, to Sibylla, to those poor, mad, misled, besotted Aunties! If Colgrim and his barbarians did outmarch the emperor and reach Edeyrnion, and if the forest people did revolt and join them — well! he could die fighting. He might have a worse end.

In any case Sibylla would probably drive him mad with her love affairs; and on the other hand to live alone with Canna and Gwrgi — even if he wrote scholia after scholia on Aristophanes — would it satisfy him, would it be enough of a life?

He stretched out his arms, as he leant against that worm-eaten post, stretched them as wide and as far backward as he could, so as to touch with the tips of his fingers the tails of both the tethered creatures. There was no perceptible wind, but two or three dead leaves came drifting in at the open door; and with them, from a strip of the old, damp, mossy woodland that no human axe whether of flint or bronze or iron had yet touched, came a strong lechery-sweet smell of funguses.

And with these things there rose upon him the feeling of all the weight of all the accumulated masses of dead leaves, falling and fallen, moving and still, that the deep forest about him had shaken from its swaying and dripping branches to the wet ground.

Miles and miles of dead leaves, either drifting, wayward and restless, like living things that are feverish and sick, or lying in piled-up heaps, corpse-cold and motionless, entering, it might seem, with some interior ecstasy too deep to betray itself by the faintest quiver, the huge dark dumb mysterious process, reeking with sepulchre-sweet rot and fetid with lust-satisfying decay, of the enormous vegetable dissolution, out of which, autumn by recurrent autumn, the organic life of the earth is renewed.

And with this sense of the piling up of mountainous vast earth ridges of dead leaves, from whose decomposition emanated a deadly sweet sexual longing that seemed to be diffused through the whole approach of this unnatural mist from the precipices of Cader Idris, he imagined he detected the faint but unique odour, more sex-drugged than any piling up of dead leaves, of fungus growths upon the air.

All through the last couple of months he had noticed by the side of the forest paths more of these fungus growths than usual, and he had told himself that their striking colours, scarlet, brown, olive green, white, yellow, with every possible gradation of tint, meant the accentuation of something that year, either in the elements or in man, that was curious and exceptional; and now he realized what that something was.

It was simply that this year's Feast of the Autumn Sowing was to be more heavily charged with the deep sex-urge that forced life forward and stirred up the hidden secrets of the tribal passions of man than he had ever known it since his boyhood!

"The Derwydd must have felt it coming," he thought, "and Myrddin Wyllt must have divined it the moment he came on the scene! Mother of God! And it's likely enough that his own yielding to it, with that Ffichtiaid she-demon of his, is what's distracted his mind and helped Colgrim to outwit the emperor! Something's queer with Edeyrnion this autumn — queer in Nature and queer in man! Well! I'm not going to meddle with either of them. I'm going to read Aristophanes and make love to Sibylla!"

But it was neither upon Aristophanes nor upon Sibylla that his mind seized next, as both his four-footed companions moved their backs out of reach of his mechanical fumblings.

It was upon an experience which he had had, just a week ago, before Colgrim had made his fatal debouch westwards and before the emperor's horsemen had arrived at the Fount. It was a simple thing — just an encounter with a semen-smelling fungus! It was a fungus that may have belonged to the genus usually entitled "stinkhorn" but in any case it had been of a texture — its colour was indescribable, though ivory-white and olive-green were elements in it — that caused him to derive some deep prehistoric pleasure from squeezing its corpse — for he hadn't come upon it till it was dead — between his fingers, while he inhaled, with a crazy inbreathing of his whole being, its unholy essence!

What his mind and senses recalled now, as he instinctively plucked at his leather jerkin so that by pulling it tightly round him he might counteract the chilliness of the mist, was not so much the irresistible fungus-flesh charged with erotic sweetness, as it was the weird and delicious sensation, different from any he had ever known, that came when its essence — you might almost say its soul — thus savagely appropriated and drawn into his blood like some heathen sacrament, had melted and dissolved within him and become one with his spirit!

This sensation — and he knew he made no mistake here — partook of the nature of death. It was in fact — and this he fully recognized — the unequalled sensuality of being immersed in death without its pain, without its loss, without, in a word, its "sting."

And then it happened, by one of those extraordinarily lucky chances that when they occurred in his favour always made Brochvael vow to imitate Caius Julius and take Fortune as his one and only deity, that the god of all gods himself, the majestic master of life whose Persian representative's modest champion was at that moment asleep — but was he? — in Brochvael's goatskin chair, made his appearance through the yellow mist.

It was only by a deepening, but it was a concentrated deepening, of this straw-coloured mist, that he realized that what he had been longing for — that what all Edeyrnion had been longing and praying for — had actually happened, and that the sun had risen free from rain on that twenty-first of October in the last year of the fifth century, but his certainty of the fact was absolute; and he was aware of an impulse to lift up such a mighty shout that all Edeyrnion should hear and rejoice with him.

Others, less watchful of the weather signs than he, might not know, but he knew without a possibility of doubt what that visible thickening of the yellow haze at one particular spot, where the Divine River skirted a rocky promontory on her way to Dinas Bran, signified.

The whole expanse of the mist contained a suffusion of yellowness; but at that particular spot, and Brochvael needed no Boethian science to tell him that this spot was due east from where he stood, the yellowness seemed moment by moment intensifying itself, precipitating itself, solidifying itself, until against the very shoulder of the queer-shaped rock where this transformation took place it thickened itself into something palpable and opaque, into something resembling — so he allowed his imagination to tell him — the golden lid of a golden cauldron!

Here indeed was the very cauldron of Ceridwen about which Auntie Tonwen used to tell him such tales and which still played its incredible part in the rumours that had been flitting of late from the Gaer to Ogof-y-Gawr, and from thence to the kitchen of Ty Cerrig, about the boyish Pen Beirdd whom the heir to the treasures of Clydno had brought with him to Saint Julian's Fount!

"I must go into the house and tell them!" he said to himself as he stared at the uplifted lid of gold between the river and the rock. "Into the house to tell them," he repeated, turning his back upon the golden object and patting with an eager obsequiousness, as if they had been sacred animals, first the rump of the ass, and then the rump of the ox. But he felt an extreme reluctance to do what he talked of doing!

As the image of his familiar goatskin chair rose before him with the deep wooden shelves behind it containing his books and scrolls and all his modern monastic copies of the ancient texts, together with all the vaguely sweet sensations that hung about the darkened firebricks on the floor where so many fragrant logs had smouldered to ashes and so many forgotten thoughts had come and gone, he realized how deeply Morfydd's attack had lodged itself in his soul and how fatally henceforth it would be associated with his thoughts in that chair.

"I'll feel," he told himself, "like some old wooden decoy-duck tied to a post in the salt marshes of Ardudwy by one of these forest archers with an itch to shoot a sea eagle with his poisoned arrows; but I shall be a decoy whose destiny it is to be found by a young sea hawk who incontinently leaps upon it, digs its claws into it, and proceeds to tear out its inmost heart of sawdust and shavings, and to scatter its poor pretentious painted feathers to the wind and the water and the reeds and the mud!"

But he shook off this self-pitying vein with a grim jerk and proceeded to ask himself a very direct and searching question. Was it in some secret jealousy of Porius, and in some nervous hostility to the fellow's huge, careless, casual, slow-moving, giantlike ways, that he had all this while been subtly conspiring with Gwrgi and old Canna to give those two sleepers, the girl at the top of the stone stairs of the House of Stone and the man at the bottom, the one solitary chance they were ever likely to get in this life to come together?

In a few hours, according to the old tradition brought from Africa, the monstrous phallic lance would be plunged into the waters of Saint Julian's Fount, and the orgiastic cry of the Fisher King would be raised.

And at that moment, married as chastely as you please, married twice over if necessary, once by the priest who murdered Morvran, and again by the priest who buried Pelagius, the young giant would surely discover, as he embraced his bride, that she had been ravished already! Alethe! alethe! binetiomen! Thus did the wise Lysistrata, releaser of the world from war, make her obeisance to reality: "It's the truth! It's the truth! We want to be ravished!"

He had arrived at this point in his thoughts and was feeling as if from now on to the end of his days the cry Binetiomen! would be inscribed on the rocky bulge of the obtrusive crag which at this spot prevented his enjoying a clear vision of Dinas Bran, when he became aware that he was being summoned by his brother Einion.

"Brochvael! Brochvael! Where, in Christ's name, are you hiding?"

Never had the ruler of Edeyrnion showed himself more princely and debonair; never had he looked freer from anxiety, responsibility, concern, and trouble. His soft, rugged, incredibly handsome face with its carefully trimmed beard, his slow, easy, complacent movements, the imperturbable aplomb of his tone, the airy mockery of every word he uttered, were all enhanced to a level of positive enchantment by the golden light in the east which was now piercing, as if with the lance of the Fisher King himself, the undulant mist that had overwhelmed the valley from the southwest.

"I can't wait for you, brother, and that's the truth; and I can't wait for the bride either! She'll have to come — much as she'll hate it — with the Aunties and that rogue Erim. The Derwydd will be down by the water by now, and you can imagine the host of rascals he'll have with him! You can also imagine the size and thickness of the lance they'll have been polishing and painting for months for this day's business! He'll be saying to himself — and he may very well be right — that this'll be the last Autumn Feast ever celebrated in Edeyrnion. Do you know what I've found out lately, brother?"

Brochvael expressed suitable ignorance, but he thought, "And I can make a fair guess in what quarter you found it!"

"I've found out," the prince went on, "that he's not going to follow any particular ritual or routine today in the Ravishing of the Waters! From dawn to noon he'll have that great lance plunged as the spirits tell him, and it won't be only one sort of spirit that'll tell him either — I can assure you of that — it'll be all the kinds there are! Holy Jesus will tell him; Gwyn ap Nudd will tell him; Gwydion ap Don will tell him; and I wouldn't be surprised if our own pious Gorsant gave him a nod too! As long as all's done in the name of the Trinity; as long, I tell you, as we don't forget that the Church is the Bride of Christ, it's wonderful what's allowed! And I like to see it, brother. The more wine's mixed with the water, the more the love of women's poured into the love of God, the sooner will our old earth come back to her senses!

"By the way, I saw my son's hunting spear in your room. I always know it because I gave it to him when he killed his first wolf. I made old Afagddu put five circles of silver round it. It shows how little of a hunter the man is, to have kept his schoolboy spear unbroken all these years and to still carry it about with him! It amused me to see it there today, though! The old man and Euronwy made such a fuss — and you too, brother — about getting them publicly and promptly married to impress the forest people and propitiate the Gwyddyl-Ffichti before the Saeson were on us, that I saw the pair of them led to the altar like sacrificial lambs! Yet here we have our amorous offspring unable to await either the holy hand of the priest or the magic cry of the druid, and deciding to sow the good seed independently of both of them!

"Well, Brochvael, I must go. I don't suppose my hot-blooded son found time to tell you how Brother John is? I hope the honest old fellow's not dead? What would he say, I wonder, to this snatching of the fruit before the ladder's been put to the tree?"

As if this were to be the final word between them, Einion now turned away from his brother with a mischievous smile and a valedictory lifting of his right hand. As he did so, his handsome features and majestic figure seemed to draw to themselves all the most precious drops of the liquid gold that was stretching out to them from that far-away dawn; and even after he had begun to follow the forest path leading down to the Fount, some projected essence of the nebulous radiance that was now advancing from Dinas Bran seemed to fling glory about his head and shoulders.

An unpleasant sensation of being meaner, smaller, poorer, weaker, and altogether less of a personality than this careless and reckless brother of his came over Brochvael; but among the imperatives that now made him hurry after the retreating man was undoubtedly a longing to retrieve himself with himself in the matter of personal integrity.

As large-natured, as golden in regal magnificence as Einion he would never be able to be. The die was cast, the mould was hardened, the bolt was shot in that direction. But at least he could preserve the virtues of his narrower, smaller inheritance intact.

Nor was it only one of these minor virtues that sent him pell-mell after that broad back, now as golden as Memnon's image in the dawn. There was also a plain and simple fear of being exposed in an unworthy concealment of a scandalous secret, for it certainly would have been humiliating beyond anything that had ever happened to him if his brother discovered the identity of Morfydd's visitor from other lips than his own. He made several rapid strides after the stately creature and clapped a hand on the figure's wrist as it turned.

"Einion!"

"Holy Jesus, man! What's up now? I thought you were — God! you gave me a start."

"I'm sorry! I should have called out to you. But there's something I ought to tell you at once, though I never quite know how you'll take anything. But however you take this I can't let you go without telling you. It wasn't Porius who was up those stairs with Morfydd. It was Rhun. And it's Rhun, unless he's rushed off, leaving his spear behind him, who's up there now. How Rhun came to have Porius's spear I can't tell you — save that being always together they may have exchanged weapons.

"Mind you, Einion, I've been out of the house some while. I left the house — oh, it must have been an hour ago! — and it's possible, I can't say more than that, that Rhun has rushed off and given no thought to what he'd been carrying. He came scrabbling at my window in the dead of the night with a book for me that Dion Dionides had brought from Athens. I put him in my chair and he went to sleep almost at once. He was asleep when I came out. And so was she at the top of her stairs!"

For a second the two men faced each other without a word, and to Brochvael the silence between them resembled the pain at the base of his skull at one particular stage of the gouging out of his teeth by the Ostrogoth's agents.

Then Einion thrust his spear deep into the earth, making his companion think of what he'd been told of the breaking of the sword of Cunedda. Was weapon-breaking a habit of this queer man when his feelings were affected in a certain way? But apparently he only wanted to free his hands; for he now proceeded to smite these members together with a sound of huge exultant merriment, while he uttered inarticulate noises of amusement such as in their boyhood forty years ago had been a cause of considerable irritation to Brochvael's nerves.

On this occasion with his own face in darkness and the prince's in golden light, it cannot be denied that a secret ground swell of anger — though whether the anger was directed towards the incorrigible personage before him or towards the absent Porius, he would have found it hard to say — heaved and rumbled in the centre of his being. But Prince Einion gave him no opportunity for further comment.

"Well, you old Athenian brothel-keeper — no! no! don't go off — I'm only teasing you, Brochvael! I know we're not sons of Iddawc the Apostate for nothing! I know that neither of us will speak of this to anybody, least of all to my poor dear wife! No, no! Don't go off in a rage, my dear! I'd love to come in with you and break my fast on your Gallic wine and Canna's cakes and see who does come down those stairs. But I must go. I can't leave the Gaer for long today. And if I'm not down there for the Ravishing of the Waters, these crazy forest people may do anything. I want to get them and the Derwydd well under control before the Aunties arrive, so if they come to visit you, keep them with you, brother, keep them with you for as long as you possibly can! But I must go. You can guess who'll be waiting for me, and with my breakfast too, I dare say, down by the water! All of us to our free choice is the word today, eh? Isn't it so, brother? — to our free choice, eh? Wherever our spears may be — and wherever our hearts!"

And with this he lifted his head so high that all the grey hairs in his beard showed as golden as his skin; and jerking his spear out of the ground, and brandishing it in the air without so much as a glance to make sure its point wasn't caked with mould he swung off into the forest at a pace that looked as if it might soon turn into a run.

Meanwhile Brochvael, remaining absolutely motionless till the mist swallowed up both man and spear, continued with no less absorption to stare fixedly at the vacant recessive oblong space in this same mist through which the tall figure had vanished.

"So that's the price Sibylla's got to pay," he thought, "for the Sais's life!" and he promptly associated this idea with the forms of several half trees he could see down by the river, whose trunks were invisible in the thick white vapour, but whose branches were not only clearly outlined but were touched by a coppery lustre that isolated them — while they remained palpably soft and organic — and islanded them in an enchanted element that was at once lighter than water and heavier than air.

But as soon as he turned and began walking slowly back to the House of Stone he felt as if his former vision of Sibylla crouching outside the dungeon of Rhitta Gawr, till they let her carry wine and bread to the man chained against the wall, had actually travelled through the air and was now — her living figure, that is to say, for he had not visualized her face — waiting in the same alert and yet docile attitude among the reeds and willow stumps of Saint Julian's Waters for the careless prince who had chained her man to the wall.

Long before the brothers had thus met and parted, in fact just about the time when Brochvael, standing in the shed between the hindquarters of the two beasts, first caught sight of the visible presence of dawn, Rhun ap Gwrnach, aroused from his sleep by Canna, was observed by that old lady with an expression on her face beyond the description not only of the greatest Byzantine artists but even of the most skilful of the ancient Greek ones, very slowly, stone step by stone step, mounting the stairs to Morfydd’s room.

It would hardly be fantastic to offer as one reason for the slowness of his physical movements the complicated burden of conflicting emotions that his athletic figure carried with it up that flight of stairs.

“Why aren’t you wearing your Phrygian cap?” the demon of mockery whispered in his ear at the first step he took. “Is this the way to become a ‘participant?’” echoed his conscience at the second step. “So your ‘carefully considered’ attitude to sex amounts to this, does it, Master Miles?” repeated the mocker, as the regular breathing of the girl came through the unclosed door. “Haven’t you, in a thousand romantic hints, given Gwendydd to understand that your heart is free, your ideals chaste, your senses under masterful control?” re-echoed his conscience, when he realized there was a light in her room.

No, he had not supposed there would be a gentle illumination at the top of those demon-possessed spiral steps, at least not till he had nearly reached the last one of all. Then he noticed with a curious moral relief — for it made his intrusion seem less like the rape of a girlish stranger than like a boyish trick played on a confederate and consenting playmate — that a friendly and welcoming gleam shone on the chilly pillar round which the steps curved.

Once he was inside the small arch-roofed chamber, however, and standing above her bed while she still lay in a deep untroubled sleep, a completely different emotion seized him.

It was indeed in a tumultuous whirl of many emotions that he found himself struggling; and caught with him in this vortex, he soon realized that the small oil lamp that hung suspended by a chain just above her head was in itself a cause of nervous vexation to him.

It gave him an uneasy feeling that at any second it might drop burning oil upon her face, or at least upon her hair. It was as if one of the demons who had teased him on the stairs had followed him to the girl's bedside to make sure that, whatever the upshot of all this might be, fate was going to permit no unruffled moment of poetic romance to delay the swiftly running current of malignant fatality.

It was from a crack between a couple of large stones in the arched roof that the iron chain hung down, and the modern hook that had been hammered into this crack was of the kind that had only lately appeared in Gallic and Brythonic kitchens to assist in the acceleration of pot boiling.

Morfydd was lying on her back, one long bare arm stretched out at her side above the coverlet, while the other was not — as the soldier of Mithras, when he imagined Gwendydd asleep, always visualized both of hers to be — bent at the elbow between her head and the pillow, but was likewise stretched out straight at her side; only this arm lay under the pair of purple blankets that she had inherited from her grandmother, the eldest sister of the Three Aunties.

The head of the girl's bed lay east and its foot west, and whatever stir of air there was, and there wasn't much, came directly towards her from the west, through a small orifice artfully and cunningly concealed beneath the carved snout of some devilish-looking monster— "an Avanc, I expect!" thought Rhun — and thus caused the chain to sway very slowly backwards and forwards, and the lamp that hung from it to cast a moving shadow upon the floor where the foot of the bed intercepted its pallid ray.

His devotion from boyhood to his father's chaste and warlike sun god had so purged and limited Rhun's erotic experience that his first sight of the sleeping girl filled him with something much more like awe than lust. The magical softness of her skin possessed an indescribable bloom all its own, a bloom that was quite different from that which lay upon the surface of any fruit or any leaf, a bloom that, though less porous than that upon a flower petal and less easily bruised than that upon a butterfly's wing, possessed some psychic quality that made it more impressive than these; and this unique bloom, lying so vulnerable in its perfect unconsciousness, was at that moment nothing less than a revelation to him.

The purer essence of Morfydd's soul — in the sense of freedom from worry and irritation and nervous annoyance and wounded feelings — had, by the aid of a few hours' absolute oblivion, diffused itself so completely through the porous and responsive chemistry of her youthful flesh as to create a living and breathing eidolon of loveliness that seemed for that moment outside the injurious shocks of both Space and Time.

But now it was that one of the most startling differences between the masculine and feminine response to the mystery of sex was presented by the chance of that occasion with a fatal opportunity to assert itself.

The misfortune was that the very simplicity of this particular initiate of the Phrygian cap debarred him from the mental detachment necessary for any wise grasp of such a situation. Yielding to his first emotion of pure awe in the presence of this motionless image of helpless loveliness, the swiftest footed runner in the whole island of Ynys Prydein sank down with a sigh upon his knees by the bed.

Simple and natural as was this act of reverence, the causes of it were deep. The condition of sleep was in itself the chief of these causes, endowing the youthful sleeper with an ideal remoteness from all that is transitory and ignoble in our nature, while it emphasized the primordial pity of the general human situation.

It did in fact what only death can likewise do. It absorbed the comic tragedy of the individual in the poetic pathos of the species. And then in a second all was different. The girl opened her eyes.

This faint movement of those fragile lids, behind which the whole mystery of life can be hidden, changed in a flash the heart of the situation. Hitherto the consciousness of Rhun had supplied everything, supplied the actor, supplied the accompaniment, supplied the audience; but what the lifting of Morfydd's eyelids brought upon the scene was another consciousness, also supplying, or about to supply, every one of these things.

To put it differently and more crudely, a new and opposed world had rushed into this particular oasis of Time and Space, where it confronted the one that was already in possession.

And at once these two worlds, brought into contact by two pairs of eyes, began their ancient play of creation, amalgamation, and destruction; a process which would have resembled, if the little oil lamp swinging in that misty air had possessed anything approaching enough human intelligence to note it, the mutual demarcation, cohesion, and absorption of two such opposites as night and day, sunlight and moonlight, sound and silence, birth and death!

At the moment it seemed quite natural to Rhun that, as she awakened to his presence, she made no startled gesture nor uttered any agitated cry. He took it for granted that, out of the unfathomable waters of such deep sleep, the old youthful intimacy between them had risen without a splash like a great, gentle, shiny-finned fish, and now buoyed her up upon its broad back till she was, so to say, riding side by side with him as he floated on the full, easy, natural tide of their early association.

"Morfydd!"

"So you've come, have you, Rhun?"

At these words he snatched at her exposed wrist, and clasping it tightly with one hand flung his other hand round the back of her neck, and drawing her head towards him across the pillow, kissed her on the lips.

And it was then that the all-conquering Eros seized on them both according to the different natures of men and women.

“Rhun, my dear, my dear!” she whispered. “I knew you would come!” And with this she began stroking his face with her free hand and murmuring over and over, “And now you have — and now you have — and now you have!”

Her tone was infinitely tender, and it ought to have been clear to him that her emotion was of the kind that left her in full control of herself and in no mood for yielding to overpowering passion. Had he been in love with her, their feelings would have had more chance to flow together, and all the abysmal difference between a man and a woman, a difference that descends — as if our very souls possessed members and functions consonant with and corresponding to the members and functions of our bodies — into the darkest recesses of fathomless being, all this difference between them, I say, might itself have been turned into an agent of ecstatic union.

But, as it was, the fact that he was not in love with her, the fact that all his more romantic cravings and idealized emotions had come to be absorbed in the personality of Gwendydd, left in him nothing strong enough to curb his simple and powerful masculinity, nothing strong enough to calm, refine, sublimate, or subdue its primordial and reckless impulse.

And so, towards his boyhood’s playmate as she traced with the tender fingers of infinite contentment the rugged contours of his hot cheeks, instead of the worshipful idolatry that would have quivered through him had the bed across which his arms were stretched been Gwendydd’s, what he felt was a simple rush of primitive and predatory lust.

It was — as so often happens — a small and a slight thing that finally became the cause of the flaring up of the flames. From the exposed wrist, of which he had possessed himself, the sleeve of her nightdress was drawn tightly back over the tender skin; and it was the trifling accident that beneath his fingers he was able to feel at one and the same moment both her soft flesh, risen as it were to life's surface after its restorative bath in the fountain of oblivion, and that tightly drawn sleeve, faintly damp from the warmth of her sleeping body; and from the conjunction of these things he was rapt away by an irresistible enticement, and draining to the dregs the maddeningly sweet draught of impersonal femininity, he gave himself up to all the brutality of the primeval male.

And she, watching his face in the swinging lamplight, became instantaneously aware that there was no flicker of response in his heart to the depth of her love, and that all she had done by her caress was to stir up in him the immemorial caveman leap of predatory passion.

Realizing all this in a single pulse beat, and recognizing that by answering her long-enduring love with this mere outburst of momentary lust he was in fact rejecting it and tossing it away, she grew icily cold, contemptuously calm, and anxious only to escape.

Thus had the crisis between them reached its fruition. Meanwhile it should be remembered that both the Gaer priest and the forest druid would from their opposite angles of vision have attributed Rhun's access of savagery to the erotic emanations of that particular day, to the aphrodisiac effluvia brewed in the mouldering crucibles of those millions of dying leaves, to the inebriating odours distilled all night from those fantastical stinkhorns and fabulous funguses.

On the other hand, Rhun's recent antagonist, the Jewish doctor, would with almost equal certainty have ascribed his momentary madness to a natural reaction from the prolonged service of a god of heroic chastity.

What is certain is that the raptorial beauty of the almost feline leap which the unequalled muscles of this son of a Greek athlete made possible, as Rhun exchanged the cold floor of the upper chamber of Ty Cerrig for the bed of his foster-brother's bride, passed unseen and unrecognized by its would-be prey. Of one feeling alone was Morfydd conscious, as with all her strength she flung him off, flung him back, flung him away, flung him down with such unexpected violence that, entangled in the purple blanket and thus unable to retain his balance, he fell with a thud that made a peculiar sound upon the stone floor, a sound not unpleasant to her ice-cold anger.

All the same if she hadn't sprung up too, jumped from the bed, rushed past him before he could clutch at her nightgown, and from the top of the steps called in a clear strong voice to Canna, she wouldn't have escaped him. His blood was up. His anger was as burning as hers was cold. To overpower her proud feminine spirit and dominate her feminine weakness by an antipodal outpouring of male brutality was the compulsion that filled at that black second the whole world of his consciousness.

Had this scene in the upper chamber of Ty Cerrig been witnessed by the Cabbalistic sage who was the father of Gog and the expectant father of Magog, it would have been Morfydd's desperate need to escape, even to the point of shooting an arrow through the throat of this springing wild beast, as against Rhun's obsession to ravish this proud Artemis into helpless docility, that would have chiefly impressed him.

As a psychotherapeutic student of the ancient books he would have quoted his favourite rabbi to the effect that every living creature — from insects so small as to be invisible to human eyesight, to huge pythons and sea serpents — holds in its consciousness a whole universe, perhaps more than a universe, and he would have detected that Rhun's universe had at that moment room for nothing but the forcible rape of his childhood's playmate, and that every horizon of this constricted universe was blocked by a thick blackness shot through by streaks of crimson blood.

But this terrible world, as devoid of expanding horizons as it was devoid of all height and all depth, this red-black world that contained nothing but the image of a smoking spear of phallic fury rushing upon a resistant blur of whiteness, was not destined to survive very long.

It was brought to an end by the concatenation of two other worlds of human consciousness, neither of which were as intense as itself, or as creative or destructive as itself, but in which there existed at that moment those unrestricted horizons upon which normal human consciousness depends.

Rhun's madness was in fact brought to an end by the sound of the voices of both Canna and Gwrgi answering the appeal, or perhaps it ought to be called — for Morfydd's tone was more imperative than desperate — the command of their young mistress.

It is doubtful if any of the foreign artists met by her father in his travels could have reproduced the facial expressions of Canna and Gwrgi while they were waiting and listening at the foot of the stairs. It is certain that not even the cleverest draughtsman in Byzantium could have reproduced the significance of the look that was exchanged between the two when they heard Morfydd's voice.

Rhun himself couldn't see anything but the slender figure standing in the doorway with its one long wisp of hair staining, like a dark shadow upon snow, the nightgown over which it fell; but, if he had seen that look, it could hardly have broken into smaller fragments the bloodstained passion-mirage that enclosed him than did those two old voices.

And the man with averted face who now slipped past Morfydd as if she'd been a spirit, and, dashing down the circular stairway, tore his way between Gwrgi and Canna, and forgetting his lance, or rather Porius's lance, which he had recently laid down so carefully on the softest mat in Brochvael's chamber, rushed forth from the House of Stone as if a thousand devils were after him and hurried away towards Saint Julian's Fount, was not only the man who had forced an entrance this preceding night, holding the eleven plays of Aristophanes in his arms as carefully as if they had been that author's Acharnian girl-pigs, and not only the man who, impelled by the madness of Eros, had just made that frustrated leap from a cold grey floor to a warm bed with a purple coverlet, and not only the man who in the course of a couple of days had come to dote upon a farsighted, ambitious, fashionable woman of the imperial court, idealizing her into an innocent victim, but was also the man, and remained also the man, who was the same humble, upright, simplehearted, heroic soldier-priest of the Bull-sacrificing, Bull-embodying, Sun-conquering, Sun-absorbing god of the Persians.

And written clearly enough on the face which old Canna turned to old Gwrgi when the man was gone, a man she had known as an infant, known as a boy, known as a lad, known all his days, was the particular kind of indignant and yet tender reproach, not untouched by a sort of maternal amusement, which the amorous urges, reckless and violent as they may be, of the men they have known from childhood are wont to excite in elderly women.

"Has he—" began the puzzled Gwrgi; but the experienced eye he kept on his friend's face warned him to keep his comments to himself.

"Cau dy geg" were the expressive monosyllables with which the old nurse bade him "shut his mouth"; but after staring at him for a minute in silence, she added with a sound that might have been a sob and might have been a chuckle: “Today is today with us all, my good man, and tomorrow is tomorrow.”

CHAPTER XXI. The Aboriginals

THE FIRST RISING OF THE SUN beyond Dinas Bran on Sunday the twenty-first of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine was a battle with the mist; but an hour after Rhun ap Gwrnach left Ty Cerrig it was from beneath a victorious sun and a sky crossed only by cloud wisps of wind-tossed vapour that Brochvael, re-entering his house, found the fire burning brightly in his room and his daughter resolute and calm, eating her breakfast in her accustomed place, appropriately attired for her marriage to the son of the Prince of Edeyrnion, and even laughing a little as she talked easily and naturally with Canna, who had perched herself like a cheerful old pet raven on the arm of his own goatskin armchair.

The old woman would have hurried off at once on his entrance, but Morfydd stopped her by calmly asking, while she turned her steady eyes from one to the other of them, whether it wouldn't be a good thing "to put that spear out of the way."

"It might," she explained, nor could her hearers, though they were of course the two persons in all the world who knew her best, detect any awkwardness or embarrassment in her tone, "be noticed by the Aunties or at least by the silentiary, and its presence might be misunderstood."

At this remark Brochvael and Canna exchanged very grave looks, and while the former began, "I think we might put it—" the latter hastily approached the suspicious object and possessed herself of it, declaring as she did so that it would do no harm in the kitchen if they put it behind a few of Gwrgi's rakes and hoes. This might have been an occasion for both father and daughter to smile, but neither of them did so.

However, they didn't interfere in any way with the old woman as she carried off the tell-tale weapon. When she was gone there did arise between them a few uncomfortable moments of embarrassment; but these were soon dispersed when she came back with a jug of wine, some of yesterday's oatcakes, cold, but not unpalatable, and a little butter and honey.

Thus it was in the midst of a perfectly natural and normal scene that the two princesses and their political adviser presently made their excited appearance.

It soon became clear to Brochvael that both the princesses were more agitated and excited than he had ever seen them. Gwrgi had dragged from the kitchen not only a massive wooden bench but a portentously tall chair, suggestive of the authority of an extremely primitive monarch; and after the visitors had settled down, Esyllt in Brochvael's goatskin chair, Erddud in what might have been the very judgment seat of Rhitta Gawr, and Erim upon Morfydd's horse block, father and daughter seated themselves side by side upon the bench that Gwrgi had extricated from the kitchen.

As for the two old retainers, they were obviously enjoying to the full every succulent moment of this historic and richly dramatic occasion, and it was with the air of attendants at a ceremony that partook at once of the solemnity of a funeral and the cheerfulness of a birth that they presented to everyone present a large wooden platter of cold oatcakes and a two-handled heavily carved silver loving cup full of a sweet, rich, fragrant red wine, on whose surface floated thin flakes of the aromatic peel of a particular species of lemon from southern Gaul.

They all tilted the silver cup to their lips. They all mechanically nibbled the cakes. But they all seemed unaware of what they were doing; and Esyllt, the elder princess, kept putting to the silentiary various quick, hurried, arbitrary, impatient questions which evidently struck the close-lipped, sagacious Erim as untimely and even disconcerting.

The proud old lady's royal Iberian blood was clearly in a ferment, and it looked as if she felt that with the Saxons so near and the emperor so far, and her traditional subjects, the forest people, so entirely under the influence of her friend the Derwydd, the Brythonic domination of Edeyrnion by Mynydd-y-Gaer was now at last destined to collapse, and the ancient glory of Ogof-y-Gawr destined to take its place.

Brochvael was, however, far too occupied in watching his daughter and wondering whether it would be, or whether it would not be, as a maid that her cousin would lead her that day into Brother John's cell, to have much attention to spare for the behaviour of his aunts.

He was aware — but that was no new thing — that Erddud had done nothing since they first entered but stare at him with a delirious intensity of emotion. The old lady's lips were trembling and her face twitching; and as he watched the wine come round to Morfydd again he saw the girl surreptitiously remove, with the help of a small squeezed-up pinch of oatcake, a thin trickle of saliva from the side of the richly carved goblet that had "escaped," in Homeric language, "the barrier" of the agitated old woman's teeth.

It wasn't till Canna had taken the goblet from the girl and put it into his own hands, as they sat uncomfortably side by side on Gwrgi's bench, that the father and daughter exchanged the first private, secret, and sympathetic look that had passed between them for a day and a night.

But in this look the whole turbulent tradition of the House of Cunedda, in greater danger at that moment than it had been since the Romans first brought its fierce tribal sons to this rebellious district to do the work that experienced hunting dogs are accustomed to do for wise masters, rose up, rallied itself, concentrated itself, gathered its forces together, and resolutely entrenched behind its ffos or vallum, prepared to do battle alone against three quarters of the world!

Brochvael drew a sigh of relief from the very bottom of his soul. He might blunder and make a complete fool of himself in his clumsy and ill-considered attempts to understand her where the fevers of Eros were concerned, but this — thanks be to the gods! — was another matter.

Here they were really father and daughter; here they were as one against all their enemies; and this fanatical old fury, Auntie Esyllt, and this doting old madwoman, Auntie Erddud, were, as much as their obsessed silentiary and their equivocal Derwydd, a pair of treacherous and unscrupulous enemies.

Meanwhile in heart and senses and nerves — not to speak of soul and spirit — the indomitable Auntie Erddud abandoned herself to a mental orgy of that ideal and impassioned love about which she had been dreaming, and for the satisfaction of which she had been praying for half a lifetime.

Ever since her recent interview with him when they had clashed so desperately, and as it seemed to him so finally, on the eastern battlements of Ogof-y-Gawr, the old lady had been unable to sleep save in snatches of overpowering exhaustion.

The austere Esyllt — though her confidence in her extraordinary advisers was as abnormal if not as mad as Erddud’s feeling for her nephew — was too absorbed in her schemes to notice what was happening to her sister. She gave little enough thought to the departure of the youngest princess with the hermit of Ogof-yr-Avanc; but now that Prince Einion had imprisoned the Saxon envoy, contrary, Erim kept telling her, to the unwritten laws of all the tribes of men, she thought of nothing but revenge.

And it was around a revenge so bloody, so remorseless, so wholesale that her brooding thoughts kept circling that they became almost impersonal. They became at any rate so racial as to cover up beneath a torrent of tribal lava every vestige of natural human feeling, every scruple of natural family consideration.

In vision after vision did this matriarchal Amazon queen, following human instincts older than any in Europe and at least as old as any in Asia, see the emperor’s horsemen perishing, horses and men rolled in bloody heaps together, under the poisoned arrows of the forest people.

In vision after vision did she see her wild subjects standing at gaze, awed and drugged with terror and pleasure, while the Germanic invaders slaughtered the Brythonic invaders — those crafty pets of Rome — or flung them into Rhitta Gawr’s aboriginal dungeons.

To the Princess Esyllt, as to Erim ab Uchtryd, the day of the Feast of the Sowing, instead of being a Saturnalia older than the Pyramids, wherein life’s traditional burden of sex restraint was for a few hours blown away, and the urge that replenishes our human world was rendered blameless and given limitless scope, became merely and solely the final chance for liberating Edeyrnion from the House of Cunedda and re-establishing the dominance of Ogof-y-Gawr.

Very different were the thoughts and feelings that now reached their culmination in the almost equally extravagant brain of Auntie Erddud.

“He’s too worried,” she said to herself, “he’s too worried to notice what I’ve got on,” and she glanced down at her long woollen robe of an indescribably beautiful green, against which showed to perfection the massive gold ornaments she wore, chains and chains of variegated pendants and all of them making a rich tinkling sound when she moved.

“But then,” her thoughts ran on, “I don’t believe he’s even noticed that Esyllt’s wearing the old royal purple that Iddawc wouldn’t let Indeg wear, lest they should say it was she, and not he, who ought to be ruling Edeyrnion. How pale and unhappy Morfydd looks, and what a silly mantle she’s got on! Well! At any rate it’s better than all those showy Gwyddyl things her mother used to wear. But she looks more like a religious woman than a bride.

“Everybody says she’s madly in love with Rhun ap Gwrnach and simply hates that great stupid ox of a Porius! Esyllt wants Rhun, not Porius, to be Einion’s heir, because none can deny that Alarch was Indeg’s daughter and none can deny that Rhun is Alarch’s son. But who knows, as Esyllt says, who was the father of Porius? We’ve got nothing but Euronwy’s word that it was Einion. It may easily have been one of those Cader Idris giants he’s always talking about.”

The thought of her niece-in-law submitting to the embraces of a Cader Idris giant caused Auntie Erddud such curious satisfaction that she discovered in herself enough strength of will, while Time’s pulse quivered for a whole minute, to turn away her eyes from her idol and stare so intently at every detail of Morfydd’s appearance that even Erim, occupied as he was with anything rather than the effect produced by a young woman upon an old one, received the impression that if she weren’t putting a tynged on the girl she was bewitching her with an intensely evil eye.

But nothing he looked at at that moment, whether in the form of a person or in the form of a thing, impinged upon the slippery, fishlike texture of Erim’s consciousness further than what might be called scale-deep.

It wasn’t that he was vaguely calling up the results of Colgrim’s impending victory. He was staring with his inner eye as intently at that victory as Erddud was staring with her outer one at an elaborate legal document which the Saxon victor would have to sign, whether he could read or not, by which, in the name of the Three Princesses, Erim ab Uchtryd would be the ruler of Edeyrnion.

"I wonder if he'd have noticed me," thought Auntie Erddud, "if I'd worn my black robe with the silver border? But I couldn't! If I'd worn black for the Autumn Sowing, Esyllt would have made me change — so it's no use thinking about that!"

But though she could make herself stop thinking about her black robe, she couldn't make herself stop thinking about her nephew. His nearness to her now realized all the wild ecstasy she had been anticipating for so long.

And as she clung to him with her eyes she knew with more and more certainty that a fatal submission to the destiny of love, whatever that destiny might prove to be, was now her life and would remain her life to the last.

Suppose this feeling she had for him burst all bounds, suppose at the moment she got him to herself she just cried out with a great cry: "I love you! I love you! I love you!" and suppose in his anger and his horror and his shame — for he must needs see what kind of love it was, and these Romanized Brythons had crazy notions — he struck her to death for it, what better death could she die? To be killed by her true love because — well! because fate had hampered their love — what better end to the sole interest, purpose, motive, meaning of her life?

She had no sooner reached this conclusion than they were all reduced to a solemn and intensely silent listening by a distinct yet distant sound. It was what so many of the forest people had been waiting for, longing for, thinking of, and talking of, for nearly twelve months — for every week in fact since it was last heard — the raising of the Fisher King's chant!

Brochvael and Morfydd, according to the custom of the House of Cunedda, remained seated side by side on their bench; but the two princesses and their silentiary rose to their feet, while Gwrgi and Canna hurriedly freed their hands of what they were carrying, and clasping their fingers shut their eyes as if in prayer.

Since both the wine and the cakes came to rest on Brochvael's table, it was certainly lucky that he had removed both Ovid and Aristophanes; though it is likely enough that, even had he not done this, neither of these heathen ghosts would have regarded a few wine stains and grease marks as insulting to their memories.

But round and about that Brythonic father and daughter as they sat uncomfortably side by side on their bench the religious hush that now fell on them all was no mere convention. The enchanted tune that came faintly to their ears had by reason of its immense antiquity the sort of magic power that could cast a spell over the lightest hearted, and awe the most frivolous with an overwhelming sense of mystery.

Traditionally critical of what they regarded as aboriginal superstition the father and daughter were, all the same, by no means immune to the emotion that surrounded them; and thus it came about that there arose from the consciousness of those seven people, four women and three men, a conflicting chaos of silent and yet passionately extravagant responses.

"Will she let Prince Porius touch her... after... whatever it was... that Master Rhun did?" thought the old nurse.

"Will Colgrim give me enough land to live upon, or will he hang me by the neck?" thought Gwrgi.

"It would be best for us all if both Einion and Brochvael were killed defending the Gaer," thought Auntie Esyllt, "for then we'd have no difficulty in dealing with this blundering fool Porius."

"The first thing I must do when the Gaer's taken," thought Erim ab Uchtryd, "is to send word to Medrawd ap Llew that Arthur's been put to flight, and that he'd better gather all the men he can and try to waylay him before he reaches Caergwynt."

"I suppose Einion," thought Brochvael, "is enjoying Sibylla at this very moment. Well! The question for me is: what difference will that make, if she comes to live with me here?"

Meanwhile Auntie Erddud was saying to herself, "I mustn't give way, I mustn't give way, I mustn't give way before he touches me! Oh, when will Esyllt take this girl off?"

"I swore by Rhitta Gawr," thought Morfydd, "and it certainly would be strange if Porius were right, and there really were giants on Cader Idris!"

She stared past her father's characteristically Brythonic profile, the lines of which had so changed, however, in the process of adjusting themselves to the loss of his teeth that they were no longer a true revelation of his character. In fact they now suggested a self-control, a restraint, a reserved power, that in reality he was far from possessing.

But it was not at her father's clear-cut profile that Morfydd now stared, but at the window, the aperture through which, some six hours before, with the Eleven Comedies under his arm, Rhun had so boldly clambered. And it seemed to her that there came through that window on the southwest wind not only the Fisher King's chant, but a sadder, fainter, more wistful sound than any of those disturbing refrains that were lifting the forest branches and reviving the ebbing sap in their inmost veins; and this new sound, this different sound, was one she had heard from her girlhood in the forest — for a child of the forest she was for all her proud Brythonic blood — and it always seemed to come especially for her own ears alone, and her own secret heart alone, and it was an indescribable comfort to her to hear it now, so entirely distinct from that ancient orgiastic chant.

That had originated in the desert; but this came from the forest, and when the forest was cut down would never be heard again. What it resembled to Morfydd's imagination was the sobbing and laughing of the animate souls of oak trees and ash trees, of alder trees and pine trees, subhuman souls, so absorbed in their own elemental pleasures and primitive pains that they were totally unmoved by the human passions and conspiracies for which Auntie Esyllt and Erim, not to mention the fatal and frivolous Derwydd, were prepared to give their lives.

But it was not only these two presences, the voice of the Fisher King's chant and the voice of the oak spirits, ash spirits, and pine spirits, that were now entering that hushed room with its five erect and two seated figures.

The last trailing wisps of the now almost evaporated ivory-coloured mist entered with those two voices. Morfydd couldn't help noticing how there was something in the mist that corresponded with the Fisher King's chant, almost as if the mist were some impalpable instrument accompanying the chant or were even the physical embodiment of its psychic appeal.

But driving the insubstantial remnants of the mist before it, as though they were the scattered ghosts of the proud flocks of Rhitta Gawr, the final invader of that hushed room was Porius's southwest wind. It was of this that Morfydd was now aware, ruffling Auntie Erddud's green robe, brushing past her father's toothless profile, cooling her own forehead, and stirring her hair.

It was probably this final intruder whose touch opened the small interior secret gate through which the girl suddenly found she could look into her own deepest soul. And what she saw there startled her not a little. She found that by rejecting Rhun's rush of natural passion she had won an immeasurable advantage and shifted to an incredible degree in her own favour the wavering balance of the relations between them.

She actually felt that in place of losing all hold on him because of what had happened she had won a hold on him, a hold she had never had before. And she discovered to her tremendous relief another thing also. She discovered that instead of suffering from her former nervous shrinking at the idea of being possessed by Porius, instead of dreading it as nothing but pain and shame and humiliation, she had actually gained, by rejecting Rhun, a power, not only over him, but over Porius too.

She had gained in fact a power over life, a power so exultant that the idea of giving herself to Porius receded as an image of shame, and grew larger and bolder as a defiance of feminine weakness. The whole business in fact had become something more than a merely feminine victory over the two men by shaking herself free from both of them; though such a victory certainly entered into it, since it wasn't out of love that she would give herself to Porius, and it was in spite of love that she had torn herself from Rhun.

Her struggle, in fact, had been and would still be a struggle with life; and if it became a victory, on this day of all days, it would be the victory of one solitary girl over the spirit of a race orgy that had lasted for ten thousand years.

It was Morfydd herself, therefore, whether under the impact of the southwest wind or under the secret stress of some Artemis mood drawn from the fierce independence of her Brythonic blood, who now rose to her feet and declared that the time had arrived for them to start! Brochvael looked at her in wonder and astonishment, and so did the silentiary; while even Gwrgi threw a puzzled and questioning glance at his friend Canna.

But the old princesses, understanding a woman's ways better than could any of these men, took it all as perfectly natural, tacitly assuming that the girl was following some deeply laid plan of her own.

In any case they were in no position to intervene; nor did either of them feel for a moment that their great-niece's union with Porius could possibly save the House of Cunedda at this terrific crisis if it were destined to fall.

Looking back at a later time upon her mood of this wild morning of the twenty-first of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, it seemed to Morfydd as if the exultation she felt as she hastened through the forest, with Erim on her left and her great-aunt Esyllt on her right, had been something beyond the limits of sanity.

In that later and calmer mood, she attributed her excitement to the triumphant pride of will that had given her the strength to resist that direct physical contact with a man's passion to which, by a law of Nature designed for the continuance of the race, the senses of women are so fatally susceptible.

As she hurried through the forest with the southwest wind blowing between the branches, wetting her face and leaving on the grey hood she had tied round her head a fringe of raindrops that were the final legacy of the departed mist, she experienced the strange feeling that it was she herself, in her triumph over the passion of the man she loved, who had driven this wild mist, this caddug from the Cader, back whence it came! White as wool it was just now, before she and the sun overcame it.

Shifting shapes and treacherous portents had been engendered in it by last night's moon. But it had been in last night's twilight, before she had defied her father, and with her father the whole multitude of living men, that this mist had revealed its inherent nature.

And it had revealed itself, weirdly enough, in the pallid yellow tint of their Edeyrnion stubble fields when the corn has been cut, the yellow that is neither tender gold nor shadowy ivory, but a tint peculiar to itself and one that clearly had the power of drawing forth strange responses from human nerves.

Her mood grew momently more and more intense. She could easily have left the old princess, to whose concentrated but rather painful advance the excited silentiary was now devoting all his attention, and have rushed forward like a bacchanal through the mist-drenched trees, to plunge savagely and without a second's hesitation into Porius's formidable embrace.

She had never been more aware of the familiar forest rubble under her feet, or of the swaying branches above her head, or of the showery water drops that came scattering down against her cheeks from the drenched fir cones. She kept noticing little brownish grey drooping funguses with their heads fallen sideways upon the wet pine needles. She kept noticing the stumps of old fallen trees where, in the rain-blackened interstices between ribs of sepia-brown bark, little coral-like funguses grew, not red but yellow as pale amber, and completely headless, as if they'd been golden pillars set up upon the memorial cairns of infinitesimally small elves.

She kept noticing the stumps of still older trees, or rather the prostrate trunk boles of trees that had no moss on them at all, nor grass nor lichen, nor saxifrage nor stonecrop, trunk-boles that had fallen away from their parent stumps and that had now, twice removed from their life-giving roots, little resemblance to any vegetable substance, save that they retained their outward insubstantial tree-trunk shapes, while made up entirely now of soft powdery dust that would sprinkle itself over the intrusive hand or arm that so much as brushed against it, or at a more violent contact was scattered to the winds.

Had Euronwy's Gaer priest, who at this moment armed with his wooden cross and his book of psalms had already arrived at Saint Julian's Fount, and was repeating to himself the formidable Latin words of the rite of exorcism, seen the look of exultation in her face at that moment and noted the lightness of her step, he would have put these things down to the angelic aid that had given her the power to resist the greatest temptation to which a woman can be subjected.

Had Euronwy herself seen her son's bride just then, she would, divining the girl's love for Rhun, have attributed her excited radiance to some crazy heathen faith in the power of those bones of Rhitta Gawr, upon which the girl had sworn when she herself with her hand on the chalice invoked the Son of God.

As for Rhun, had the counsellor's sister been clever enough to drag out of him his real thought, he would have admitted his certainty that his old playmate was happy at last because she had discovered that in spite of Mithras, and in spite of Gwendydd, and in spite of their brotherly and sisterly past together, he had wanted to make her his own.

Even the girl herself, as for the eleventh or twelfth time she slackened her speed to keep pace with her preoccupied companions, began to wonder, as her spirits continued to rise and she found that the prospect of union with her Herculean betrothed held no longer any terror for her, and began to grow puzzled at the careless, reckless happiness of her present mood.

"What has happened to me?" she thought. "Do I love Rhun less, and Porius more, than I supposed when I went up those stairs last night?"

With a shock such as she had never had before, she found herself facing in baffled wonder the intricate, complicated, and organic knot of mystery in which the living roots and fibres of her heart were lost. But her heart left behind, it was extraordinary how she kept noticing every smallest and least significant aspect of this forest path! This was of course partly due to the fact that the three of them — for her father and her great-aunt Erddud had been left far behind — had their backs to the risen sun.

Every tiniest piece of moss or lichen was illuminated; and illuminated too by a light that was not only richly golden but was perpetually flickering and fluctuating by reason of the trunks of the trees through which the path twisted and turned.

It was this no doubt that brought it about that the little things she kept noticing stood out in such marked relief and separated themselves from the things that were left unnoticed, these latter remaining not only in a merely relative, but in an absolute obscurity.

She noticed for instance how the sprays of the spreading brambles that were too adventurous to bear blackberries crept rebelliously, flat on their bellies, across the moss and the pine needles, and how they projected, with a mathematical regularity that suggested human arrangement, their oval-shaped leaves in clusters of three, and yet how these triadic sproutings, that in their prone and surreptitious advances over the wrinkled forest floor seemed invoking the support of a god who, like themselves, possessed the peculiarity of being three-in-one, yielded with equally regular periodicity to an impulse that every now and then flung forth profane and defiant clusters of five!

How was it that on this particular day, when in so strange a manner she had swung out into the open spaces of life beyond both love and passion and could take her own body, as if it were a slippery and glittering fish, and fling it with a splash into the brimming flood, she should notice with such curious feelings, just as if they were the Great Mother’s own soothsayings, written on a free daughter’s flesh with ecstasy for them both, how, as the boy-bard Taliesin wrote:

The wandering brambles,

When the horses of the sun burst through the forest,
Turn triads into quincunxes or threes into fives?

Of whatever elements her present excitement was composed it certainly had the effect of making her senses and her powers of observation almost unnaturally acute.

She began to feel with everything she looked at as if she were made of a material more porous than ordinary human flesh. They had, for instance, all three of them, to step across a little rivulet, in which the water, though it was only a couple of feet wide, was churned up, by reason of a series of minute waterfalls, into constant bubbles of restless foam; and instead of crossing this little stream as Esyllt and the silentiary did, with a mind too absorbed even to catch the sound of its dallying with its alternately sun-bright and fern-shadowed pebbles, she paused and turned and stared down in fascinated wonder while a particular sequence of tiny bubbles met and lost themselves in a larger one, and indeed kept on increasing the size of this larger one till it came to resemble a subhuman and at the same time a superhuman eye!

It became in fact the living eye of the whole chemical substratum of planetary elements, out of which water, earth, and air draw the fluidity, the solidity, the imponderable vacuity of their essential beings.

The girl bent down as she crossed this little stream and stared steadily into one of these constantly growing bubbles; and this arbitrarily chosen eye of the whole inorganic world stared back at her — the eye of matter itself responding in subconscious or perhaps superconscious indifference to the eye in a human skull!

In this eye bubble, for the sun was still behind her, she saw herself reflected. She tried experiments with this singular mirror! She lifted an arm to her head and watched the image in the floating eye bubble lift its arm to its head! It gave her a curious satisfaction to count how many times this phantom creature within this water bubble could gesticulate in this innocent manner before it broke into nothingness and became once more a portion of the flowing stream.

During this process she possessed two selves, and the eye bubble, within which one of these selves was making signals to the other, managed somehow at the moment of its dissolution to give that "other" a farewell wink of sardonic amusement.

And she remembered how delighted her dead brother had been when their father repeated the saying of Heraclitus: "Panta rhei kai ouden menai, all flows away and nothing remains"; and at the thought of her brother her mouth began twitching, and no sooner had this happened than in one of her cheeks — a thing that always annoyed her for she could feel it, as you might say, from within — a nerve began twitching in sympathy with her mouth; and she began thinking of all their father might have done and never did do, to save the boy's life.

"If only our mother hadn't died! Oh, if only our mother hadn't died!"

She quickened her pace to overtake her great-aunt, for she hadn't failed to notice that the silentiary of Ogof-y-Gawr, upon whose arm the old lady had now begun to lean more heavily, had turned his head once or twice, since she stopped to stare at those bubbles, as if to make sure she hadn't deserted them and returned to her father.

But it wasn't long before she was compelled to pause again by the appearance of another and an even more curious phenomenon of Nature.

The level rays of the sun behind her were now projecting her shadow in such a manner as to cause it to resemble a second Morfydd, a less solid and opaque Morfydd, but one in whom had been engendered a more gallant, defiant, and adventurous temper.

And it happened that this better-constituted, less life-outraged Morfydd — who, though not immortal like its begetter, was still an authentic daughter of the sun — was at this moment blotting out from the eyes of its more human alter ego one of Nature's accidental miracles of transcendent glory.

The girl's shadow was in fact passing now in front of a minute waterfall which the sun's horizontal rays had turned into a million blazing diamonds, diamonds as dazzling as if poured forth from a fabulous casket of some legendary queen of Marrakesh.

It was a moss-grown rock which evoked this effect, for in its grey interstices there were veins of dazzling white quartz and over both quartz and moss, turning the latter into a soft mass of water-soaked sponge that clung to the rock like a skin, and turning the former into a blaze of gems, trickled one of the many little streams that ran into Saint Julian's Lake.

And because her defiant and light-stepping shadow with its head held so high blotted out for a second this dazzling scintillation, the blaze of it when it came back was more resplendent than before and indeed was more resplendent than where at the final termination of this forest path the great sun itself, the intolerable origin of these unearthly dazzlements, plunged into the lake and floated there, rising and falling with the smallest ripple, in his own tremendous image.

This vortex of dazzlement might well have stayed the steps of any mortal maid, and after Morfydd had watched her reckless shadow — which was certainly as much braver as it was much lighter and less substantial than herself — plunge boldly into this blaze, blot it out for a second and pass on, she herself stood still, not unaware of a second's irrational surprise when her pause called a halt to this second self's irresponsible flittings.

But no sooner were she and her shadow motionless for a moment in the presence of this accidental embrace of the four elements, this casual encounter of air and water and rock and fire, than there occurred another of these miracles of chance.

For it happened that where this small rivulet sank into the grass there was surviving from the late summer a solitary specimen of the extremely aromatic plant which her father had taught her to call Mentha hirsuta, and from this plant as her foot brushed against it there now arose the familiar pungent smell. And in a twinkling her memory had been seized upon by this pungent fragrance and swept back to an occasion when, in the absence of her father on one of his journeys in search of books, her Gwyddyl-Ffichti mother had taken Morvran's side in a quarrel, and she had gone off by herself into the forest and there by herself had come upon a similar fortuitous clash of the four elements whirled together in just such a dazzling conjunction as this, and had been caught up in an ecstasy of pleasure.

An ecstasy of power too, and of more than that: an ecstasy of faith in her power to retain until she died the indescribable strength — strength rather than illumination or revelation — which that moment had brought.

She felt such a thrill now, that gathering up the folds of the heavy garments that the primeval custom of Edeyrnion had compelled her to assume, she ran at top speed — faster than she had done since she fled from Porius and Rhun in those old home-rock races — to catch up with the silentiary and her great-aunt.

And as she ran she felt accumulating in her heart, in her blood, and in her brain the same sort of strength as on that first occasion. It would be incorrect to call what she felt by any other name than "strength"; but she concentrated this strength just then on two things: on her indignant repudiation of Rhun's gesture of lust, and on her resolute anticipation of Porius's gesture of possession.

Even after she had overtaken her preoccupied great-aunt and the anxious silentiary her thoughts remained entirely occupied with her personal feelings.

Auntie Esyllt would not have believed it possible that a granddaughter of the Princess Indeg could, at such a crisis and with all the life of Edeyrnion in the balance, be concerned so exclusively with her own affairs. She sometimes even suspected with a certain uneasiness that it was because the ideas of her Herculean betrothed were so different from Morvran's that towards the end of her brother's life there had been a coolness between them.

Morvran's hostility to Christianity was a furious, one-sided, atheistic revolt, whereas Porius had a way of suspending his own judgment completely on every subject except his immediate sensations while he enjoyed with the liveliest satisfaction the almost infinite process of analyzing the beliefs and customs of everybody else, their occult causes and psychic repercussions, together with all the practical justifications for submitting to them or rebelling against them.

But although it was with her own affairs that the daughter of Brochvael was concerned on that critical day, there had been a bride brought into this family once, of an earlier generation, namely, Creiddylad y Gawres, who would heartily have approved of one form at least that this concern took, that is to say, the girl's perpetual preoccupation with her vow on the relics of Rhitta Gawr.

It would no doubt have required the erotic insight of a goddess like Myrddin's chthonian Styx to explain why it was that, with all her feeling for him, Rhun's simple ideas about life and death, and about good and evil, had never had the faintest influence upon her, or indeed the remotest interest for her; whereas every one of Porius's thoughts and prejudices and manias — some of which were not only inconsistent with each other but extremely subtle and complicated — had always thrilled her with a fascinated curiosity.

As things were at the moment she was certainly contemplating her future life as narrowly, clearly, and practically as if Colgrim the Sais were still sitting in judgment in Germania, and as if it had never entered the head of Erim ab Uchtryd or of the last of the druids to turn the unstable forest people against the House of Cunedda. Nor was it only of her outward life that she was thinking.

She saw herself loving Rhun to the end of her days but refusing to let him touch her. She saw herself bearing children of whom not only Euronwy but Euronwy's father would be proud She saw herself humouring her own father, though not without private reservations that need not be seen, by encouraging him to have not only Sibylla but Sibylla's child to live with him.

And finally she decided — for her instinct told her to put an end to this scheme, whoever was responsible for it — that never should Porius sail for Constantinople, whether with this Greek or with anyone else, even if by not doing so he put an end forever to the rehabilitation or even to the canonization of Pelagius.

"Brother John," she told herself, as she lifted her bridal robe out of reach of what once had been the living branch of a mountain ash, but that had lain in one spot for so long without losing its natural shape in that ten-thousand-year's old forest that it had at last become a powdery mass of soft adhesive dust, "Brother John thinks only of the making of saints — for that's what he swore when he took his vows — but I've got to think of the making of people capable of defending Mynydd-y-Gaer, for that's what I swore when I took my vow!"

While lingering no longer, but walking resolutely now, step by step with Auntie Esyllt, Morfydd was approaching Saint Julian's Fount, the obsessed Auntie Erddud was frantically using every sort of subterfuge, however obvious or transparent, that could be possibly turned into a reason for allowing the others to leave Brochvael and herself behind.

Oblivious to these simple tricks the old lady's nephew certainly was not. But he felt no strong urge — indeed he felt no urge at all — to deny her the satisfaction she craved. Was there any connection between this weakness in his blood, this lack of instinctive moral fastidiousness, and the Feast they were celebrating?

He certainly felt at the lowest level of his psychic vitality just then, with no heart for anything save just giving himself up to the sensation of the moment; and of all the forces in the world, natural or supernatural, the one most easy to give yourself up to is the power and splendour of the blazing creature whose warmth falling upon their backs as they moved forward together, linked by the arm he had thrown round her shoulder, created in him the vague, curious, erotic fancy that those powerful level rays that seemed to be melting the very opacity of his bones were not only doing the same for hers, but were in some extraordinary and special way fusing a pair of elderly skeletons, and out of them making a new single, fresh, much younger skeleton. This weird fancy urged him to throw down his Gallic staff and to hold her in both his arms. And no sooner had he done this than Princess Erddud's consciousness recognized that the moment of Time, the moment for which, ever since her desire had become a madness she had so desperately yearned, had really come at last; and this recognition broke down not only all her power of resistance but every reason she had for resisting.

"Take me! Take me!" was the cry of each living portion of her old body. She could feel along with his arm about her — both his arms about her — the same conquering sunshine, sunshine that was more than sunshine, that he was feeling himself; and not only so, but the old familiar elemental illusion that the great flaming orb was much nearer to earth at this moment than it would be in the heat of noon took possession of her.

She felt as if that desperate wordless cry of hers had actually won sympathy and found a response in the ancient femininity of the earth itself, that immortal goddess-creature beneath her feet, older as well as so much less fastidious than all its superhuman titanic children and all its monstrous megatherian beast-brood that cropped its aboriginal mosses!

And Erddud felt as though she were rapidly becoming part of that old immortal mother of gods and monsters. Through every nerve and fibre within her old flesh, and with every inch of the flesh that covered her bones, yes! and with every bone beneath those nerves and fibres, she felt as though she were yielding, just as the old earth had always yielded, to the sun-man or the man's sun in whom was the seed of life.

In the dizzy heart of darkness within the blazing obsession that possessed her she felt that she could drain into herself with frantic inebriation every drop of all the golden rays which the flaming entity that had seized upon her had in its loins to bestow; yes! drain them into herself to their final dregs!

In the richness of that singular irony, which seems to be one of the chief humours of all cosmic changes, it was on this particular day and in the person of this particular woman that one of the most obscure mysteries of the Christian Trinity was now revealed.

For even while Erddud was abandoning herself as a daughter of the earth to what seemed to her then to be the very embrace of the sun in heaven, she was also giving herself up, with a reciprocity of sensual ecstasy that was beyond the compass of any man's power to feel, to her one and only man's total possession of her.

Thus in the very core of the impersonality of her desperation there existed a sweet and vivid consciousness of Brochvael's actual identity as she had known it and loved it so long; a consciousness of his face, so different from all other faces, a consciousness of his hands, of his arms, of his neck, of his skin, even of his toothless mouth — at the sight of which Morfydd's mother had winced and shuddered and indeed had never quite ceased wincing and shuddering till the day of her death.

But emotions as intense as those which were now destroying this aged descendant of the queens of Marrakesh leave their impress upon the elements.

One thing is certain; namely, that both this particular plot of earth where the culmination of Auntie Erddud's life occurred, and the ethereal space immediately above it, received at that moment an imprint upon the inmost substance of their twin identities, an imprint so totally beyond the obliterations of season or weather, an imprint of such supreme happiness, that thousands of years afterwards, men and women crossing that random patch of ground and passing through that random hollow of air have felt a mysterious elation, lifting up their hearts and redeeming their sorrows.

At intervals of Time whole centuries apart, and by persons totally unknown to each other, has this vibration of triumphant joy been experienced at this spot; nor have there been lacking cases where the experience of it has changed the entire course of a person's life.

But whatever miracles may have been worked centuries later by Auntie Erddud's passion, at that actual moment the old woman's feelings were grotesquely crippled by the pitiableness of her years. Her words grew incoherent as she clung to him; her scanty white hair got caught in the metal clasp of his mantle and was dragged and twisted about and even torn out of her skull by the fury with which she clung to him. She clung to him not only with her thin arms but with every part of her frame.

He could feel, through her clothes, every pulse in her whole person throbbing wildly against him; and very soon in place of the wild torrent of verbal endearments she had at first poured out, he was aware that she was uttering curious low-pitched moaning sounds of a significance beyond the reach of words. He even imagined he caught, proceeding from her lips, certain unintelligible syllables suggesting the rhythms of orgiastic African music, such as he himself had heard ere now when anchored off the shores of old Roman harbours on the outer edge of that great mystical continent.

But it was only after he had felt her give three or four gasping breaths that were not sobs nor moans nor cries, but were more like the ghastly ejaculations of an ecstasy paid for in jets of arterial blood, that he lifted her off the ground and hugged her hard against his navel.

Whether her incestuous passion, as the old princess indulged it now without a thought of anything else, was itself enough to plunge her into the gulf of nothingness, or whether it received, in some automatic response from the senses of the man who was holding her, the final shock that pushed her over the brink, it seems likely that they both must have heard at that desperate moment, with ears sensitized by the feeling of that forest at dawn, certain particular strains from the Fisher King's chant which from the beginning of Time seem to have had some peculiar power over the nerves of the daughters of the desert.

All Brochvael knew was that when the spasmodic ecstasy of the princess reached a particular climax, a shuddering convulsion contorted her whole body; and after a horrible jerk like the snapping of a bent bow, he knew with his brain she was dead, though with his heart against which she was now so fiercely pressed he refused to accept this ghastly termination of an affection which, however guilty in the eyes of Minnawc Gorsant, "the Slave of Christ," possessed elements that were as noble and exalted as they were unbalanced and insane.

But the flight of the living soul from the bodily shape we are holding in our arms is soon bound to freeze, unless we are obsessed — as Brochvael certainly was not — by some insane necrophiliastic emotion, the human warmth of our embrace; and in a second or two Auntie Erddud's nephew felt as starkly aloof and wearily indifferent to all human happenings as did the distorted image of an old woman in a beautiful green robe that he now laid gently on the ground. But he set himself all the same to do all he could think of to make the old body and disturbed face, ere they grew stiff and cold, present the appearance she would have wanted them to present to those who might now approach her when she was unable to smooth out a crease from her garment or a wrinkle from her skin.

He could hear the strains of the "Fisher King" growing louder and wilder as the gusts of the southwest wind tossed them towards him over the creaking fir branches and carried them away towards Ty Cerrig and the Gaer; but their sound, in place of rousing the faintest response in him, only increased his indifference to all human loves and hates.

He found himself picturing his new friend Sibylla, clinging in the frenzy of lechery or the recklessness of ambition to the tall form of his brother, the prince, as the latter carried her with amorous intention into the deeper undergrowth; and yet the lascivious imaginations he conjured up excited no jealousy in his heart or agitation in his senses.

He felt as if, where all women were concerned, they ought to be left absolutely free, to love or not to love, as their impulse or caprice dictated.

“If Einion doesn’t want her,” he thought, “she’ll turn up at Ty Cerrig tomorrow, and I shan’t send her away. But I could live all right without her; and what Einion gives me from his land rents and his protection dues will be more than enough to keep Gwrgi and Canna. Oh, I shall get on, even if Einion does want to help her and she goes back to him — that is, if these Saeson leave any of us alive!”

He shivered a little as he abstractedly straightened out the creases from the carefully selected green robe she had chosen for this supreme day of her life. But he soon jerked his Italian mantle more tightly round him, and shuffling on his hands and knees along the grass at her side he folded her embroidered garment about her shoulders and neck so as to keep her, too, from the chill of the wind.

He was kneeling by her side in a particular glade of the forest whose peculiarity it was — by one of those chances he had come long ago to associate with the most important moments in his life — to confront unimpeded by any tree trunk or undergrowth the now fully risen sun; while in the opposite direction the southwest wind from Cader Idris was likewise unimpeded in its impact upon them.

Thus he was aware of a confused and simultaneous obligation to keep the sun from scorching the face and the wind from ruffling the garments of this tall emaciated doll in green that had been his aunt. He himself felt at that moment a sullen and inhuman sympathy with both the indifferent wind and the indifferent sun.

Even while he was arranging the rich collar of her robe so that her face, grown less troubled, now grown even calm, might not suffer from the sun, and pulling the fringe of her robe round her ankles to protect them from the wind, down at the very bottom of his solitary soul he was praying to the sun to dry up the whole bloody jungle swamp of his native Edeyrnion, and to the wind to carry him who had lost Morfydd and would soon lose Sibylla, him and this waxen image that claimed so preposterously to be Modryb Erddud, down the long centuries of the past till they reached the old primeval simple days, before there were ships to bring migratory savages into Ynys Prydein, and before there were emperors in purple or pendragons in red, and before there were counsellors who dressed like herdsmen and rode on wild stags and could call up thunder, and before there were princely lancers mounted like Roman horsemen with kisses on their lips from Christian ladies, and before there were druids in hidden caves who believed in the Trinity, and before there were priests in Gaer chapels who murdered your sons.

He bent his head and touched with his face the dead woman's face.

"Mother of God!" he thought, "how cold she feels! Will my skin feel like this when Colgrim's savages tear off my clothes? God! But what a curious coldness it is! Not like anything else."

Again he touched her face with his mouth. "Like funguses," he said to himself, "like funguses grown in the dark."

Suddenly he stood up and looked down at the body. "It isn't Auntie Erddud at all!" he thought. "This quietness is unnatural. It isn't the quietness of sleep. It isn't the quietness of rocks or stones. It's the quietness of something underneath matter, something startling and shocking, something outside Nature."

He went on staring at the corpse. “This thing’s a husk without its seed,” he thought, “a shell without its fish, a cast-off skin. We can’t have it both ways. If we throw Holy Jesus to the crows we’ve got to live alone. But what it means to live alone is what heathen philosophers never tell us. Aristophanes comes nearer telling us than Plato. I must make a philosophy for living alone out of Homer and Aristophanes, and then perhaps there’ll be—” here his sequence of thought had a discomfortable jar, for the wind brought from Saint Julian’s Fount the sound of a chorus of voices; and by nature of this chorus he knew exactly — as everybody else in Edeyrnion knew — what point in the age-old ritual had been reached.

It was the first uplifting above the water and the first downplunging into the water of the huge ritualistic lance — of the size of seven ordinary lances, for it was made out of the trunk of a tall tree — to whose phallic symbolism, lost in African antiquity, three sorts of progressive mysticism, Gnostic, Mithraic, and Christian, had given a redemptive interpretation.

But the annual repetition, from his childhood up, of this occult gibberish, whose curious drummings, harsh screamings, and prolonged murmurs of subhuman incantation had so dulled Brochvael’s mind to any sort of articulate meaning, whether pious or impious, that all he felt now was an access of nervous irritation.

As the sounds increased, this irritation, which flapped about like a great death moth, in the windowless chamber of his present disillusionment, caused him to start prodding the fog-drenched moss and the little threefold leaves of the wood sorrel with vicious prods of his ebony staff.

And with each prod into that bed of dark green moss and light green sorrel, whose natural tints made a striking contrast with the dead woman’s green dress, he lifted up his voice in a groan of defiance towards whatever powers they might be, divine, or demonic, or, as Democritus would have declared, simply chemical, who had brought this accurst humanity into being, on this infected planet.

It was only when a flurry of dead leaves, blown across her body, and now caught in the hood over her white hair, broke into his paroxysm that he realized that he had repeated over and over again, at each thud of his Gallic staff, the single syllable “Sais!”

It was just as if he had beheld in a fit of furious second sight some flaxen-haired follower of Colgrim, savagely cleansing Edeyrnion of the last taint of Berber, Gwyddyl, Brython, and Roman, and just as if he himself had been strengthening those heathen hands with each prod of his Gallic staff!

But he had no sooner disentangled the dead leaves from the dead woman’s hair than he heard sounds on the wind that struck his ear as different from the familiar chanting. He hurriedly stood up and with his back to the corpse set himself to listen intently.

“Something serious is happening down there,” he said to himself; and casting a quaintly supplicating look at Erddud’s body, as though begging it not to move till he returned, he hastened off at a run, down the open clearing that led in the direction of the lake.

Nor had he gone far before he got at least some intimation of what was occurring. He stopped at a point where the path turned sharp to the eastward so as to avoid a somewhat precipitous descent to the water’s edge. It was a climb he had often dared as a boy, and he would have been prepared to scramble down now. He stopped for a moment, however, between two pine trunks to collect his thoughts, his legs hidden by bracken and his head by a small fresh growth of prickly pine needles emerging like a spout of green blood from the side of the tallest of the fir trees.

What he expected to see down there was an old story to him, and he took its appearance for granted; but what else he saw from this natural and inaccessible vantage ground was as unexpected as it was startling.

The sun was now sufficiently lifted above the horizontal to have the power to distort Brochvael’s own shadow to strangely wavering dimensions as the wind stirred the trees on which it fell. But after throwing its grotesquely distorted outline upon a staircaselike sequence of receding tree trunks, it seemed to glory in using those shadows as a jumping-off place from which to reach the surface of the lake, where it proceeded to make a divinely glittering pathway as if for the feet of some gigantic aboriginal — Rhitta Gawr himself perhaps — returning at last from Cader Idris. In the process of doing this, however, these same sun rays seemed deliberately to accentuate and darken, to a degree of horrible significance, the chief symbolic object of this whole ancient mystery, causing it to look as if it were caked all over with a rusty, long-ago-dried crust of black-red blood.

This object, a huge seven-times-elongated African spear, was a most monstrous-looking thing. It was carved in certain respects to convey the impression of a colossal and hideous phallus, and Brochvael now watched it being lifted up, watched it being swayed to and fro to the tune of the Fisher King’s chant, and watched it being plunged into the water.

For standing at the top of this minor precipice, whose descent was varied by moss-covered rocks, low-voiced rivulets, and old fragments of fallen branches that Time had reduced to mouldering dust, he quickly realized, for he had the advantage of the sun behind him and was therefore undazzled by light and unconfused by shadow, that it was in the midst of a scene of wild disturbance and angry fighting that this hideous blood-rusted object was being lifted up into the sky and plunged down into the water!

From the frantic movements of wounded men it now became clear to him that many flying arrows were increasing the tumult. Horses were rearing, men falling, and spears being thrown. It had only just begun; yet now in a moment howls and screams were rising, such as cut and cleft the air, even as the flesh from which they rose was torn and cut and cleft by the heartless iron and “pitiless bronze.”

Brochvael hesitated. He felt automatically drawn forward and automatically pulled backwards. The dispersal of his normal identity by the shock of Auntie Erddud’s death, though only a temporary disturbance, followed so quick upon the loss of Morfydd and the murder of his son that it seemed to suck out of him the very pith and marrow of his life endurance.

But slowly, little by little, as if it were a floating island, composed of materials that had to be brought together by more than one ocean current from more than one remote shore, his submerged life illusion returned to him and he became once more the brother of the Prince of Edeyrnion and the great-grandson of Cunedda.

And good need he had to be all this, judging from what he saw just then down there by the Waters of Saint Julian. In his imagination he felt himself descending the precipice before him to the level of that deadly and crowded strand. He could feel the sickening impact of those terrible arrows, under the rain of which horses were rearing and plunging, men were staggering and cursing, and the emperor’s mission to Edeyrnion was being wiped out by the Derwydd’s archers. “Wiped out” were the actual words he now muttered aloud, while with his free hands, though both his arms were embracing the two tree trunks between which he stood, he began mechanically removing the black leaf mould that still clung to the end of his Gallic staff.

“I must show somebody where I left her,” he said to himself, as if repeating a lesson, “so that they can take her to Ty Cerrig.”

It was at that moment that three separate impressions reached him, each one of them enough to strike his consciousness with the force of a physical blow and to leave the imprint of an emotional bruise that would take some time to disappear.

One was the sight of a large white dog, rushing in and out of the confusion at the foot of the precipice. Another was the sudden appearance of three human figures advancing towards him along the path that skirted the descent above which he stood. These were a man and woman supporting between them a youth who was apparently badly wounded; for though he was able to walk he kept up a loud self-pitying monologue interspersed with groans and lamentations, as his companions, or at least as his feminine companion, helped him along.

His male companion appeared to be vigorously protesting against this tenderness in the woman and imploring her to forsake the young man, so that they might do together the more quickly whatever it was they had in their minds to do.

It was the third impression, however, that sank the deepest into Brochvael’s consciousness. The white hound’s rapid movements amid the confusion of men and horses and murderous arrows, the approaching couple quarrelling over their groaning companion, were apparitions that retreated into the background of his mind compared with this third thing.

The white dog, like the men and horses, was a moving object in the midst of other moving objects. The three figures approaching him were moving objects in the midst of rocks and trees and bracken. But what arrested and absorbed his attention now were two motionless figures down there in the very centre of the confusion. The first was the figure of a kneeling man, of large and ungainly stature, wrapped in a black mantle, and the second was the figure of a sparely built youth, seated so close to the other that no space was visible between them. The man was crouching on his knees, all hunched up with his skull pressed into the earth. The youth was sitting cross-legged and so near the hunched-up man that if the light hadn't been propitious, and Brochvael's vision far-sighted, they would have looked like one enormously corpulent and abnormally broad-shouldered human being grovelling in the mud before some supernatural presence.

"Grovelling" may be too strong a word, but the person down there was engaged in some kind of absorbing worship or abstracted prayer; though what his youthful companion was doing it was impossible to guess. Sharpening a weapon? Drawing a picture? Reading or writing something? No! From the youth's proximity to him that ponderous-looking figure in the mantle — and the mantle belonged to a much older tradition in soothsayers' garments than his own Etrurian one — could hardly, our agitated watcher decided, be other than the emperor's counsellor himself, and if the youth was his attendant the chances were in favour of his being absorbed in the concentrated and elaborate working but of some fatal magic spell!

Brochvael had barely reached this shrewd conclusion when all three impressions — the white dog, the couple arguing over the groaning man, and this hunched-up figure in a mantle with the slim youth at his side — became inextricably linked by a new occurrence of startling and alarming significance.

A tall dapple-grey horse, beside itself with terror, its bridle trailing along the ground, was now rushing round and round in ever-narrowing circles, between the arrow shooters and the horsemen with their lances, like a mad creature; and it was being closely followed by the white dog, who kept leaping up at it and uttering long-drawn, heart-stricken howls.

Both these fate-bearing creatures, the dapple-grey one and the white one, came at length to a pause, the horse moving slowly and feebly round the points of the compass in an apparent attempt to keep its head in proximity with the head of its agitated and obsessed companion.

But it was clear to all four watchers, for the woman had propped the wounded youth against the trunk of one of the two pines, while the man was whispering in Brochvael's ear things of which he heard not a single word, that the apparition of the dapple-grey horse thus welcomed by the white hound had changed the whole situation and brought — if not peace between the conflicting parties — at least a tragic and pitiful, though it might be only momentary, suspension of conflict.

The man who had had his skull pressed against the earth was now staggering, grotesquely, dizzily, clumsily, to his feet; while the youth who had been so intensely absorbed in his. Platonic calculation or his sorcerer's art was on his feet too and had rushed to stop a man who was trying to catch the horse by its trailing bridle, apparently to expostulate with him for interfering with the occult purposes of inspired animals.

But now both sides in the conflict were all intermingled and indistinguishable, while starting from some point on the outskirts a cry of grief commenced, a cry which quickly increased in volume, till it reached at last something that was little different from a universal lamentation.

"What is it? Do you know what it is? They haven't killed my brother, have they?" Brochvael addressed this question to the dark curly-headed personage at his side.

But the pacific lord of the impressionable Lela seemed only able to lurch nervously from side to side, lacking words to speak. In plain fact the laughing philosopher from Ogof-y-Gawr was at that moment on the brink of bursting into great heaving sobs.

“Do you understand what’s happened?” This time Brochvael addressed the woman who was bending over the groaning man, solicitously following with her fingers the rumpled passage through his tunic and vest to the bandaged wound in his hip against which he kept pressing his hand.

“There!” she murmured, with an absorbed tenderness that showed how little she cared about the problem as to what had caused all this uproar. “There! You can feel yourself that the blood’s not coming through! I told you I’d put something round it that would soak it up. The arrow’s only cut the flesh. It went out as cleanly as it went in.”

“But it hurts! It hurts! You don’t know how it hurts!” moaned the young man. “It’s the poison! I know it’s the poison!” he went on. “I can feel it beginning to creep through all my veins.”

The woman turned her anxious face towards Brochvael now, but she completely disregarded the question he had put to her.

“Will you please tell him, my Lord,” she pitifully begged, “that arrow wounds always hurt like that, especially when the shaft’s gone clean through and there’s nothing left in the flesh. It’s the air getting in that makes the smarting so bad.” And she added in a different tone for Brochvael’s benefit: “Canna always says that arrow wounds want the air kept out. It’s Prince Galahaut of Surluse,” she went on in a whisper. “He’s only a boy,” she added gently. “He’s been softly reared, you know, and isn’t as used to this dreadful fighting as some of them down there are. He’s very sensitive. It’s his skin. His skin’s so terribly soft. It’s much softer, you know, my Lord, than most of them up this way.”

She paused and then added, in a tone of grave and dreamy awe: “He really is the Prince of Surluse, and I know who it was who hit him! I saw him single him out — the mean coward! — I saw him draw his bow and what’s more I know—”

But at this point Amreu ap Ganion brushed his wife aside.

"The horse, the horse, my Lord! It's Owain Pen Uchel's dapple-grey mare. He spoke to me just now. He says Princess Tonwen and the Gwr yr Avanc went off yesterday together on that horse to find the emperor. He says the Saeson have murdered them both! He knows because he gave them the horse. And my Lord Rhun's Drudwyn knows too, because he's been stabled since Thursday with the horse. And with your permission, Arglwydd Brochvael, I'd like to say this: I am thankful to God I shan't be the one to tell Princess Erddud that her sister's dead or taken by the Saeson! Why do you look at me like that, Arglwydd Brochvael? I'm no friend of Erim, the Brython hater, who has got Princess Esyllt to make a pact with Colgrim.

"It wasn't because of the Three Princesses, you understand, Arglwydd Brochvael, that Lela and I left Ogof-y-Gawr last night. It was only because of Erim's hold on Princess Esyllt, and what he was leading her into: sinning against Jesus, Lela and I call it; for he who doesn't believe that the Lamb is the Lamp of Peace, and that all who love fighting are damning themselves out of the light of that Lamp, and out of the presence of that Lamb, and out of the—"

He was interrupted at this point by a panic-stricken cry from the Prince of Surluse that brought Lela down on both her knees, and drew both her hands to the place in the young man's clothes where his frantic apprehension was once more endangering the value of her carefully folded bandage.

"Listen to me, Amreu ap Ganion."

Brochvael's tone had become a tone of authority, the tone of a brother of the Prince of Edeyrnion, and no sooner had the ex-steward caught that tone than he promptly turned his back on the frightened lad and the over-sympathetic woman and was at the service of the possessor of such a voice.

“Neither you nor anyone else, Amreu ap Ganion, will tell the Princess Erddud anything about the Princess Tonwen.”

He paused, for he saw the thick Iberian lips twitch ominously and the warm Iberian eyes begin to fill again with tears. But he added with a sudden exasperation: “And if the emperor doesn’t get here quickly, or my brother doesn’t send half of his bodyguard to Ogof-y-Gawr, it’ll need all her Derwydd’s arts to save the Princess Esyllt from her Saeson friends! But listen, Amreu, for I want to go down there now; and I want you to help me. Will you do exactly what I say?”

“Exactly, my Lord — except to go back down there, or to join any sort of un-Christian fighting anywhere.”

“Well then, it’s like this. You’ll find the Princess Erddud’s body by the side of this path” — he gave a jerk with his head— “a furlong or two from Ty Cerrig. I want you to carry her to Ty Cerrig. Will you do that? If Canna and Gwrgi aren’t there, you and Lela must make yourselves at home. Get any refreshment for yourselves you like, and for him too” — and he nodded towards Prince Galahaut— “but if you feel uneasy there — or Lela feels scared — with the Saeson so near — the best thing to do would be to lay the body on the ass you’ll find in the shed and carry the princess, and this wretched boy too, straight on to the Gaer, where I expect by this time my brother has begun getting our defences in order. You’ve followed exactly all I’ve said, Amreu?”

He spoke gently to the man for it was clear that these two deaths coming together had upset the soft-hearted steward. But the discerner of masterful tones put this gentleness to its proper account and hurriedly replied that he would obey him to the letter.

It was clear from the look on the man’s face while Brochvael gave him further instructions as to what to do with the dead princess of Ogof-y-Gawr and with the wounded prince of the land of Surluse that it was an indescribable and immediate relief to him to be under clear, definite, and comprehensible orders, and orders given him, too, neither by a rival servant like Erim, nor by an arbitrary and fanatical old woman like Erim's mistress.

"I understand you are Prince Galahaut?" said Brochvael, addressing the wounded youth and speaking gravely and respectfully, though without any warm sympathy. But seeing from the boy's expression that he had no thought to spare for anything but the smarting of his hurt and his mental dread that his wound was poisoned, he confined himself to informing him that he was going to be taken at once either to a house built of stone, and with comfortable weatherproof chambers, or to the Gaer itself, where the Prince of Edeyrnion would be responsible to the emperor for his welfare.

Before leaving them Brochvael turned once more to the ex-steward of the Three Modrybedd, now reduced to one, and enquired sternly whether he understood exactly what he had to do and exactly where Erddud's body lay.

The deep full sound of the double-dyed affirmative iawn was the most significant portion of the man's reply; and as this was accompanied by one of the richest and most radiant of his smiles, and by one of the most devoted and doglike of the looks of which his luminous brown eyes were capable, Brochvael felt certain that he would be obeyed.

"Jesus be in your bread, Arglwydd!" was the response he received to the nod he gave him as he turned away; but both the finality of that reverberating iawn, and the heroic undertone, like the primitive hospitality of a nomad's tent, of the mingling of the word "bread" with the word "Jesus," made his struggle with that risky climb of his boyhood a lot easier than he had expected.

It turned him aside, when he was nearly at the bottom, from the straight descent he remembered so well, and led him down a less precipitous slope, drawing him on, easily and naturally enough, along a forgotten sidetrack, till he came to a sort of terrace, where he found himself confronted by the stone of a ruined sheepfold, overgrown by a covering of deep, soft, emerald green moss.

He was quite close to the bottom of the slope now, quite near to what was going on, but it seemed impossible to him at that moment to do anything but stop and gaze at the spectacle presented to him over the surface of those mossy stones.

Was it the reverberation of that trouble-quelling, soul-satisfying iawn or was it some verbal magic about the association of the word “Jesus” with the word “bread” that plunged him just then into a trance of atrophied but not unhappy quiescence? Or was it neither of these things, but the far-off, world-distant calling to him of the bewildered animula vagula of Auntie Erddud, wrenched too quickly and too violently from its life socket by its own desperate bursting into flame?

The scene he was now staring at was indeed a startling one for any grandson of Edeyrn ap Cunedda; but with the fate of his House, his home, his race, his prince, his emperor, not to speak of his own daughter, in the balance, he had enough imagination to ask himself whether it wasn’t a little unnatural, in fact whether it wasn’t altogether monstrous, that he could lean his chin on that moss-cushioned parapet and fall into a detachment as complete as if he’d been dipped in Lethe?

He actually found himself noting with something akin to malicious amusement, though as he yielded to this emotion he seemed in some odd way to be identifying himself with the grey slab of ancient masonry of whose rough edges he was dreamily conscious as they protruded themselves beyond the green moss, how unsympathetic and even hostile to the human scene now presented to him were the sounds he could hear proceeding from the four feathery throats at the back of four brittle beaks, that were at that sunlit hour uttering their harsh, discordant, and it would almost seem derisive disapproval.

"That croak is a raven's," he told himself, "that scream is a jay's, that cry's a jackdaw's, and that angry jeering's a green woodpecker's. The doves and the pigeons are quite dumb. They must be tired of trying to soothe and soften our human madness."

It was indeed as if, with those four querulous voices as its background — and Brochvael having so recently unrolled the Comedy of The Birds could add the voice of the epops to that wrangling succession — the whole drama of what he was seeing had been pushed backwards both in Time and Space, so that between him and it there came to exist a misty haze that had the power of dimming what he saw and muting what he heard to a vanishing point of indistinctness and unreality.

"I suppose," he said to himself, "those eyebrows of the Derwydd are still lifted in wonder as to whether it will be he or the counsellor that will survive this contest. That must be the counsellor standing over there like a great tremulous black-feathered hen, guarding those lads and horses as if they were its chickens! Mother of God! And there is the Derwydd along with Auntie Esyllt and that damned Erim — Christ in Heaven! and our precious priest too! And there must be at least a couple of hundred archers and javelin throwers with them.

"That little band of horsemen wouldn't have a chance — not a chance — against that crowd, if they really closed round them! And they're only waiting for the word. That crazy dapple-grey horse, and Rhun's white dog jumping round it, have brought a momentary lull — but it'll begin again in a minute!

“It certainly looks as if Auntie Tonwen were dead. But maybe that hermit of hers has simply carried her off. Poor old Auntie Esyllt! She looks as if she were dead too — dead and buried, many times over!

“Oh, the devil! She drew away then from that infernal priest as if she’d seen him murdering my son! Yes, yes, Auntie Esyllt! Get safe the other side of your Derwydd, and let your clever silentiary deal with our damned priest! But, Mother of God! What’s that counsellor up to now? Is he hurt? Has he been hit by a poisoned arrow? No! He’s on the ground again. He’s praying again, or whatever he does! Morfydd and Porius must be married by now. There’s that boy again. By the gods, it’s a tablet for writing he’s got in his hands! He must be that boy bard, Taliesin, whom Einion refused to have in the Gaer. He seems to be taking things coolly enough now, strolling about and asking questions, as if he were at the market rather than on a battlefield! And who the devil — oh, it’s that Jewish doctor Canna told me about.

“And by heaven she was right! He has got a ram’s horn, or some kind of a horn, in his hand. But what’s this? Are they going to let that murdering priest speak? Yes, they are! The Derwydd’s pulling Auntie Esyllt back, and the archers are unstringing their bows.

“And the horsemen themselves are moving nearer to hear. What a chance for a real orator to swing them all into line! ‘Equites and archers, emperor’s men, and Derwydd’s men, I’m calling on you—’ someone really ought to have the power to rush them together in one great wave against the Saeson!”

His fingers were twitching at the edge of the sun-warmed stone where the moss came to an end. And the odd thing was he saw this moment, quite clearly, quite calmly, quite coldly, as one of the critical moments of his life. Should he throw his Gallic staff over the wall now, very now, and hoist himself up, and scramble across these mossy stones, and rush down the grassy slope, and fling himself between the two parties, and toss the priest aside, and implore them all, Brythons, Romans, and Iberians for the sake of Ynys Prydein, their island home, to follow the Prince of Edeyrnion against the invader?

"No," he told himself, "I cannot do it. And what's more I cannot blame myself for not being able to do it."

And calmly, quietly, coolly, and even with a certain earthy, animal-like satisfaction, certainly without the faintest trace of remorse or shame or self-lacerating discomfort, he decided that there were certain limitations to his character where heroism and initiative were concerned that it would be, to use the Homeric expression, more in accordance with "the propriety of destiny" to accept than to try to transcend them by frantic and desperate efforts.

"Perhaps," he said to himself, "when that great hunched-up idiot of a counsellor hears the fellow's voice he'll stop praying to Pluto for an earthquake and set in motion some really effective spell. Or perhaps the wretch will see how Esyllt and the Derwydd have drawn away from him, and lose heart."

But Brochvael was soon being forced to confess that a priest who in the ancient land of the Ordovices, the tribe of all tribes in Ynys Prydein the most touchy and truculent about names, had dared to change the "Ford of Mithras" into "Corwen," was not likely to be deterred from following what the Ordovician Brythons used to call his ael, or "goal," by the lifted eyebrow of the last of the forest druids or by the cold aversion of the last of the forest princesses, least of all by the silent praying to unknown chthonian demons of an old animal-taming conjurer like Myrddin Wyllt!

And as if all this wasn't enough, here he himself was, behind this mossy wall, compelled to listen to an harangue that his intellect — whatever his instincts might feel — couldn't help recognizing as a masterpiece of crafty argument, just the same kind of argument — didn't he know it well? — as had set them murdering his son.

"It is there," yelled the priest, "it is there, in that cowering crouching figure, who for so long has been perverting the mind of our Lord the Emperor, that we must look for the poison, the plague spot, the festering sore, the devil's canker, the subtle medium for the fumes and stenches and reeking pits of pestilence by which our land is blighted!

"Ride your horses over that spawn of hell, my brave boys! Look at him, how he crouches there, gross, hideous, excremental, obscene! A corrupting taint he is upon the pure shore of this sacred water! Ride over him! Tread him into the mud with your horses' hooves! 'Tis he, he, he, not any of you, that these indignant ones here, my devoted and most faithful children of the Holy Forest, cannot abide should remain on this sacred soil!

"Just pull your horses back a little, brothers of mine, and you'll soon see, from the showers of arrows that'll be poured into him, yes! into the loathsome lump of offal, that leprous heap of fetid defilement, huddling so vilely there in his filthy panic and calling upon his devils to help him, what our Christ-worshipping forest people feel on this day of their ancient Feast of the Autumn Sowing!

"Oh, how that unholy, huddled-up, monstrous toad over there hates the very name of the Blessed Trinity! He has even dared to declare, as Christ's poor servants in Caergwynt and Caerleon and Caerloyw and Caerlyr have told me, that one of the worst of these devils in human flesh that those thrice-accurst Greeks called 'Philosophers,' a prize devil, a master devil, a dragon-tailed devil, a great ramping, roaring, ram's-horn devil called Pythagoras swore that the number four and not the number three was the secret of God's most holy cosmos. Yes! yes! yes! That cowering lump of Satan's dung over there, calling in vain upon Hell to aid him — he is the cause, he alone and only he is the cause, of the landing of the Saeson on these shores! Ride over him, horsemen of the emperor! Loose your arrows upon him, people of the forest!

"For even as I speak to you on the brink of this lake, even as that archdevil crouches before you there like a squatting spawn of the ancient dragon escaped for a time and a time and half-a-time from beneath the lake of fire, the Saeson are already — the voice of Christ in my heart tells me so, and the death of Princess Tonwen bears witness to its truth! — within a few furlongs of this water! Let us therefore, O soldiers of Christ, let us in the name of the Blessed Mystery of the Trinity and in the miraculous power of the most holy number three, fling to these savages what's left of this enemy of the human race, whose devilish magic even they, unbaptized heathen as they are, loathe as much as we do!

"We will make the Saeson respect our wives and children by throwing to them the fleshly fragments of this devil in human shape, to whom no less than three holy fathers, good and loyal friends of my own, have sworn to me, yes! on the nails of the cross, that the emperor has sold his soul!

"Only one man at his court, they assure me, and he is Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch, the emperor's nephew, has defied the arts of this spawn of Satan, peering down now into the Pit and calling upon his legions! Ride over him, ride over him, ride over him, Lords and Masters of the emperor's guard! Pierce him with your arrows, my faithful forest people, so that none may know him, he'll be so covered with your shafts!

"Yes, let us save our holy places from profanation and our daughters from desecration! Let us fling to these Cerberuses such a devil's sop that they'll spew up their unbaptized souls for Hell to snatch at! Ride him down, my Lords and gentlemen! Riddle him with your arrows, my free friends of the forest!

"You all know well how he came — and who gave him the chance to cajole the emperor to bid him come! He came at the request of this Antichrist called John; this John who is now dying in his unredeemed guilt and adding to his own sin that of all the couples he's been pretending this day to unite! This man John has no right to marry anyone. He's an accurst heretic, seduced by that blasphemer Pelagius, for whom there's no such thing as the Fall, no such thing as Original Sin!

"Come now, you soldiers of Christ, come now, you avengers of Christ upon the workers of iniquity! When we've dealt with this hellish magician here, we'll go on to the cell of this lecherous old monkey who called himself John, this Brother of the drivelling dotage of Pelagius, this Brother of the Order of the Deed of Darkness, this Brother of the Convent of Free Will, this Brother who denies predestination, this Brother who believes that man is naturally good, this Brother who teaches that those of us who hate, loathe, and void our excrement upon the evil thing, those of us who live to crush it under our feet and under the feet of our horses are lacking in Christian charity!

"Yes, when we've finished with the Antichrist of Magic we'll go on to the Antichrist of Reason, and we'll never stop till — till Christ and the Soldiers of Christ rule Ynys Prydein from coast to coast!"

Thus the priest's voice resounded westwards over the surface of the lake; thus it resounded eastwards over Brochvael's head; thus it resounded over the rocks of the precipice behind him; and the further the voice went on its way, the more remote from human emotions it became, and the more charged it became with an unearthly force.

It was in fact as if some deep, impersonal, metaphysical vibration had been set working by the voice, a vibration that the priest's demiurge had at its creation inserted into this complicated world in order that at a skilful touch it should at once begin to indicate the inevitable perdition of the advocates of the number four, and the inevitable redemption of the advocates of the number three.

Like the harsh cry of a supernatural raven 'mid the squawks of homely jackdaws it went resounding on, growing, as it went, more and more inhuman, and more and more remote from all ordinary reality.

Finally the priest's voice reached the spot where lay the body of Auntie Erddud. Whether a dead body has power of absorbing and neutralizing a deadly curse is an open question; but the fact remains that no sooner had the voice arrived at the old woman's corpse than it ceased to travel through Space, and lost itself in that absolute nothingness which is so appalling to some minds and so comforting to others. The voice was lost in fact with that sort of abrupt shock that we experience when we unexpectedly touch the ice that is called cat ice, from beneath which all the water has been drawn away.

But ere this occurred, and while the priest's voice was still uttering his fearful maledictions and his fatal injunctions to blot out the evildoers from the face of the earth, injunctions to which it seemed that the dead alone could be impervious, Brochvael, who was mentally doing his utmost to range himself with these happy dead in his obliviousness to his son's murderer, and was hoping and praying that the curly-headed steward, who associated Jesus with peace and bread, rather than with the Trinity and Blood, was even then lifting Auntie Erddud from the ground, became aware, as indeed did every living thing within what might roughly be called a mile of Saint Julian's Fount, of a startling change in the atmosphere.

Tightening his Italian mantle round him and beginning to shiver a little, Brochvael could see that Auntie Esyllt was saying something to Erim, and that the Derwydd was saying something to Auntie Esyllt, and that the staring excited crowd of the Derwydd's followers were letting their bows sink down to their sides and removing the arrows from their strings.

He could see that the emperor's horsemen were nervously stroking the necks of their horses, settling themselves in their saddles, and turning their proud young heads and the points of their enormous lances in the extreme opposite direction from that towards which this frantic champion of the Mystery of Three against the Magic of Four was throwing his deadly indictment.

Nor was this change in the atmosphere a merely physical phenomenon. It was a psychic one, and it affected everybody. Long ere his summons to the catastrophic crushing of magic and heresy in the name of Christ had reached even an approach to its final climax, which when it arrived was broken off as abruptly, as miserably, as finally, as a mistletoe-bearing bough in an equinoctial storm, the impassioned priest became himself aware of this phenomenal change.

A chill of a peculiar kind, of a unique and unnatural kind, had fallen upon that portion of Edeyrnion. And it was accompanied by the rapid arrival upon the scene from the direction of Cader Idris of a wet, cold, clammy, straw-coloured mist, a mist that was unmistakably of the kind that can only be described poetically since any scientific description would require a lifetime of chemical analysis based on minute daily physiognomic observation.

A mist of this sort can be delineated however by some poetical image, or better still perhaps by some description of its physical effect that is at once very homely, very traditional, and very popular, such as the expression “struck by the mortal chill of a death sweat.”

Some sort of “mortal chill” — and there were unquestionably drops of sweat issuing from his feverish skin — did undoubtedly take possession just then of this inspired enemy of heathenism. The unfortunate man had worked himself up into such an abnormal heat — and who can tell what overstrainings, what desperate rendings and crackings of his vital instrument had taken place as he played this mad final tune on the chords of his inmost being? — that at this moment when his eloquence died down under the corpse-like chill of this unnatural niwl, or “death fog,” the shock was more than any life force could bear; and from the chattering of teeth, from the bony concussion of knees knocking together, from the violent pitilessness of shivering fits, that shook him as an arctic wolf might have shaken a desert dog, we may suspect that his poor human soul was thankful enough to receive its exeat or missa est, and to pass from the mystery of life to the mystery of death. Of one thing we may be sure, namely, that the priest’s disciples and pupils, and the whole inner circle of his Brythonic fellow Christians who laid him that same night before the altar of his unfinished church, did not grudge him the glory and honour and immortal memory of a martyr of the Catholic faith.

Shivering not a little himself and clutching his Gallic staff tightly by the middle, as if it were no staff at all but a short spear, Brochvael now clambered over the wall and was hurrying recklessly into the throng when his heart gave a jump in his body like the jump made by a fish at the bottom of a deep pond when it first feels the hook at the end of the line.

Standing dead still, as if the thick leather straps that he always preferred to sandals were frozen to the damp moss between two tussocks or, as Auntie

Tonwen had told him to call them, tyweirch, of swamp grass, he was suddenly conscious of two gigantic figures passing him by.

They were passing quite near to him and they were moving rapidly in the direction of Brother John's cell. They had — there was no mistake about this, even if they were a visual illusion called up by Myrddin Wyllt — the shape of human creatures. The larger one — for there was great difference in size between them — had the shape of a man, the smaller that of a woman.

Both seemed to be dressed in the skins of beasts. Neither carried any weapon. And it seemed to him that he was conscious of their smell as they passed him, a smell that struck him as strangely and mysteriously attractive, alluring, you might almost say, and such as, once inhaled, might leave behind a very curious craving, a desperate, unspeakable craving, a craving such as a particular kind of person, whether man or woman, might follow to destruction.

A few minutes later, when the chilly mist had departed and the sun had appeared again, Brochvael found himself explaining to none other than the Jewish doctor with the ram's horn that what they had both seen might possibly be only a mirage created by the projection of a pair of normal human shapes upon some unusual kind of mountain mist. He found himself engaged in an animated and confidential dialogue with this man before he realized that he had approached him; and he was obscurely slow in grasping the fact that it was he himself, and not the individual with the ram's horn, who had dilated at some length upon the scientific potentialities of illusory reflections upon mist.

He admitted to this intelligent stranger, to whom in his agitated mood it proved so easy to talk blindly, hardly knowing what he said, that what they had just seen had "given him a shock."

"And from that crowd over there it looks as if it's given our priest more than a shock. Well! I don't know what your ideas may be, Master, but if it turns out that that man has burst his heart by his fury, or had it burst for him by his terror of... whatever it is we've just seen, he won't be lamented by me!

"I don't know how much you know of us here, Master Doctor, but" — he stopped abruptly for it seemed clear to him from the look of things now that the priest really had given up the ghost— "but when I tell you that it was my son he worked on them to kill, you can understand — yes," he went on more quietly, "I don't know what your ideas are, but we must remember it's possible — and you can see," and he pointed to the crouching figure still huddled up with his forehead against the earth, "he's still doing something — possible, I say, that Myrddin Wyllt simply ensorcerized us all by his hud and lledrith — by his enchantments, I mean — into seeing those shapes."

"Yes, I know perfectly well what you mean, Brochvael ab Iddawc, but you must remember that 'those shapes,' as you call them, were very, very — what shall I say? — solid and quite different from the effect usually produced by witchcraft and magic, which, although physical enough, is physical with a difference. I am not speaking lightly or casually, Lord Brochvael, for our old Hebrew books that deal in these things include — well! pretty well everything that the human race had discovered in that realm!"

"But, Master, my Master," protested Brochvael, "you yourself received a terrific shock from what we both saw just now! I don't see why it shouldn't have been the work of a magician, forcing us to see — forcing us mentally, of course — to see what we saw. Your own face just now was white as chalk — did you know that? — yes! white as chalk, and your fingers, on that horn you're holding there, were shaking as if you had the palsy.

"And another thing you were doing, Doctor, probably without knowing it — but since you were the person I saw when Myrddin's enchantment, or whatever it was, released me, I naturally noticed you a good deal — you were tugging at your head as if you were trying to pull your hair out — yes! pull it out by its roots."

The Jew had begun to watch him closely as these details — somewhat insulting details — followed one another. And the truth is that later in the day, Brochvael himself felt he had been uncivil to this learned stranger.

"Well?" And he murmured this question rather peevishly: "How the devil do you yourself, Master, explain those two monstrosities?"

The Jew looked at him still more closely and then began speaking slowly and very carefully. "Suppose," he said, "you and I were two grass-eating oxen and were suddenly confronted by some earlier and more monstrous creature, a behemoth, let's say? Or suppose we were normal desert men suddenly faced by the sight of two of those beings called in Hebrew 'the sons of God,' from whose union with the daughters of men the Anakim were descended, striding over the sands and shoals and pools and swamps of Mesopotamia, wouldn't we turn 'as white as chalk,' wouldn't we open our mouths till we dribbled like idiots, Brochvael ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn?

"Or suppose we were a couple of languid, drowsily floating conger eels, drifting bellies up in the warm sunshine, and were suddenly conscious that the appalling head of a sea serpent with a horrible, scaly, naked neck, tufted with stinking seaweed like black horsehair, had stretched itself out of the waves at our side. Wouldn't we look queerly at each other when we met safe and sound at the bottom of the sea ooze? The truth is, my Lord Brochvael, you western peoples are too far removed from the lands where man first appeared. You’ve forgotten those swamps and shoals. You’ve forgotten what was sometimes seen in those sandstorms.

“You’ve forgotten those caves where the Anakim lived. You’ve forgotten those dead seas and what moved upon their margins. You’ve forgotten those forests of stone trees and the dragons in the reedy pools among those ruined habitations of men not made as we are made. You’ve forgotten—”

But Brochvael had had time to recover himself, and, as was natural with him, his mind reverted to his favourite books. He interrupted the doctor with a curiously complacent chuckle, a physical manifestation of the consciousness of superior knowledge, which always had a peculiarly irritating effect upon his son, though it rather endeared him than otherwise to his daughter.

“Mother of Earth!” he cried out, in the high-pitched voice he always used when quoting his favourite ancients. “I’ll tell you, stranger, what Hesiod would have called those giants, if giants they were. ‘Men of the Third Race’ he would have called them, whose armour was of bronze, whose houses were of bronze, whose implements were of bronze, and among whom ‘there was no black iron.’”

The Jewish doctor tapped with his knuckles on his ram’s horn. He tapped upon it a little Arabian lullaby, with which his wife was accustomed to lull their son Gog to sleep; and as he did this a rather wistful smile crossed his lips, an immemorially old desert smile, that put into their proportionate place, in the long history of humanity, not only Hesiod’s “bronze” race but his “silver” one too, and even perhaps his “golden” one.

But before he had time to comment on Brochvael’s words and while he was in the act of saying to himself, “The man’s quite happy, now that he’s plastered that rent in his nerves with some pedantic salve or some poetic lotion," they both became aware of a sudden uproar and a turbulent rushing together of the emperor's horsemen and the druid's archers.

That it was a very special rushing together they realized the second they were conscious of it. What they now saw was indeed a scene of wild and exultant reconciliation and fraternization. Many of the horsemen had even leapt from their horses and were talking eagerly and passionately to little attentive groups of their former enemies.

But suddenly there was a deep hush; and Brochvael and the doctor could clearly make out the dark, enormous, unwieldy head of Myrddin Wyllt swaying a little from side to side as it uttered its mandates, as if it were the head of an inanimate automaton or at least of a deus mortuus, or a "corpse god," risen from its tomb, but towering now by reason of its height over them all.

The phrase Pen Annwn, "Head of Hades," floated into Brochvael's mind as he tried to catch what this dark swaying head was uttering. But at last a word did reach him, and reach his companion too, nor was it the first time since his arrival in Edeyrnion that the Jew had heard those particular syllables.

They were familiar enough to Brochvael, of course, as a sort of slang word for the unclassified ordinary men and women of Ynys Prydein, such as were neither Romanized rulers nor privileged Brythonic princes of Castell or Cantref, of Dinas or Gaer, nor yet unscrupulous invaders from the North Sea, nor yet uncivilized marauders of Gwyddyl-Ffichti descent.

But just because they were so familiar to him, so colloquially, so diurnally familiar to him, just because they carried with them for him so prehistoric an undertone of communal existence, just because they were so steeped in all the planetary usages, the immemorial human usages, of the kindly generations, unblighted by what Homer calls "the pitiless bronze of tearful war," he had never imagined as conceivable that they — of all racial syllables in the wide world the least aggressive and the most evasive — should become a trumpet call of defence and a rallying cry of refuge.

The word was the word "Cymry"; and no sooner had it been flung out upon the air by Myrddin Wyllt's enormous head — that darkly looming head with its great flapping animal-like ears that was swaying now from side to side, above spearmen and archers, above horses and riders, as if it were the decapitated head of Bendigeitfran, the head of the never-dying yet eternally dead Being, whose destined nature it was to be the ghastly but imperishable medium between the buried past and the newborn future — than it was caught up in a thundering shout from thousands of ecstatic throats — Cymry! Cymry! Cymry! Cymry! — and went echoing away over Saint Julian's Water towards the up-tide current of the Divine River, the current that ran unchanged through the centre of Tegid's Lake, echoing far away on the further side of that lake, echoing up the gorges and tarns and precipices of the Cader itself, whither those monstrous shapes of the true aboriginals of Ynys Prydein had, as so many now believed, actually come and gone!

CHAPTER XXII. The Marriage Tent

IT MUST HAVE BEEN several minutes before the dapple-grey mare, riderless, crazed with fright, and encircled by the leaps and bounds of the white hound, had shamed the combatants into quiescence, that Porius lifted Morfydd across the entrance to their bridal tent. His favourite southwest wind, by carrying away all sound of the violence that had arisen, spared him the necessity of choosing at that crisis between love and war.

The Fisher King's chant had been the signal for a general rushing together of the sexes, and a great number of these encounters were undoubtedly taking place at the same moment, not all of them by any means at the same distance from the uproar or spared awareness of it by the same relation to the wind.

Porius's heavy bodily movements were accompanied this morning as they always were — and never indeed more so than at this crucial occasion of his life — by the most erratic, the most wayward, the most fantastic thoughts. Never had any woman, in all the long years of human history in this part of the forest, sacrificed her virginity to so small a portion of her lover's personality.

But this suited Morfydd's present mood very well. He was what he had always been, her calm, patient, considerate, submissive, affectionate subject. She knew that even now, at this supreme consummation of their betrothal, she had only to make the faintest sign of repugnance, of distaste, of resistance, of a desire to put off this moment, to put it off — it might be — for good and all, and he would obey her without a protest, without growing sulky, without getting angry, without making any desperate appeal.

And not only so; but she knew, if her distaste amounted to a necessity for their separation, he would defend her to the uttermost against all and sundry and take upon himself full responsibility for the consequence.

And this submissiveness of her good-natured Hercules suited her just then almost startlingly well. She too was living her life in her own way. If it suited his method of existence to take possession of her with no more than a tenth part of his personality, it suited hers to be so taken. It left her free. And henceforth to the end of her days she intended to remain free.

She felt still, even while she was suffering the pain of her ravishment, she felt still, even while she realized there was more blood than she expected, she felt still, even while she was caught in the sex-drugged abandonment of her own response, that she could never love this powerful and submissive man as she loved Rhun; but in a manner that surprised herself she felt proud that by her will and her spirit and her vow — in fact by all that was most individual about her, all that was most intimately herself, all that was the essential Morfydd within her — she had conquered, and on this day of all days too, the old ancestral aboriginal tynged laid upon women by the irresponsible god of love.

The knowledge that she had an absolute power over this remote, mysterious "strong man" of their tribe, under whose inviolable protection she and her children would be safe from their enemies, gave her the feeling that henceforward she would be able to do what she liked in life; yes! even to — though she stopped herself there with the deliciously sweet sensation of a curious sort of interior guile — even to giving the moral complacency of friend Rhun a few subtle jolts.

And it was just because this was not Rhun, just because she was not in love with this formidable, docile, absentminded Hercules, against whose ribs, while intermittent nervous vibrations still followed each other through her limbs, she now drowsily cuddled, that she could let herself be herself, lazily, carelessly, heedlessly, indifferently, inconsiderately, treating him in fact as if he were a huge, docile animal, whose feelings she could assume to be friendly, whose behaviour she could govern with a nod or a murmur, and whose devotion to herself, without the need for her to make the faintest effort to retain it, remained an unfailing background.

A most actual and living background he assuredly was at this moment, as he lay with his left arm securely round her body, while, with his profile turned away from her brown hair and brittle skull, which were resting on his chest, he kept his small bear's eyes lazily open, watching the entrance of the tent.

He couldn't turn completely round, because, in the reaction from their amorous embraces, his own head had sunk into the space between their two pillows, a space into which there had descended by this time such an entanglement of Nesta's verdurous decorations as not only to tickle his neck and his cheeks, but, in the case of one twisted spray of darkly veined ivy, to cling to his hair in a manner that suggested Thessaly rather than Edeyrnion.

Morfydd was asleep now — the best sign she could have given him that she was free from agitation and discomfort — and he could let his mind wander over the whole cosmos of his consciousness while a delicious drowsiness invaded his satisfied senses.

He had often lain like this before but never with a woman whose virginity he had just taken, and it pleased him to fancy that these long, slow, tranquilly rolling ripples of sex satisfaction resembled those other drowsily curving time waves, though he never pretended to himself he could remember them, rocking so gently upon the brimming sea of contentment, such as every child born into the world may be imagined feeling, in its first independent falling asleep after its navel string is cut.

In his present mood of drowsy deliciousness, with no thought of any duty save not to go entirely to sleep, and no visible object demanding his attention save the flapping tent edges at the entrance to his sanctuary, he found that the primordial phenomenon of fighting and killing, as opposed to the equally primeval phenomenon of begetting and being born, had the power, at least for a deeply satisfied animal nature like his and especially when this nature was half-lulled to sleep, of presenting a nebulous picture of a vast upheaving life-and-death struggle between gigantic sluggish aboriginals and desperate prehistoric invaders, a picture in which, though he had no difficulty about identifying the aboriginals with the Cewri of Cader Idris, he was left uncertain whether the invaders who were attacking these easygoing Goliaths with showers of javelins and arrows were Romanized Brythons like himself or early tribes of savage Ffichti as yet undisturbed by the “pitiless bronze” of the first migratory Gwyddyl.

It was indeed through a narrow chink “between sleep and wake” that he watched this prehistoric struggle, out of whose arena he could imagine certain embraces of love that were destined to bring forth some world-saving birth. But it was all suddenly dispersed into a vapour of obscure shapes. And in place of it came the real world. Sharply he caught the voices, high-pitched and even childish, but overlaid with a rather ghastly overtone, an accent obviously acquired at court, of those two little pages called Fflam and Tegvan whom he had seen so many times in the company of Neb ap Digon.

They were standing together just outside the opening of the tent, and he could imagine with beautiful precision the cause of their appearance. They had been sent by that infernal witch Nineue solely for the purpose of spying on him and his bride in their first sleep!

The torches at his bed's head had long ago burnt themselves out and the logs on the floor had been extinct for hours, but the sun entered with such a golden blaze of light and through such a large opening in the tent's mouth, that though to his eyes, contemplating them from above the rounded ridge of his outer pillow, a ridge that in that stream of dazzlement took the form of a dark curving line that might have been the horizon of an arctic sea of frozen whiteness, their childish heads appeared like little round balls of solid darkness floating in a transparent waterfall of golden motes, to their eyes the sleepily amused smile that flickered across his heavy face when he caught sight of them was a signal for an impassioned colloquy between them, every word of which was distinctly audible to him, as to whether they should address him or not.

"Fflam!" he whispered as loudly as he dared. "Tegvan!" he added in the tremendous silence that followed. And instantaneously those two little round black balls in the golden blaze of that swaying space between the tent's hangings drew together, and he felt that all four eyes were fixed intently upon him.

Nor did it escape him that there was something almost comical in the fact that such extremely small personages should, by ceasing their birdlike chatter and concentrating so intently their childish observation, be able to evoke such a deep silence.

And the odd thing was that this same silence which seemed to emanate from the blaze of golden light, in which wavered those two black dots, which had come to resemble a couple of wild plums suspended in a luminous haze, was only deepened for him, and not broken at all, by sundry little movements and uneven breathings that Morfydd made in her deep sleep.

There were really — though none knew it but herself — no less than three nights of disturbed sleep, to be made up for in the hidden economy of the girl’s spirit, and now that she had let herself sink into happy quiescence like a blissful little mackerel between the fins of a great sturgeon, Nature’s blind obstinacy of recovery was asserting itself irrespective of everything else.

“Come in, Fflam!” he whispered. “Come in, Tegvan!” he repeated.

With the caution of two microscopic pawns come suddenly to life upon a golden chessboard the small creatures, whose faded court colours of yellow and green looked blacker than ever in that blaze of sunshine, slipped across the threshold and stared with the dilated eyes of dragonfly grubs at what they saw in front of them.

“Will you go on a couple of errands for me, Fflam and Tegvan?” he whispered. They both nodded furiously. “Well, children,” he went on, “the first thing I want you to do is to run across to Brother John’s cell and find out if he’s still conscious of what he’s saying, and if the Henog of Dyfed, and Taliesin Pen Beirdd, who were with him at dawn when the Lady Morfydd and I were married, are still there, or whether the Jewish doctor has taken their place? The second thing I want you to do is to go down to the shore where the Derwydd is, and bring me the last news. I’m getting up soon, but I don’t want to wake my wife till I’m forced to.”

Both the little creatures resumed their violent noddings. Then, becoming suddenly stiff and very grave, they advanced a few feet along the floor and began to speak. And Fflam said, “The trouble’s got worse down there where the Derwydd is and the chanting.” And Tegvan said, “They’ve started shooting arrows at our young lords and killing their horses.” And Fflam said, “The counsellor is there; but he does nothing but kneel on the ground and hide his head in the earth.”

Porius made a sign for them to come closer, and when they did so they held each other's hands, as if to support each other in this risky enterprise.

"If either of you," he said, "would like to earn a golden coin as big as that one over there with the head of Caesar" — and he made a motion with his own head in the direction of Aulus's marriage gift— "you'll only have to go, first to the Brother's cell, and then to where they've been dipping the lance, and bring me news of what's happening. You needn't go close, you know, just near enough to see if they're still fighting, and whether my lords, the emperor's riders, are still holding their own, and whether it looks as if it would go on till nightfall. I may get up and come and see for myself. And if I do we'll probably meet; but if we don't meet, you might come back here and tell my wife what you've seen, and she'll tell me when I've come back from Brother John's."

The living pawns in their green-and-yellow colours exchanged a rapid look.

"Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd is outside," began Tegvan, taking the initiative for the first time. In doing this he called Porius's attention to the fact that between the two little round faces, under the almost identical curly, reddish hair it was Tegvan's eyes that had the friendlier expression, Fflam's the shrewder.

And the man in the bed also noticed that at this moment Fflam's eyes were invisible under their screwed-up lids. "He wasn't going to tell me a word of this!" thought Porius.

"And Morgant the Derwydd's man with him," added Fflam.

"Drom, their other man," went on Tegvan, "holds to the Derwydd still, but the Derwydd's brother says 'all is up,' and Morgant says 'all is up,' and they're sitting on the stump of a willow by the water, waiting."

"Waiting? What for?" enquired Porius.

There was something that caused him a faint irritation in this picture of Llew and Morgant seated irresponsibly on a willow stump awaiting destiny. But Fflam's spiteful reply caused him to feel ashamed of this envious annoyance.

"For another master," said Fflam. "For you, Prince Porius."

"Well," he said, "off you go, little ones! And if you want a piece of gold bring me news from where they dipped the lance; but anyway bring me news from the Brother's cell."

When they were gone he listened with intense attention to his wife's breathing. No, she was sunk as deep in the undersea of sleep as Pwyll Pen Dyfed in the bed of the Queen of Annwn, when for courtesy's sake he neither spoke to her nor touched her till the twelve months were over.

Tighter than ever he pressed the girl against his side. His left arm had begun to hurt him a good deal, having been under her so long, but it hadn't gone numb, and the knowledge that he would have to extricate it soon and get out of bed made him very unwilling to make any superogatory move.

"All is up," he repeated, wondering how much the treble voices of Fflam and Tegvan changed the peculiar intonation with which the shamefaced brother of the last of the druids of Edeyrnion must have uttered those three syllables full of a pessimism so absolute that it sounded astronomical.

"All is up," he repeated, "and that applies," he thought, "to the Roman Empire as much as to druidism! And now comes Christianity advancing from shoal to shoal, like water seeking its level! But what'll happen when it finds its level? That is the question! What will the stars have for us next?"

And Porius remembered how once he'd heard the Henog arguing that the rise and fall of religions depended on the signs of the zodiac. "It's the zodiacal signs that rule the world today. They are the divine powers." And then he remembered how the Henog maintained that it was Pisces that had now begun to exert its force. “Pisces must rule for two thousand years,” the Henog had said, “and then Aquarius must take its place.”

The pain in the arm on which Morfydd slept, her head rising and falling with every breath he took, and her own breath growing momently smoother and more completely escaped from all sublunary misery, the pain, I say, in his arm now became quite a prominent element in his contemplations.

“Of course in real truth,” he said to himself, “my actual philosophy of life is purely and simply my ‘cavoseniargizing.’ And I’ve got to face the fact that when extreme pain comes on the scene ‘all’s up,’ and instead of our consciousness filling the mental field the demon of pain’s consciousness covers the ground, sucking the marrow out of our bones, eating the eyes out of our sockets, licking the lifeblood out of our veins. No! ‘Cavoseniargizing’ isn’t a philosophy. And thank goodness it isn’t.

“No man can have a philosophy that covers the whole of life. It’s not intended by Nature. No, sweetheart!” and he invoked the body that was hurting his arm and the head that lay on his chest and the steady breathing that from infancy had so often reassured old Canna. “You, along with every other wise woman, know that!”

He now set himself to push the hurting in his arm to the back of his consciousness while he gave himself up to a minor orgy of his cherished “cavoseniargizing”. And as he did this he vaguely wondered how far the drunkenness, greediness, and amorousness of the Hercules of tradition were attributes that naturally accompanied the especial kind of muscular strength he possessed.

And his inability to “take sides” too, perhaps! “But how can I take sides?” he thought, “when I loathe poisoned arrows and, not a bit less, hate tournament lances, Roman horses, stirrup cups, and ladies’ favours?”

And he set himself to take possession of his immediate surroundings with all his senses, beginning with his wife's soft breathing and including, for it was part of his life worship to include certain things, or at least segments of certain things, which naturally caused him disgust rather than satisfaction, the small malicious screwed-up eyelids of Fflam, for instance, when Tegvan was telling about Llew ap Greidawl waiting his destiny on the willow stump!

And in order to give this process its full scope he imagined himself taking hold of this absurd pain in his arm, which he could have brought to an end in a minute by the simple process of getting out of bed, and having got hold of it he imagined himself making it hop like a rabbit up and down the emphatic rim of that snowy, billowy, feather-lined eminence of a pillow's edge across which his dazzled eyes had to focus their way out from the valley between Morfydd's pillow and his own, that fantastical geographical rim which had just taken on in the morning sunlight such an exuberant mixture of gamboge yellow and vermilion red.

"It's odd," he thought, "how certain I am that between us all, in some way or another, Colgrim and his Saeson will be disposed of. In my heart I don't think this poor sod from Germania has a chance! I couldn't explain this feeling to anybody, and I'm glad Morfydd hasn't asked me what I predict is going to happen. But my feeling is that much less is going to happen than we expect."

With his pain — for a minute or two anyway — successfully exiled upon that gamboge-yellow pillow ridge, he forced himself to enjoy with concentrated attention the delicious warmth of his wife's body and her peaceful breathing.

Out of these two things — warmth felt and breathing heard — he made himself a sanctuary like the one in which Brother John was at this moment confusing Pryderi with Jesus.

"It's odd," he said to himself, "how few people realize what incredible good fortune it is, simply and solely not to be worried, harassed, anxious, or in great pain!" And he remembered how it was only last Thursday that, setting out with old Rhun from the Gaer, he had been ready to sail away to Constantinople, and so well-satisfied with himself for having shaken off — as he felt he'd finally done — the power over him of his mother and Morfydd.

"I don't need," he thought, "to shake them off now! I've learnt a trick better than that! As long as you have to shake people off, and things off, and places off, and repulsive thoughts and images off, you're still a slave of them all! The thing to do is to remain just where you are and carry them all, as Atlas carried the whole world. Then — and then only — you're free from them all!"

Steadily, evenly, rose the childlike, little-girl breathing from the brittle, lightly resting head on his chest. And deliberately permitting the pain in his arm to leave its rabbit dance on the pillow and to invade as much of his consciousness as it could, he went further with this same thought.

"It's silly," he said to himself, "to think I've changed so much since Thursday! These things were all in me before Thursday. It's only that, after Thursday, they've been coming out of me, one by one, and perching like seagulls, on my ship's rigging! Ship's? There's no ship in my story, the life of Porius, the son of Euronwy, the daughter of Porius Manlius Romanus!"

It was at this point that the pain in his arm became so acute that he was forced to make a curious sucking noise by drawing in his lower lip; and simultaneously with the pain he became aware of a faint stir in his bowels, a stir remote enough so far, but with his wife's head on his chest sufficiently disturbing to his whole field of consciousness.

Had such a sensation, however faint, invaded the consciousness of his uncle Brochvael — now his father-in-law — that incorrigible bookworm would no doubt have got the thing into proportion by conjuring up some grotesque episode from Aristophanes.

But what Porius was compelled to conjure up just then was neither Brochvael nor Aristophanes. By some infernal planetary malice it was the handsome jeering face of his father, the prince. And this image, once invoked, seemed to take the devil's own delight in holding the front of the stage.

And it became such an exquisite discomfort to him to associate his father with what he felt at this moment, whether in his bowels, or on his arm, or in his nerves, or in his heart, that it was as if all these troubling feelings in being approached by his begetter's ironic smile were like familiar ingredients in the cauldron of Ceridwen suddenly approached by an acid that made them hiss and seethe and bubble and foam.

With not a few interior groanings and creakings he hoisted himself up, and freeing his arm from beneath her body, and transferring her head to the centre of her own pillow, he bent over her, and with his lips a little twisted and twitching from the spasm of pain caused by this muscular movement after such long quiescence kissed her on the forehead, heaved himself awkwardly out of bed, and began putting on his clothes.

The girl opened her eyes wide and sitting up looked hastily round.

"What's the matter, Porius? What's happened? Do they want us? Hadn't I better dress too?"

She looked so attractive in her sudden spasmodic return to consciousness from the first satisfying sleep she had had for several days that he felt a strong desire to embrace her again and lie down with her again.

But he succeeded in overcoming this desire, as with his eyes sometimes upon her and sometimes upon the tent's entrance, he wavered there before her, his unbelted tunic hanging loose over one shoulder, his broad deerskin straps trailing from his knees, one of his sandals on and one off, and every now and then touching his Roman water bottle with one foot or the other; for it had become in the last twelve hours a superstition with him to keep it near him till he could return it to Porius Manlius, and as he touched it now he did so half-defiantly and half-appealingly.

Then he moved to her side, and taking her softly by her shoulders made her lie down again and pulled the purple blanket under her chin.

"No, no, no, my true love," he said with as much authority as he dared assume. "Better stay where you are for a bit! If I can find Nesta ferch Aulus I'll send her to you. But if she doesn't come, let's say in about half an hour, you had better dress. Anyway, you'd better come when you are ready to the Brother's cell. There's a chance, you know, that Gwendydd may leave us that grand pavilion of hers just as it is. At least the counsellor began murmuring something of the kind. And he told me" — here he moved a little away from the head of the bed— "late last night, my dear, a serious piece of news for you and me." She could see he was no longer swinging his unsandalled foot against the water bottle but had begun seriously and effectively to twist the straps round his legs. While he did so he spoke slowly and emphatically but without looking at her. "Dion Dionides, it seems, the Greek merchant, you know, who was going to take us — and Rhun too — to Constantinople, has asked for leave to marry Gwendydd and carry her off with him. This will, I suppose, put an end to the rehabilitation of Pelagius; but it will leave" — here he spoke still more slowly and still more emphatically— "old Rhun safe with us, unless the loss of you and

Gwendydd at one blow causes him to rush over to Gaul and take the vows of a Mithraic ‘participant!’

“Mind you, I’ve got nothing but the word of Myrddin Wyllt for all this; and it wasn’t clear to me when he spoke of it whether the Greek had really asked him, or whether it was only that he knew by his magic that he was going to ask him. But you know what they say of Myrddin Wyllt: that he never, in all his long life, has uttered a false—”

He jumped to his feet now, for there — holding back the entrance hangings — were Fflam and Tegvan! The girl in the bed was thus enabled to do what her nurse’s favourite proverb called “killing two birds with one stone.” For by promptly turning her face to the wall and pulling the purple blanket close round the back of her neck so that only a patch of brown hair was visible, she not only avoided having to make any comment on her husband’s information about Rhun, but she avoided supplying any new items to fill the leaky scandal-sack of Fflam and Tegvan.

“Well, children, what news?”

Tegvan was the first to reply, and the news he brought was, as generally happened with him, extremely reassuring.

“The Henog of Dyfed is with Brother John. He is sitting on the Brother’s bed reading to him from his tablets. Brother John looks very pleased with what he is reading.”

“What is he reading? Could you hear?”

A swift flicker of delight crossed Tegvan’s face followed by a frown of concentrated memory. “It was wonderful!” he cried. “It was about Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed and Gwawl the son of Clud, how they plotted with Gwrgwst the son of Hafgan against Pryderi. It was wonderful; they were the wickedest magicians in the world, and Gwydion the son of Don joined in their plot and they all swore they would drink no wine and eat no meat till Pryderi had the knockers of the gate of Llwyd's llys about his neck, and until Pryderi's mother, Rhiannon, had the collars of Llwyd's asses, after they had been carrying hay, about her neck."

"Well, well! That certainly is good news, that the Henog is collecting those old tales and sifting out their truth from their falsehood, and that Brother John approves of the way he is doing it. But what more news have you, little ones? Could you get near where they are plunging the lance? Has any trouble started yet between our people and the emperor's horsemen?"

Fflam and Tegvan looked sharply at each other. Then they looked past Porius at the rigid form under the purple blanket. From their intimate service of court ladies, under all manner of perilous and piquant conditions, they were both of them a good deal more alive to the behaviour of brides than was this bride's groom.

Thus neither of them missed the fact that the sunlight in falling upon the bed flung a special lustre upon a couple of white knuckles whose function at that particular second appeared to be an infinitesimal lifting of the purple blanket where it fell across the orifice of a small but alert ear.

"You tell him," suggested the sluggish, heavily drooping eyelids of Fflam. "You're just the sort of person dedicated to reveal to a sovereign prince's son the death of a sovereign prince's aunt."

And obediently and timidly the sympathetic Tegvan described how they had been stopped by Gwythyr who had just been despatched by Einion to the Gaer to warn Euronwy as to the course of events. It was through Gwythyr they learnt how the crazy struggle between bowmen and horsemen had been interrupted by the desperate and riderless dapple-grey mare and her effect on Rhun's white dog.

It was Gwythyr who finally told them to hurry back to the Brother's cell and warn him that the Gaer priest was at that very moment making a ferocious appeal to them to turn upon Myrddin Wyllt and free the emperor from him, and when that was done to follow it up by freeing Edeyrnion from Brother John.

Tegvan had hitherto expressed himself frankly, freely, quickly, easily; but there now came a point when he stopped and hesitated, behaving in such a queer, nervous manner that Porius turned instinctively to the bed, seeking, as he had done from childhood, instruction and direction from the particular kind of wisdom offered at a crisis by the feminine mind.

By what channel — for though her ears might be alert, her eyes were hopelessly removed from the scene — it was communicated to Morfydd that her Hercules was in special need of her, or, whether in need of her or not, that there was danger for both of them on the wind, it is impossible to say; but it certainly looked as if Tegvan's troubled hesitations, and the quaint signals of distress he had begun to make to the self-possessed Fflam, were what caused the girl to swing round under the purple blanket, and furthermore caused her, starting from that position and having snatched a quick view of the general situation, to sit up in bed and take her share in this queer scene.

"There'd have been more trouble — make no doubt of that—" repeated Tegvan, as if Fflam was prompting him.

"Stand away from him, you!" came suddenly from this uprisen figure. "And give me something to put on, Porius." This was added more quietly and gently; and with evident relief at her intervention he took her at her word and wrapped carefully round her the man's woollen nightshirt which had been provided for him by Euronwy but which he had never used.

"He's waiting, I expect," he murmured, addressing his wife, "for the piece of gold I promised them if they brought news from the Ravishing of the Waters."

“Have you got a piece of gold?” she asked quickly.

His hand went to his neck. “Why, no!” he replied. “By heaven, no! I forgot. No, I’ve got nothing. But I’ve seen one lately — somewhere — just now. Oh, yes! But it’s in a sort of case. Here!” And he tore down from its ledge the carefully carved frame containing Nesta’s present.

Morfydd frowned. “But that’s old Aulus’s work. I saw him at it all last winter. He took great pains with it!”

Under the pressure of Porius’s powerful fingers the girl perceived the laboriously carved object begin to crack.

“Stop!” she cried. “I can’t let them have that! Aulus would be terribly hurt.”

Agitated, inquisitive, puzzled, perhaps a little frightened, Fflam and Tegvan drew nearer, their eyes riveted on the object in the man’s hands. The sunlight streaming in through the opening in the tent fell full upon the profile of the first Caesar; and Porius couldn’t help being struck by the severe intensity, so far removed from contempt or indifference, with which the strenuous preoccupied conqueror gazed out upon the world.

“But I promised them—” he muttered, transferring what he held into her keeping but continuing to stand lumberingly before her, his arms hanging down.

“Each of them?” she enquired.

He had not thought of that, but he nodded and smiled grimly. It was her turn now to lift her hands to her neck; and after fumbling there for a while and letting the profile of Caesar in its cracked frame fall on the purple blanket, she stretched out her arm to him. A long, thin, golden chain was swinging from her fingers.

“Break it in half!” she commanded. “We mustn’t begin by forgetting our promises.”

"But my mother—" he blurted out.

"Oh, yes, I know it was her mother's, a Pendragon bequest and so on, but you and I have to aim higher. We've got to follow beings greater than any Pendragon. Ask Brother John. Ask the Henog. Ask this crazy boy they've got with them here who calls himself Pen Beirdd. We've got to follow Pryderi, son of Pwyll Pen Annwn! Do you think I've forgotten, my Lord, all you've told me about Rhitta Gawr?"

Hearing her utter this last name, Porius stared at her confounded. He had — it was true — in his softer, more amorous, more melting moods confided to her things of his secret life that he revealed to no one else, not even to Rhun. But somehow — and the quiet way she'd taken these revelations justified his doubt — he had never supposed she took what he said seriously enough to remember any details. Had he heard of — still more had he seen — that compact between the two women in the Gaer chapel he would have been dismayed, disturbed, awed, frightened even.

"It's getting cold; the sun's almost gone," were her next words. "I've a feeling that it's one of your Cader mists. Break the chain, my Lord, while there is yet time, and let the boys go."

If her tone, and the gravity with which she spoke, and her use of the words "my Lord," and the whole notion of dividing his mother's heirloom between these grotesque little strangers created a confused impression that was disturbing to Porius, the effect upon him of the change in the weather was more serious still.

Yes! His wife was right. It had grown chilly, and the sun had gone, and there was an ambiguous obscurity that might well — only he must get out of this place before he could be sure — emanate from the stubble-coloured mist. He broke the chain in silence.

“Well, children!” he said, concealing half of the chain in one closed fist and half in the other and extending both towards them, “choose which you’ll have!”

Fflam made a movement that might have been the beginning of an indication that he had decided to select the right-hand one of the two extended fists; but as Tegvan spoke he cut short this gesture.

“My Lord Prince Porius,” said Tegvan, “I want to tell that when we got to the willow stump where Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd and his man Morgant had been sitting, we found them standing; and they were—”

“You’ll have to choose quickly,” Porius broke in, “or you’ll just have to scramble for these bits of chain.”

“ — standing on the stump and staring westward. The stump made them much taller and helped them to see much further. Fflam and me wanted to see what Morgant and Llew ap Greidawl were seeing, so we climbed up on another willow stump and looked where they were looking.”

Here Tegvan stopped and moving still closer to his companion — though they were already as close as two puppets on one wire — whispered something in his ear.

“And what did you see?” asked the girl from the bed in an imperious tone.

“For God’s sake, children, choose!” cried Porius. “Choose which hand you’ll have, and take your piece of gold and clear off!”

Both the small creatures were now displaying signs of irrepressible discomfort. Tegvan even turned his head and glanced at the tent’s entrance as if he contemplated an unrewarded panic-stricken flight from those extended fists.

Finally it was Fflam who spoke the word.

“The Cewri! — I saw them. Tegvan didn’t, but I did. I saw them clearly; a big one and a little one. They were the other side of the water when I saw them, but they were coming round — round the edge of the water. They were coming very slowly. The big one was pulling the little one after him by the hand. I think they were afraid, for I saw them—”

“Afraid? Did you say ‘afraid’?”

This question was interjected by the girl in the bed; but before Fflam could reply Porius had carelessly twisted half of the Pendragon chain round one small neck and half round the other and was bending over them and giving them quickly spoken advice.

“Better get back to Mistress Gwendydd and Mistress Nineue as quick as you can. Myrddin Wyllt won’t let any cawr, whether big or little, hurt you when safe with them. And don’t go by the water, or by the Mound, or by any path where you can be seen. Go straight through the thickest undergrowth. You’ll survive a few scratches! But better tie those chains tight round your necks or you’ll be leaving them on the brambles!”

But though with a hand on the back of each head he ushered them forth, he wasn’t left with the last word.

“I expect those Cewri have gone back by now. I could see they were afraid of the Derwydd’s archers. Any fool could see that. And no wonder! Even our equites are afraid of them. It’s the poison, my Lord Porius — the poison they put on their arrows. Oh, I forgot that Gwythyr said he saw young Mabsant killed before his eyes. He said he jumped into the air like a cat when he was hit, and Gwythyr said when he was dead he was like a hedgehog; he had so many arrows in him. If you want to know, my Lord, where Llew ap Greidawl and Morgant are now, I’d say they were ‘under the reeds’. They didn’t wait to ask me if I’d seen anything. They just sank down. Oh! You should have seen the way they sank down! ‘Fast as the lightning, sudden as the dew, the bolt that's got your name on it is the bolt that gets you.'"

Porius heard Fflam's voice repeating and repeating this prehistoric jingle as the two small figures dived obediently into the brushwood; but before he could catch more out of the air than a vague smell of lake mud and the death damp of the yellow mist, lo and behold! according to that favourite phrase of the Henog's, "with a clap of thunder, a fall of mist, and the appearance of a wonder," Gwythyr and Nesta stood before him.

"In a good hour, Nesta!" he exclaimed warmly. "God, but I'm glad to see you! And if you, Gwythyr, are off to the Gaer, will you please tell my mother that Mistress Morfydd and I are safe and sound and that we'll send someone later with further news, or perhaps even come ourselves.

"Yes, yes, do go in, Nesta, and see what you can do for my wife. I expect she'll be getting up now. Oh, yes, and when she's ready, bring her round, will you, to the Brother's cell, and wait there for me, both of you, will you, Nesta?"

But it was at this point that Morfydd's voice once more made itself heard from beneath the purple blanket, under which, automatically fumbling with the cracked frame of Caesar's head, she now lay on her back, stretched out and still.

"Has my Lord Porius got a weapon, Gwythyr? If not, could you lend him one of yours?"

This request, or command, if so it was to be taken, brought Nesta back with a light, noiseless rush to her husband's side, and there was an extremely rapid exchange of wordless looks and gestures between them as to whether it should be his short battle spear, or the long knife he carried in his belt, that was to be loaned to the son of his prince. In his own secret heart Gwythyr would have preferred to keep the spear, as a more dignified weapon for a man, and to have lent his lord his knife, but the centurion's daughter knew well that not only was the knife always at his side whereas the spear might be left anywhere, but that for all his pride as a man of war, her youthful philosopher was a good deal more at home with the knife than with the spear.

"Did you see these Cewri, Gwythyr?" enquired Porius, as he mechanically accepted the spear, hardly aware of what he did, without a nod or a smile.

"Yes, Arglwydd, I saw them. And I beg you to forgive my plain speaking, my Lord, when I say that I hope to heaven none of these grand riders of the emperor meddle with them where they are now."

The colour left Nesta's cheeks and her Etrurian eyes grew as deep and dark and as full of earth secrets as a couple of water-rat holes in a moonlit riverbank. How could she know that this reserved and silent boy had gone through a mental crisis that very day in which he had resolved to act no longer the patient ass with these people but to assert himself?

But Porius saw nothing and felt nothing but what he read in Gwythyr's laconic face.

"Where are they now?" he enquired.

"They've hidden themselves by the water, behind Craig Hen, and they're cracking the bones of some poor devil that these prancing gentry have speared like an eel! They'll go straight back to their mountain to sleep when they're sated; and it'll be lucky if they don't carry off — at least that's what our old people say — twice as much carrion as they've already gulped down! What they're afraid of are the Derwydd's arrows. They think nothing of these mounted gentry's fine lances and—"

But the imposing figure of the prince himself had appeared in the tent's entrance.

“So you haven’t gone, and you’re both still here. Well, well, well! Am I to offer thanks to Brother John’s Pryderi for this, or to our family’s natural amorousness?”

Never had the appearance of the Prince of Edeyrnion, though it was always an event calculated to produce some kind of psychic shock, been more disturbing than at this moment. Gwythyr backed away from the tent’s entrance but did not dare to stir further. Nesta sprang to the bed’s head and squeezed herself against one of the bedposts as if desirous of attaining some magical strength from the polished texture of its fragrant cypress wood.

As for the prince’s son, he just stood where he was, his feet resting on the blackened portion of the floor where the fire had been, his right hand drawing lines and curves and squares among the burnt ashes with Gwythyr’s spear, while the fingers of his left, with bent knuckles, were fumbling at an exterior spot just below his waist where he had recently fancied he felt a faint threat of a possible motion of his bowels.

Einion ab Iddawc walked straight over to the bed; and Porius noticed with a grim clarity that could hardly be called interest that his only weapon consisted of that same ancestral sword of Cunedda whose point he had himself seen the man break in his colloquy with the emperor’s nephew.

This sword, with its two-edged blade jaggedly uneven at the point, protruded from the prince’s embroidered belt as he bent over the bed in a fashion that struck the imagination of that same son as grotesquely like a satyr’s tail.

Einion lifted both the girl’s hands to his lips in so sudden and sweeping a gesture that the golden coin, disengaged from its frame, would have rolled on the floor, if she hadn’t, by a quick movement of one of her legs, made of the blanket’s fold a happy valley between her knees.

With the same grim clarity and the same lack of interest Porius noted how easily and instinctively she threw off the absurd nightshirt he had cast round her shoulders and with what perfect composure she responded, naturally, wittily, free from all affectation, to his effusive gallantry.

He swung round now, however, and faced his son while his manner, still faintly mocking, grew majestical and commanding. Porius saw that he still held one of the girl's hands fast in one of his own, nor did it escape the younger man that this effort to hold tight to her and yet to turn about and confront her husband was occasioned by a certain nervous strain in the prince which accentuated the warrior in him and eliminated the irresponsible jester.

"It's clear, my boy," he said, "that you and I will have to divide our forces; and what I think would be—"

But at this point Porius was astonished to hear himself interrupt his father.

"Did you see them, my Lord?" he asked.

The prince shot at him the look — oh, how well its victim knew it! — with which had been derided from his son's infancy all the artless, shameless, unblushing, blurted-out innocences of indiscretion of which the boy had been guilty.

"See what?" Einion asked. "Oh, you mean those two Cewri? Yes, of course I saw them! Who could help seeing them? And I can tell you, my good lad, I spent an uncomfortable five minutes going from our Cymry, who were itching to shoot their arrows into them, to the emperor's young nobles who were burning to cut off their heads and carry them to Arthur!

"But the Mother of God be praised! What I begged, implored, commanded, wept, cajoled, abjured them to do they finally did, with the stale, flat, dull, tedious, commonplace, ordinary instincts of frightened animals — did in fact just exactly what these romantic Cewri you've been asking me about all your life did themselves when they saw those shining arrow points and lance points! In plain words they did nothing.

"The man-eating giants squatted down behind a rock to crack the bones of a few dead men; while we heroic Cymry, as the counsellor tells us we must all consider ourselves in future, looked anxiously, patiently, sternly, eagerly hopefully, intently — in the opposite direction! Yes, that's the truth, noble son. While the Cewri crunched our brothers' bones in the west, we ran — crying out, 'We're all brothers today!' — to the east."

"Thank you, my Lord," said Porius. "I just wanted to know whether you saw them."

"Oh, I saw them all right! But the question at this juncture, my romantic son, and even your mother would agree with me here — is how to drive off the biggest rabble of invaders that we've ever seen in Ynys Prydein since the time of Ronwen ferch Hengyst! And if to do this we have to call off our dogs from these great filthy carrion eaters, that's what we have to do!

"Oh, they'll skulk back all right to the Cader! You needn't be afraid our men or our dogs will finish them off. You'll have plenty of other chances of satisfying your curiosity. They're certainly queer objects to look at when the sun shines on them!

"You may be sure, like carrion crows, they've got some secret instinct that draws them to any place where we insane human beings intend to provide a lively 'slaughter. But these two may be the last of the whole brood; just as I fancy our friend the Derwydd will be the last of his occupation! The world is changing, my philosophic son, the world is changing! And if we don't want to perish like mangy wolves who've lost their good heart and their strong white teeth, we've got to let the dead bury their dead."

While he spoke Einion kept his eyes on his son, but, for all that, he didn't release his niece's hand. It was, however, at this strained and tense moment that what to Porius was a wholly unexpected and even startling ripple manifested itself on the swift-flowing stream of Time.

In plain words Morfydd made a face at him. It was done swiftly, surreptitiously, mischievously, confidentially. It was done entirely between themselves. But that childish screwing up of her face and that deliberate projection of the pointed tip of her tongue between her small teeth had an effect upon him out of all proportion to her intention. He never forgot it. By the simple process of "making a face," she had in some queer psychic sense consummated and consecrated their marriage.

Her "face" had said to him: "Don't take any notice, my dear, of how he makes me behave before your mother and before the old man and before the rest of them — yes! and even before Rhun — for the truth is, after what's happened between us, we've got a bond and a link more important than love or custom or anything else."

But even while she was making this face, and while the equivocal mischief in it was flickering into existence and flickering out of existence, the man who was holding her hand had begun issuing his princely orders.

"What I propose," he announced, "is that your wife should go straight back with me to the Gaer and be a support to your mother and to us all, till we know at what these damned Saeson are really aiming — and that you should stay here with Rhun and a few of our younger Gosgordd, so that if Colgrim surrounds the Gaer there'll be some of us well outside! I'll be off to see Brother John now, and I'll wait for your wife there; but I'd like you, if you don't mind, my dear boy, to get hold of Myrddin Wyllt and tell him to let me know at once if he hears anything from the emperor. Rhun himself might act the messenger between us. Nobody knows the forest better than Rhun, and there's not a Sais born who could catch up with him when once started.

"Don't fail, all the same, my son, to get it lodged in his crazy conscience that for all our sakes, and specially — that may appeal to him if nothing else can! — for the sake of the spirit of his mother Alarch he mustn't take any improper risks. Get it into that overconscientious skull of his that Mithras can't afford to lose his only adherent, that I can't afford to lose my only nephew, and that your wife here — we all know I can speak for her — can't afford to lose — now that she's married you — her only cousin! But heaven knows what's going on while we're talking!

"I saw that white dog of Rhun's sniffing about round the Craig Hen. Rhun had better look out, or those monsters will leave their human carrion to crunch that dog's bones! Better see what's happening over there, my wise son, before you try to find Myrddin Wyllt. Off with you now — and remember that all I said about Rhun — and again, I say, I speak for your wife as much as for myself — applies doubly to you! We can't afford any crazy risks. If the Sais must have blood he'll have to get it drop by drop, do you understand? That's what I've just told them about these bodysnatchers from the Cader. Let them crunch our bones when we're dead as long as we drive the Sais into the sea while we're alive!"

In his dazed and confused state, Porius, as he inclined his head and turned to go, found himself vaguely wondering what the daughter of the ex-centurion was thinking of this family she served, as she leaned in discreet anonymity against one of the bedposts she had decorated with such care.

He had never felt so dull to the particular impressions of his physical surroundings as he felt at this second, as he turned his back upon the purple bed, upon Morfydd's outstretched girlish arm, upon the reckless, resplendent figure with the broken sword, and upon that water flask from Uriconium which in all these agitating days had become a sort of fetish with him, so obstinately had he made it a mental point of scrupulous piety that he should return it to the old Roman.

All these impressions gave him in their portentous combination the queer feeling that he was the victim of an unnatural dream. As he pushed aside with his new spear, however, the imperial green-and-yellow hangings of the tent and saw Gwythyr sharpening on a birch trunk the boy's sole remaining weapon, there rushed into his mind the particular moment in Gwendydd's sumptuous pavilion when Myrddin Wyllt, having poured a libation of milk to the aboriginals, gazed about him with a look that seemed to make all the tent hangings of all the imperial armies in the world quiver like the fins of frightened fish in shoreless oceans and the feathers of birds in fathomless spaces.

CHAPTER XXIII. The Cewri

THE FIRST IMPRESSION Porius received from the outside world powerful enough to pierce the network of personal feelings that had been hemming him in was the impression of damp stubble-coloured mist.

This mist was not so thick that it hid the view, nor so chilly as to make a person shiver, but it brought to his mind his vigil of Thursday evening above the eastern gate of the Gaer.

“He told me,” he said to himself, as he walked rapidly towards the edge of the lake, “to go first to Craig Hen,” and then as he recalled the prince’s words about the dog sniffing round Craig Hen the impulsive thought rushed into his head: “Why not go clear round Saint Julian’s Water and come upon them alone and unobserved — myself and those two separated by Craig Hen from all the rest of the world?”

It must not be supposed that when this idea took possession of him it brought with it any rapturous excitement conformable with the possibility that now at last, on this twenty-first of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, he might be really destined to meet in the flesh an actual living Creiddylad, a Creiddylad from the same Cewri of the Cader among whom Edeyrn the son of Cunedda had found his bride.

The reapproach of the yellow mist, drawn down as it seemed from the very peaks of the Cader by the release of druidic arrows and imperial spears, had occurred so simultaneously with the consummation of his marriage and the consequent exhaustion of the energeia erotica of his life force that, full as this possibility of meeting a second Creiddylad was of the vague, rich, inchoate magic and nameless sweetness of the underdreams of his entire life, it rendered his rapidly moving mind dazed and drugged, if not exactly reduced to a condition of stunned passivity.

Yes, he would go round the water and come up with them from behind Craig Hen! This sagacious decision he held clearly, firmly, obstinately, before his mind. But it did not give him the exultation that a course of action so clear, definite, and inescapable ought to have given him. He would steal cautiously round the lake. He would come upon them suddenly and unexpectedly from behind Craig Hen. He would catch them by surprise.

This was decided. This was settled. And yet there hung about the whole project something dreamlike and unsubstantial, not so much unreal as subreal, like a decision under water, or in the soft persistent falling of snow upon snow!

The thought of going straight to Craig Hen was an unquestionable clue in this misty clouding of his normal wits, and he had instinctively clutched at it. And the idea of walking round Saint Julian’s Water and reaching Craig Hen from the other side and finding them alone, he alone with them alone, and where he and they would be hidden from all the world, was the thing to which this clue had now led.

It was like throwing out from a boat a thin tentative line in a fog at sea, a line that would eventually return to the boat securely fastened to a thick rope covered with green seaweed, shining fish scales, yellow spray, and patches of black paint from the bulwarks of a great ship. He hadn’t got very far from the tent, however, when he came upon a thick reedbed extending into the lake for about a hundred yards and so closely grown that it hid the water altogether.

The water itself, owing to undulations in the level of the mud, varied in depth from a few inches to a couple of feet, and on the edge of the reeds there were several willow stumps; and clinging to one of these in a singular manner were two human figures whom he divined at once to be Llew, the Derwydd's brother, along with Morgant his man.

Llew was lying on his stomach along the only remaining branch of a nearly prostrate willow whose immense age had brought it about that the main rondure of its rooted stump was covered with richly green, cushion-soft moss, while from a couple of projecting excrescences that bulged forth from the base of the branch on which the man lay, there had broken off and swung loose, and finally at intervals, as far removed from each other as a couple of generations of human life, dropped into the water various fragments of rotten wood, full of the soft substance of vegetable decay, destined to float for a week, to lie on the mud for a decade, and to resolve themselves into the elements in half a century.

Seated upon this central stump, with his long legs twisted round the two excrescences and his face towards the nearest slope of the mountain ridge that was dimly visible through the mist, the Derwydd's servant was murmuring over and over again the "Hagios, Hagios, Hagios, who was crucified for us!" of the Monophysite chant, and at every "Holy," with its implication that it was the Father of Men himself who was crucified for man, he drummed on the mighty buttocks of the Derwydd's brother.

"What are you doing, Arglwydd? Where are you going?" cried the Hagios chanter. Don't you know that the Cewri have come down from Cader and are eating the dead behind the Old Stone?"

"I know it very well," replied Porius. "But what I don't know is why you and Llew ap Greidawl have left Gogfran Derwydd, nor why Llew ap Greidawl is lying on that bough, nor what the sounds mean that are now issuing from his mouth."

The man Morgant with several creakings and groanings disentangled his stiff limbs from the mossy stump and stood before Porius while his bare arms, neither very muscular nor very hairy — in fact eminently suggestive of his long and devoted attendance in those dark underground chambers beneath the Mound of the Outlaw — hung down at his sides, the droop of their dark veins and the misty modelling of their dim curves answering to the downward drag of the graven furrows in the lean and cadaverous face.

"Gogfran Derwydd is not alone," said the man slowly, giving his head a couple of jerks and stretching his long neck sideways as though to pierce the recesses of the mist that extended beyond his questioner in the direction of the Craig Hen.

"Not alone in any sense, Arglwydd, for he has gone to Ogof-y-Gawr with Princess Esyllt; and Erim ab Uchtryd and my own half-brother Drom have gone with them to attend on them."

While Morgant was making these reasonable explanations and striving to pierce with his gloomy, heavy eyes, as if they'd been a pair of ship's lanterns, the hollow spaces of mist that separated them from the Old Stone, his questioner was endeavouring to make some sense of the extraordinary sounds that were issuing from the mouth of Llew ap Greidawl.

Porius had never seen either of the sons of the mysterious Greidawl until now. In the last twenty-four hours he had heard from several quarters of the Derwydd's philosophic calm and imperturbable detachment from the stream of events. He had also heard of the man's doting indulgence for the incredible sluggishness, only prevented by the man's timidity from becoming absolute brutishness, of Llew ap Greidawl.

It soon became clear to Porius that the grotesque figure prone on its face on that fallen bough — a bough that even now wasn't only a bed for several sorts of thick moss but for several sorts of small plants, some of which, in their slow, indirect, vegetative way, were already thanking the earth-mother that their pliable little stalks had the power of bending down so naturally under oppression that even the protruding belly of Llew couldn't break them — was uttering no mere gibberish, no mere ejaculatory balderdash, but rationally joined syllables, such as, in their rhythmical permutations and combinations, attained the dignity and mystery of human language.

Downward hung Morgant's long-veined wrists. Downward drooped the gloomy lines of the deeply channelled furrows of Morgant's face.

"Not so, Arglwydd," Morgant said. "Gogfran Derwydd has Drom with him; and I know Drom. It is undeniable we had different fathers. But we had the same mother. Drom is short but faithful, small but faithful, weak but faithful, simple but faithful, innocent but faithful, foolish but faithful, soft but faithful, ridiculous but faithful, frightened but faithful, idiotic but faithful. I am different from my half-brother Drom. The heavenly powers have endowed me with intelligence. I ask questions. And my questions confuse the heavenly powers. It is because of my questions that they have made me a servant and a servant I am. Very well. So be it. But I still ask questions. I ask for instance whether it's better to serve the falling or the rising, one who is doomed to fall or one who is doomed to rise."

Porius kept making vague reassuring gestures with the butt end of Gwythyr's hunting spear towards that lank figure, towards those furrowed lines from nostrils to mouth, towards those long fingers hanging so helplessly; but he was only half listening to the man's talk. He was struggling all the time to catch some sort of revealing glimpse of the distorted profile of the weirdly voluble Llew.

But aye! what an extraordinary language it was — if it really were a human language — whose words were now bursting out, like huge breaking bubbles, one after another, from that contorted mouth pressed in such panic against that mossy bough!

Lowering the butt end of Gwythyr’s weapon, Porius now came up close to Morgant and putting his mouth to his ear asked him point blank what language it was that this poor wretch, crazed by panic to such a point, was spluttering out.

The tall man drew himself away from his questioner with the unmistakable movement of a lonely person who does not relish being touched.

“It’s their language,” he replied wearily. “It’s the language of the Cewri. I think he’s begging them to spare him when they kill the rest of us. I think he’s telling them he knows about the willow being their sacred tree, and that he’s making love to it as to a woman, and that he’ll make love to no other till he dies if they’ll only spare his life. I know the meaning of Cewri words better than Drom does because Drom was born simple.

“There are more words about making love in the Cewri language than about anything else; and that’s why he” — and he jerked his thumb towards the figure on the bough— “took to it. Drom makes a god of the Derwydd and an inferior god of this one” — and again he jerked his thumb towards Llew.

“I’m different. I was born intelligent. I know when a man is a man, and when a man is a god. In the earliest days there were gods in Ynys Prydein. There were bad gods and good gods. Pwyll and Pryderi were good gods. Llwyd ap Cil-Coed and Gwawl ap Clud were bad ones; but the worst ones of all were the sons and daughters of Don.

“Greidawl Derwydd didn’t know the language of the gods; so he couldn’t teach it to Gogfran Derwydd, but Myrddin Wyllt knows it well. When Myrddin Wyllt doesn’t know what to do, he puts his head on the earth and the underground gods tell him what to do, and he understands what they tell him and tells the emperor what to do. That’s why, having been born with intelligence and not being simple like Drom, I have left the service of the Derwydd. Of course I would prefer to serve someone who, like Myrddin Wyllt, understands the language of the gods; but the only servant he'll ever have is Neb ap Digon. There's nobody so simple as not to know that."

For a second the question rose in Porius's mind how it came about that everyone, in whatever part of Ynys Prydein they might live, knew every detail concerning the personal life of the emperor's counsellor, knew about his sister — all save old Rhun who seemed as simple and faithful as Drom! — knew about his seizures or fits, knew about the fatal power over him of Nineue the Ffichtiaid, knew about his attraction for animals and birds and reptiles and fishes, knew about his travelling disguise as a savage "herdsman from the south," and not only knew about these things but felt instinctively — and it was this queer aspect of the case that specially arrested Porius — that neither the man himself nor the gods whose language he understood could change one jot or one tittle, one dot or one iota, of the destiny or tynged, which had been laid upon him from the beginning.

Everyone knew that they could change their own life, and either by force or by guile change the life of others, but all the rumours about Myrddin Wyllt seemed to take for granted that nothing could change his preordained fate; and was not a rumour of this sort, spread wide among the simplest people, in itself a proof that the man really was not like other men but had something about him that set him apart?

"Morgant" — Porius's words were a good deal more casual and unconcerned than the feelings that dictated them— "could you possibly repeat to me — before I go — any phrase or sentence — or even any single word — belonging to this language?"

The drooping visage in front of him seemed in that yellow mist as if it belonged to some Boethian time-measuring machine possessed of a mechanical fist that at regular intervals drummed on the rump of the man on the bough; but a flicker crossed it, all the same, of sardonic amusement, when it coolly enquired of its questioner whether he was referring to giants or gods.

“To the Cewri, of course.”

“All I know are the two sentences that Drom is always using. He’s so proud of knowing them that he repeats them when nobody wants to hear them.”

“What are they?”

It was Morgant’s turn to whisper now, but it was clear he was deadly afraid lest Llew should catch his words.

“Please say that again, Morgant.”

“Thumberol Gongquod... Tungerong larry ong,” murmured the other, whispering each weird syllable as clearly as he dared.

“Did Drom know what that meant?”

“Two sentences they are, Arglwydd. Drom used to repeat the first when he was comfortable and the second when he was uncomfortable. I was always forgetting what he told me they meant and always asking him again. But in the end I learnt the answer. ‘Gongquod’ means ‘the earth,’ and ‘thumberol’ means ‘to tread amorously.’ Drom used to say that deformed dwarfs could understand the giants better than proper-sized persons could. He said that he understands the word ‘thumberol’ perfectly and that it meant ‘making love with the soles of your feet’.”

“And the other? What does the other sentence mean — the one that ends with ‘ong?’”

The channels in the tall man's face, that looked as if they had been furrowed by all the tears of all the primeval races of the world, appeared to deepen and grow more haggard still as he replied.

"Drom said 'Tungerong' means 'endure,' and 'larry' means 'until,' and 'ong' means 'the end.' So 'Tungerong larry ong' means 'endure until the end.' Drom used to say it whenever we were sent to hunt wolves. He said he said it for the wolves."

"For the wolves?"

"That's what he said, but he wasn't born intelligent. If he'd been born intelligent he'd be here now with me ready to serve you or any other friend of the emperor. Instead of which he's gone to Ogof-y-Gawr with Gogfran Derwydd and Erim ab Uchtryd and Princess Esyllt."

"But maybe," suggested Porius, who had already come to the conclusion that beneath this mask of guileful intelligence his gloomy friend was already profoundly homesick for his half-brother, "but maybe it'll be here, and not at the Cave at all, that the Saeson will make their first appearance. They must already regard the princesses as their allies."

The tall man gave the prostrate Llew a weary thump. "When before its hour," he declared pontifically, "the tide of the salt sea stops and turns, then will a Saeson chief and a Saeson host keep their word to their allies."

But Porius's mind was too full of what he might soon discover at Craig Hen to argue about the newcomers from across the sea.

"Do you know," he enquired, "how Greidawl Derwydd learnt the language of the Cewri?"

The tall man looked round into the mist with the air of one mentioning secrets that the very elements were on edge to hear. Then he murmured the word "Ffichtiaid."

"The Derwydd," he said, "assured me that the Ffichtiaid made friends with the Cewri and became their slaves, just as later they made friends with the Gwyddylaid and became their slaves. The Derwydd swore that when the world was first created the Ffichtiaid travelled from sea to sea, becoming the slaves of all the fiercest races, but that after a few generations the races they served began to grow weak and in the end died out.

"But before they died out they became more afraid of their slaves than they were of their worst enemies. The Derwydd told Drom and me that nobody knew from what country the Ffichtiaid came. But he said that when he and him" — and Morgant indicated, with a thump that was at once less necessary and less mechanical than usual, the mumbling creature at their side— "were children, their mam told them that it was Pwyll Pen Annwn who brought the Ffichtiaid here, lured them and coaxed them here, from the depths of Annwn, along with the swine. But I myself think 'twas Gwydion ap Don fetched them up, not Pwyll."

As the tall man's voice died away it seemed to Porius as if those terrible channels in his long bony face must" have been caused by these fatal Ffichtiaid, whose complicated treacheries had at last drained the very fountains of natural tears.

"Tungerong larry ong, endure till death" — the words drummed at Porius's ears with a dulled and reiterated drumming. "Are those fits and seizures of Myrddin Wyllt," he thought, "all part of some devilishly destructive tynged laid upon him by Mistress Nineue?"

He began to feel faintly ashamed of the physical attraction which he had felt for Mistress Nineue, but only faintly ashamed of it and not for long; for his attraction had been anything but uncontrollable. What soon overtook and overlapped that first feeling, however, was an emotion totally different, an emotion far removed from anything remotely resembling shame. It was a feeling of jealous and indignant outrage — a very curious feeling. And what caused it was the clear memory of how only three days ago — yes! it was on Thursday night in Gwendydd's tent — he had been startled by catching this same Nineue calmly practising — oh, he was sure of it! he knew the signs and the symptoms too well to be mistaken — nothing less than his own secretive psycho-sensuous trick of ravishing the four elements with the five senses, and of doing it with these latter so fused together that it was like making love to the earth-mother herself, precisely as the story described Jasion doing, when Zeus in the fury of his jealousy murdered him with a thunderbolt.

If it hadn't been that something within him — some master nerve that underlay all his reactions and responses to life — was too distracted by what was happening at the Old Stone to give anything but a dreamy and perfunctory attention to this willow-tree encounter, he would have carried further his mental analysis of why it was that it should be such a tingling pain to him to think of Mistress Nineue — vicious, cruel, inhuman succubus as she was! — practising his precious cosmogonic art of "cavoseniargizing."

"Tungerong larry ong!" The words seemed to go on drumming upon Porius's ears. "Endure until the end, endure until the end, endure until the end, endure until the end."

Like great gobbets of half-digested vomit the thick bubbles of aboriginal sound, as if they had been bubbles of Odyssean wine from the heaving gorge of the Cyclops, rose and burst between Llew's swollen lips and the moss-covered branch.

"I must get on," he told himself, "I must get on," and with an unpleasant spasm of self-discovery he realized that the attraction that was drawing him to the Old Stone was not unmixed with a rather ghastly terror, and that it was to postpone his departure that he was asking Morgant all these curious questions.

"Well!" he said aloud. "The best thing you two can do now is to wait for me in the porch of Brother John's cell. Make Llew understand he'll be much safer there than he is here. Tell him I make myself responsible for him. Tell him I promise to find the right man for you both to serve. And listen, Morgant! When you get to the cell don't fail to ask anybody who's there for a blanket so that this madman can be properly wrapped up. Somebody there will give you something to eat, and I'll be with you ere so very long."

Morgant looked so disconsolate and appeared so extremely doubtful if anyone in these desperate days could be trusted to keep any civilized appointment that Porius came near to uttering a grim chuckle.

"Do you want me to help you heaving him up?" he enquired; but when the tall man had moved his lamentable and yet resigned physiognomy on the pivot of his long spine in a negative fashion, he took his spear by its centre as if it were a dagger and incontinently bade them farewell.

"How much heavier," he thought, "are people's souls than their bodies. Compared with their souls their bodies are light as feathers!" And he imagined himself retreating to the Brother's cell with the body of the melancholy Morgant under one arm and the body of the obstreperous Llew under the other, while he left their heavy souls beneath this willow stump!

What he became most conscious of in a physical sense as he rounded the southwestern end of Saint Julian's Water was a peculiar smell carried on the mist.

"It's their smell," he told himself; and he would have found it hard to say whether it struck him as alluring or revolting. At any rate he could hardly call it unique, for it made him think of several smells that, without effort, he could conjure up. It reminded him for instance of the smell of the tadpoles — especially when they were dying or dead — which he had carried as a child to certain wayside puddles at the foot of the Gaer.

It also reminded him of the smell of an octopus that one of the learned monks in that school beyond Moel y Famau kept in a bucket and used to feed with fragments of meat, fragments which he carried from the refectory table in a particular fold of his habit.

And it called up a strange but not altogether unpleasing smell that on certain days used to hover over a salt estuary near that same Bishop's School, and which several old fishermen of that cantref swore by the heads of their mothers was the smell of the sea god Dylan.

He made no attempt to force himself to advance as fast as he could. "If I am afraid," he told himself, "of Creiddylad's people I am afraid of them! It's no good pretending I'm not; and it's no good playing the Brythonic hero over it, or the Mithraic hero either! It's a natural fear; and though I may be as strong as Hercules I'm a natural coward." And he set himself to recall certain vivid and memorable glimpses he had had as a child of his grandfather Iddawc, and he struggled with a vague and groping desperation to conjure up from these glimpses of Iddawc some sort of dim image of Iddawc's mother.

And then all suddenly in that inhuman mist he fancied he heard the sound of human weeping, and it seemed to him that the sobs he heard were not those of a woman nor of a child but of a man. In his excited mood and with his head full of Cewri and the daughters of Cewri this unexpected sound was a painful shock to him.

It had not often happened to him in his life to hear a man weep. With so much Roman blood in her veins his mother scarcely ever shed tears. Never once had he seen her cry because of his father's frivolous infidelities, nor had he failed to note how a special and peculiar look came into her face when in the galleries of the Gaer she had come upon some young Brython of the Gosgordd or some young serving woman from the forest people indulging in this sweetly healing relief.

He stood still and looked around him listening intently. No! Whatever it was he had heard, or imagined he heard, had ceased now altogether. Aye! But how well he knew the particular sound that had not ceased, but that monotonously, regularly, mathematically, repeated itself in his ears — the lapping of lake water!

There was something in this particular sound that always roused in him a mood of vague and obscure uneasiness. Of all sounds it was the sound he disliked the most. The little promontory of oozy mud in which he was now sinking was almost entirely surrounded by tall reeds. And among these reeds the water kept advancing and retreating with all manner of curious gurglings and lappings and suckings.

Still holding Gwythyr's spear tightly by the middle, as he was accustomed to do when hunting wild boars, Porius tried in vain to catch through the mist some glimpse of the notoriously ancient Craig Hen which just then was his ael, or "goal." He made no attempt to suppress his nervous apprehension. From his earliest childhood, and this applied to all children born in Edeyrnion, Craig Hen was a spot of holy terror. It was more "haunted" even than the Mound of y Bychan, the Roman-feared bandit.

Above Craig Hen, it was said, a descendant of the oak tree grew from whose branches the wicked enchanter Gwydion, who killed Pryderi, by hud and lledrith coaxed his own sister's son, Llew Llaw Gyffes, who bore the shape of a wounded eagle, with rhymes learnt from the Muses themselves, to come down to the ground.

And now it was his destiny, urged by an element in his nature that he could not understand, chosen for the task by his own father the prince who mocked them all, dragged love-weary out of the very arms of his bride, to creep through this strange-smelling mist with the lapping sound in his ears and the oozing mud in his sandals so as, if it might be done, to come face to face with creatures whose existence he had doubted all his life, creatures whose ancestors, twenty-five thousand years ago, must have crouched shivering in these very reeds while the awe-inspiring Rhitta Gawr passed on his way from the peaks of Eryri to the ridges of the Cader, and where, centuries upon centuries earlier, the enchanter Gwydion, coming from Maenor in Arfon, overtook the great sow who fed on the flesh of the eagle.

Once more there came upon him — only it seemed weaker and fainter this time — the weird fancy that he heard the sound of a man weeping.

"It's no good," he told himself, "this ridiculous standing on one leg in these reeds, till my flesh turns putrid for Gwydion's sow! I must get ahead and get on with this business. If I don't see that curst Old Stone soon I'll begin to think Pryderi's enemy's putting a spell on me too."

"Tungerong larry ong, endure until the end." Certainly there did seem to be some occult power in the sound of these words. Very slowly and very cautiously he advanced. And at last it seemed to him that he did really see the ghostly bulk of a great fragment of rock standing between land and water and dominating both these elements with its phantasmal enormity.

What teased his mind to its depths just then, as he struggled on towards this shadowy image, taunting his thoughts and towering over his self-respect, was the interior fact that he had allowed his inner nature to confuse itself with his outer nature; had in fact permitted the instinctive continuity of the tide of his life illusion to be so tossed about upon so many contrary winds and crisscrossed by so many arbitrary currents, that the simple primeval voices of “I love” and “I hate,” or “I want” and “I don’t want,” or “I will” and “I never will,” had grown to be as confused as the soughing of these reeds and the gurglings of this lapping water.

And it was as much without shame at this change, as it was without exultation, that Porius now faced the startling fact that the two dominant emotions of his life — his pleasure in completely yielding to the will of Morfydd, and the secret stories he told himself about imitating his ancestor, Edeyrn ap Cunedda, and carrying off a daughter of the Cewri — had lost their unwavering edges and clear outlines.

It was not that they had lost their separate identity or had mingled with each other. It was rather that they had assumed different positions in relation to each other and had allowed something completely alien to each of them, an attitude to life and the elements in which human relations played little part, to move forward and establish itself ahead of them both.

This new thing was naturally an old thing, or it wouldn’t have had the strength to dominate his life illusion; but it had taken to itself a completely new power and he saw it under a completely new light.

Sucking, gurgling, and lapping, the water at his feet eddied about the stalks of the reeds, while their roots, hidden deep below the surface, drew down through their clammy veins life-giving nourishment from the elements of the air.

Step by step he moved slowly forward, discommoded by his weight and his natural clumsiness as much as by the confusion of his thoughts. At any moment now he might see with his actual living eyes this second Creiddylad, this imaginary Creiddylad of the secret craving of his whole youth.

But what had happened to him? All he felt at this high, pregnant, never-to-return moment was an uneasy dread, mingled with an almost comical sense of having left — he the one strong, serious Samson of their tribe — the whole business of repelling this ferocious Colgrim, with a numerous army of savage Saeson, to his mocking and frivolous father.

His thoughts moved as rapidly and as shamelessly as they always did as he lifted first his right foot and then his left foot out of the mud, carefully avoiding the places where the reeds were thick so that they shouldn't make any susurrating sound as they beat against his legs.

Again he seemed to hear— "Blest gods! But this must be my fancy!" he thought — the disturbing sound of a man weeping; and this time there came with it the memory of that picture in his mother's room of the baby Jesus with a snake, and of the expression on the snake's face. That expression was unmistakable.

He had understood it before he could pronounce any articulate word. "I protest," it said, "against this whole apotheosis of Love which you as God are now inaugurating. Love is the craftiest sublimation of the possessive instinct. I admit it gives with both hands. But what it does it always does for a reward. It lays up treasure. I tell you," so it had seemed to him this snake's eye said, "one touch of freedom is worth a king's ransom of love."

Mother of God, yes! He knew now what it was that had started him thinking of that snake's eye and all it contained. It was this curst Saint Julian's Water and its sticky mud and whispering reeds! When was it — three years ago? — by Christ, no! only last Thursday — that he had parted from his father when he broke their sword and had done — or was all that an hallucination? — some sort of act of homage to Medrawd! "Then it was only last Thursday," he thought. "But Holy Jesus! the whole thing's crazy! It's like the spell laid by Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed to avenge Gwawl, about which that boy said the Henog was reading to Brother John this morning! And yet it was only last Thursday that old Rhun made me taste his sun god's honey that'll make us brothers-in-arms for life! Well! We're brothers for life all right, but it's brothers-in-love rather than brothers-in-war. However! Whether by the honey of Mithras or by the kiss of Morfydd, old Rhun and I are linked up — and if the link's cut it won't be by me!"

It was at that particular moment, by some occult movement of omnipotent Chance, that a faint shifting of the wind from southwest to due west took place by means of which a slight lifting of the mist permitted the gigantic outlines of Craig Hen to tower up unmistakably before him a good deal nearer and sooner than he had expected.

He took three long abstracted strides through the reeds, staring intently at the huge natural battlements before him and entirely forgetting his previous caution about the noise the reeds made switching against the leather of the straps round his legs. This unexpected shifting of the wind had brought it about that, though the lower portion of the Old Stone was still cloudy and obscure, its upper part was revealed in all the jaggedness of its origin.

In fact it was presented to Porius in the precise way it had been left when the original cosmic convulsion had cracked its heart, wrenched it from its foundations, shattered its symmetry, splintered its curves into gaping chasms, and with the peculiar ecstatic delight wherein Chance, the greatest of all artists, extemporizes her creations, carved signs and symbols upon its furrowed forehead that only the final race upon earth would probably — if even they — possess the wisdom to read.

More clearly than ever he now heard the sound he had taken for a man's weeping. He stood stone-still in the wet mud in an effort to make out whether what he heard came from the upheaved fragment of chaos before him, or from among the pine trees that grew here in scattered groups, on ledge after ledge of the terraced hillside, until they were swallowed up by the forest.

"By God!" he thought. "I believe that man is up there among those trees, and not at the Old Stone!"

It gave him an intense feeling of relief that this weeper should not be at the Craig Hen; and he knew very well that one of the more natural causes of this relief was simply the excuse it gave him for delay.

During the whole of this morning's quest, passed on to him so airily and perfunctorily by his light-hearted parent, he had been aware that his youthful mania for the Cewri and his manhood's craving to beget a child on the gigantically sweet body of some Creiddylad of his own finding was not what it had been, was indeed completely different from what it had been; and now as he stood staring at the Craig Hen and listening to that sound, there formed itself in his mind, for the power he possessed of rapid self-analysis, though diminished by his recent reckless lavishing of the life force in his bridal bed, was still operative in him, the knowledge that he had at last, while he'd been stalking these Cewri, stalking them like wild beasts round this old familiar little muddy lake, found out what he, Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn, really was — Mother of God, yes! — and really wanted!

He lugged his feet out of the mud now and moved on, cautiously still, but perceptibly quicker than before. He decided he'd leave that unhappy man up there among the fir trees till he'd seen the Cewri.

And it was at this moment that he began to realize that the particular portion of the Old Stone nearest to the ground, where there was a circular space not unlike a cave but open to all the winds save the one from the northeast, was just now clouded by something that was different from the yellow mist.

Smoke! Cannibalistic monsters that they were, they had evidently lit a natural human friendly bivouac fire in their hiding place! He moved forward a few more paces, grasping Gwythyr's spear by its centre and staring fixedly into the hollow space at the foot of the Old Stone whence the smoke was emerging.

Again he heard that sound — whatever it was — and he could not make up his mind even now whether after all it came from the hillside or from the hole in the rock.

He had long ago noted as a cynneddf, or "peculiarity", in himself that under the pressure of any disturbing crisis or of any exceptionally agitating occasion that might turn out to be a crisis, his mind had an automatic tendency to take critical stock of its strength and weakness as an instrument for coping with life, and he often reached at such times conclusions that in calmer conditions would never have emerged.

And he told himself now as he stole forward towards the smoke, with that sound of a man weeping on his right hand, with that loathsome lapping of lake water on his left hand, and with shapes in the smoke out of which his imagination had no difficulty in conjuring up beautiful, terrible, majestical faces, that what he wanted in the depths of his being was simply to be left alone to enjoy his own thoughts and sensations and to watch and wait, here in Edeyrnion — and to hell with the Bosporus! — submitting to Morfydd and going about with Rhun, what the future had in store — tungerong larry ong!— "enduring until the end."

What, however, actually happened then remained, until that same "end," a wild series of broken, inchoate, inconsequent, inconclusive impressions. It was a hoarse cry — more like the howl of a sentinel wolf than of a human watchman — from the weeping man among the trees, that must have warned the cawr and cawres of Porius's approach.

And these two must have taken him for the first of a silent pack of men and dogs with bows and arrows and spears and hunting knives, if not with that terrible magic water that Lludd sprinkled upon the Coranians and destroyed their whole race!

For incontinently they left their fire and their feast and came forth, fleeing towards the Cader, and they passed so close to Porius that he could see the features of the half-devoured corpse the cawr was carrying away, and he knew those features as the features of the young Mabsant, formerly of the emperor's court, whose mission to the Gaer he had himself so rudely interrupted only three days ago!

Little had this spirited lad — and indeed little had he himself when he lifted him from his saddle — guessed to what a tynged, or, in the Cewri language, to what an ong, his Edeyrnion quest would carry him!

But the figure of the cawres who followed at the heels of this devourer of beautiful young men drew Porius's attention with an absorption that was irresistible from the ghastly and pitiful burden the cawr was carrying. The countenance of the cawres, for she was the man's daughter and not his wife, bore not the faintest resemblance to that of her father. He indeed looked exactly what he was, the last of the cavemen of the mountains, last of the creatures who had lived on the slopes of Eryri and the Cader long before the Ffichtiaid appeared as if out of the bowels of the earth with their treacherous servility, or the Gwyddylaid had crossed the sea with their weapons of "pitiless bronze."

But the things that absorbed Porius's attention about the majestic feminine creature who followed this savage old aboriginal were not at first the monumental outlines of her figure or the elemental proportions of her face. They were her clothes. The old cawr who preceded her was dressed in sheepskins with the wool left just as it was when the animal was killed, but this young cawres displayed quite a perceptible discrimination in what she wore, having a loincloth, if so it could be called, made of moleskins that had been carefully cured before they were sewn together, and in place of sheepskins wearing several very flexible and particularly soft deerskins, put on one above another, not in a rough hugger-mugger manner, but with considerable awareness of their general effect.

It was as if she, the last of the aboriginals of Ynys Prydein, had been led by Nature to show to the woods and lakes and precipices and caverns, if not to the wolves and eagles and ravens and foxes, what the sheer instinct of femininity could achieve, in and by and for itself, without any help from outside.

The young cawres had even twisted her heavy straw-coloured hair into great massive yellow braids, braids that gleamed and glittered when the sun shone upon them with a metallic lustre, braids which waved and tossed round her neck as she moved, falling sometimes between her shoulders and sometimes between her breasts.

Although the young cawres followed her father in their retreat, she didn't follow close behind; and it was clear that she was by no means bent, as he was, on escape at any cost.

For a second Porius stood like a stump of ice, cold, squat, and repellent. At least that was how his frozen quiescence struck the young giantess. But a second later something entered his blood that changed this ice into stone, so that he seemed to her like a pillar of basaltic slate, not repellent any more but hard as iron.

Her father had not, for all she could tell, caught a glimpse of this motionless broad-shouldered man, whose small yellow-green eyes seemed in a flash to take possession of her, body and soul. It could hardly be called a look or a glance, the rush of magnetic intimation that passed so instantaneously between them; for what their natures felt was a mutual assimilation of each other's sex as complete as the melting of a cloud into the yellow-green space of evening or the mingling of a far-drawn inland river with the salt sea.

No, her impression was that her father had not seen the man; but the young cawres had not yet, for all her life at his side, sounded the abysmal animal cunning of the ancient savage who begat her.

The last of the Cewri had shrewdly enough, with the corner of his crafty left eye, under its drooping lid, taken his own measure of the terrific muscular power of this motionless man’s arms and shoulders; nor had he gone past him by much more than three times his own length than he began — apparently quite naturally and casually — making signs to his daughter to follow him more closely.

Several times after that, Porius saw him turn round to see if she were still safely behind him and not lingering; but when he had satisfied himself that his fears were groundless and had realized that the young cawres was moving, if anything, still closer to him the further he got from the water, these anxious turnings and peremptory wavings entirely ceased.

And then there came to Porius, as he watched them ascend one by one the long series of steep rock ridges leading to the foothills of the mountains, what was really an extremely complicated crisis in his life. It could be called a moral crisis; but it was much more than that. It could also have been called an aesthetic or even perhaps a metaphysical crisis.

But it was really more than any of these things. It concerned his whole life as a living organism. What the extraordinary encounter that had just taken place had done for him was something that even the experience of holding Myrddin Wyllt in his arms had been unable to do. It had so increased the division between his mind and his body that his mind had suddenly felt powerful enough to put an end once and for all to the disconcerting equality between these two antagonists, powerful enough to assert itself once for all as the dominant partner.

He became conscious of his mind as a living entity, using his body but distinct from his body. His mind felt as if it had suddenly become a new creature, strung up in itself, flexible and porous in itself, compact and resilient from centre to circumference, and able, as it had never been able before, to choose between opposite possibilities of action, and taking hold of its lumbering brother-in-arms to use that simple companion for purposes that must seem to it both fantastic and obscure.

The shock he had received as his eyes met those of the cawres was different from anything that had ever happened to him before or would ever happen to him again. Through each pair of eyes, as through double gulfs in thick banks of clouds that have unaccountably risen to face each other across the firmament, the primal mystery of the differing consciousness of male and female as it tore its way through Time and Space struck his whole organism such a transforming blow that his brain began to work with a sensitive grasp that in itself was a new experience.

He measured the time the two Cewri would take to reach the rocky platform upon the skyline, beyond whose surface stretched a dense forest of pines leading eventually through the wildest and loneliest stretch of country in all Edeyrnion to the foothills of the Cader.

Putting aside the possibility of the old cawr being seized with a fit of such desperate animal panic that he'd be compelled to relinquish the half-eaten corpse and carry the young cawres instead, Porius saw that it was humanly impossible for them to get out of his sight for the next half an hour.

With a speed almost worthy of Rhun himself he set out therefore at a run, jumping over every sort of obstacle that could be so treated and steering his course to that portion of the hillside where he had heard the weeping man.

As he went he kept glancing at those two figures, mounting, ridge after ridge towards that bare platform where the forest began. It is true they were less clearly outlined against the dying bracken and dead heather than they'd have been against the new growths of the spring, but they were more distinct than he could have ever imagined it conceivable that such a sight could be.

"I've plenty of time," he told himself, "if I have any luck."

And Uncle Brochvael's goddess of fortune gave him the luck he required; though how to reconcile such pure chance with the deep-flowing current of destiny would need a chronicler more learned in what the young Taliesin always called "the wisdom of Africa" than any Henog of these isles.

Yes, there it was — the curious sound of a strong, formidable, elderly man indulging in a passionate and apparently unquenchable fit of weeping.

"He's leaning against one of those trees," Porius said to himself. "I'll soon find him."

But as he moved from the foot of one fir tree to the foot of another he couldn't get the young cawres out of his mind; and the natural but ungracious thought came into his head that it was strange that, after embracing his bride all those hours and lavishing on her so much of his life force, he could feel all he felt for that young aboriginal climbing from ridge to ridge so close behind her father but every now and then turning round hurriedly and furtively and flinging a glance in his direction.

"She knows what I'm doing," he said to himself. "Does she guess what I'm going to do?"

Suddenly he was actually touching the man he sought; and to his amazement it was none other than his old friend Afagddu, Afagddu of the hideously mutilated countenance, whom only three days ago he had watched setting off with the emperor's nephew in company with a lad whose name, though he could see his face almost as clearly as he saw Afagddu's at this moment, he had entirely forgotten.

There were no tears on the monstrously deformed face, but it took the soul within the man several long seconds before he could bring under control the muscles and nerves of that distorted visage and that knotted gullet that were flinging forth these reverberating sobs.

And even when he had succeeded in quieting himself and quelling his lamentation, he could explain nothing nor reveal anything till he had extracted from beneath his clothing the precious chain which Porius had forced the prince to hand over to him, and the princely cap made of the skin of those extinct oxen which he had himself removed from his own head to place in his keeping.

The conscience-lacerated man was in fact unable to explain anything till the oxhide cap covered Porius's skull and the prince's chain was round Porius's throat.

But when this transaction was over, though even then he seemed to find crouching on the pine needles under that corrugated trunk a more fitting posture for a confessed traitor than standing on his feet, he poured forth in a torrent of eloquence the whole pitiful story.

It was through his patriotism that the old warrior had finally been seduced, his patriotism for the cause of the forest people and for the cause, along with the forest people, of all those in Ynys Prydein who were neither Romans, nor Brythonic princes and nobles in league with Romans, those, in fact, who as even strangers like the Jewish doctor were beginning to recognize, called themselves Cymry.

It was with some restraint and hesitation that the old man revealed the subtlest of Medrawd's arguments, among them the powerful one that apparently had seduced the silent youth whose name Porius forgot, namely, that Prince Einion himself— "Ha!" thought Porius. "So that wasn't missed, eh?" — went through the motion of doing homage to Medrawd as Arthur's heir.

As in the minds of the unfortunate Princesses of Ogof-y-Gawr, it was a rooted and grounded tradition with the forest people that a ruler's heir was the king's nephew and not the king's son.

Thus no child of the emperor's could possibly, in the public opinion of the Cymry, put forward a claim to succeed him stronger than Medrawd's. Indeed to Afagddu, as to the Aunties, Arthur's own position, whether as the son of Uthyr Pendragon the great Brythonic prince, or as Comes of the British coast in the interest of Rome, had always been — as Porius realized it still was with Einion ab Iddawc — an extremely doubtful one.

But what Afagddu finally revealed — and the shudder with which he did so made the black recesses in the dark red hollows of his revoltingly mangled face grow still more horrible — was a much greater surprise to Porius than the unfortunate man's divided allegiance. He helped him to his feet at once and bade him hurry off without delay to the Gaer to convey his news to the prince.

And then as the two men, under the influence of that curious necessity, amounting to an intimate craving felt by those who have been separated under dramatic conditions and brought together again under circumstances still more startling, stared at each other as they silently divested themselves of the ghostly wrappings that concealed the bleeding wound where their loyalty had been wrenched apart, there rushed into Porius's mind a real Brythonic inspiration.

"You're the same old friend of mine as ever, Afagddu," he murmured, "and it is to none but my father that you must give back his chain!" And with this he rapidly bent forward, and kissing him at the base of his forehead just above his deformed nose, he squeezed the chain, though not without some difficulty, over his corrugated forehead and protruding ears and with a swift glance at the two climbers who were even then a long distance from the last of the rocky terraces, he broke away from the man's emotion and went off at what to himself seemed a fast run.

He was not, however, any more than were his prototypes Samson and Hercules, much of a runner; and though the sight of his "Creiddylad," for in his secret senses she was already installed under the name of the mother of Iddawc ab Edeyrn, gave him the power, not given to all, of running uphill, his speed was not only retarded by lack of the energy he had lavished in the bed of his bride, but by his amazement at Afagddu's news.

In a physical sense his heart must have been as strong as the heart of one of those extinct oxen whose hide was now once again pulled tightly over his closely cropped skull, for though the jerky leaps and violent bounds with which he pursued his youthful cawres were anything but the easy movements of a classic athlete, they would have been impossible to any living organism whose heart was not more like the heart of a wild boar than of a man.

It was through a confused enough mass of material impressions that the full impact of this news had to force its way. The contact of his lips with Afagddu's face had in itself left behind it an obstructing amalgam of such impressions, sweat, tears, blackness, redness, hairiness, and the acrid smell of unwashed masculine flesh, while the slippery knots of the exposed roots of heather, the burnished stalks of bracken, the dead blackness of crowberries, the scaly surfaces of yellow-green lichens, the orange-pink clumps of stonecrop, upon which the soles of his sandals kept pressing as his deep-drawn gasps grew more and more heavy in his upward rush, were all contributions to the entangled screen that imposed itself between his intelligence and this astonishing news.

And what news it was! He had just learnt from Afagddu that Medrawd had been concealed at the Old Stone for the last couple of nights and had been having constant interviews with Erim and the Derwydd, and even — and this clearly had struck Afagddu as the most ominous thing of all — with Mistress Nineue, the handmaid of the counsellor's sister!

Afagddu had confessed moreover that he himself suspected — though he had no evidence to support this ultimate and final treachery of his seducer — that Medrawd had, during these two nights and days, secretly met — and perhaps even was, at this very moment, hurrying off to join — emissaries and envoys of the bloodthirsty Sais!

Certainly the face of the emperor's nephew, as he had seen it three days ago, ran with Porius now as he ran, climbed with him now as he climbed, stumbled and slipped and fell with him, and struggled on again, nearer and nearer to this beautiful cawres, whose name he felt surer with every step he took was and must be Creiddylad.

Long after the nature of Time had brought it about that this particular day, this day that came to occupy a special dimension of its own in his memory, had been, as the Jewish doctor would express it, "gathered to its fathers," Porius could remember certain moments of it as vividly as if he had slept only one night since his consciousness passed through them.

The present chronicler of this same consciousness has already recorded how, as the only son of Einion and Euronwy and also as the foster-child of Rhun's mother, Alarch the Fair, Porius had learnt the trick at a very early age of separating the docile and obedient routine of his outward actions by a considerable gulf, both from his secret physical sensations and from his secret mental commentaries.

And the older he had grown, the wider had become this gulf; for both these personal responses were of the kind in which he could indulge without rippling the surface, far less disturbing the depths, of the massive docility of his life.

But it was doubtless due to this curious psychic lacuna, this steadily widening magnetic gap, between what might be called the nerve centres of his consciousness and the motions, and emotions too, in a patient and plodding sense, of his behaviour, that he fell into the abnormal habit, already alluded to, of substituting in his own mind some arbitrary, accidental, and fantastically irrelevant substance or colour or shape for some human person, or for his reaction to some human person by whom his life was at the moment troubled.

With his heart pounding, his pulses beating, his breath coming in gasps, and the salt sweat running down into his eyes, he now began to visualize the palpable and physical aspect of the rape to which he was being whirled by his own will, while the young cawres lingered for him up there, dodging that savage old Titan, her monstrous begetter.

Horribly and beautifully he visualized it. And the beauty was reached through horror, and the horror was reached through beauty.

And both the beauty and the horror came from the same causes — from the majestic stature of this goddess-giant and from his having found her so soon after leaving his bridal bed that no overpowering rush of passion could blind him.

Thus the present chronicler is by truth compelled to be more explicit than that cunning artist, the Henog of Dyfed, had been in his account of the dark enemies of Pryderi. For the rape of the young giantess now presented itself to her Herculean pursuer as a reproduction, with a difference, of what he'd seen when he pressed his face against the face of Afagddu.

It became in fact a swirling bottomless pool, wherein there whirled round and round a terrible vortex of all the beautiful and horrible waves and eddies and ground swells of black blood and crimson blood, mingled with slime and scum and ooze and seaweedlike hair, that cover the shoals and porches of the threshold of life.

When he reached the rock platform it was with a lively shock of crafty relief that he found that the cawres had left it. Ah! The wise Creiddylad! She realized what she was doing! For Porius, who knew every stick and stone of these particular foothills, as well as any cawres of the Cader, was well aware that between this platform and one of the loneliest and most hidden of the small mountain lakes that waylaid and sidetracked the foolhardy stranger who fancied he could discover an ascent to the Cader through the impenetrable forests of this northeastern approach, there was a mass of undergrowth so ancient and so thick that if two persons attempted to thread its mazes and keep together they would have to remain in close physical contact.

Oh, she was a woman all right, cawres or no cawres! For here was the place, and the only place till they got above the trees altogether, where that formidable old Titan of a father could be given the slip!

He stood still, panting; and so extreme was the mingling of his excitement and exhaustion that he felt as if his heart, not himself, were the conscious creature who had brought him here; and as if he himself, his brain, his feelings, his desires, even his very muscles, were like a bundle of gristle to which dead leaves and bits of rubble and the wilting feathers of small birds killed by buzzards stuck fast, and whose only reason of existence was to guard that tell-tale master of life, his thumping heart!

But, he told himself, here was the kind of special moment for which that same tynged which made him what he was, so sensitive to his father's mockery, so submissive to the wishes of his mother and his bride, so closely bound to old Rhun, had, ever since Alarch the Fair first bent over his pillow, armed and prepared him.

He promptly decided that it would be mad to plunge blindly forward into the dense thicket which surrounded that platform with a half-circle of entangled branches and thorns and briars. And yet were he to shout, the father as well as the daughter would hear him and come bolting back ready to wring his neck!

That the old cawr could do for him in any hand-to-hand tussle he had no doubt; finish him off he could, and he certainly would if he got the chance, and afterwards carry him away under his left arm as a counterpoise to the half-devoured corpse under his right. And as he stood there hesitating and getting his breath, and letting the thumping of his heart subside, the grotesque image butted its gross way into his consciousness of the savage old caveman compelling his daughter to eat the flesh of this Brythonic Samson for whose sake she had stayed behind.

Had the Henog of Dyfed been the chronicler of these events the chances are that he would, according to his Silurian tradition, have hesitated to describe Porius as feeling particularly proud of his unusual strength or as giving utterance in his heart to a wish to test this strength against a real living cawr y Cader, but there is no doubt he would have managed to give the episode the sort of romantic twist it would have attained had he allowed the old monster to contend in a life-and-death struggle with Porius while the young Creiddylad looked on.

As a matter of fact the only occasions in his life when Porius had ever thought about his strength were when his mind ran upon the original

Creiddylad, and he felt a thrill of excitement at the thought of inheriting the blood of the real aboriginals of Ynys Prydein.

Apart from these occasions he just instinctively used the consciousness of his strength as an assurance of security, as a pledge that one cautious and cowardly observer of the stream of life, at least, should have a peaceful and untroubled existence. It is very doubtful whether the Henog would have seen that Porius's eager response to the voyage to the Bosporus was entirely due to his natural craving to be free from an overloving mother and an overcontemptuous father.

The Henog would have taken for granted that what urged him to undertake this embassy was a pure craving for adventure. But he would have been wholly wrong. Porius was so constituted that almost all his pleasure in existence consisted of two parallel activities — his active enjoyment of the simplest sensations of living and his active enjoyment of the subtlest analysis of life. For adventure, as adventure, he cared nothing.

As he stood there now on this platform of rock listening intently to the strange moanings that the wind was making in the various kinds of trees — like the waves of the sea through the pines, like the rushing of wings through the birches, like the rustling of garments through the hawthorns — he began to wonder what he would do if the cawres had not waited for him. Would he just give up and go off upon his errand from Einion to Myrddin Wyllt?

And then — without the faintest sound that a man, or even an animal-like old cawr, could possibly associate with the passage of so stately a figure through so thick a wood; and how she did it, save perhaps by "waiting upon the wind," and only moving when the wind moved, and in exact proportion to the lesser or greater intensity of the wind's movements, who could say? — the cawres herself, the very "Creiddylad" of his secretest broodings, and yet a real, living, breathing, goddesslike young girl, came forth from that thick chaos of autumnal vegetation and stood before him, with one finger pressing her lips in the immemorial gesture of feminine warning, and with the other loosening her belt of plaited reeds in the immemorial gesture of feminine complicity and consent.

There was a strip of moss and grass, mixed with delicate small ferns and the foliage of wood sorrel and corydalis, that extended the whole length of the rocky platform on which they were standing, separating its saxifrage and stonecrop and yellow-green lichen from the dark wall of trees and undergrowth from which she had just emerged. Upon this tender and yielding couch the cawres now laid herself down; and Porius, with deliberate movements that well might have shocked a less primordial partner in the art of love, stripped both himself and his large-limbed companion of every strip of clothing that impeded their complete union, and throwing himself upon her heavily breathing supine body, which seemed to his bewildered senses like a great field that the Immortals had blessed, he succeeded, after a struggle in which he might easily have failed, in mingling his life with hers, and, grotesque as it would have appeared to his own derisive begetter, discovered for the second time on that day of stubble-coloured mist and of southwest wind what it meant to take a ravisher's possession of yielded virgin soil.

If the taking of Morfydd had been rendered easy by the girl's gallant and heroic passivity, the rape of this last cawres of the Cader was rendered difficult by the goddesslike creature's own overpowering passion.

But he was not a Hercules for nothing, and it was accomplished at last; and they both lay there, between rock and wood, in an exhaustion that was as indescribably Time sweet as it was unutterably Space deep; and over Porius's senses there floated that same ineffable Cewri scent that Morfydd's father had noticed when the coming of the pair interrupted the priest's call for vengeance.

But his vital force soon began to return to him; and, when it did so, it seemed to reach him through the living and breathing body of this great beautiful creature, the mere momentary possession of whom had flung him upon an enchanted shore of deep and fathomless rest. It was she who had drained him of his strength, but it was now she who was restoring it to him, restoring it out of those elemental depths of planetary substance, substance of air, substance of water, substance of fire, substance of earth, into which, beyond and beneath the living substance of flesh, extended the great paradisic division of male and female.

And as his strength returned, though he still lay against her just where he had turned himself half-about after their supreme embrace, he suddenly heard her voice whispering something. Her voice was deep and sweet, but not flutelike or clear. It was more like the sound of rain upon innumerable leaves.

But it was uttering now a particular collocation of tender syllabic sounds that as he listened did not seem altogether unfamiliar. Throwing a tone of imploring supplication into his request he begged her to repeat those words.

She lifted herself upon her elbow and looked at him as if to make sure he was serious. Then she sat up erect, pulling her vest of doeskin across her bosom and her shimmering loincloth across her lap and coiling the heavy braids of massive yellow hair round the top of her head.

Then with an emotion so intense that it brought a double frown to her broad low forehead and caused two tears as big as hailstones to roll down her cheeks, she repeated three or four times over, chanting it as if it were the burden of a song, the double word, "cariad-digon," syllables that so hit just where he least expected to be hit, the nerve of imaginative romance in his heart, that he scrambled to his knees by her side and twisting his fingers in her hair kissed her hard on the mouth, while his own tears mixed with hers.

"Tungerong larry ong," he gasped as their loud sobs rose and fell in grotesque alternation, while his mind, moving now as rapidly as it had ever done, decided that this double word, cariad-digon— "love is enough" — had very likely been handed down among the Cewri as an occult, mystical saying, in the manner of old Rhun's Persian Nama, Nama, Sebesio, ever since Edeyrn the son of Cunedda taught his Creiddylad to repeat it in some hidden cave of the Cader before he carried her off.

Ill-advised for Creiddylad the Second was his making her repeat those words this day; for their united sobs now became louder than those of the weeping man he had left below. He would never have been so drawn, as he had been all his conscious days, to the obscurely transmitted eidolon of his ancestress from the Cader, never have been so drawn to the idea of the daughters of the Cewri, if there hadn't been something in his inmost identity which descended from them and belonged to them, something really aboriginal in him that made the Ffichtiaid seem of the day before yesterday, the Gwyddylaid and the forest people seem of yesterday, and his own Romanized Brythons seem of a mechanical, rhetorical, loud-echoing, noisy today!

Yes, there was a magnetic reciprocity between him and this aboriginal creature from the caves of the mountains that united them as the tide coming in from the sea unites the water pools in the salt marshes, raising the level of the water and lifting it above its banks of mud.

An unfulfilled craving was in each of them — the deep sex-yearning of one primeval form of matter for another primeval form of matter. And it was the satisfaction of this craving that now broke forth in these mighty sobs.

It was as when some deluge of ancient rains, long accumulated in the rock chasms above an overbrimmed river, is liberated at last from bondage and rolls down the slope and meets and mingles with the flood below; and as it descends, and as the river rises to meet it, their two voices become one sound, and the one sound their voices become is the sound of a joy that can only be expressed in lamentation.

But even the expression of a feeling too primeval for anything but passionate sobs or howling bursts of laughter was not permitted by the exacting destinies of that corner of Edeyrnion to last for long.

Even though the wind carried their emotion eastward rather than westward, their happy lamentation was, as Homer would say, so like the desperate crying of a pair of sea eagles that it was not long before it brought the old cawr upon them. Together they leapt to their feet to meet him, and Porius glanced hurriedly round to see where he'd dropped Gwythyr's spear. Dropped it he had at the first appearance of Creiddylad, and he could see it now lying on a bed of fading stonecrop with the sun glittering on its iron point.

Never in all the days of his life had he needed a spear so desperately as now. In his longing for a spear he could feel a spear in his hand. Even one of those great ridiculous lances borne by the equites of the emperor — he would have given all the relics of Rhitta Gawr for any one of them!

Ail this while there was a spear in full view. But how in the name of the Mother of God was he to get hold of it? The cawr was after him now, and he had to dodge and skip and dance for his life. The old monster's gigantic arms were free of the corpse. The wrenched-up trunk of a pine tree, along with its straggly root, whose corrugated excrescences and compressed knobs were hard as quarried marble, was clutched in those horny hands, while a veritable frenzy of fury distorted that enormous visage.

With the most primitive of all weapons whirling at his head, first from the north and then from the south, the giant pursued him, up and down the whole length of that platform of rock. He found himself calling out again and again to the cawres, “Pick up my spear! Pick up my spear!” But of course these syllables were mere gibberish to the second Creiddylad, who at first, till the huge creature shook her off so violently that she lay for a moment stunned, tried to cling to his arm and his waist.

After this she made use of more cunning tactics. She began repeatedly running between her father and her lover, so that the old giant couldn’t aim his tree trunk at the man’s head with any ease or freedom.

But even this made little difference, and the grotesque dance went on till at last Porius began to feel completely exhausted. He had never been a runner like Rhun. Rhun would have led this monstrous creature such a dance that before it was over he would have been able in full sight of him to stoop and pick up that thrice-blest piece of wood with an iron point.

Iron! That was the one thing needful in dealing with monsters like this! The voice of his foster-mother, Aunt Alarch the Fair, rose up within him, playing a game called “Touch Wood!”

But wearily and for the thousandth time he jerked himself aside to avoid the swing of that frightful tree trunk with its octopus root. And wearily and for the thousandth time he asked himself whether he would have even a faint chance if he ran in under that brandished tree and seized the giant by the waist.

Not the faintest chance! All the muscles of Samson and Hercules together would be helpless before a Goliath like this. To wrestle with this creature would be like wrestling with yr Wyddfa, the peak tomb of Cronos.

A man couldn’t wrestle with a mountain. “I can’t go on,” he said to himself. “I’m done for! She’ll feel funny when she sees him carry me off under his arm as a counterweight to — Creiddylad!”

But his cry was too late to save her. She had seen his exhaustion. She had seen the rapidly decreasing energy of his leapings aside; and now, when a particularly savage descent of the tree trunk took advantage of his weariness, she just flung herself between him and the blow.

One of the most hammerlike bulgings of that knotted root struck her on the side of the head. Her skull cracked like a floating sea shell struck by the prow of a powerfully rowed boat. Porius could see the blood and more than the blood. The whole side of her head was cracked, crushed, and smitten in. Broken bits of her skull, to which were adhering blood-soaked strands of yellow hair, hung down against her shoulder.

Porius could see these sickening details more clearly than the giant himself who now dropped the tree trunk, and snatching up his daughter in both his arms, where he held her as a mother holds an infant, flung at his enemy — and these were the first sounds Porius had heard him utter — a wild and terrible word, the reverberation of which no living man at whom it was aimed could ever forget; and Porius never did forget its psychic vibration, though of the syllables that composed it he remembered nothing, for it was a long scaly word like the prolonged hissing of a dragon heard through miles of marshy reeds; and Porius could feel its deadly venom, like the spittle of an insane incubus, strike ice-cold against his cheek.

His one desire now was, for once, simple and direct and of a devouring rapacity in regard to alternative possibilities. It swallowed them as a hydra might swallow its own eggs! He must get his Creiddylad — his cawres now for ever — into his own hands. And with this thought filling his whole being, body and soul, he staggered over to where Gwythyr’s spear lay upon the faded clump of stonecrop, snatched it up, brandished it with a shaking arm, for his skipping life-and-death dance of escape had left him weak, and, trembling and tottering as he was, stumbled with frantic desperation straight at the old cawr.

An instinctive seizure of something very nearly approaching panic took possession of the huge creature the moment he caught sight of that iron point. Had the sun been glittering upon it, it would have been less menacing. But the dense wall of forest trees that fronted them already concealed the late October sun and the wan, cold, livid, heartless, deadly look of that iron spear point struck a nerve of superstitious fear in the old cawr, as he hugged his daughter, that went back thousands of generations to what his race suffered in the beginning from the "pitiless bronze" and the "grey iron."

So the old cawr fled in panic-terror by the path by which he had come, for by returning along the track he had originally taken, he had made, such was his colossal size, as if an Avanc had been forcing its way through the forest, a quite perceptible track; and behind him, sometimes gaining on him and sometimes distanced by him, Porius, with reckless desperation, a crushed skull swimming before him and a grey spear point giving strength to his feeble knees, came lurching and lumbering, staggering and stumbling, wanting only to possess in death what had been given him in life.

Several times he tripped and came near falling, but he caught himself up in time, for he knew by an instinct in his bones that once on the ground he would have found it hard if not impossible to resume this obstinate jog-trot of grey iron seeking red blood. And then, all suddenly, the mad race was over and done. There appeared an opening in the dense wood; and first the cawr with the cawres in his arms and then the exhausted descendant of the older Creiddylad passed through this opening, Porius catching sight, as he did so, of the ghastly half-devoured body of Mabsant, whose eyes, staring up at him from among the delicate ferns where he'd been flung, had the horrible damned look of the eyes of some hunted creature brought, head and all, to a human feast, impaled on a platter.

And there before them under the open sky, with the sun illuminating its deep clear water, was the first, and also the secretest and most hidden, of all the mysterious and fathomless lakes or tarns, that from the beginning of Time, at least from an upheaval worked by some planetary catastrophe unrecorded in Time, seem to have been designed by Nature herself to protect the security of her primal offspring.

The cawr paused and looked back over his shoulder at his pursuer. This, and the glimpse he had had of the half-devoured boy, drew Porius on in a final surge of desire to hold the goddesslike creature, whose blood was trickling down the old giant's body, safe in his own arms:

So he hurled himself forward, with the iron-pointed spear raised to strike, and in a second the old cawr had done what may well have been at the back of his mind to do ever since he took his dead child in his arms.

Plunging head foremost without a cry or a curse he leapt with her into those sun-illumined depths of emerald green water, and such was the violence and weight of his plunge — with the cawres clutched so tight to his ribs that had she been alive his hug would have killed her — that he sank, like a landslide, clear down to where a great splintered rock, projecting itself from the side of that underwater cavern, blocked the way.

Had this obstacle not obtruded itself he and the cawres would doubtless have sunk clear down to the bottom, though it is probable they would have floated up to the top again in the passing of a couple of days and nights.

They sank so rapidly and heavily, however, that when they struck this projection of splintered rock their weight forced them through an orifice between two jagged teeth of slaty stone, that had been broken at such an angle by the original upheaval that what once passed through them could never come forth again.

The hollow space below the teeth-barrier of this earthquake-sculptured Avanc was spacious enough for the natural laws that govern bodies floating in water to assert themselves; and it was hardly a minute after the shock of striking this obstacle had broken their fall, and in doing so had crushed the father's skull as the pine tree had crushed the daughter's, that Porius, pressing his weight on Gwythyr's spear till the "grey iron" vanished from sight in the mud, was confronted by two ghastly apparitions that seemed to his imagination to be staring up at him through the green water.

At first he tried to separate and distinguish the two pairs of up-gazing eyes; but he soon reached the conclusion that all he could really see were no eyes at all, only a mixture of yellow hair and grey hair swaying like a submerged tangle of weeds amid clots of blood.

And then it was that an immense weariness took possession of him, numbing his power of feeling and launching his mind upon fantastical voyages of far-fetched thought.

"There must be a consciousness in Chance," he said to himself; and then as he formed the thought, his hand slid down the whole length of his spear handle, now fixed firmly upright, and he subsided upon the fading bracken with his knees almost touching a trickle of water in which the leaves of a plant that Brother John had taught him to call potamogeton, or "neighbour to a river," serenely floated.

And the river of Time carried him away up the centuries, up thousands upon thousands of centuries, till he was permitted to behold in his own person the terrestrial catastrophe which caused this almost bottomless mountain lake to be formed, and this prison of submerged rock to make captive these two corpses.

"If there's no consciousness," his thought went on, "in these chance events, there's something parallel to it that may work even better!"

He must have slept after that, for his limbs were so stiff when at last he got up to go that it was with real physical pain that he limped away along the trail left by the passage of the cawr.

He paused by the disfigured body of Mabsant and told himself he would send young Gwythyr up here, or someone else he could absolutely trust — perhaps old Afagddu — to bury the lad properly and place a stone to mark the spot.

Meanwhile, in case he himself were killed by Colgrim's Saeson before he could arrange such matters, he knelt down, groaning and cursing from the pain in his joints, and with what dead leaves were within reach he covered the worst of the boy's mutilations; and scratching up some leaf mould from the roots of the ferns where he was kneeling he sprinkled it on those portions of that ill-used body which had been left more intact than the rest.

"Rise to immortality and intense happiness, Mabsant, my child!" was what he muttered as he rose from his knees and limped off; for it had always been a friendly matter of dispute between him and Brother John whether the prayer for "eternal rest in peace" did or did not imply a secret instinctive faith in the blest relief of annihilation.

"Eternal rest — immortality and intense happiness—" He went on muttering both sets of words, as he returned to that fatal platform and limped hurriedly across it. The physical pain with which he would now have to struggle if he were to force his aching body to carry him to Gwendydd's tent before sunset so as to meet the counsellor and old Rhun and convey to them both the prince's instructions, had now, in his emotional and physical exhaustion, become his only companion. He began talking to his pain as if it were a person, though stabs and spasms and cramps were the only response he got in reply.

But that he had this pain to contend with and argue with and make sport of, as he staggered slowly down the series of terraced rocks towards Saint Julian’s Water, was a real distraction to him and he amused himself by disparaging it.

And he went on applying this pain like an actual ointment, like the ointment which Homer says the good physician applied to the wound of Menelaus, applying it to the dark throbbing of a portion of his consciousness which he had now to carry with him wherever he went, a portion of his consciousness where a fathomless pool of green water hid the bodies of the last of the Cewri of the Cader.

CHAPTER XXIV. Birth and Death

PORIUS OBEYED HIS FATHER quite literally in regard to that portion of his instructions according to which he was to see what was going on now where the ritual of the Ravishing of the Waters had taken place to the maddening repetition of the Fisher King's chant. To reach this spot, unless he went completely round Saint Julian's Fount by the way he had come, and he felt very reluctant to do this, he would have to pass the Old Stone.

"I ought to go in there," he told himself, "on the remote chance, though it's one in a million, that Medrawd may be there still." What he would say to the man, what he would do with him, he had not a notion nor any spirit to imagine. All he felt able to arouse to activity just then were his aching limbs.

His orders to his mind were simple, that it should remain quiescent behind splintered rocks under twenty feet of emerald green water. Obstinately, stolidly, heavily, wearily, he entered the double-arched cave in the heart of the Old Stone, only to find a repulsive and, in some corners of it, a revolting litter.

But it was not the litter, nor was it the appearance of a bloodstained bone, unpleasantly suggesting a human arm broken off at the elbow, nor was it a curious inscription in the old Brython language scrawled recently upon one of the interior walls— "I bide my time" — that caused a feeling of tears at the back of his-eyeballs. No, it was the strange cuttlefish smell of the Cewri of the Cader.

And precisely the same was his experience at the place of ritual through which the Cewri had passed ere they took refuge at the Old Stone. Here, where so recently the emperor’s horsemen had confronted the Derwydd’s bowmen, not a living soul was in sight; while whole beds of tall rushes, clumps of faded bracken, and every variety of ferns and mosses and grasses had been trodden by horses’ hooves and by the feet of men into a lamentable mud of forlorn desolation.

After leaving these pitiable scenes and rounding the eastern extremity of the water, Porius became aware that a new struggle was going on in the portion of his consciousness that had not been left in the green depths under the splintered rock.

“These yellow-haired invaders,” he thought, “may even now have surrounded the Gaer, and Father may be fighting for his life in some desperate sortie! And yet here am I not even on guard in the horsemen’s camp! I surely am the least heroic and most unpatriotic offspring of a Brythonic chieftain ever born!”

He called up in detail every instruction his father had given him; how he was to go to Gwendydd’s pavilion and take counsel with Myrddin Wyllt, and how he was to tell Rhun to hold himself in readiness to act as a messenger, and he was half-prepared to let all else go and hurry up thither at once.

But this obedient purpose was countered by a boyish craving to see Brother John and to tell him, even though in his dying delusions the old Brother confused Pwyll Pen Annwn with the Son of God, the whole desperate story of his recent encounter with the Cewri.

He experienced at that moment the curious sensation of being so evenly balanced between two decisions as to be counselled to watch his own feet, as if to see whither, thus left forlorn of any master, they would carry him. They carried him towards Saint Julian's cell.

As he approached the familiar entrance to this ancient retreat he noticed an object lying on the grass in front of his own bridal tent, and taking the twenty steps or so necessary to reach it, he found it was nothing less than his grandfather's Roman flask, an object which he had been carrying about so piously and so obstinately during the last few days that it had come to be endowed for him with a sort of symbolic significance.

He stood over it for a moment, glancing at the familiar appearance of the reeds and willow stumps and water from this point and even forcing himself to take a long look at the tent.

And then, as he bent to pick it up, his attention was called to a chance-made little square in the grass beside it, formed by the entirely accidental approach to one another of four tiny willow twigs. He had always had a peculiar fancy for the auguries and omens and hieroglyphical portents that can be deduced from the arbitrary and entirely accidental arrangements of what might be called Nature's windrow or the husks and chippings and sawdust and rubble of her workshop; and though in the free scope of what he persisted in calling to himself his "cavoseniargizing" he took such phenomena, as you might say, in his stride, it was natural to him to be always noting these things even if they were blotted out the very next second by other impressions.

But he had been listening of late in Gwendydd's tent to certain murmurings of Myrddin Wyllt's about the magical nature of the Pythagorean number four as opposed to the mystical nature of the Christian number three; and his sudden glimpse of this chance-flung square of little willow twigs had a startling effect upon him.

He picked up the Roman flask, with the number upon it of the legion to which it belonged, and using it rather than the point of Gwythyr's spear for this purpose, he pushed the twigs about until they fell into a perfectly even-sided square.

The steps he then retook, some twenty or so of them, to reach the Brother's cell were this time taken very slowly; and had the Henog of Dyfed been writing the buchedd, or "life history," of Porius he would have introduced some magical encounter at this juncture to account for the slowness.

Indeed had Porius himself been relating the experience long afterwards to a son or a grandson he would no doubt have hesitated whether to attribute these slow pondering steps to the empty flask, or to the empty tent, or to the empty little pattern of twigs on the grass, or to admit that his dazed consciousness had at that point begun the secret healing process of a return to his old trick of "cavoseniargizing," even though he had hold of the Roman's water bottle in one hand and Gwythyr's spear in the other.

"Tungerong larry ong, endure until the end," he said to himself, as he entered the porch of the Brother's cell.

The first objects that met his eyes as he entered were the extravagantly emphasized buttocks and testicles, under their tightly stretched drawers of deerskin, belonging to Llew ap Greidawl, who was contentedly reposing on the wide flagstone bench, half in sight of and half out of sight of the adjoining chamber, where Brother John lay on his deathbed.

Llew was resting on his back, while his knees which were uplifted so high as to be on a level with his head, were supported in their strained position by his wrists and clasped fingers. The life-weary figure and gloom-engraved visage of the wise Morgant, half-brother to the unwise Drom, hung like a devoted phantom above the reclining Llew, as if to ward off the treacherous cheerfulness of evil-intentioned devils.

Of the inside of the death chamber, from the spot where Porius now paused to interrogate the human consciousness attached to those aggressive testicles and buttocks, all he could see was the head of the dying man's bed, together with the shoulder and arm and profile, this last with an extremely long nose and with something in the modelling of the little that could be seen of cheeks and forehead that suggested some sort of facial deformity, of a completely strange youth.

It was from the invisible lips of this personage that there was now proceeding the only sound audible in the chamber, evidently the eloquent reading or the dramatic recitation of an extremely obscure poem.

With the portion of his mind that was not yet drugged by the stubble-coloured mist, or the cuttlefish smell, or the staring eyes imprisoned by the splintered rock under the green water, Porius decided that this reciter of poetry must be the youthful Taliesin, about whom Myrddin Wyllt had spoken, and who would be no doubt keeping guard tonight over the rich young Cynan's treasures and probably making elaborate preparations of meat and drink with a view to the victorious return of that young master along with his bosom friend, Owain the son of Uryen, when Colgrim's army had been put to flight.

"All these young springalds," Porius thought, "underrate our enemies. I shouldn't be surprised if they've left their whole camp in the hands of bards and doctors and women and children! But I made a lucky hit in sending these fellows here. I'll tell this boy-bard in his own fashion that these two are looking for three things: for a great bard, for a generous master, and for a chance of waiting upon heroes! And if he asks about their special gifts, I'll tell him they've never spilt a drop in pouring out mead!"

He pondered gravely, all the same, as to whether it would be wise to confess to the poet that Llew ap Greidawl was brother to the last Derwydd of Edeyrnion. “Yes, I think I’ll tell him,” he decided at last. “Dead or alive, young or old, and whether they believe it or not, bards and druids have the same deadly and eternal enemy, the Church of Christ!”

Both the melancholy Morgant and the reclining Llew had, all this while, been watching him in shrewd silence and with a certain nervous apprehension. He read in their faces that they suspected him of having escaped from the Cewri by some crafty trick, possibly by enrolling himself in their service as a sort of spy or even as a bodysnatcher.

“Tungerong larry ong,” he told himself, “and ‘cavoseniargize’ to the end!” He forced himself now to shake off with a violent jerk the enchanted circle in the midst of which he knelt with this same spear in his hand and nothing in front of him but green water; and he forced himself to bend forward till his own face was so close to the drooping furrows in Morgant’s face that a pair of tiny little scrawls arrested his attention in the midst of those deeper channels, one of them white and the other red, that seemed to him like two dragons linked in an unnatural embrace of love!

“Ask Llew ap Greidawl,” he whispered, “what the phrase ‘enjoy to the end’ would be in the language of the Cewri.”

Morgant turned his head, certain protruding hairs among his thick eyebrows tickling the other’s cheek as he did so, and there ensued a murmured colloquy between the man on his feet and the man on his back. Then the gloomy watcher, turning again towards Porius, once more tickled his cheek with his rebellious hairs.

“He says ‘to enjoy’ in the language of the Cewri is ‘gorsorb.’ He says ‘to enjoy to the end’ would be ‘gorsorb larry ong.’”

Porius patiently and humbly repeated these strange syllables: "Gorsorb larry ong — gorsorb larry ong."

But Morgant already turned away from him and was occupied in communicating some piece of news to his sluggish-minded companion. He was indeed bending down over the recumbent Llew and tapping gently upon one of the man's knees.

Porius heard him whisper, "The Chief Bard of Ynys Prydein is going to recite one of the best poems he has composed this autumn, and it behoves us to give him our most reverent attention."

Neither Porius's own thoughts nor his own feelings were free enough at that moment to respond in any very subtle manner to what was going on around him here; but it was impossible not be struck by the tone of Morgant's words, and it was certainly clear that these words had an immediate effect upon the person to whom they were addressed.

The druid's brother straightened his back, brought his legs to the ground, and pulled his loosened jerkin tightly round him.

Porius was astonished at what he beheld. It was as if this unbalanced, loose-limbed, unsatisfactory individual were treating himself as a showman of puppets might treat one of his least appealing dolls, out of whose belly the straw and sawdust had begun to escape! By tightening his garments about him Llew ap Greidawl appeared to be withdrawing the dissipated forces of his personality from the kitchens and butteries of life and forcing the poor devils to man the ramparts.

"And all this," Porius said to himself, "because Cynan's poetical cake maker has started reciting one of his obscure modern rhapsodies." Porius had never understood the curious mingling in the mind of his father of a strong aesthetic appreciation of the poetry of this grotesquely youthful Chief Bard with an equally strong objection to giving him a domicile in the Gaer.

"The paradox must either be due," he told himself, "to some complicated tribal reverence for the elder branch of the descendants of Cunedda, or to some nice extravagance of personal pique directed against this same elder branch!" But if his father's attitude to the young Taliesin puzzled him, Myrddin Wyllt's tone about the youth completely bewildered him.

"I must be lacking in some sort of psychic intelligence in these matters," he said to himself as he recalled the counsellor's enigmatically humble acceptance of the young poet's arrogant claim to be the prophetic announcer of hidden truths. "Yes, there's something lacking in me. And it's the same with—" He was going to compare his lack of the power of appreciating poetry with his lack of success with women when the memory of Creiddylad's deep-throated gasping cry rose up within him, and he swallowed a groan of misery.

Gathering himself together with the sort of crouching movement indicated in Homer by the expressive word "aleis," Porius now made Morgant sit down by his side on the same ledge where Llew was sitting, causing that beleaguered scarecrow to sit up straighter still and drag yet tighter the folds of his garments.

For the voice of the Chief Bard of Ynys Prydein was now resounding through Saint Julian's cell, and, in spite of that "lack of psychic intelligence" of which he had complained, Porius's attention was powerfully arrested by what Chance was compelling him to hear.

"Is Brother John listening to all this?" he wondered. "Or is this a dirge over his corpse?"

But what that penetrating young voice was repeating certainly did not sound like a dirge. The boy-bard was explaining — whether to the Jewish doctor as well as to the Henog of Dyfed Porius could not tell — that the inspiration under which his poems were composed came from Africa rather than from Asia. The tone in which he uttered this explanation struck Porius as somewhat harsh and defiant, though there was a queer kind of authority, like the obscure phrasing of a mystical oracle, about the words he uttered.

But what most of all arrested Porius's attention was the surprising change in the lad's voice — and it was evident that the two listeners at his side were not oblivious of this — when he came to the verses themselves. The young poet made them sound as if he himself were only a medium for the chanting of some inanimate element, like the sea or the wind.

I was old when the night fell
On the spread wings of Gabriel:
I was young when Eve's milk mild
Turned to gall in her first child:
I was old when in sea foam
Love's queen lost her gold comb:
I was young when in sun's red
They caught her in War's bed.
Cad Goddeu! What mad wrath
When Gwydion and old Math
For the sake of Amaethon
Despoiled Annwn's Arawn.
Cad Goddeu! What sap spilt
When the trees of the Coed Gwyllt
For the sake of a bitch dog
Were lost in the peat bog!
At the holly rushed the whinberry:
At the willow charged the wild cherry:

From the pine fled the slender birch
When the hazel left her in the lurch:
While the oak, huge in history,
Stalked alone in his mystery
And the ash tree's grey stare
Filled with phantoms the air.
But I Taliesin
Go out as I go in:
Through life in its whole span
From doomed worms to doomed man:
Worlds laugh as I leap on them:
Worlds weep as I pass them by:
I neither laugh nor weep;
Too sweet is life's idiocy!
Air, fire, earth, water
Are worth more than a kiss.
Through earth's earthquake daughter
I ravish the abyss!
I go in at one end
And come out at the other:
My slain is my dearest friend:
My slayer is my brother:
When Math's magic shook me
To Gwydion I betook me;
Though 'gainst Arawn I fought,
It was Annwn I sought.
I drained sap from the bracken
For the battle of Achren,

And to plum trees and privet
I thundered to give it;
But at elder tree’s order,
That magic Recorder,
I gave bracken back
All I’d caused her to lack.
There are sighings that pass
From the gorze to the grass
When the alder swamp’s moan
Turns the heart into stone;
And though Gwydion transform me
Into sprigs of the thorn tree
And with oak apples lay me
On the ruins of Deganwy
I’ll still worship Arawn
The dark King of Annwn,
I’ll still praise the unwary
Song-enchanted Pryderi!
For as Jesus, the Crocaw,
Can pass over all law,
So I Taliesin
Can go out and go in!
With Dylan the wave’s lord
My chess board’s a pearl board:
For bereft Manawyddan
The sea’s caves shall glisten:
And with coral and amber
I’ll build him a chamber!

Though as free as the stalk
Of the wind flower in the wind
When in wild wood I walk
’Tis with Judas who sinned.
Man’s deep spirit-mind
Has a dead blank behind,
Absolutely dark!
Nil, nihil, not a spark!
There to Nothing all drops:
There the mind simply stops.
But fear fills that space
With God’s ghoulish face
And in Nothing’s dead ruck
Lo! the Vampire doth suck!
Where no eye can squinny
Comes the Nightmare’s whinny:
And where Being is not
The Ghost Horse doth trot.
But with Nothing within
And with Chaos without
I, the Chief Bard, still win
As I go in and out!
For where my thoughts go
Fall the walls of Jericho
And Jerusalem soon or late
Opens her every gate!
Not a tomb, not a tomb of Jesus
Into which we cannot squeeze us!

Not a Trinity Ship so vast
That we cannot ride on its mast!
I was the crack in the mould
Of Behemoth's final stride:
I was the pebble that rolled
On Leviathan when he died:
I was the feather blown high
From the helmet of Diomed:
I was the flame in the sky
Over Trojan Hector's head!
Things ugly and little
From frog spawn to spittle
To me like the rest
Take their place with the best:
All matter is dung:
All our death knells are rung:
We must eat what we've got:
We must sleep when we can:
Man is born for his lot:
And his lot's born with man:
From the cankers and scriggles
Of the leaf worm that wriggles
Come the runes I compose
To make redder the rose:
Down each curve of each shell
I've descended to Hell
And no weed in the sea
Withholds secrets from me:

Not as waves, but like waves,
Not as flames, but like flames,
Rolls the chaos that raves
Round the shore without names:
But I Taliesin
Go out as I go in;
And where nothing can be said
I behave as the dead:
I ride on strange creatures
Who have winds for their features
And waves for their hair
And are there and not there:
For beneath every skin
Is the gooseflesh of doubt
But 1, Taliesin
Go in and go out.

The second the bard's voice died away Porius heard the much more and much less oracular voice of the Henog; for it was clear that the bard and the storyteller had already clashed. But other voices were now raised also, and raised, it was clear, more in an attempt to propitiate both the indignant specialists than to take either side.

Porius got up stiffly to his feet and so did Morgant. Llew ap Greidawl on the contrary made the first motion, by lifting one of his ponderous legs upon the vacated ledge still warm from the bodies of the others, towards the resumption of his favourite horizontal position.

"You heard?" cried the angry bard, too excited to realize anything save the presence of three new members of his audience. "You heard the ansyberwyd, the sarhad, the laughable insult, which I, and through me all the tribes of the forests of Edeyrnion, have suffered from this man, this Henog, who behaves like the most ignorant Mabinog of the most savage forests of Gwent!"

It was then that he became conscious he was addressing the newly married heir to these same savage forests of Edeyrnion, and he stopped abruptly. It was almost as if the druid's brother, with one foot on the flagstone ledge and the other on the stone floor, had uttered — only it was hard to conceive of Llew ap Greidawl having even the energy needed for the working of the simplest charm — some sort of magic incantation; for the effect upon Porius of this encounter with the boy bard from Deganwy was as instantaneous as it was unexpected.

Porius was a man of rooted, primitive, very simple, almost childish prejudices, and one of these prejudices was against bards and priests and druids. This may have been a tincture in his veins of the ancient Roman stoicism of the House of Manlius, or it may have reverted to the more defiant blasphemy of his father's father.

But whatever its origin there existed in him side by side with this a superimposed destiny to become, in the beat of a pulse, a formidable protector of the imaginatively eccentric, the emotionally weak, the mentally disturbed, the nervously deranged.

And the curious thing was that all his life such abnormal persons had felt this and had instinctively clung to him for protection. Myrddin Wyllt, for instance, had clung desperately to him; whereas such self-centred intellectuals as Brochvael and Morvran, and such enigmatic, self-contradictory humorists as his own father, regarded him as a simpleminded, slow-witted, muscular fool.

Rhun had a very different idea of him, but, like other ideas of Rhun's, this was hidden, along with the sacred honey of the god of soldiers, in Rhun’s heart and Rhun’s cave.

Thus it happened that when the boy-bard came forth, indignant and hurt, from the Henog’s caustic criticisms, his hands shaking, his upper lip quivering, and a distracted look in his eyes, his outraged soul flung itself, with the instinctive movement of a wounded creature, upon the responsive breast, so to speak, of Porius’s powerful and sympathetic personality.

And thus, as Porius’s new father-in-law would have said, it was arranged by a pure stroke of agathe tyche, or Chance in her divine mood, that Taliesin never in his whole life felt a thrill of deeper gratitude than he felt towards this Hercules of Edeyrnion, when falling, so to say, like a weeping child on a strong man’s breast, he was greeted in the particular manner which among all possible consolations soothes a poet the most.

He was greeted in fact by a line from his own poetry. This oracular line, as magical as it was obscure, was one that Porius had caught on his father’s lips when the prince was too drunk to remember anything more.

“Ys kyweir vyg kadeir ygkaer sidi.”

“Complete is my chair in Caer Sidi,” quoted Porius, in a voice sufficiently loud and sufficiently emphatic to carry the implication to every person in the inner room that, for all his youth, this bard of the Battle of the Trees had already drunk so deep of the sweet white wine of the four-cornered paradise beyond the sea that he was safely ensconced on his poetic throne, far away from all carping quips and cavilling strictures.

Nor, though he realized from the twitching tension of the face before him how near the boy was to convulsive tears, did he fail to snatch the particular advantage from the sudden bond between them upon which, with the cunning of a primordial instinct worthy of the caves of the Cader, he felt he could count; for with Morgant’s help he hastily got the Derwydd’s brother to his feet, and murmuring to all three of them his conviction that it would be a light undertaking for the wealthy Cynan to make an addition to his household, he gave a private hint to that good man's new adherents that their bardic introducer had accumulated a considerable store of wine and mead against the warrior's return; and twisting this final image like a pair of ghostly vine wreaths about the couple's heads he got the bard and the two men out of the cell together, and well upon their way to Cynan's hospitable kitchen, before they understood what was happening to them.

When he turned back into the portico he could hear that the Henog was still speaking, and the man's voice struck him as peculiarly querulous and rasping.

"History versus Poetry," he thought wearily. "It was History versus Prophecy last Thursday, and it was the counsellor then who got the better of the Henog's argument, if not of the Henog's temper. Well! There is something about this boy bard's mystical arrogance that would be bound to irritate an old collector of legends. Well! I mustn't interrupt him. Is Brother John asleep? Or is he dead? I feel as if I were asleep or dead myself!"

It was certainly a curious weariness that came over Porius just then. It was not a despairing feeling. It was not a hopeless feeling. It was indeed a feeling not entirely devoid of a subtle sweetness. But he felt as if he could sleep for a thousand years. The heat of the fire in the adjoining overcrowded chamber began to make even this portico too hot for his taste. He removed his outer garment and spreading it over the flagstone ledge sank down upon it almost as heavily as Llew ap Greidawl had done earlier that afternoon.

But unlike Llew he remained in a sitting posture, his legs stretched out in front of him and his eyes fixed on three objects, two of which he must himself have propped against the third when he came in just now.

This third object was nothing less than the great earthenware vessel with two handles which had contained all that heady Gwlad-yr-Haf mead which Rhun and he had carried together to his bridal tent and there drained it to the bottom. Nesta ferch Aulus must have placed this against the wall, while against it in its turn he had propped young Gwythyr's spear as well as the legion's water bottle.

Looking at the spear, he began to feel again the precise sensation he had had when, with his fingers sliding down its shaft, he had sunk on the moss in front of that clear green water and had seen those two pairs of eyes staring up at him through clotted blood and drowned hair. But suddenly, clean through the blood and the hair and the staring eyes, a chasm opened into something deeper yet, an ecstasy of life worship indescribable in words. He felt indeed an extraordinary sensation; a sensation that to the end of his life he would try to reproduce in any crisis. It was nothing less than an ecstasy of enjoyment, of exactly the same nature as his familiar "cavoseniargizing." Only there was this difference. This ecstasy included every experience he had ever had; for he had never been in pain so unendurable that he couldn't detach himself from it, nor had he ever seen horrors so appalling that he couldn't face them without losing consciousness. It was a feeling, he decided later, that embraced the whole world as if it were something under water, something that included not only staring eyes and pieces of bone, but ourselves also, as if we lived under water and saw ourselves, and everybody else, as weeds, stones, reeds, minnows, newts, water beetles, mud!

And he set himself to try to analyze the real causes of the queer ecstasy he had just had. "Probably," he thought, staring at the two shadows on the floor, the shadow of the spear and the shadow of the legion's water flask, "probably it was simply due to some absurd pride in having fixed up this boy's hurt feelings by quoting his own weird words." And he repeated to himself once more: “Ys kyweir vyg kadeir yghkaer Sidi — Complete is my seat in Caer Sidi.”

And then he thought, “How this child-poet and this Henog do hate each other! Mother of God, but I’m as much on the side of the old storyteller as Father’s on the side of the little poet! I’ve no music in me, no poetry in me, no love in me. And yet I had an ecstasy just then. I can have an ecstasy as well as another, though I have no music, no poetry, no love, and enjoy nothing in life but life and trying to analyze it!”

He stared at the earthenware handles of the vessel that had held their mead. “It sent Rhun to sleep,” he thought, and an old song a beggar from Ceredigion used to sing in the Gaer kitchen came into his head about “reaping ferns in the Land of Summer where black dogs shit butter.”

From the apple juices and halcyon seas of the Land of Summer his mind turned to Creiddylad and death. “Did those two enjoy their life?” he thought. “And where are their living souls now? Gone as completely as Brother John’s will soon be gone! Ask for Brother John of Saint Julian’s Fount, and some honest Henog of the future will tell of a lean skeleton in a forest grave with a nest of baby moles cuddling under its hollow ribs. Ask for the giant-girl who could cry out as she was raped: ‘cariad-digon! cariad-digon! love is enough!’ and you’ll find a pair of broken skulls tapping against a scoriac splinter!”

He stretched out his legs till the toe of one of his sandals touched the base of the huge earthen jar in front of him, while with his left hand he possessed himself of a stout piece of firewood that someone had dropped and beat it idly upon the flagstone.

“My killing her,” he thought, “began three days ago. It began on the day of Jove the Thunderer, when from above our eastern gate I watched the straw-coloured mist from the Cader follow the windings of the Divine River."

All this while he could hear the tense, strained, carefully modulated voice of the Henog of Dyfed, and he now began to make an effort to use his habitual "cavoseniargizing" in a manner he had never used before; that is to say, to include in its scope not only the fullest realization of death as meaning and implying his soul's complete annihilation, but, along with death, all those nervous manias and horrors and terrors and morbid fears that had ere now come near to causing him — though he suffered less from them at thirty than he had done at twenty — to long to lose himself in that same blessed annihilation.

The shock of his rape of the cawres, and her death so quickly after, had roused forces within him which he felt were enlarging if not altering the whole nature of his consciousness. One of these forces seemed to be the power — and it may possibly have been his exultation in this that had produced his ecstasy — of including in the sweep of his "cavoseniargizing" both the idea of death as the end of all and the whole array of these secret nervous afflictions of which his mother and Morfydd knew very little and Rhun nothing at all.

It may have been something in the curious disharmony between his sluggish body with its Herculean muscles and the almost unnatural rapidity of his conscious thoughts that produced these morbid effects. They were not always present with him, and sometimes for months he had been entirely free from them; but it was only as he gradually outgrew not merely his adolescence but his complete dependence on three formidable women, on his foster-mother, Alarch the Fair, the mother of Rhun, on his real mother, Euronwy, the daughter of Porius Manlius, and finally on his playmate

Morfydd, who today had become his wife, that he began to shake off these nervous afflictions.

They could not all be explained as a result of his abnormal self-consciousness, but some of them certainly could. What in fact was his worst horror, needing all sorts of mental tricks to overcome, was the simple physical fact of his eyelids having to blink, his pulses having to throb and his heart having to beat, not to speak of his having to obey the diurnal necessity of voiding his natural excretions.

Thus what made this strange ecstasy such an important moment in his life, as he sat alone that evening in the familiar portico of his dying teacher's cell, was the fact that in place of contenting himself, as he would have done only a couple of days ago, with his old "cavoseniargizing," forcing himself to enjoy the general and particular aspects of the time and the place, he now made an effort of will to include not only his eyes blinking, his pulses throbbing, his heart beating, not only the fact that when he made water before crossing this threshold his urine had possessed an uncanny smell, but also the reckless and daredevil notion of the complete annihilation of his conscious soul in endless death. In plain words what he set himself to do, as he listened to the voice of the Henog and held himself back from disturbing Brother John till the fellow had finished his tale of magic, was to force himself to enjoy both the outward world, with all its forms and colours, its splintered rocks, jagged spikes, dizzy peaks, slippery precipices, and the inward world with all its prickings and ticklings, its messings up and missings out, its throbbing and pulsings, its heavings and spasms, all that the mind whistled to him, all that the conscience clamped down upon within him.

"I can go on now doing anything that Mother and Morfydd want me to do," he told himself. And he pulled up his legs with a jerk and slowly and stiffly rose to his feet and put on again the garment he had removed. He felt as if the sight of those two pairs of open eyes staring up at him through blood and hair and green water — a sight which from henceforth he could call up at any moment — was more than a substitute for a voyage to the Bosporus. That sight and his eternally varying reactions to it would from henceforth be his voyage into another world, his visit to Caer Sidi!

He was standing up now with one hand against the wall and with his eyes shut. "I must see Brother John," he thought, "and then I must go round the camp before reporting to Myrddin Wyllt. I expect I'll find Rhun with Gwendydd."

It was not because he felt shame at having delayed so long in obeying his father, nor was it because he felt dizzy from lack of food, that he shut his eyes. It was because — by one of those pure strokes of chance that so delighted his wife's father — the tale the Henog was telling had grown so relevant to his special case that he was like a native of Dodona who, as he was collecting acorns for his pigs, found he had suddenly entered the sacred grove and was listening spellbound to an oracle from Zeus himself.

"And on the fifth morning after they had hunted together in this fine forest, Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed noticed that the countenance of his friend, Gwawl the son of Clud, was heavily cast down, as though he mourned the loss of some rich possession or of some beautiful lady; and forthwith he enquired of him the reason for his grief.

"'I mourn,' he said, 'because this Forest of Gwent-Is-Coed is richer in deer and richer in well-stocked streams than any district in my own land. Moreover, its lord hath in his stable the most beautiful mare in the whole world, and on every first of May this mare bears a foal.'

"'To whom does this forest belong?' asked Llwyd.

"'It belongs,' replied the other, 'to Teirnyon Twryf Vliant.'

"'Were it not better for you, my Lord,' said Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed, 'if you asked counsel on this matter?'

"'It would be better.'

"'My counsel would be that you should borrow the Avanc of Arfon that my kinsman Gwydion the son of Don keeps by enchantment till its claws are as long as those of the dragon of Eryri, and I myself would work a marvel on your behalf.'

"'What marvel would you work?'

"'I would cause that Teirnyon Twryf Vliant should leave his stable in the care of nobody but old men who drink mead; and I would bring it about that a clap of thunder, a fall of mist, and a mighty tumult should cause these old men to run away. Then when the foal was born I would cause the Avanc to thrust his claw through the window of the stable and carry the creature off. Does this counsel seem good unto thee, my Lord? For if it does not we will travel together to Caer Dathyl and ask help of Math the son of Mathonwy.'

"'The counsel does seem good to me.'

"'Why then, my Lord, is your countenance still downcast?'

"'I call heaven to witness that I have good cause to be still sad, even though in your friendship you work this wonder, that the claw of the Avanc of Arfon should enter this stable in Gwent-Is-Coed and should carry off this foal.'

"'What cause have you, my Lord?'

"'Between me and God, I'll tell you the cause,' said he. 'There is only one woman in all the world that I desire for my wife, a maiden so light of foot that she can tread upon the crests of waves without breaking them into foam, and upon the petals of flowers without spilling a grain of their pollen. This maiden is Rhiannon, the daughter of Heveydd Hen. Her father, when in my debt for many services, promised her to me but now I find he has broken his covenant and has betrothed her to Pwyll Pen Annwn.'

"When he had thus spoken Gwawl the son of Clud breathed the heaviest sigh that had been heard since the beginning of Time in the forest of Gwent-Is-Coed.

"'Is it thy pleasure, my soul, that I give thee further counsel in this matter?'

"'Between me and God,' said Gwawl, 'right thankful would I be for any counsel.'

"And Llwyd blew upon his bugle four times, and there was no sound from the bugle that a man could hear, but the dogs of both of them heard it and of themselves they made one pack and of themselves they went as fast as the wind, with no man behind them and no stag in front of them. Northward they went for a week and a day till they came to Rhuddlan Teifi in Ceredigion where Pwyll Pen Annwn had one of his hunting lodges, and there they stayed.

"And such was the power of Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed that where they stayed no eye could see them save the eyes of the creatures they killed for food and the eyes of the carrion crows who followed them for the sake of the off-scouring from the creatures they killed.

"And when he had finished sounding his bugle Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed looked at his companion; but Gwawl's face was like the face of a stone.

"And Llwyd said: 'I will show thee friendship more perfect than this. Between me and God there is an Annwn of Illusion and Enchantment that is richer and easier to reach than the real one which Arawn, its ruler, shares with Pwyll. Into this Second Annwn, this Annwn of Illusion and Enchantment created by Math the son of Mathonwy and by Gwydion the son of Don, there is a way that leads under land and water from Caer Dathyl. It is a way that goeth by the north, leaving Dinas Arianrod to the south.'

"'I call heaven to witness,' said Gwawl the son of Clud, 'that if you bring me the aid of this Second Annwn I will support you with all my possessions.'

"'You will only need to support me in one matter,' said Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed, 'and one thing only I shall require of you.'

"'What is that one thing?'

"'I will tell you freely and will conceal nothing from you. In their false Annwn of Illusion Math and Gwydion have caused chains of enchantment to be suspended from the deep sky in such a manner as to descend into the lowest chamber of Caer Sidi — for you must understand there is now a Caer Sidi of Illusion as well as the real one. Between me and God, my soul, this is all that is required of you if you desire my help and the help of Gwydion the son of Don against Pwyll and Arawn. When any man or any woman asks you concerning the real Annwn and the real Cader Sidi you must answer them as if they were asking you about the false ones, those that were made out of sedge and seaweed by the enchantments of Gwydion the son of Don.

"'Thus, as the years flow by, when one man asks another, as he ploughs or fishes or hunts by his side, whether the prisoners in Caer Sidi are really bound in heavy chains, the other will answer: "Let us pray to Gwydion the son of Don to preserve us from the mynweir, or 'beast-collar,' with which the enemies of Gwawl the son of Clud and Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed are —"'"

Here the words of the Henog suddenly ceased and there arose a general murmur of excited voices, out of the midst of which Porius sought in vain for any indication that his old teacher was conscious or unconscious, asleep or attentive, dead or alive.

So with an effort greater mentally and more painful, for some obscure reason, even after all that had happened to him, than any effort he had made that whole long day, he entered Brother John's warm, spacious, and crowded cell.

Yes, there was the old man's bed as he had always known it; and there — close to the big fire — was the bed he himself had slept in before rising to meet his bride.

Seated on this bed was the Jewish doctor and by his side, also seated, was the dark-eyed, vivacious Nesta ferch Aulus, evidently enjoying herself extremely, and displaying her natural and graceful charm with an added aplomb — so it seemed to Porius — due to her marriage and the loss of her virginity, even though these events had occurred so recently.

Behind her, chopping logs for the fire with some difficulty since the only instrument he had for this task was an antique bronze axe that must have been preserved by some special chance, or possibly — since this had been a heathen shrine long before it became a Christian one — by some special intention, was the young owner of that borrowed spear he had left in the porch, that spear whose short thick shaft and broad double-edged point he would remember to the end of his days.

The person nearest to him as he entered was the Henog of Dyfed, who, however, kept his seat on the bed and giving him no more than one shrewdly alert and scrutinizing glance continued screwing on the tops of his small bottles of writing pigments and twisting little pieces of twine carefully round his tablets.

Porius could not help noticing how very quickly that sharp shrewd self-protective glance with which his entrance had been greeted faded away from that singular face while the man's earlier look, which had for a second been superseded, returned undiminished.

This prevailing expression upon the Henog's countenance caused Porius a contradictory mixture of friendly indulgence and irritation. It was the special expression naturally assumed, he remembered, by most of the reciters and storytellers when they made some popular hit over the mead at Mynydd-y-Gaer; and Porius derived a vicious amusement from noticing how the same maudlin complacency which rested, as thick as flies upon newly dropped dung, on every feature of the Henog of Dyfed differed so little from the tipsy satisfaction of the simple revellers whose pride in their innocent successes he knew so well.

He noticed however that, unlike the popular reaction of the gregarious reciters at his father's banquets, this afterglow of the Henog's satisfaction in his own performance was a lonely and solitary thing and completely independent of all outward response or recognition.

Thus, as across the unconscious form of the dying man he made low-voiced enquiries of the Jewish doctor who had risen to his feet to greet him, Porius's rapidly moving consciousness filled every gap in these solemn questions and answers with his mental reaction to this amazing chronicler, who seemed in the pride of his storytelling to be literally pushing the unconscious Brother John out of his own deathbed, what struck him as especially astonishing was what he now learnt from the presence of those pens and pigments and tablets; namely, that the man had been reading from a passage he had just written.

He had in fact been reading from what he was in the midst of composing. And in doing this he was absolutely self-centred and self-sufficient. "He must be," thought Porius, "in the habit of reading aloud to rocks and trees. The doctor over there, with that extraordinary object in his hand, must have served him as a holly tree, that dark-eyed girl as an elder bush, and friend Gwythyr as a truculent ivy stump! The fellow's quite mad," Porius told himself, "or he is the most original chronicler of events there's ever been! He does it purely and solely for his own satisfaction! Mother of Heaven! But I'd give a lot to know how much of it he invents and how much he picks up as he goes about. And I'd give a lot to know whether the old Brother heard a word of it before he slept.

"And what does the Jew think? Does the Jew say to himself, 'God of Moses, but this is marvellous; this is like the History of Ruth; this is like the History of Elijah and the prophets of Baal!' or does he groan and curse in his heart the frivolous fairy tales of the heathen?"

Porius soon decided that nothing that any of them felt was of any importance at all to the Henog! What did he care whether Gwythyr and Nesta had understood or hadn't understood his tale? For all he cared, Llwyd and Gwawl might have seemed to those young people like a couple of conspiring badgers, and to the Jewish doctor like the savage sons of Zeruiah!

There was clearly not the faintest reason why Porius himself should make any special effort to be courteous to the man about his performance. Disregarding the Henog completely, therefore, he turned to the doctor. "He might die then, you consider, at any moment?"

Lot-el-Azziz gave him a penetrating look across the chronicler's bottles and tablets.

"When the devourer in his bowels," he replied, "feels his own death imminent, and I have heard through this" — and he tapped his ram's horn— "that it is near, he will leap at his heart."

But even while those words — as words sometimes will after they've been uttered — went bowing and nodding and winking at one another across that loaded bed, Porius was wondering in his heart which of the two, the Henog discovering a second Caer Sidi among the aboriginal legends in a cloudy and complacent void, or that sensitive boy, with his wounded life illusion all quivering and bleeding, flying for refuge to a real Caer Sidi in his own heart, held the true secret, the real cyfrinach of the past?

Through the twilight of his ponderings his own uncomfortably rapid mind had ample time — for the doctor was now describing to him at some length the proceedings of the invisible enemy within the body of Brother John — to note the pathetically furtive attempts of the young Gwythyr and his bride to come into some sort of natural flesh-and-blood contact in spite of all the ghostly mysteries of all the bards and chroniclers in the world.

But as twilight deepened in that chamber and those young bodies cunningly drew closer to each other, Porius's own grotesque and tragic lavishing of love's seed on this day of the sun made the whole business of erotic attraction seem sad and perilous.

"I wager," he thought, "that cry, cariad-digon!— 'love is enough!' — was picked up by 'them' up there — caught in fact like the plague! — from our deluded and treacherous race. No, no, no! Love is certainly not enough! It needs pity and common sense and a lot more if it's not to breed hate and jealousy and suspicion and loathing and murder!"

But the Henog had by this time collected his writing materials and was ready to depart; nor could Porius, as he escorted him in silence through the portico to the entrance and nodded a simple farewell, refrain from a sigh of immense gratitude to the man, that there was no wounded life illusion here for him to heal.

The Henog departed into the twilight with the same expression of inscrutable satisfaction as he had worn when he first ceased reading. "He's alone in Space," Porius thought, "and only Space has the power of reflecting his stories in such a manner that all their faults are lost and all their virtues remain. In the eternally empty Space round him he sees the perfection he aimed at and gives himself the credit for having attained it; and maybe, in some cosmic ideal sense, he has attained it."

And Porius's clouded memory struggled with dim recollections of how Brother John had interpreted certain words of Pelagius about Plato. "Everybody who listens to the Henog," he thought, "is resolved into this paradigm or perfect pattern of an ideal myth; and, by becoming a part of it himself, is transformed into the very perfection of which in his critical hostility he refused to see so much as the fragment of a shadow! Thus while the Henog's hearers" — and Porius found himself staring as if from an immense distance at the spear and the bottle and the two-handled vessel— "may actually be tearing to pieces the tale he is telling them, they are themselves, as far as the storyteller is concerned, irresistibly compelled to assume the role of small and unimportant portions of the perfect pattern of his vision."

Porius indeed was now destined to experience the queer sensation of being himself a person in one of the Henog's tales; for as he re-entered Brother John's cell and found the married lovers completely absorbed in each other, and the doctor on his knees at the bedside, he heard a patter of light-running feet and on swinging round was confronted by the small page Neb ap Digon.

At the sight of the little creature Porius had a vivid remembrance of the first time he'd seen him, only three days ago, outside Gwendydd's pavilion; and a whole series of pictures with Gwendydd and old Rhun in the foreground, that alluring demon of a Ffichtiaid in the middle distance, and in the background that poor, hunted, harassed counsellor, tottering to and fro like a sick and yet solid ghost, flitted across his brain.

Before the little page had done more than begin to catch his startled attention, the boy's mere presence brought back sharply to his mind the occasions when he had been forced to support the faltering magician in his arms; brought back even the corpselike smell of which he had been aware at those queer moments.

"Roaring drunk through the whole camp, do you say? Insulting the body of Princess Tonwen? Carrying the head of the disinherited chief at his belt? Where is Rhun ap Gwrnach? Who is with the Lady Gwendydd? Where is Dion Dionides? — Who did you say? Are you sure about that? How do you know when a woman—"

But by this time the doctor had joined them, and though Neb had kept his head in the presence of Porius's agitation, under the interrogation of Lot-el-Azziz he began to utter sounds more like the hysterical sobs of a baby centaur than any human sound.

"It must be she," the doctor cried, speaking very rapidly and in a tone of angry desperation, while he hurriedly adjusted the fastenings of his long brown professional robe and jerked back his head to get his elongated topknot out of the way. "Where did you say? Near Prince Porius's new tent? And the boy with her? Did the boy speak to you? But never mind that — I must go at once — I must—"

His words were cut off by the entrance of the woman herself. She was dragging her body along the flagstones on all fours, giving vent as she did so to convulsive and spasmodic sounds that were like groans uttered not by a woman at all but by a nameless animal.

In spite of all this she kept articulating quite intelligible sentences to the child who accompanied her. She must have seen the doctor, but she disregarded him completely. She rose on one knee and began working her way, her right hand on the foot rail of Brother John's bed and her left still on the floor, towards Nesta ferch Aulus. The only person who seemed to divine her intention was her little boy, Gog. He ran forward to Nesta and pulled violently at her belt, crying in a shrill voice, “Magog’s knocking to come out! Magog’s kicking to come out!”

Never had Porius felt such a helpless fool; but what astonished him was that the Jewess’s husband seemed equally at a loss. Instead of leaping with professional assurance to the aid of the woman in labour, Lot-el-Azziz appeared totally dazed. He even began unfastening his long brown robe as if it were himself, rather than his wife, who was in need of delivery. Gog, and Gog alone, at this juncture, showed a sound instinct, an instinct which was promptly supported, though rather faintly and feebly, by young Gwythyr, as to the person to whom to look for help.

“Do what Nesta says,” this latter youth kept repeating in a low-pitched nervous voice but with a reiterated obstinacy that augmented with each repetition. “Do what Nesta says!”

What followed forced itself with overwhelming clearness upon Porius’s mind and struck him as the deepest of all the causes that enabled the Romans to conquer the world. He had himself turned to Nesta ferch Aulus, and he remembered long afterwards how as he watched the look in her eyes a sense of complete confidence swept over him as to the fate of the woman and as to the whole issue of the affair.

Whether it was Roman staunchness in her or simply the old Italian earth wisdom from the heart of the immemorial peninsula of citrons and cypresses and classic gardens and rustic gods, one thing was certain: the competence of the centurion’s daughter soon changed the whole complexion of that old room under the Gothic arches!

It soon became clear that if the Henog could turn the Brother’s cell into a negligible portion of a vast dome of empty Space in which the story of Gwawl the son of Clud and Llwyd the son of Cil-Coed wrote itself upon the air, Nesta ferch Aulus could turn it into a traditional lady’s bower of Ynys Prydein devoted to the natural functions of birth, of life, of sleep, of death.

Porius himself, leaning forward over the unconscious body of Brother John, and indeed pressing more of his weight upon it than was decent or right, watched spellbound from beginning to end the rapid, primeval, competent movements of the centurion’s daughter, who herself, hardly more than a dozen hours earlier, had been an unravished maid.

He noticed how she was helped at every turn by that familiar of ladies’ bowers, the sophisticated Neb, who himself was followed by little Gog, who kept his eyes fixed upon him in awed wonder and fascinated respect as if he’d been a wooden doll endowed with the miraculous power of human action.

It may have been his instinctive male horror of the convulsive spasms and crushing pains of childbirth that brought it about, but Porius found, as he leant forward over his old teacher’s motionless body, that he had to struggle quite violently once or twice with a sensation that was extremely distasteful to him and against which he always fought fiercely; namely, the feeling that he was moving from the past into the future like a shadow upon a dial, a dial that was too enormous to be seen as a circle but along which he moved through a fatal series of happenings that stretched ahead in predetermined succession.

Nor was it long before he was looking, as he had looked once before that day, through a mist of water and wet hair and torn flesh, at a human head smeared with blood; only it was one head now and not two, and there were only two eyes now, two tiny little ones, and those tight shut, not four great staring ones capable of following him anywhere and of peering at him through walls of stone.

It was indeed upon Porius's mattress on the floor by the fire that the woman was finally delivered of her "knocking" and "kicking" Magog; and as he saw her lying there at peace at last, while with water warmed in a familiar cauldron he himself constantly used, and brought in from outside by the active Neb in the Gwlad-y-Haf mead vessel, young Nesta, like some Etruscan goddess of birth, washed the small descendant of Abraham.

That diminutive nomad's voice was now lifted up — like the shriek, Porius thought, of a filmy-winged bat from the fathomless darkness outside, caught in the confines of a human cave — though it was hard to say whether its protests were directed against human life in general, or against fate's choice of the queer person now murmuring over it what sounded like an incantation in the language of devils as its human progenitor.

But at this moment it was the mother and newborn baby that obsessed Porius's attention rather than the doctor-father. He heard the woman say something to Nesta in a husky deep-throated murmur like the sound of the first hoarse notes of an early blackbird.

But what an extraordinary creature a newborn infant was! "Has that shockingly naked little blob of helplessness," he asked himself, "got a soul like mine? And will its soul change, as mine has changed in the last twenty-four hours, from thinking of itself as the centre of everything to thinking of itself as akin to the souls of dogs and badgers and horses and weasels and foxes — yes! and of worms and gnats?

"Curse it all! Could there be a greater fool than I've been all these years, thinking myself God knows what, because an old patriarchal hunter of wolves and harasser of Gwyddyl-Ffichti was crafty enough to have himself baptized and to propitiate a Roman general! Oh, Master, Master," his thoughts ran on as he bent down lower over the man in the bed so as to catch a glimpse of some portion of the well-known features, "why didn't you teach me how to arrange my mind and my feelings so as to endure life and enjoy life, instead of teaching me what Pelagius thought, or what Plato thought, or what the difference is between Mithras and Christ?

"Why didn't you teach me that when I die it's the end, and that until I die it doesn't matter who I am or with what arms or speech or name or tradition I face life as long as I do face it, and fulfil it, and befriend it, and defend it, and extend it, and am ready in spite of it to accept death as its natural conclusion?"

As Porius cried out all this about himself and to himself, he was aware that the doctor had left the sleeping woman in the care of Gog — who indeed was guarding her like a watchman at the gate of Jerusalem — and had approached the bed and had begun to fumble under the sleeping man's blankets with the intention evidently of feeling his heart or his pulse. He was also aware that Lot-el-Azziz was not only trembling and perspiring and showing signs every now and then of being seized by a convulsive shiver, but was so wrenched out of himself that he flung down his ram's horn on Brother John's pillow close to the sick man's head and allowed the obstreperous wisp of hair on the top of his own skull to hang down over his narrow forehead like a black snake suspended by its tail.

Porius had just seen Nesta making signs to Gwythyr and Neb to be quieter in their movements, now that mother and child were both asleep, so that it was in a low whisper that he began congratulating the doctor on Magog's birth.

"You surely won't sail with the Greek now?" he whispered to him, but when he found that the man either did not hear him or was too agitated to understand him, his own mind swung back to what he had just seen which was the first birth he had ever witnessed in his life.

He had differed since his infancy from all previous members of the prolific Cunedda family by taking no interest in animals. Of horses, of dogs, of sheep, of cattle he knew as little as it was physically possible for the only child of a born huntsman like Einion ab Iddawc to know. Thus as he had been entirely removed from the circumstance of any birth in his association with his mother, his foster-mother, and his betrothed, his knowledge of the singular and startling accompaniments of birth was practically nil.

Of course he had heard tell of this and that; so what naturally came into his head to wonder now was whether it was in some shocking connection with the uncomfortable phenomena he had heard described as the “navel string” and the “afterbirth” that Nesta had at a certain moment wiped Gwythyr’s hunting knife with a piece of stuff clipped from the tail of its owner’s vest, or whether the knife had only been used to cut from this same useful garment a band broad and soft enough to wind round the tender belly of the newborn.

What he felt now, as his eyes followed the eyes of the doctor to the narrow and dark orifice under the blanket where he held the Brother’s wrist, was an obscure impression that if he could only plunge his soul into some mysterious underworld of real reality, out of which those four open eyes had emerged from a spume of blood, and those two closed eyes had emerged from the torn and bleeding centre of a woman’s body, he would find that the secret of life included within its immeasurable orbit the secret of death.

It was at this moment that he saw the doctor fall back in startled alarm; and it was also at this moment that he himself — owing to the fact that he had been leaning so much of his weight upon the Brother’s body — fell back in shocked and dizzy helplessness. For there suddenly happened two bewildering events. There appeared on the threshold of the chamber the flaxen-haired figure of Gunta, the eight-year-old little daughter of Gunhorst the Sais and of Sibylla the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, and as she entered she called upon the name of Neb ap Digon. At the same moment, with a sudden and shockingly unexpected jerk of his whole body, Brother John heaved himself up in his bed by the help of his two hands into a sitting posture, and cried aloud: “It doesn’t matter! It doesn’t matter! It doesn’t matter!” and then fell silent but remained in a sitting position.

Swift as an arrow Neb ap Digon rushed to the side of the little girl and took her hand. They neither of them showed the least awareness of Brother John. As far as he was concerned they might have been a couple of living dolls, chattering during the Eleusinian Mysteries or the Christian Sacrament, but they were both too proud and too self-conscious to chatter, and they showed no sign of their acquaintanceship before all these people beyond holding hands.

The flaxen-haired little girl, who had realized at once with a woman’s life instinct that there was a newly born infant in the room, opened her blue eyes wide with interest when she realized that if she stood on tiptoe she could just see the child lying asleep in the round tin basin in which for the last thirty years Brother John had taken his monthly bath.

Having satisfied herself that her instinct had been correct, and that there was a baby in the room, the little Saxon raised one of her bare arms, and drawing Neb’s head close to her own began whispering vehemently in his ear. Neb’s features during this process became like those of a stiff archaic statue of Hermes subjected to restoration or alteration by some nervous and fanatical modern Byzantine.

After a quick exchange of further whispers during which the two small creatures were watched intently, not only by the doctor and Porius who were supporting the dying man, the one on his right hand and the other on his left, but by Brother John himself, who kept making violent but futile efforts to speak, Neb left the little girl's side, and hastily approaching Porius, though after a courtly obeisance coming no nearer than about twice the length of his own height, commenced, in the perfect style of a practised imperial courtier, to deliver his horrifying and indeed appalling news.

Brother John, his head twisted awkwardly with concentrated attention, listened to every word the boy uttered; and as he listened he relinquished, to Porius's infinite relief, any attempt to utter another word.

Neb told how a considerable body of Saxon invaders had taken undisputed possession of the central tents of the horsemen's camp, and had met with little resistance, for all the equites were away fighting, and the men that were left — and well did Porius know that! — were anything but natural fighters. Worse than this, and here Neb's voice assumed a tone that doubtless followed some austere tradition that went back to ancient Rome, the leader of the band was the same Saxon who had previously waylaid and killed both the Princess Tonwen and her disinherited friend of the Avanc's Cave, who now is known to have been the son of Gorthevyr the Blessed, himself the son of Gortheyrn the Accursed, the lover of Ronwen.

Worse still, these same savage Saeson had discovered, and some false traitor must have shown them its entrance, the place where the camp's wine and mead were stored, so that they were now as drunk and as wickedly mad with drink as the worst devils in hell, and when Gunta ferch Sibylla saw them — but here Porius interrupted:

"You mean to say that this little girl herself saw these things going on?" and Neb ap Digon acknowledged with a faint but very courtly bow, just as if he were relating some magical adventure to a group of spellbound ladies-in-waiting, that his youthful girlfriend had been present in person at these savage deeds.

“When she saw them dancing so furious and so wild, and their yellow hair tossing so madly,” Neb continued, “she climbed up into one of those fir trees in front of the camp kitchen, and being so small of stature and those Saeson devils so huge and so drunk, not a soul of them saw her. But, my Lord, I have to tell you something else that is... that will... that will make you—”

The hesitation assumed by Neb at this moment was as dramatic as if the adventurer addressing the court ladies had suddenly perceived the queen herself entering the circle of his audience; and he lowered his voice to such a pitch that Porius, instead of angrily bidding him tell the worst quickly and have done with it, glanced round at Brother John’s profile and at the rim of the improvised cradle.

What Porius really felt at that moment would have shocked every living soul in all Edeyrnion except Neb himself and his great master. He felt as though, since the purposes of destiny would be fulfilled whatever anybody did or didn’t do, that it was more than lawful, that it was natural and wise, to enjoy the spectacle of the rushing torrent of good and evil and let what would be, be.

What would have been difficult at any time, and was impossible in his present mood, for his nature to grasp, was the depth of Neb’s cynicism and inhumanity. Save for Myrddin Wyllt and Gunta ferch Gunhorst Neb did not give a damn for god or man. His dramatic gestures and pauses, his lowerings of the voice, this “something else that is... that will... that will make you... “ were in reality pure melodramatic playacting.

But the hollowest reed if thrown into the dangerously smooth water above a waterfall can make a perceptible splash; and Neb’s “something else that is... that will... that will make you... “ served to precipitate over the brink the troubled soul of the man in the bed.

Brother John had been listening intently to all Neb said, and though the words were ostensibly spoken to Porius alone, and spoken in a stage whisper too, he had heard them all.

And the curious thing was that when he began speaking now, his total unawareness of the fact that the enemy within him had at that very second gathered itself up for its last leap was so complete that as it was carried to his hearers upon the powerful vibration of his tone, which was a tone of life and not of death, they too were hypnotized into forgetting that he was dying.

"You must forgive me, Porius, and you others," he said in curious spasmodic jerks, dropping the words like round smooth pebbles into the astonished silence of the whole room, "if I can't see you and if I'm interrupting anyone; but I've never been so short of breath, and I've never felt such a thick cloud of mist — what we used to call a niwl — over my eyes. And I've never been so heavy with sleep. I've got a lot to do yet before I die or I'd like to sleep for a thousand years — to sleep, you understand, Porius filius, just simply to sleep.

"But the things those children are telling you, Porius, my son, are enough to keep us awake till doomsday. You've brought me a good doctor, Porius, a very good doctor. But Death's a better one. If I hadn't got such a lot to do I'd like to die now. But I want to tell you something, and I've no time to explain what I want to tell you. I can only tell you, and you must take my word for it, Porius filius, that if I had time I could explain. No one is to be blamed for all this horror except everybody and everything. That's what I want to say. Nobody is to blame more than we all are; and nobody is to be punished more than we all are!

"Do you hear, Porius filius? No one is to be punished. None, I say, none! We are all good and we are all bad; we are all angels and we are all devils.

The good is always stronger than the bad. But we don't see it till the end because we don't know the one from the other.

"And however bad the pain Death can always stop it; and nobody, I say to you, nobody can stop Death coming and bringing it to an end. One minute the pain's there, and the next it's gone for ever and it is Death that has done it! So let us give thanks, neither to good nor to evil, neither to God nor to Satan, but only to Death!

"I'll be better soon, I expect, Porius filius, when this niwl's gone and I can see clearer. I've got a lot to do; otherwise I could sleep for ages. No, no, no, no! You needn't call for Pryderi, or for Jesus, or for Pelagius! I can do what's needed myself, since there's nobody to blame and nobody to be punished. Absolvo — omnes, omnes, omnes, omnes!"

The almost supernatural jerk that followed these words was so violent that it caused the doctor's ram's horn to roll off the bed. One second, as the old Brother had himself just said, and his living soul was solidly there, deeply entrenched within him; another second and it was gone, absolutely, and what was left was a striking mask, an impressive image, an imposing likeness, something that had been deserted by the world of Nature and taken over by the world of plastic moulds, monumental mimes, mummied mockeries, and mortuary mementos.

Porius felt as if the same jerk with which the living soul had torn itself out of his old friend's body had taken place, a thousand times modified, in his own case. The difference between the man's last words and what he could now see of the head hanging loose and falling sideways, and of the face drawn awry and distorted, was a bitter commentary on the way things went in this world.

As he held the dead body by its shoulders while Lot-el-Azziz smoothed the pillow to receive it, the view he got of the Brother's features was naturally broken and fragmentary, but it was sufficiently startling to disturb him more than he expected.

The scene that followed, however, was a proof to him of how impossible it is to predict what the combined forces of fate and chance, playing upon the nerves of a particular group, can conjure up in the shape of an edifice of atmospheric emotion.

As far as Porius was concerned, his one and only thought — and considering his present drifting, detached, and half-drugged state, and considering the ghastly pause in Neb's narration and the unspoken horrors that had been hinted at before that narration ceased, this was the last thing he would have predicted — was to catch his old master before he got too far away and to tell him that the distorted form under his hands, as he helped Lot-el-Azziz lower it down on the pillow, was not he at all, and that he couldn't think of this lifeless thing as anything but an it.

"Yes," he thought, as he left the doctor to get Nesta's help in closing the eyes of this simulacrum and straightening its limbs, "you are as real as we are who cast shadows and break wind and eat oatmeal upon the earth! By Jesus and Pryderi, you are as real as we are!"

He stood, lumbering and lurching and swaying for a moment, his thumbs in his belt, his head nodding like a grotesque idol, and his hands hanging down like those of a great ape. He hadn't had the least idea he would feel the old Brother's death like this; and the discovery that he couldn't predict his own emotions increased his sense of being in a boat on a far more unknown sea than any Bosporus.

While these were the most articulate of Porius's feelings, to the newly born Magog the presence of death had not even risen to the reality of a sneeze or a gurgle. He had been making curious little pathetic animal noises in his extemporized cradle, but he now fell into a delicious Elysium of sleep deeper than he had experienced since he had been lugged from his warm soft nest in his mother's body. He had had his rebellious moods even there, and his fits of restless dissatisfaction, but of these no fibre, no nerve, no cell awoke to trouble his new sanctuary in the dead man's washing basin.

And there came across that fluctuating invisible something that was next to nothing, that wavering edifice of emotion, made up of the feelings of all the persons in that death chamber, a sudden backrush and tidal return of the old caveman life of the Gaer long before the Romanized House of Cunedda refined and Christianized it.

Over those two unconscious bodies, the body of the newly dead and the body of the newly born, this backwash of prehistoric life swirled and heaved. And its focal point was the renewed contact between the rapidly moving lips of the daughter of Sibylla and the attentive ear of the cynical Neb.

And while Porius, standing erect now and scowling with absorbed intensity at the stone arch above Magog's cradle, tried indignantly and inconsistently to hold back the escaping soul of Brother John and make it forgive everything of which it knew nothing, Magog's brother, with no less gravity but much less inconsistency, clutched anxiously at the most available corner of his mother's nearest garment while he kept his eyes fixed in awe and wonder upon the flaxen-haired little girl.

It was Neb ap Digon who broke the spell. Porius's attempt to force back the dial shadow of fate and to burden the dead with the unbearable load of the living was a lapse into the sort of irrational emotion which, in his convoluted experience of the heart affairs of the imperial court, this small creature had come to regard with the contempt of an arctic fish for a tropical fish.

His attitude to Porius was already a little dubious, if not actually hostile. That there was some sort of a psychic bond, hard to define and possibly destined never to be defined, between his great master and Porius, had already struck Neb's attention; nor had he been free from pangs of actual jealousy on the occasions when it had been Porius's impulse to offer physical support to the magician.

In addition to all this, Neb's protective instinct on behalf of Myrddin Wyllt had been roused to a dangerous point when he noticed what seemed to his sardonic mind to be a subtle lecherous understanding between Porius and that fatal woman from whom he felt it to be his first purpose in life to protect his master.

There was therefore at the back of what the small creature now did an urge beyond the urge of the moment. He rushed forward, completely disregarding the angry reprimand of Lot-el-Azziz, who was engaged with the corpse, and seizing Porius by his belt began dragging him, with a force that was as astonishing to himself as it was to his victim, across the flagstones towards the portico.

Meanwhile Gunta, noticing that the initial bewilderment on Porius's face had turned to a puzzled irritation and that this, in its turn, was changing into anger, made the scene worse by snatching at one of Porius's wrists and throwing her whole weight upon it.

At this point little Gog, though clinging now with both hands to his mother's sleeve, began to laugh with intense sympathy at what he fancied, for the doctor played it sometimes with him, was a game of "giants" between this small boy and girl, and Porius. The only reason, he thought, that the three of them weren't laughing out loud was that the old man in his rumpled bed and Magog in his tin cradle were both fast asleep.

It therefore may easily have been some mental vibration between Gog's brain and his own that suddenly compelled Porius, when he felt this pressure from both the little beings, to treat the occurrence not only as laughable but as a definite sign from the goddess of chance pointing to what it were best for him to do.

What he did, therefore, under the influence of this view of things, was to lift them both gently and firmly from their feet and carry them bodily, Neb under his right arm and Gunta under his left, clean through the portico, which he knew so well, and out into the open air.

CHAPTER XXV. Better Nothing Than This!

THE SHOCK OF FINDING IT much colder and much darker than he had anticipated had the effect of deepening the primeval play impulse communicated to Porius from the Judaic soul of Gog, brother of Magog. He mentally let go his hold upon the spirit of his dead teacher, a spirit that immediately — so it seemed to his imagination — mounted aloft in great spiral circles into the vast curve of the sky.

But he replaced gently upon the ground both his prisoners, taking care however to retain his hold of each small hand, one of which, Neb's, was very warm, and the other, Gunta's, very cold. And he bent low and looked ponderingly into each face, smoothing down in turn as he did so a disturbed lock of hair on each head.

It was then that for once in their mutual life, which was destined to be both long and eventful, the wise and worldly Neb proved himself a poor discerner of character compared with the scaramouch daughter of the reckless Sibylla.

Neb had reacted unfavourably to the experience of being carried under the arm of "that great hulking Gaer ass," as he had heard Dion Dionides describe Porius; and now that he was released, to have his hand taken as if he'd been a child and to see his girl's hand seized in exactly the same way, was maddening to every dangerous nerve of his intimate pride.

But that one look combined with that one touch was quite enough for little Gunta. From henceforth to the end of her days she regarded Porius as the only absolutely good and reliable man fate had ever thrown in her way.

"You won't get too tired and too hot in that cloak, my dear, will you, if we go and take a look at those drunken devils?"

This remark of her "good and reliable" one had the effect of turning Gunta's mind to the safety of Neb. It wasn't that she wished he had a cloak as warm as hers, for she knew that his profession as a page kept him so constantly in and out of sheltered places that his bodily temperature had come to resemble that of a cat; it was that she distrusted his ability to climb trees with the monkeylike swiftness and assurance that she herself possessed.

And if they were to conduct this "reliable" giant into the presence of her Saxon relatives' dance of death, it would be necessary for them to witness these murderous men's fate — for she had been brought up to regard the son of her mother's prince as invincible — from a safe vantage ground.

But before any further move was made it occurred to Gunta ferch Sibylla that if the solitary "good man" of her life — for into nothing less than this that one look and touch, combined with a delicious sense of helplessness such as she could naturally never feel with Neb, had already converted our Herculean friend — was to be stirred up to that real anger, which Gaer gossip assured her was necessary if he were to destroy his enemies, it was advisable that she should do what it was totally against her nature to do, namely, convey to him the abominable horrors she had witnessed during the last six hours. It is possible that if even her friend Neb had seen the things Gunta had seen he would have been too upset to speak of them. But having resolved for all their sakes to make this placid Hercules angry, the little girl, with her fair hair blowing in the southwest wind as they walked faster and faster along the lake's edge, thrust her big doll more securely under the belt beneath her cloak and proceeded to relate, baldly and bleakly, and in a shrill reedy voice like the piping of a curlew between seashore and salt marsh, how a band of the Saeson had brought into the camp the decapitated bodies of Princess Tonwen and the son of Gorthevyr Bendigeit, commonly known as “the man in the Ogof’s Cave,” and how they had forced their way into the camp’s kitchen, and how they had got drunk on the heady mead of the west and on the rich wines of the emperor’s cellar.

From the branch of a pine tree it was, she told Porius, that she had watched the beginning of these horrors — only the beginning, she explained in her monotonous piping voice, for she had seen worse things that day than drunken brutes dancing round two corpses, even though one of them was the son of Gorthevyr the Blessed and the other the youngest princess of Ogof-y-Gawr.

“What worse things?” Porius enquired abruptly and not without a spasm of irritation, for he had been aware for some while that Neb was attempting, by means of the simple expedient of digging his nails into the hand that held him, to shake himself free and escape; and though Neb’s nails were neither as sharp nor as long as those of his fellow pages, they had begun to cause his captor no little discomfort, not to speak of making him aware of a wetness in the palm of his hand that was beyond perspiration.

But, from this point on, both the pain and the blood drops ceased; and they ceased because both the little girl’s companions stopped in awestruck amazement at what she now began to relate.

And the queer thing was, though it sprang from quite opposite causes, that the strong man of Edeyrnion and the wise child of Caerleon felt quivering through their souls the same feeling, a feeling composed, in almost equal portions, of revenge and shame.

Neb felt ashamed that he had left for a single second, though at the man’s express command, his weak, helpless, and victimized counsellor. Porius felt shame that while he had been occupied, and worse than occupied, while he had been absorbed, possessed, obsessed, angel-hunted, devil-ridden, by the tragedy of the new Creiddylad and by the death of his old teacher, these savage invaders of Ynys Prydein had been murdering his people, polluting his sacred places, befouling his life-giving shrines, and for all he knew capturing Mynydd-y-Gaer itself!

Nor was the little offspring of Gunhorst the Sais and Sibylla the Gwyddyl-Ffichti oblivious of the effect of her dramatic narration. Had Brochvael been there to hear, and he alone in all Edeyrnion would have caught the full significance of her tale, he might well have been reminded of some Homeric scene when it was the duty of Iris to reveal some ghastly aspect of human destiny to which the son of crooked-counselling Cronos had nodded his assent.

But though she had never heard of Iris little Gunta was of the same sex, and at this moment with her back to the darkening water and to the purplish ridges on the other side of the water where the rocky terraces rose above Craig Hen, she resembled Iris in being able, beyond the power of either Neb or Porius or both of them together, not only to see but to describe abominable happenings without allowing them to leave, or at any rate without their leaving, any wound or scar or bruise upon her feminine mind.

"I followed Sibylla" — the child always spoke of her mother in this impersonal way— "when she went to join my father. She thought and my father thought that I should go with them — either back to Germania if they lost, or on to Caergwynt and Bryn Badon if we lost. But I had other ideas. When the prince let my father go on his vow to abstain from the war, and he broke his vow and took Sibylla with him and met the Saeson and led them against Ogof-y-Gawr I pretended to be going with them. But I ran ahead and got first to Ogof-y-Gawr where the princess and the Derwydd and Erim ab Uchtryd had taken refuge, but where there wasn't a single solitary man to defend them.

"I told them I'd guide them here to the Brother's cell, or, if they liked, I'd take them to Gwern-y-Gwyddyl, where they could hide for days and months with Sibylla's people. I begged and begged. I took Princess Esyllt's hand and cried and cried. But she wouldn't and the Derwydd wouldn't. But I frightened Erim ab Uchtryd at last by telling him how angry my father was with the prince for chaining him to the wall in Rhitta Gawr's Hole, and how he would make the Saeson kill them without mercy. I think Erim would have come with me quite alone, but his conscience wouldn't let him. So if it was my father who killed the others, it was Erim's conscience that killed him.

"Ogof-y-Gawr was empty — everybody had gone. I went in and stood at a window overlooking the entrance. In the entrance the princess and Erim and the Derwydd waited for my father and his Saeson. Sibylla came with them and stood at the back all the time, her hands over her eyes. My father had joined the same band who had killed Princess Tonwen and the chieftain of the Avanc's Cave and whose leader is the one you're now going to kill. His name's Thorson, and he's a terrible one with both axe and spear.

"The princess made a speech to them, a biting, railing, violent speech and a speech full of as much contempt for us as for them; a speech against Roman, German, Brython, Gwyddyl-Ffichti; against all in fact except her own forest people, who, she said, had killed all the giants and had inherited Ynys Prydein from them. The princess wore the same royal robe she'd worn at the Feast of the Fisher King, and the Derwydd had on all his arch-druid's garments.

"After the princess had spoken the Derwydd spoke, if you could call it speaking. But it wasn't like ordinary speaking. It wasn't talking to anybody, neither to my father nor to Thorson, nor to the men. It was more like asking questions into the air; but it wasn't exactly like that.

"And the Derwydd wasn't angry like the princess, or frightened like Erim. He was smiling. But he wasn't smiling at anybody. He was just smiling, like I used to smile when my doll was asleep and I didn't know when she'd wake up. I can hear his voice now; and when those things began happening I didn't cover up my eyes like I saw Sibylla doing. I only repeated over and over again what the Derwydd was saying to the air. 'Nothing,' he was saying, 'is interesting save to see what happens next.' It was Thorson with his spear who did it; but he didn't throw his spear. He just walked up to the Derwydd and with all his strength ran the spear straight through him and pinned him to the ground. Then he did the same with the princess and Erim; but those two he pinned to the ground with the same spear.

"Fear made Erim laugh out loud. Fear made him laugh like a woman. Fear made him ashamed of nothing. He acted like a baby, playing round the princess's skirts till the princess thought he'd gone mad; and I could see by her face she was annoyed with him, and when he held her skirts she tried to push him away.

"But I knew what it was and I was sorry. But I was glad when he laughed like that; because I know from myself that when you laugh like that you don't care for anything! That's what I wanted to say to fear: 'Fear,' I wanted to say, 'you're a fool! You've frightened him so much that he's not afraid any more! That's all you've done with your frights!'

"Thorson pinned the Derwydd to the ground with one spear and then called for another. And when one of his men gave him another he came up to the princess when Erim was behind her, clinging to her, and when he was laughing till the tears ran down his cheeks and when he was jumping the princess, who is very thin though she’s so tall, up and down, as I jump my doll sometimes. And suddenly my father told Thorson in a funny kind of voice not to put the spear through the princess because the Derwydd, though he was pinned to the ground, was still smiling and telling the air about its being ‘interesting to see what happens.’ I could see my father was troubled with fear; yet not enough fear to give him a laughing fit.

“When the same spear was pinning them both to the ground Erim stopped laughing and began to scream. This made me feel sick; and I could see it annoyed my father, for he took an axe from one of Thorson’s men and lifting the princess’s head out of the way, and I could see from the window she was dead, he chopped his skull in half.

“Then my father thought of a strange thing. I could see Thorson didn’t much like it. I think he was frightened of it. I think he knew it would bring him ill luck. But though he’s stronger than Father he hasn’t got Father’s brain. So Father made Thorson’s men do what he wanted; and they fastened some sort of oily stuff round the two spears — round the spear that pinned the dead princess and the dead Erim to the earth, and round the spear that pinned to the earth the last of the druids. Then they brought fire and set light to these two spears, so that above three bodies pillars of fire rose, and as they rose, their flaming horns waved in the air.

“I couldn’t see the Derwydd’s face any more now because of the smoke, but I don’t believe he was dead and I imagined I heard his voice coming out of the smoke and still saying over and over: ‘Nothing is interesting save to see what happens next,’ and before I slipped out of Ogof-y-Gawr and ran away I went round Thorson’s men to Sibylla, who still had her hands over her face; and I picked a tuft of fescue grass, for in our huts at Gwyddylgwern we throw it after them when a man takes a woman away, for fescue grass binds them together and keeps the man kind, and I threw it against her but too lightly for her to feel it; and then I gave a last look at those two pillars of smoke and kissed my hand to Sibylla's back and ran."

It was extraordinary, when she had done, how the effect of her words flowed and ebbed, ebbed and flowed, across the conscious personalities of Porius and Neb. Thousands of mysteries of feminine self-expression in all their proud and pitiful essences were incarnated in this flaxen-haired child as she clutched about her shoulders half of an untrimmed sheepskin and shifted the position of the big doll she kept strapped against her side under her leather belt.

"Come! Let us go!" cried Porius; and as for Neb he gave his girlfriend a series of congratulatory little nods as much as to say: "You've worked the trick, my dear. The devils are done for now."

And the little girl, as they all three went on, proceeded to relate how when in her flight she reached Porius's marriage tent she had found the door open, climbed on to the bed, and there slept for more hours than she could tell.

It was in this way that she'd given her parents time to make any vain search for her they may have felt impelled to make ere they went off together to join Colgrim; and it was thus that when she finally wandered into the horsemen's camp she perceived from her vantage point in the fir tree that the gigantic Thorson and his small band were still at their marauding games.

"Come on! As quick as you can, children!" whispered Porius, "and as quietly as you can. Let me and not you be the one to make the noise that'll disturb them!"

What Gunta felt when they reached the scene of these gruesome revels and, letting Porius go forward alone, stood hand in hand with Neb, was exactly what she would have felt had their friend been an angel of heaven with a weapon in his hand from a celestial armoury.

What Neb felt was much less imaginative. Weighing the situation in the most rational balances, he decided that heathen barbarians of this kind would be more terrified of a man like Porius with empty hands than of half a dozen men like themselves armed with battleaxes and spears.

But Chance is nothing if not capricious; and the event that actually occurred fulfilled neither Neb's premonition nor Gunta's presupposition. For as it happened the drunken band of Saeson, in number about a score, were lying on the dew-wet darkening grass at the feet of the gigantic Thorson, who, with his axe by his side and his back to the ramshackle wooden structure which the imperial horsemen had put up to serve as a kitchen, was drowned fathom-deep in sleep.

Porius moved slowly forward. His feelings at that moment were curiously sluggish and languid. No particular emotion of any kind stirred in him, not even that of righteous anger. He often found it difficult to get angry when "the occasion," as people told him, "called for it," and he supposed the occasion was making its humble uproar at this very moment.

But a drowsy kind of fatalism about these men's crimes and a vague, confused, anxious sense of being a prize fool himself, both in regard to his achievements and in regard to his misdeeds, were all he felt.

And indeed as he moved forward towards a heap of stones that separated him from these twenty sleepers, he began actually to feel a dim sense of pleasure in the fact that he was no longer called upon to display any feeling; in fact that all he had to do was to exert his strength in opposition to the strength of twenty peacefully oblivious Saeson! That this exertion of strength would necessarily imply wounding and killing remained a blur at the back of his exhausted brain and was no part of the motive force behind his huge and abnormal muscles.

But suddenly he stopped, stopped like a creature frozen motionless, stopped like a rabbit in the presence of a weasel. He had reached the heap of stones which had not been high enough to conceal the group of men who were lying in all sorts of quaint postures at the feet of their gigantic leader but had been just high enough to conceal what lay immediately behind it. And it was this that froze him into motionless horror. The dapple-grey mare — whose name had been given her only twenty-four hours ago by the emperor himself — lay there dead while a thick, slowly oozing stream of blood, that looked jet black in the waning light, had begun to gather at a spot in her side and to trickle down over the smooth curve of her belly till it collected in a pool between her legs.

Himself transfixed by a long spear which had been left in his body, but not in a vulnerable spot, and which now trailed at his side leaving dark ribbon-shaped lines in the dew-soaked grass, crouched the familiar form of Drudwyn, Rhun’s white hound.

Drudwyn was licking the cold nose of the dead mare about whose nostrils and eye sockets crawled several black ants, while a tiny brown insect whose identity, had Porius tried to verify a matter of such subhuman interest in that dim light, would have struck him as belonging rather to the race of beetles than to that of flies, kept approaching the slippery surface crossed by the dog’s devoted tongue and then again precipitately retreating.

But there was a cause much stronger than the dimness of the hour or the minuteness of the insect to sweep Porius forward now from horror to horror; for beyond the dead mare and the wounded dog there lay side by side two human figures, if human they could still be called who had been so monstrously manhandled. They were the figure of Princess Tonwen of Ogof-y-Gawr and the figure of the disinherited son of Gorthevyr Bendigeit of Ogof-yr-Avanc.

But it was not only the fact that these figures were lying in complete nakedness side by side that gave him this ultimate shock. It was the further abomination that their severed heads had been exchanged, so that to the naked body of the youngest princess — who was an old woman over seventy — had been joined the head of the son of the saintly Gorthevyr, while the body of the disinherited recluse looked out upon the twilight through the proud, aloof, death-enamoured eyes of the woman who loved him.

Kneeling down by their side Porius lifted up the severed head of the woman, kissed it, laid it on the grass, and did the same with the man's. Then he joined each body to its own proper head, following as closely as he could the organic adjustments of Nature. Then removing his outer garment he laid it carefully over the two bodies, and having brushed away the leaves and insects from the faces of the dead, he rose to his feet.

At that moment he became aware that some half a dozen of the Saeson were on their feet too, and having possessed themselves of their weapons, were standing in a row before Thorson, calling on him to awake, and even indulging in tentative, cautious, and hesitating prods with the butt ends of their spears to hasten this event.

As if aware of new danger in the wind the white hound lifted his head from licking the nose of the dead and holding up his snout uttered a miserable howl. Something in the effort required for this requiem to his friend completed what the spear had begun; and with one long convulsive shiver the soul of Drudwyn was gathered to his fathers.

"Jesus Holy!" cried the heart of Porius to the brain of Porius, "I must get that spear out of him!"

Hurriedly he moved over to the dog's side, and without kneeling or forgetting to face his enemy while he was thus engaged, he managed, by pressing one large hand on Drudwyn's back, to pull out the spear.

Meanwhile the majestic Thorson had risen to his full height and was moving his clenched fingers up and down the long handle of his axe so as to get the precise hold on it he wanted; while one of the others, the bravest in spirit though the smallest in stature of them all, seizing his own spear by the middle and holding it as if he were attacking a wolf, rushed blindly forward against their enemy.

Now it happened that the particular spear that Porius had pulled from the corpse of Drudwyn had not been brought across the sea from Germania but had been cut from a grove of ash trees near Dinas Efrog, and had had a tynged put on it by one of the wild Ffichtiaid of those regions that it should be a deadly killer but be able to kill none save Saeson.

Its appetite for blood therefore had been roused but not satisfied by its sojourn in the bowels of Drudwyn, and being possessed of the mysterious peculiarity that in the beginning had been injected into the sap of these weird trees by Melian Nymphs who were themselves, as Hesiod relates, of no normal origin, it made a quivering and vibrant use of the spontaneous thrust given to it by Porius and passed easily and naturally and exultantly through the heart of the smallest and bravest of Thorson's little band, killing him instantaneously.

And it was then that our Brythonic Hercules performed the exploit about which all Ynys Prydein was destined to hear, not by the whisperings of goblinish Coranians but by natural rumour, before the year five hundred Anno Domini was far advanced.

The huge Thorson, whirling his axe round and round and grasping its long handle with both hands, came casually and deliberately striding towards Porius, who as all could see was now entirely weaponless, since the spear that had been released from an animal body was now incarcerated in a human one.

Thorson was evidently not hurrying himself. The death of his smallest and bravest follower had no more excited in him any pseudomoral spirit of honourable retribution or of righteous revenge than the sight of his atrocities had excited such feelings in Porius. He seemed to know by instinct that Porius wouldn’t run away; and with his twenty men — only nineteen now — supporting him, he must have felt he had all the time in the world to chop their enemy in pieces.

A sick amazement that was speedily transformed into a headlong panic took possession of every Seisnig heart when they saw that enemy bend down and pick up their dead man by the heels, the spear still transfixing him, and proceed to use this small corpse as a grievous and deadly weapon.

Before Thorson had time to bring down his great swinging axe from the whirligigs and curlicues he was weaving with it in the air, Porius with his corpse club had struck him to earth, stunned and senseless, the axe knocked from his grasp. After that it was all as easy for our friend as if he had been contending with helpless human-sized chessmen. He kept mowing them down with the corpse of their comrade till only four were left erect; and finally when he advanced against these, brandishing round his head the battered, broken, mangled, and almost indistinguishable body of the bravest Sais who had entered Edeyrnion, they all four threw down their shields and spears and fled weaponless up the slope of the mountain.

With no motive force now in his exhausted mind save an obscure preference for being surrounded by dead Saeson rather than by wounded ones, Porius picked up Thorson’s great axe and beginning with that axe’s owner went heavily, wearily, doggedly, round the whole circle of his enemies, smashing their skulls; nor was it until, save for Neb and Gunta, he was the only human being left alive in or near the dining hall, kitchen, buttery, and dormitory of the emperor's equites, that he summoned those two little creatures to rejoin him.

Thus it was brought about that when at last in the early hours of the following morning the vast disk of the full moon rode high in the sky over the waters of Saint Julian's Fount, it was on the outer margin of a considerable expanse of smouldering wood ashes that Porius — wrapped in a blanket discovered by Gunta in an alcove of the horsemen's kitchen, for he had turned his outer tunic into a shroud — slept and waked, waked and slept, while on the inner edge this same expanse, surrounded by a motley confusion of silver bowls, wooden trenchers, fragments of bread and cake, together with cedar boxes of Greek currants and Syrian caskets of dates and figs.

Neb and Gunta, those precocious children of zodiacal antagonisms and planetary cross purposes, tightly intertwined in each other's arms, free from hope and fear and desire and regret and apprehension and expectation, slept an untroubled sleep.

"Am I lacking," thought Porius, as he watched the magic satellite of the earth disentangling herself from the tops of the fir trees and staring down at her image in the water, "am I lacking in some essential element of natural feeling, that I so meekly obey him over there about staying down here among dead dogs and dead horses, among chamber pots and kitchen pots, among nursery bards and druid brothers, instead of hurrying home to the Gaer to join him, whether he likes it or not, and to fight after my own fashion on his side?"

Porius was now watching with a curious interest two tall reed stalks with feathery tops that were swaying a little in a faint night wind wavering from the west, from the direction, not of the Cader, but of yr Wyddfa.

And there seemed to him to have detached itself from one or other of these swaying stalks a pair of seed husks that by some chance, possibly by a wandering gossamer thread, possibly by a weft of spiderweb, had got stuck together, and now made a hair's breadth bridge leading from one stalk to the other.

By yet another chance this bridge of gossamer seed lifted up its twin angles of triune lines exactly in the centre of the moon's reflection, and once established there took on the appearance of a gallows. And as he watched this sinister shape framed in the wavering reflection of that circle of mystic light, a final accidental happening occurred; for there was brought thither, carried on some reckless breath of wind, a leaf or a twig, or it may even have been a tired and battered or possibly lifeless moth.

This weak or even inanimate wanderer destiny now proceeded, with the same weary indifference that Porius himself had used towards his prostrate enemies, to hang on that lunar-rippling horizontal bar.

And as he watched this hanging of a leaf, or a twig, or a feather, or a straw, or maybe of an already dead moth, on this gallows of reed stalks within this wind-rippled lunar reflection he made a discovery and a decision.

His discovery was that everything in the-world is a fluctuating and wavering image in wind-stirred water; and that what is called truth is simply the particular aspect of this image as it strikes a man, or a woman, or a dog, or a horse, or a fish, or a snake, or a worm, or a bird, or an insect, or even a plant or reed.

His decision was that never after this hour, an hour that he knew must be something like three or four in the early morning of the twenty-second of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine, would he indulge himself in feelings of remorse for anything he himself had done, or nourish righteous indignation towards, or inflict justifiable vengeance upon, other people who had committed crimes. He was by his bodily nature and constitution so easygoing, in fact so sluggish and slow moving, that in spite of the rapid ideas that whirled through his mind he needed no special revelations or resolutions, nor any particular aid from Mithras or Christ, to hold him in patient submission to the way of life along which fate and chance appeared anxious to conduct him.

What the cumulative impact of this day’s extravagant events — Morfydd, Creiddylad, Brother John, the birth of Magog, his own recent remorseless killing of all these Saeson — had really done to him was to leave him like a planetary body that had been struck by another body and had had a great fragment torn out of it, so that a scoriac crater yawned in his side, a crater that no dead chemistry, nothing but the organic vegetation of the living seasons, could ever cover.

It was in fact the slow and almost saurian enjoyment of sense life congenial to his Herculean muscles, fibres, and sinews that came to his mind’s rescue at this crisis and set itself now to feed a prehistoric instinct in him that seemed only able to assert itself when he obstinately reduced his activities to an enduring and patient submission to a mother and a wife — tempered by all the inward irony he could muster up.

The yawning and jagged crater carved out of his inmost being by the death of his Creiddylad could be — and his sluggish and gigantic muscles seemed to be aware of this — filled up with leaf mould and the wandering seeds of life’s natural and healing vegetation. But these could be caught, nourished, and matured there, only by a life of obstinate and yet ironic submission.

"There's a couple of hours more," he thought, "before dawn; and it's the twenty-second already! The eighteenth it was when Rhun and I ate that honey together in his cave. Jesus Holy! And what things have happened in these four days!"

He had got as far as this in his thoughts when he began to feel sleepy again. The ebbing tide of tragic memory drew back to the horizon, and he began to remember all the little things that had happened before he slept.

Neb and Gunta had soon discovered all sorts of kitchen supplies and cellar supplies completely missed by Thorson and his band of marauders. To counteract their nearness to the lake, and to take the chilliness from the wind, the three of them had quickly lit a glowing fire, and the red flames of this blaze could probably be seen from the whole length of the opposite bank, and certainly by anyone who happened to be awake in the cavernous recesses of Craig Hen.

There had been quite an argument among the three of them as to whether they should spend the night inside the walls of the camp's kitchen or outside, the luxurious Neb casting his vote for the former, but the little girl, her Gwyddyl-Ffichti love of the open air being reinforced by her Seisnig blood, was all for making use of this particular outbuilding where they now were, which was sheltered from the west wind by the main building and possessed a roof though no walls.

As he now settled himself to sleep again, in steady contemplation of this reed gallows against the lunar ripples, he would have been more peaceful if something about this hanging scene enclosed in the circle of the floating moon hadn't made him think of that Byzantine picture in his mother's room representing the infant Christ caressing a snake. Was it not, he drowsily asked himself, on the edge of this same water, only then in sight of the cell where the Brother now lay dead, that four days ago, in connection with the emperor's nephew, he had thought so vividly of that picture?

It was now Monday morning and not since Thursday had he looked on that picture, and yet he would see it now with devilish clearness, and the snake was still like the emperor's nephew, and he still felt more sympathy with it than with the Holy Infant or the Virgin Mother.

And why did he feel this sympathy with it? Why had he felt, and why had his father so clearly felt, no loathing, no horror, no hatred, for this snake in the emperor's bosom? Was it because of Medrawd's close connection on his father's side with the ancient princes of the forest people? Was it because the man had conspired so long with the dead Esyllt and the dead Derwydd? Or was it because something in himself — the blood of Princess Indeg perhaps? — had always drawn him away from the House of Cunedda, away from his mother's Roman father and Pendragon people, towards Ogof-y-Gawr and the Three Aunties?

"That snake," he thought drowsily before he slept, "wants... to... wriggle... away... and be really free... wants... to... escape... from God—"

Porius's innermost cynneddf, or most characteristic "peculiarity," was undoubtedly the extreme compactness and the corresponding rapidity of movement possessed by his conscious soul. The inherited landscape, however, over which his soul like a swift-winged bird had to fly, contained a number of inherited camps of opposed reactions, contrarious enclosures, hostile climates, all of which, in the blurred and scrawled-over map of his psychological inheritance, were perpetually trying to lure his light-flitting uncommitted psyche to descend and be caught in some fowler's net. But the rapid mobility and feathery compactness of Porius's conscious soul made it possible for him to move across the map of his mental inheritance with a greater speed and a lighter weight than most.

Thus as he finally awaked on this morning of the twenty-second of October, his first conscious thought had to do with the struggle that had gone on all his life between the Gaer and Ogof-y-Gawr; and he thought wearily of this struggle as something that had been perpetually draining the spirit out of him, since in the nature of things it was impossible for him to give himself up wholeheartedly to either of the two. And the day that was now beginning seemed to him to resemble the uninspired condition of his divided sympathy.

It was neither rainy, nor misty, nor windy, nor thundery, nor even cloudless. It was as lacking in distinction of any kind as he himself, at least so he felt just then, was lacking.

"Of course, all this," he told himself, "has nothing to do with Colgrim and his Saeson; nothing to do with the emperor." And then, as the immensity of the neutrality of the universe rose and expanded about him, even the emperor himself seemed like a martial-visaged dragonfly among grotesque beetles; and what he had felt just then of the weariness and drabness and lack of distinction in himself and in everything else changed completely, for now in this dawn it really looked as if, while he had been asleep, the earth and sky had reached some tremendous solution, a solution of all the discordances in the world, and had resolved them all in some vast astronomical secret understanding!

It was as if the grey earth had become the mystery of Time, and the grey sky had become the mystery of Space, and as if all that the inhabitants of the earth had to do now was to drink of the sky and eat of the earth and conduct their affairs in peace and quietness and common sense between the one and the other.

"What powerful beings," he thought, "the thinnest and filmiest of grey clouds are! Jesus Holy! How they bring down the pride of the sun and the moon and the stars! It’s these grey clouds, Semnai theai, as Brochvael calls them, ‘most sacred goddesses,’ who are keeping us now from knowing whether or not the sun has risen, whether or not it’s even now above the lake, above the river, above old Rhun’s cave with no Drudwyn to guard it, above Ogof-y-Gawr, deserted, empty, silent; above the sacking and looting hordes of the victorious Colgrim, above the routed and ruined emperor!”

So murmured Porius’s buzzardlike consciousness as it hovered over the particular portion of his field of vision inherited from the elder sister of the three dead princesses!

But he scrambled heavily to his feet after that, and without disturbing the sleeping children, who had reverted to their true age in their unconsciousness, he proceeded to fetch logs and sticks and a capacious three-legged cauldron, and to collect up what loaves he could find and all the butter on which he could lay hold.

He couldn’t set light to his fire, for their only fire lighter was in the possession of Neb, but when their breakfast was ready it amused him to summon them to share it with a repeated tu-whit-tu-who! in exact imitation — a trick of his that always delighted Morfydd — of the hooting of an owl.

Their meal over he decided to accompany them back to Gwendydd’s tent. His father’s command had been clear and definite; that he should keep in touch with Myrddin Wyllt and make use of Rhun’s swiftness as a messenger between Gaer and camp, and this was clearly the moment to obey it.

They were all three on the point of setting out when he saw, what was impossible for his companions to see by reason of their small stature and the height of the reeds, the very figure he had so much on his mind during that protracted night, the figure of Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch, the emperor's nephew, the man who according to the forest people's notions of royal inheritance, was heir to the throne of Ynys Prydein.

"Listen, children," he announced as casually as he could, "I think after all I'd prefer to wait here just now, in case any more Saeson turn up, and let you two go on alone to Mistress Gwendydd's tent; but when you've heard the news I'd be very grateful if you'd come straight back and let me hear it. But keep together, for Christ's sake, you two! I don't want to hear that either of you have been hurt."

The two precocious ones exchanged a somewhat long glance. But after that, each of them giving him a hurried, intelligent, obedient nod, they set off hand in hand at a rapid pace without looking round.

"He's coming from the Craig Hen," he told himself. "He must have slept there and seen our fire across the water! He must think it's the Saeson, and that having killed all the serfs and cripples and raped all the women they've been making a night of it."

He moved back behind some jutting-out planks where the horsemen had left their outbuildings unfinished, and from this vantage point he watched the man's approach.

Yes, it was Medrawd without question; and as Porius watched him he felt as if he was not alone in regarding his slow, dogged, obstinate advance with a feeling of discomfort. He had several times been struck both in childhood and boyhood — he even recalled an occasion when he had attempted, but quite in vain, to convey what he felt to his foster-mother Alarch — how certain people possess a magnetic force of personality that imposes itself as much on the inanimate about them as upon their rivals in the human struggle.

And now, as the emperor's nephew approached, he couldn't resist the impression that the vague uneasiness he himself experienced was shared by the water, by the reeds, by the divine clouds, and even by unseen presences composed of invisible air, in that calm and neutral dawn.

All these elemental entities struck him as drawing back into themselves, as shrinking inwards upon themselves, as gathering themselves together within themselves, as if they sought, in the curves and rondures of their various retreats, to avoid, as he himself had an instinct to do, the threatening vibrations of this man's approach.

It was not indeed until the heir to the throne of Ynys Prydein had stood for some while dumbly staring at the smouldering ashes and dumbly taking in, though without any change in the tragic beauty of his sombre features, the steaming cauldron and the three empty goblets, that Porius emerged from his concealment.

Swift as the flight of an arrow went the man's hand to the hilt of his weapon, and a long, thin, double-edged sword directed its point with automatic precision at Porius's heart. Porius made a grave inclination of his head and with it a carelessly fatigued movement of one of his hands as if brushing off an intrusive wasp.

"Put that away, my good Lord," he said, and he said it with much more weight of authority than he felt, "and sit down here, and let us talk for a while. You are our emperor's successor, and it is better that I should offer you rest and refreshment than contend with you in the play of swords."

He bent down after uttering these words; and taking up the blanket Gunta had found for him he spread it out over the blackened ground. He didn't however take his eyes — no! not for the smallest half-beat of Time's swift wings — from the eyes of the man before him, and he rehearsed in his mind the precise jerk of the arm wherewith he would send that gleaming blade whirling among the reeds!

But Medrawd with the same impassive expression returned the weapon to its sheath, and uttering a heavy sigh as if the mere thought of a talk with this wooden-headed barbarian were a tedium beyond words, stretched himself out on the offered blanket.

Meanwhile Porius, with his empty hands hanging loosely against his thighs, remained on his feet, staring down at the mask of calculating despair beneath him, and with the curious kind of cunning which he shared with many powerful animals making as if he were twenty times more puzzled than he was — for actually and in truth he was hardly puzzled at all — by putting on an expression of asinine bewilderment, almost in the manner of young Gwythyr, only what he put on was idiocy rather than stupidity, and by frowning with such a show of intense effort of thought that his little greenish bear's eyes nearly disappeared under his brooding brows.

At last he spoke and spoke slowly. "What was it, my Lord," he enquired with patient rather than eager curiosity, "that originally prompted and predisposed you to rebellion against your uncle?"

Porius assumed an almost academic tone in uttering these words, a tone that suggested the expectation of some incredibly subtle statement such as could only be refuted by a process of sophisticated reasoning totally out of the power of a fool like himself.

"What," he went on, "I've long wanted to ask you face to face, Prince Medrawd, is this: how are you planning to get rid of these invaders from Germania when they've served your purpose? Isn't there a danger that they'll use you as they used Gortheyrn? And aren't you running a great risk, my Lord, in associating yourself with a Ffichtiaid witch like Mistress Nineue? Isn't she as likely to betray you as she's betrayed, as everybody but the man himself knows, your uncle's counsellor?

“If you’ll allow me to say so, Prince Medrawd, wouldn’t it have been better, as your uncle’s heir, not to have given the benefit of your help to such a crazy venture as that of our unhappy Modrybedd who have paid for it with their lives; and not only so but have dragged down with them the last Derwydd of Ynys Prydein?

“I’m not saying these things, my Lord, in any spirit of ansyberwyd, or ‘discourtesy,’ but as matters of lively interest in these difficult times.”

Medrawd lifted himself up a little on his blanket, and without looking at Porius began slowly drawing forth his long thin sword out of its sheath till he had it in his right hand, its blade naked across his body.

“Why did you do that?” asked Porius, seating himself on a dilapidated and sticky box that had once contained dried figs from the shores of the Mediterranean. To have the point of this naked sword pointing directly at him, while with his weaponless hands he tightened his clothes round him and thought of Auntie Tonwen and her friend of the Avanc’s Cave feeling nothing in their nakedness under his warm tunic, was to Porius a stimulating rather than an unpleasant experience. His unease with this man was an impalpable thing, not a physical thing, and he got solid comfort from thinking how easily, with a mere jerk of his elbow, he could knock that blade aside even after it had pricked him, and proceed to break its owner’s bones as you might strip the twigs one by one from a particular branch you wished to use as a staff.

“Why did you do that?” he enquired for the second time.

Medrawd tightened his hold upon the sword.

“Because last night I slept with your mother.”

Never had the abnormal gap between his rapidly moving mind and his phlegmatic body stood Porius in better stead than at this moment. He felt as if his conscious soul were flying swiftly round him, and round the sticky fig box beneath him, warding off all intelligible messages and all vibrations of psychic contact between his dangerous muscles and the words just uttered.

Some people might be astonished that he should have thus believed, implicitly, absolutely, what the man said. For believe it he did; and the speed of his mind's movements can indeed hardly be estimated in any attempt to follow them.

His first reaction of all would have delighted Auntie Esyllt, had she not been lying dead, pinned to the body of Erim ab Uchtryd by a charred and blackened spear whose parent tree, yellow with autumn leaves, was still flourishing in its native Germanic forest. To put therefore Porius's first reaction to Medrawd's boast into plain words, what he felt was that his mother's body was her own and that what she did with it was no business of his. This cold-blooded, impious, un-Christian reaction, which doubtless sprang from that particular region in the inherited landscape of his consciousness ruled over by that primeval matriarchy of Ogof-y-Gawr which Iddawc had brought into the House of Cunedda by his fatal marriage with the Princess Indeg, was quickly followed by an extraordinary series of others.

Although for Euronwy, daughter of a Roman Patrician and cousin to Uthyr Pendragon, to take into her bed, while her husband and father were fighting, the unusually handsome heir of the Emperor of Ynys Prydein might not in itself be for her only child an unbearable blow, the news of it, coming like this from the seducer's own lips, set that only child's emotions dancing to curious music.

He couldn't resist a malicious surge of shameless wondering as to how he over there — and for once from that mead-coloured stretch of sky there emerged the blurred image of a mocking human countenance — would enjoy being pricked with his own dart!

The time occupied by these thoughts was briefer than a thunderclap followed by a spout of rain. But in this short movement he was sufficiently shocked by his own cold-bloodedness to be driven to excuse himself by the reflection that had it been his foster-mother Alarch, she who had suckled him and rocked his cradle, whom the emperor's nephew had seduced, he would have taken it very differently.

Staring as calmly as possible all this while into the desolate and desolating ghastliness of the fellow's beautiful face, the incorrigible mind of Porius now raced scandalously on in an attempt to think of this face as pressed against his mother's in the final spasm and paroxysm of ecstatic copulation; but though he believed absolutely in the truth of the man's boast, his visual imagination completely failed him when he tried to see it as a reality.

"It would have been different with Alarch the Fair," he thought; and indeed he found himself drawing back in sacrilegious horror, as if from some mythic bestiality, at the idea of this beautiful devil's face on the same pillow as that of Alarch the Fair.

After what seemed to himself an unblinking stare of half a day, he turned his eyes aside from the man, released the undertunic which he had been squeezing round his ribs as if to keep them from contact with an iceberg, jerked the sticky fig box an inch or two nearer the point of the fellow's sword, and clasping his fingers over one of his knees while he tilted the box backwards he said, "Why have you told me this?"

"I don't know."

"Did you think I'd try to kill you?"

"Yes."

"Do you still think I shall try?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because you're not a Christian."

"What am I?"

"I don't know."

"Will you stay where you are while I go to find something to put round me? I took off my tunic to cover the dead and I feel cold."

Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch nodded without speaking; and Porius, feeling as he rose from the sticky box as if he were an ape leaving behind him the skin of his rump, returned in less than a couple of minutes not only with a great purple blanket wrapped about him in the technical and rather difficult fashion of a Roman toga, but with a wickerwork case containing a flask of Greek wine.

This latter he handed to his visitor. "Break the wax yourself and drink first," he said. "You can see I haven't poisoned it."

While the emperor's nephew was breaking the seal of the bottle with the point of his sword by holding the blade, thus shortened into a dagger, with a corner of the blanket on which he lay, Porius settled himself comfortably, with his back to the woodwork of the kitchen in the sort of gwal ysgyfamog, or "hare's form," where Neb and Gunta had been sleeping. From this position he could see the path by the water in both directions: towards the Craig Hen and east towards the cell where Brother John lay dead. But from where the emperor's nephew lay nothing could be seen but the bed of unusually tall reeds behind which the children had disappeared.

The two men remained within an arm's length of each other, so that they could exchange the wine, but quite twenty minutes if not more had passed before the flask was even half-empty.

This was not merely due to the fact that they both possessed the civilized virtue of prudence, nor to the fact that the precious vintages selected by the sagacious Dion were specially heady. It was much more due to the peculiar nature of the startling and indeed demonic matters revealed to Porius by the emperor's nephew. Neither of them had the least notion that a time might come in the history of Ynys Prydein when one of them would be justified by the movements of destiny in asking the other — supposing they could meet at that far-off time — whether he remembered this startling conversation.

But whether or not that future encounter was ever fated to take place, one thing was certain now; namely, that Medrawd permitted himself to go further than Porius supposed any mortal man had ever dared to go before, in the depth of his pessimism and in the desperation of his loathing of life.

"And why to me?" This was the question that Porius kept asking himself, just as he had asked himself the same question with regard to the emperor's counsellor.

Was it, he wondered, because the weird gap between his abnormally active consciousness and his abnormally sluggish body left a slit in his psychic armour through which the strangest communications could pass without encountering resistance, yes! and not only could pass; could in fact encamp there and finding some kindred inherited ground, whether barren or fertile, mingle with it and engender strange offspring there, offspring like, yet unlike, to either of the entities from which it sprang.

If it was through a slit in the psychic armour of his personality that the magical energy of this weird individual entered his soul and won his sympathy, he soon forgot himself altogether in his fascinated interest in watching the man while he talked and in listening to what he said.

Medrawd had half-risen now and was supporting himself by the help of his long sword, which he held with the point upwards, the blade still wrapped round with a corner of his blanket while the hilt or handle of the weapon rested on the ground.

In his free hand Medrawd held the Greek flask, still in its wicker case, but all the while he spoke he made no motion to put it to his lips.

“You want to know why I am talking to you, Porius ab Einion?” he was saying. “Well, I’ll tell you, just as I told your mother last night when she asked me why I embraced her. It was, and it is, to get even with life. I won’t talk about the gods to you, Porius ab Einion, for we all know that it’s only as accounting for life, a good accounting or a bad accounting, that we bring the gods into it at all. That old life worshipper Myrddin is fooling Arthur just as he fooled Uthyr Pendragon and as he fooled Gorthevyr Bendigeit. Bendigeit Hell Pigs! Moch-Annwn to Moch-Nant! Do you think I don’t know how your ladies carry their hearts under their shifts as they queen it along with the Mistress of Arawn?

“O you proud Romans, how I loathe you! O you pure-blooded Brythons, how I despise you! I know you, Porius, son of Einion ab Iddawc, have other blood. Yes, I know it, for all that blanket-toga of yours! And shall I tell you something? Something very interesting? Something that nobody but Myrddin knows? I, who speak to you at this moment, am the true grandson of the only Ffichtiaid princess known in Ynys Prydein since the coming of the Gwyddylaid. Cynfarch found her in a cave of the chalk cliffs not far from Caer Keint, and it was her hud and lledrith, her ‘magic’ and her ‘spells,’ that enabled her son to marry my mother. But it was not till Llew got made King of Llychlyn that she began her secret war!

“My grandfather never knew till he had slept with her why she was like she was. But he knew then; just as your mother knows now. The Ffichtiaid, though they talk the language of other men, are not like other men. They did not come from Troy like the Romans, nor from Argos, Crete, and Samothrace, like the Brythons, nor from Iwerdon like the Gwyddylaid.

"Do you know, Porius ab Einion, whence my grandmother's people came? From Annwn, I tell you! Yes, from Annwn!" Here Medrawd made certain curious movements of the body, not jumping hops like a frog, but awkward little jerks like a toad, movements that consorted absurdly enough with his beautiful tragic face and with the menacing gleam of the shining blade and bronze hilt upon which he leapt; and it was clear to Porius that these grotesque jerks were purely automatic and had as their object the releasing of a little more of the faded blanket from beneath his buttocks, with a view to lifting the Greek flask in its wicker case to the highest stretch of his arm, while he kept his grip on the gleaming blade by using what he could clutch of that corner of the blanket as an unwieldy gauntlet.

What exactly this paradoxical creature had in his mind to express by this gesture, or why it seemed so important to him to keep his arm outstretched so long, Porius couldn't imagine. Could he have caught old Rhun's eye at that moment there might have been a danger of an explosion of politely suppressed schoolboy mirth, but he was alone with the man and, to confess the queer truth, he actually felt — was it the Princess Indeg in his blood? — some sort of crazy sympathy with him.

Medrawd had now begun speaking again and was giving his listener — and Porius found it necessary to keep the thought of Rhun more resolutely than ever out of his mind — what really amounted to a historical discourse on the mysterious Ffichtiaid people. "And do you know, Porius ab Einion," he was saying, "that from their first appearance as slaves of the Cewri to this very hour the Ffichtiaid have conspired against — well, never mind God or the gods — against life!

"That double-dyed ass of a Ceredigion conjurer, Myrddin, fancies he's got I don't know what kind of an arch-devil or lost angel on his side to fight the emperor's battles; but it'll all be to no purpose! I shall win in the end. Don't misunderstand me. I shall yield now, of course. Mistress Nineue will keep me in touch with every move Arthur makes, and with every move these wooden-headed Saeson make. I'm young yet, you know, and have got, as we say — and a pretty word it is, Porius filius meus, or don't you think so? — got 'my whole life before me,' whereas Arthur's bound to get weaker and weaker as he gets older and older. The Saeson will on the other hand get stronger and stronger. He'll keep them off for ten years, twenty years, thirty perhaps!

"But if he lives to be as old as your sweet mother's idol, Uthyr Pendragon, they'll come back — back and back and back again! They'll come back till all the land is theirs except — so Nineue tells me he says — but never mind the 'excepts,' and never mind what she tells me he says about another people who'll come when five hundred years are gone!

"The point is, Porius ab Einion, that she'll go on telling me things till he's dead. For when he can't tell her anything more he'll die like your old Aunties' Derwydd. Here! For your mother's sake and for Christ's mother's sake, take this wine, my good man! My arm's got cramp, and this blade'll be cutting my fingers soon. God! I believe there is blood! Do you see blood?"

But Porius as he took the flask from him and helped him to rise and to seat himself by his side couldn't make out the faintest speck of red on either the blanket or on the sword or on the man's hand. But all three of these objects, one by one, Medrawd now began examining with the utmost nicety as he rested his back against the kitchen shed.

“What exactly do you mean by hating life and fighting against life?” enquired Porius, but as he asked the question his eyes were not on the beautiful but troubled profile at his side, but on the reedy edge of the water, where he now — to his considerable disturbance of mind — saw the figure of a man running, a man who carried a weapon, at least that is how it looked to him, in each of his hands, a man who was running with a slow, heavy, dogged resolution, but a man who appeared so stumbling, so drooping, so exhausted, that it seemed as if he had already come very near the end of his endurance.

“My meaning,” replied Medrawd ap Llew irritably, “is clear enough; and only a Brython — pardon me for speaking plainly — only a Brython imitating the Romans and full of pride at killing a few Saeson bandits could miss it. There! I’m sure I did feel something just now, but I can’t see any blood — my meaning is that it would have been much better if life had never begun; but since it has begun — no! I can’t find any cut in my hand. I must have seen blood somewhere else — on something else — and with someone else — it’s all very curious!

“But since it has begun, the sooner it’s brought to an end the better, and the quickest of all ways to bring it to an end is war! In life there’s more pain than pleasure, more ugliness than beauty, more lies than truth, more misery than happiness, more cruelty than pity, more illusion than reality. So I have condemned life to die, and I have appointed war its executioner.

“The twin children of life, Hate-Love and Love-Hate, I have likewise condemned to death with war as their executioner. I am come that the world should have death; and I am strong because death is more powerful than life, higher than life, larger than life, older than life, and deeper than life.

“It existed before life appeared and it will exist after life has disappeared. When I slept with your mother last night and thought how probable it was that both your father and her father were dead, and how likely it was that remorse for what I was making her do would bring her to death, and how probable it was that you—" but the rest of his words were snatched away before they had passed, as Homer would say, "the barrier of his teeth"; but whence the harpy came who in startling fashion reduced them to thin air was a mystery to Medrawd ap Llew.

It was — though unpleasant enough and totally contrary to his education as a civilized ruler — no mystery at all to Porius. It was indeed nothing less than a convulsive fit of choking brought on by his struggle not to burst out — for again he had imagined himself catching his foster-brother's eye — into a brutally youthful laughing fit.

He apologized humbly enough, but his coughing had done its work, and the thread of Medrawd's eloquence was broken.

But a queer thing happened then; for the man's subsequent words, interjected and incoherent as they were, fell like a series of sword blades into the Saint Julian's Fount of his disturbed mind and affected him more than any coherent eloquence could have done. In fact the desperation of Medrawd's ghastly integrity, as he blurted out these nihilistic revelations with his back to the wall, became for Porius the man's most formidable witness; and, what is more, Porius really did feel with something akin to a dark, savage, devilish relief, as though he were permitted the terrible privilege of beholding from his watchtower above the gate not only the stubble-coloured mist he had seen wavering down from the Cader, but an unfathomable black flood of some unknown element, an element as different from water as it was different from fire and as different from fire as it was different from air, an element that was as free from blood as it was free from tears; an all-obliterating, all-annihilating will to perish, a will that every conceivable condition under which this universe could reappear should perish, that ultimate will, in fact, that all that is, was, or could be, should be swallowed up in irretrievable nothingness!

But he had no sooner responded thus with a psychic outrush of reciprocal black bile and a spouting forth of Acherontic spume from that portion of his mental landscape inherited from Indeg, and through Indeg from disenchantments coeval with the first ice age, and through Indeg from desperations deep as the ocean ooze that sucked down the foundations of Atlantis, and through Indeg from the old innumerable death worships of the great continent of Africa, that continent destined to howl out the ultimate cry of the human race as it curses God and dies, than Medrawd, as if perfectly aware of the effect his philosophy of death was having upon him, took up his Minoan thread again in a coherent manner.

"Cannot you see," he said, "gathered in groups and conclaves on all the planets and on all the chief stars of the zodiacal signs, each group within its own particular Gwaith Emrys, or nameless 'Stone Circle,' the dedicated mediums of all the stellar consciousnesses, from demigods to sea anemones and from sea serpents to caddis worms, in a simultaneous, instinctive, disorganized, scattered, chaos-huddled, chance-impelled revolt of the will to death against the will to life?"

But Porius only answered by taking the wine flask from him and heaving him up upon his feet. "Quick, my Lord!" he whispered. "You have only just got time to escape! You see those tall reeds? Yes? Well, go to the right of them — to the west of them, I say! — do you understand? Are you listening to me, my Lord? Yes, to the right of those tall reeds — and to the right of those willows — round the corner of the water — but don't go again to Craig Hen, my Lord, for God's Mother's sake! They'll get you there for sure! Go straight up the mountain — by all those terraces of rock — do you see? Are you listening? And then keep the high Cader peaks on your right while you go to the left of them. To the left, left, left, my Lord! Yes, to the east of the Cader! Have you got that clear, my Lord? And you'll soon be out of danger!

"Oh, you can deal — I know that perfectly well, my Lord — with either Colgrim's pirates or Arthur's equites, but at this moment you're in a different kind of danger, danger from what up here in the north we call family vengeance! You're in danger, let me tell you, of losing a great deal, Master, a very great deal, of that spectacular juice which ordinary life lovers call blood! Man's semen and woman's blood together, Master, make the wicked old mill race that turns life's wheel! And if you're to live long enough to stop that wheel turning you'll have to — God's Mother, man! You're leaving your sword! Here — never mind sheathing it! Hold it in your hand for Jesus's sake and run for dear life — or death if you like! — as long as you run!"

Like many another native of Ynys Prydein who had met this nephew of the emperor, Porius had completely misunderstood this strange creature's horror of blood. He had noticed it quickly enough and had bluntly and brutally attributed it to cowardice. Now this was entirely unfair. Medrawd's horror of blood hadn't the remotest connection with care for his own skin. It was a mystic horror, like the loathing of the smell of fish which certain demons are said to share with certain animals.

He was therefore considerably startled and indeed compelled to feel like the blustering hero of some artificial pseudoheroic Roman epic admonishing some ghostly survivor from the siege of Troy, when, instead of hurrying off in the direction indicated, Medrawd received his sword with a nod and a smile and proceeded with the utmost coolness and deliberation to retreat into the interior of the building.

"Don't agitate yourself, Porius ab Einion," he said quietly. "I shan't forget your landmarks. The Cader's not easy to miss. But I'll follow the river, I think, till I reach Lake Tegid. It may be ten, or it may be twenty, or it may be thirty, but however many years it's going to be, a day will come when your life-loving emperor and his nephew will meet on equal terms; and then, if I die, I may — don't upset yourself, I'm off — I may take him with me!"

The man's sandals must have been of the softest leather for all sound of his retreat had died away before Brochvael, supporting himself with his Gallic staff but clutching in his right hand a most murderous-looking hunting knife, staggered up the slope.

"Is he here? Have you got him? Have you killed him? Tell me you've killed him, Porius, and it'll balance all!"

"Sit down a second, Uncle, for heaven's sake. You're half-dead yourself! It'll be you who'll be killed if you go a step further. Lie down here, for Christ's sake, and take a sip of this!"

But Brochvael was staring at him in growing amazement and in growing wrath. "You... don't... know... then," he gasped. "You don't know who he is and what he's done? Hasn't he been here at all? Hasn't anyone been here? The man called Drom, who served the Derwydd and got hurt trying to save the princess, hasn't he been here? He was lame and bleeding in several places, but he swore he'd help me to find him when I told him what had happened. They all say the same thing at the Gaer: that he spent the night with Euronwy. I begged him to help me find him and give him the death he deserves, and he obeyed me at once like a legionary from Uriconium.

"He's a good youth, this Drom, and afraid of nothing; but I don't say I understand him, Porius. But I didn't come here to talk about him. And you know, Porius, how hard it is for me to speak to you of this Medrawd. Where has he gone if he hasn’t come here? It’s a queer thing, Porius, but he makes me think — Drom, I mean — of a slave in the household of the young Boethius, a slave who came from a family who had given more martyrs to the catacombs than any free-born gens in Rome. So I told him to go and see if this mad devil — for mad he must be, whatever we may think of his devilishness — had gone back to his refuge in Craig Hen or had broken into your marriage tent.

“In either case he would almost certainly — after this appalling crime — find the fellow asleep and be able, without difficulty or compunction, to paunch him like a vicious pike and throw his guts to the eels! So you’ve not seen anybody? So you refuse, even though I’ve pledged you my word for its truth, to believe this atrocity? You see, I want to get this matter clear between us, for it’s between us now, yes, between us; between my child’s husband and her father!”

His face was contorted with both exhaustion and anger, and his pantings and gaspings made him at that moment a grotesque rather than an imposing figure. But imposing or not, he now began rubbing the blade of his horrible knife up and down the surface of his ebony staff, a proceeding that would have left a sinister impression on anyone’s mind, but as matters stood, had an especially unpleasant effect upon Porius, who had a real respect for his uncle and had never seen him in a mood as dishonouring to his dignity as this.

“Have a sip of wine, anyway,” he repeated, holding out the flask to him again with all the calm courtesy he could assume.

But the mere look of that particular wine in that particular wicker case brought back with a rush to Brochvael’s mind not only Mistress Nineue’s insulting behaviour after his exhausting run, but all he had suffered much more recently from the loyal disloyalty of the wanton Sibylla!

What he did now showed clearly to Porius how near the man had come to throwing away every vestige of self-control. He actually struck at the hand that was holding out the wine to him so that the flask fell violently to the ground, a red stream pouring from its uncovered mouth and incontinently dividing into a delta of small trickles.

Porius watched these trickles as they made their way down the incline towards the lake, some of them being submerged in the ashes, others in the grasses, others again forming minute pools in the hollows of flat stones. From one of these latter — for he felt it to be wiser, after that blow, not to return his uncle's distorted stare — he could actually make out, as he bent down to pick up the now empty flask, a small spider with an enormous balloonlike body and very short legs scuttling away from what to it must have been a cosmic catastrophe, and concerning which — Porius couldn't resist thinking — there may have been woven, into many a prophetic web of its ancestors, ghastly prophecies predicting the submergence of their Spider Atlantis under a tidal wave of supernatural blood!

His own world felt shaky enough at that moment, and he had to make a particular movement of the mind which he hadn't made since the days when old Rhun, half in fun and half in irritation with this intruder at his mother's breasts, used to threaten to "beat him like a dog" if it chanced to rain on one of their adventurous excursions.

By this mental gesture, or gesture of the will, he "cavoseniargized" so furiously and desperately that he forced himself spiritually to devour the whole spectacle presented to his attention as if he'd been an antediluvian monster making a cataclysmic hole in its native earth.

Doing his best by means of this mental diversion to reduce his uncle to thin air, he proceeded to lay himself down on Gunta's faded blanket while he wrapped with extreme care about his waist the Capitolian toga he had himself picked up. The psychic purpose of these somewhat theatrical preparations for the overcoming of irritation was naturally lost upon Brochvael, who, with his back to the lake and still panting from exhaustion, laid his murderous knife across the silver knob of his staff, clasped his hands together above them both, and rested his chin upon his hands. From his shoulder hung his familiar black mantle, endowing him with an appearance that was, spontaneously and quite accidentally, a good deal more dramatic than his son-in-law's deliberate pose.

And from this position, though his speech came forth in violent jerks and without the logic even of rhetoric, Brochvael released, as he had rarely done in all his life before, an outdarting jet from the cistern of black bile which, like all Brythons, he had the habit of storing up in the recesses of his being for long epochs of time. He would have had this reservoir of maliciousness within him, no doubt, whatever the outward events of his life had been, but it was his son's death that first weakened its banks, and now his daughter's marriage hastened its overflowing.

And it was one of those occasions when Chance in her most drifting and careless mood seems to be possessed by a veritable devil. For if Porius hadn't used his warm tunic as a shroud for Auntie Tonwen and for the son of Gorthevyr Bendigeit, he wouldn't have been impelled to wrap himself up in this grotesquely theatrical toga, the mere appearance of which, reminding Brochvael, as his innocent nephew couldn't possibly understand, of things that had outraged his very body and soul during his stay in Italy, sent quivering through him magnetic shivers of nervous fury.

"Your mother's honour's just nothing to you, I can see!" he jerked out. Then after a pause during which it would have been hard to say whether it was exhaustion or anger that dragged such deep-throated pantings from him, "But, of course," he sneered, "you have just the same godlike, superhuman indifference about your own marriage bed. I know all you've told my daughter to explain your not coming to the aid of her brother. I suppose your wise caution in that case was wrapped up in the same noble toga of stoic indifference! I don't suppose it'll disturb you in the least to be told that both Gwrgi and Canna are witnesses to the fact — and no doubt it's all over the Gaer by now — that your foster-brother Rhun forced his way into my house on the night before your marriage?"

These final words flung forth from the heaving human heart between the flapping black wings of that Etrurian mantle might have roused the devil in Porius, for all his toga and his desperate "cavoseniargizing", if it had not been for two things: first, that Morfydd, being aware in her feminine wisdom that it would sooner or later come to his ear, had told him in general terms, though she took all the blame on herself and shielded Rhun, about that night; and second, that from his bride's pain and blood, and also from — despite her gallant spirit — her shyness and tension, he had recognized that he was ravishing a maiden. But it was, all the same, with a noticeable indrawing of breath and lips, and such a wrinkling of his forehead as caused his eyes to grow as small as worm holes in an oaken rafter, that Porius received these vicious words. But his unbroken silence was evidently so unexpected by the other that by pressing too hard upon his ugly weapon, balanced, as it was, somewhat ticklishly on the top of his Gallic staff, he caused it to fall with a crash and the staff with it.

Brochvael ab Iddawc tottered forward and caught himself up, tottered again, and again caught himself up, tottered for the third time and this time would' certainly have fallen, had not Porius, who had by now scrambled to his own feet, steadied him with his arm.

As soon as he realized he could stand, Porius, to avoid looking at him, hurriedly bent down and proceeded to spend much longer than was necessary in the simple task of picking up and restoring to him these objects. No sooner was he erect again and the two men standing side by side, Brochvael's eyes instinctively turning to the east in hope of seeing that faithful servant, the young man Drom, Porius's to the west in hope of seeing the figure of Medrawd too far off to be recognized by anyone, than Brochvael's anger began to ooze away, or, to put it more exactly, Brochvael's exasperated nerves ceased to hold open the weir dam within him through which his reservoir of Brythonic malice had spouted forth.

Trickle by trickle, like the Greek wine he had spilt, the wrath of Brochvael ab Iddawc sank into the sands of forgetfulness. It wasn't that he felt remorse. It wasn't that he felt fear lest he had hurt his son-in-law beyond forgiveness. It wasn't that he felt ashamed of betraying Morfydd and Rhun. It wasn't that he was so personally concerned about Euronwy or so troubled to think what she must be suffering after this outrage. Porius, with his perpetual sensuousness and his perpetual analysis of what he actually felt, mean, crazy, wicked, shameless, though it might be, and Morfydd with her own impassioned self-knowledge, if they had been questioned, would have put down his anger to habit, custom, public opinion, and the conventional ideas of family pride.

But they would have been wrong. There were what the late Brother John would have called "underlying causes of wrath," for there are few human contacts lacking in these; but the immediate cause of his outburst was a matter entirely of nerves. One nerve was itching and aching with the loss of Sibylla. Another nerve, and that not a very distant one, for it also belonged to his erotic organism, quivered and vibrated with a new admiration, not unmixed with abnormal attraction, that had obsessed him during the last twenty-four hours! This nervous disturbance had come upon him when, after the murder of the oldest princess and her druid and silentiary, he had found Drom, the brother of Morgant, drawing the charred spears from those three desecrated bodies; and as happened so often with this essentially lonely student — of whom it might have been said that his impetuous dives into real life always resulted in alternative predicaments, that of hugging to himself people who wanted to get rid of him, and that of disentangling himself from people of whom he wanted to get rid — he had dived with one desperate dive into a sudden and peculiar love for this strange man.

His first meeting with Drom in the druid's chamber came back to him in every detail! Drom playing chess, Drom crawling up that ladder amid fir-tree roots and forest rubble, Drom bidding him goodbye at the parting of the ways. He suddenly became aware that there was a beauty in Drom — not only a physical beauty, but a spiritual beauty — of so engrossing and absorbing a kind that he would give anything for the privilege of living with him to the end of his days!

And so he had begun to use this innocent of God, this faithful and loyal Drom, as a sort of human ointment wherewith alone he could heal the wound made in his feelings by Sibylla. Thus it happened that it was neither Christian remorse nor stoical self-respect that led to the closing of his malice dam and the oozing away of his outburst of fury. Compared with Porius, as Porius himself knew very well, Brochvael had that respect for scholarship, that reverence for the institutions of the past, that profound distrust of popular judgment, that preference for logical reason over intuition, which constitute, at least in the opinion of academicians, the essential attributes of the philosophic mind.

To Porius, on the other hand, Nature had given an earthy animal instinct, as well as a weathercock intelligence, and with the help of both of these organs he had been able to free himself not only from respectful awe at the mention of great literary names, but from all the recondite limitations imposed on human feeling by the processes of reason and logic. He was just the one dedicated to understand, if only he had known about it, exactly the way the elder man's emotional mania for Drom was working upon him, and exactly how, the moment it relaxed its distracting hold upon him, all the logical justifications of his nervous rage came flowing back.

Knowing already from Morgant something of the mysterious virtues of Drom, Porius, if only he had realized this new emotion in his father-in-law, would have quickly made use of it. As it was, there was something comical in the way these two civilized and Romanized Brythons contemplated each other.

Side by side, they were not very different in height, and with the small deep-set eyes, the heavy, overhanging forehead, the bushy eyebrows, the massive vulturelike nose, of all the descendants of Edeyrn ap Cunedda, they were in a sense almost humorously alike.

The lineaments of Edeyrn had been skipped in the case of the handsome Prince Einion, but they were the lineaments that came down from Cunedda; and in the elder branch at Deganwy, as much as in the younger branch at the Gaer, they were the dominant features of this proud House.

But the Drom infatuation having ebbed a little, the Brythonic malice began to trickle again drop by wicked drop from the weir in Brochvael's soul.

"No! I don't know how you can endure it, letting my brother and the old Roman face Colgrim's savages, while you loll in safety out here along with the servants and the women and the sick and the wounded, drinking Greek wine and enjoying your life!"

But Porius was a person who, if he had once made up his mind not to get angry, was extremely difficult to rouse to wrath. And he now began putting a few simple questions to his enraged uncle.

"Did Morfydd know about the emperor's nephew last night? Was he feasted in our hall before he went in to my mother? Colgrim hasn't attacked the Gaer then, I take it, nor have my father and the old man attacked him? Or is it that the emperor's advancing to cut off his retreat has sent him off at a run? Is that how things are going?"

Had the Jewish doctor been listening to these two he would probably have assumed — according to the saying of the great Jewish monarch "a soft answer turneth away wrath" — that the nephew's coyness to the uncle's anger would have shamed the uncle into a gentler mood. But not at all! No sooner had Porius ceased speaking than the elder man swung round with such fury in his eyes that the younger stepped quickly back. And it was natural enough that he did so; for the enraged student of Aristophanes, whirling his repulsive knife round and round his head, had apparently, for the second time that morning, lost all control of himself.

But it might be questioned if he really had; for in place of using the knife as a dagger or even as a missile, he flung it with all his strength towards the lake and in place of violence had recourse once more to the wounding power by the tongue.

"Morfydd, did you say? The brave husband asks of the unarmed father where is the bride? How should I know, my fine boy? I spent all last night searching for the murderers of Auntie Esyllt. No doubt your wife was at the Gaer; but what she knew about your mother, or what she knows now about Medrawd ap Llew, you'll have to ask your friend Rhun. Rhun's been greatly to the fore all this long night — I can tell you that much, my lad! He's covered incredible distances. They say he's even been to the emperor himself. That I do not believe. But he's been backwards and forwards between young Peredur with our horsemen and your father with the Gosgordd. I only saw him once when he told me I need have no fear of going to Ogof-y-Gawr because the Saeson had already gutted the place, leaving Auntie Esyllt dead. You see I'm like you, nephew. I don't believe in running my head into unnecessary danger. But there it is! All three of them are dead now. That's what we've got to think of, Porius ab Einion. Not just simply of death, but of why we die. And the feeble old Modrybedd have beaten you and me at that game! You and I are alive, my wise nephew; whereas the Aunties and my son are dead.

"Even Minnawc Gorsant — may his bones rot and his soul perish! — burst his heart in his hate of the enemies of Christ. That's what we've got to think of; not simply of death, but of what there is to die for! That's what makes you and me so careful of our skin. We think too much of death and not enough of what to die for!

"That faithful servant I was telling you about whose name is Drom, and who was helping me all last night burying the dead, has a new philosophy of his own. He says it was playing chess taught it to him: watching the eques jump to his mark, and the bishop go sideways to his mark, and the queen go straight to her mark.

"It hasn't got a name, and he says it never will have a name. He says what divides a truth from a falsehood is such a hair's breadth that it's unsafe to give it a name. He says there are as many truths as there are grains of sand upon the seashore. He says they're like the gossamer threads that spiders hang in the air in autumn and that you can only see when there's a heavy dew. He says we give things names to get power over them, and we give ourselves names to get power over others; and that there's not one of the innumerable truths that surround us that's strong enough to bear the weight of a name without being falsified and forced to look different from what it is. And do you know what he does every morning?"

Porius's mind, which had passed from Drom to Morgant, and from Morgant to the Derwydd's brother, and from the Derwydd's brother to Medrawd, and from Medrawd to that mountain lake containing those four staring eyes, came back with a jerk.

"What Drom himself does, you mean?"

"Yes, what he does when he first wakes up, for we slept in the same chamber of the deserted Ogof-y-Gawr, and I felt as if I couldn't watch him long enough or closely enough. It was like sleeping with a saint and watching an angel put on his clothes."

Once more Porius called his errant mind back from the Cewri. "Uncle's fairly hit." he said to himself, and then he thought, "If this Drom is really as faithful as brother Morgant says he is, why then, Brochvael ab Iddawc, you've set your heart in a safe quarter!"

It was almost as if Brochvael had caught the unspoken words "in a safe quarter," for he suddenly added, "But before I tell you what he does, shall I tell you what he feels? He feels that Jesus Christ has got into his soul and is there instead of himself. Yes! Drom feels that it isn't Drom who does the good things he does but Jesus in him!"

Porius felt a curious sense of disgust when he heard this and an obscure reaction against Drom. It seemed to him as if the innermost freedom and integrity of his soul sickened at the notion of being possessed by any god. He hurriedly offered his arm to the older man.

"Lean on me, I beg you, Uncle," he said, "while you tell me what it is that Drom does when he isn't feeling that his soul's not his own."

Hardly thinking what he did and making use of this flesh-and-blood support as if it had been the branch of a badly grown tree that he had half-decided to cut down, Brochvael explained that it was the habit of Drom, the brother of Morgant, to kneel down and tap his skull on the ground in the direction of the sunrise.

“Why, you’ll have to bring him to Rhun’s cave, Uncle,” commented Porius a little brutally. What he had heard about Drom’s possessed soul had filled him with a distaste he couldn’t get rid of. “What a pity,” he went on, “Brother John’s not alive to hear this! He used to say that everyone who prayed to any god whatsoever, even to terrible and horrible gods — always excepting Gwydion the son of Don and Arianrod the daughter of Don — had a right to call themselves Christians.”

This comment on what he’d just told him caused Brochvael nothing but obscure pain. But he was too much now under the spell of his absent friend to be able to be angry any more. He had already begun to imagine this servant-philosopher filling the place of Sibylla in the Stone House and of supplying at least some of those indescribable requisites without which a student’s life, even with the Eleven Comedies added to his shelves and with a chamber adjoining the kitchen of Canna and Gwrgi, was bound to be incomplete.

On the other hand, when an elderly man talks to a much younger man about another man younger still, and receives in return a rough, casual, bantering, ill-considered response, what he experiences is a shock to his inmost personal feelings so extreme that it is almost like the lash of a whip.

“God! So we return to Mithras!” groaned Brochvael to himself. “I have only to mention the sun, and the Bull roar of Rhun’s cave rumbles through this lad’s simple brain!”

And Porius felt he had struck a discordant note. His boyhood’s experience of the Modrybedd, his childhood’s recollections of Alarch the Fair, his more recent subjection to his own mother, all these had taught him that the older generation had to be handled with very delicate care; and he now begged his uncle to be pleased to rest for a space while he went to find out if there'd been any unauthorized meddling with certain dead bodies.

He announced this with the utmost gravity and moved off with a firm and decisive step; but he was aware, all the same, that the winds of feeling from a mental firmament that was more than half a century old blew with such erratic and unaccountable vehemence that it was possible Brochvael might burst out with a "What's this? What dead bodies are being hidden away from me?" Or on the other hand, he might begin accusing himself and cursing his son-in-law as being the accomplices in their incompetence of all these cruel forces of disaster.

But the older man allowed him to go and himself proceeded to lean against a portion of the kitchen stockade. Porius could see he had some fanciful repugnance about lying down on the blanket. Did it smell of those children — or possibly even of the emperor's nephew? "What a quaint old fellow he is! He's never really happy unless reading or writing; and yet he's never written a book! Does he think his old cronies in Gaul and Italy will make a book of his letters when he's dead? Not they! They're far too busy with their own immortality to bother about his! But get angry with the old boy I won't! This whole business of getting angry makes fools of us all. It's far worse than being thrown off a horse or knocked over by a wild boar. It always puts you at a disadvantage."

Such were Porius's thoughts as he crossed the floor of the kitchen and entered the wooden anteroom of the banquet tent. He was looking for something to put on. Ah! Here was Chance playing into his hand!

One of these reckless horsemen, either in a drunken fever or on some sudden amorous quest, had tossed his elegant new-fashioned mantle — and it was warm as well as smart — over one of the biggest of the unused cauldrons. He picked it up at once and put it on.

No sooner had he done so than he realized he wasn’t alone in this deserted antechamber. A figure only too familiar to him was crouching between a couple of wicker crates that stood side by side under the wall.

Yes, here was the Derwydd’s brother again; and Porius, who only a minute ago had decided that the one fatal way of making a complete fool of yourself was to fall into a rage, found himself throwing into his protest “What on earth are you doing here?” an anger out of all proportion to the ungainly Llew’s trespass, if trespass it were.

But this man’s personality had come to have a curious effect upon him. He tried hard to speak more kindly to him now, but even as he did so he felt that nothing would give him greater satisfaction than to take up those two crates and bang his head between them till they were shivered to bits and the head had become unrecognizable. If he could stand over him, unfeatured, disfigured, dead, the spell would be broken; but as it was, and all this passed with astonishing rapidity through his mind, where was the magic that could lift the burden? Was it his tynged until he died or until the fellow died, that this lolling, languid, supersensual, subhuman slug should hang round his neck, liable to go slop-flop, flop-slop, against his ribs, whenever he went forth to fight the world?

“Have you looked at those bodies out there?” he asked him in a voice that he hoped was too low to penetrate the wall of the building; for he had no trust in Brochvael’s self-control in the presence of those aged and outraged lovers.

But the man between the crates shouted his drunken answer so loudly that it could have been heard on the edge of the lake. “Taliesin and Morgant, and Owain from Deganwy, and a couple of old men from the stables, and three or four women from the wash house were up here before dawn, and they carried them to the tent of Owain ab Uryen.”

"What else did they do?"

"They stripped the Saeson."

"What else?"

"They thought there would be no harm in removing a few mouldy cheeses and a few bottles that were not keeping very well — too many bubbles in them, Porius ab Einion, liable to burst, great Prince, very liable to burst — and the general opinion was that it would be a great pity for the emperor's beautiful bottles to burst."

"What else?"

"Owain Pen Uchel began to dig and made me help him till... till I had to stop and lie down for a little while."

"To dig, you say?"

"Yes, noble Prince, to dig the deepest grave in Ynys Prydein under the Seven Pines."

"Those trees by the tent of Owain ab Uryen?"

"Yes, my Prince, those very trees, those very tall and beautiful trees."

"Not for Princess Tonwen, I hope?"

"The deepest grave in Ynys Prydein!" he shouted, and this time it was as if he wanted to make the whole place ring and ting with this information. Porius felt as if he saw the contempt on his uncle's tired face, the contempt of a man who had discussed the condition of the world with the Pope of Rome and the Patriarch of Constantinople.

"Not for the princess, I hope?" he repeated.

"For no woman, nor any man either! He dug that grave, and I helped him dig that grave, for his dead dapple-grey mare, and for my Lord Rhun's dead hound."

"And you buried them then, the grey horse and white hound? Buried them deep?"

"Deep? No dead ever deeper! No, not in all Gwynedd and Edeyrnion! Deep-buried they are, horse and dog, and in two thousand years their bones will be earth; and from that earth will spring corn, and of that corn will be made bread."

Porius stared at the crumpled torso that had huddled itself between those crates and from the unintelligent extremity of which small gusts of foul air kept emanating, while, from the other end, words by no means devoid of human wisdom were hurled into space.

"I must try to remember what I feel at this moment," he thought, "for I've got hold of something, though what it precisely is I can't clearly say. It isn't only to do with this confounded idiot, nor with Auntie Tonwen and her old lover, nor with the horse and hound, nor with the passing of two thousand years, nor with earth and bread! And yet these all come into it. Curse it! I can't catch the thing."

And indeed a few minutes later, after watching the Derwydd's brother compose himself to sleep, the thing had escaped him completely. Before leaving that friendly slope, however, under the western stockade of the camp's kitchen, he succeeded in persuading his uncle to drink a little Gwlad-y-Haf mead and to munch a few pieces of hard barley bread. He also had the satisfaction, while the other was relieving himself under a willow tree, of indulging in a little private ritual of his own, namely, the delineation with his thumb, after licking that member till it had the texture of a pond-wet batrachian, of a couple of small, scarcely visible squares upon the woodwork of that hospitable erection.

This he did with the grateful and humble scrupulosity of an enchanted ass who is anxious to take a memorable leave of some inanimate stretch of wall or plank, against which at intervals, during an unusually happy night, it has rubbed its rump.

CHAPTER XXVI. “Off and Away Can Afford to Stay”

AS THE UNCLE AND NEPHEW advanced eastward along the water’s edge, Porius told himself that he surely couldn’t miss seeing Neb and Gunta as long as he remained in sight of the lake, while Brochvael told himself that he must take care not to pass tent, cell, forest hut, or pavilion, before he had made sure that the faithful Drom had not paused to rest there or been seduced there by some crafty devil of a counsellor or merchant or doctor or courtier into entering an unphilosophic and possibly a depraved service.

And then there came to pass the very thing that all accomplished chroniclers are so chary of recording, lest in spite of their devotion to truth their scrupulous and cautious narrative should take on the treacherous shimmer of fabulous invention. For just as if the concentrated thought of Porius had really and truly brought Neb and Gunta upon the scene, while the concentrated thought of Brochvael had done the same with his admired Drom, the unmistakable figures of all these persons suddenly appeared on an elevated llanerch, or “open space,” where several forest paths intersected one another.

But unfortunately they did not appear alone. They appeared as three dramatis personae in a desperate scene that contained five persons, a scene that was confused, complicated, confounding. The other two persons were Sibylla and her liberated Sais.

Never had Gunhorst’s tumbled hair looked yellower than it looked now as it shone in the sun. Never had any human figure radiated more joyously the ecstasy of battle than did his. And yet the astonishing Sibylla was evidently defying this exultant warrior with a feminine spirit that matched if it didn’t overpower his own.

It looked as if the man and the woman were both holding fast to the unlucky Drom, who, it seemed, was making no effort to free himself; but whereas Gunhorst was attempting to tie the captive’s wrists together, the woman, or so it appeared at a distance, was doing her best to untie them! Thus it was brought about that the play of their fingers in this moving knot of contrariety resembled more and more, as the newcomers approached, the coupling of passionate snakes; and this resemblance was not lessened by the furious glances which their two heads, both of them far too absorbed in each other to notice the approach of the uncle and nephew, kept exchanging, as if in the love-hate conflict of a yellow hydra with a black lamia.

Big men though the uncle and nephew were, they both shared something of that skirmishing instinct in their tribe, for the sake of whose value against the Gwyddyl-Ffichti the Romans had originally brought them down from the north, bribing the heathen Cunedda with the rich lands flooded by the sacred river.

So, at this juncture, when without question Porius Manlius and his centurion Aulus would have uttered a shout and rushed forward in a frontal attack, our Brythons, though advancing scarcely less rapidly, did so more circuitously, taking advantage of such willows, alders, and patches of tall reeds as lent themselves to the obscuring of their approach.

Some minutes before they reached the group, Gunta and Neb, who, as it may be imagined had seen them long before they were themselves seen, had detached their small persons from the others and had slipped away to meet them.

Brochvael was far too disturbed by the presence of Sibylla and Drom in such close proximity to take any notice of the little creatures. Had there been three pairs of Guntas and Nebs instead of only one they would have meant no more to him at that moment than if they'd been rabbits. Porius, however, welcomed them with immense relief and signed to them to hang back as he went forward to meet Gunhorst, who had already broken away from the woman and the prisoner and was awaiting him with exultation.

Action of one sort or another was Gunhorst's very existence. The most painful epoch of his whole life was when he had struggled as a captive in Gaul to learn from his fellow captives certain colloquial Roman phrases that would enable him to make his way through the more civilized provinces of Ynys Prydein, in case he were called to do so by the chief of his tribe.

Active brutality rather than erotic cruelty was the worst thing into which the surging urge of the invisible force which swept him forward drove Gunhorst. Once or twice when sleeping with him on a fresh bed of straw in the communal cowshed of the Gwyddyl-Swamp where her relatives lived, Sibylla had asked him how he got so much pleasure from destroying men and women who were weaker than himself; and it would have interested Brother John in one of his less theological moods, and even perhaps struck him as pathetic, to hear how simply Gunhorst answered her. "But every enemy, when I've been fighting him for some time, becomes weaker than I am. Am I to stop and bind up the wounds he's got from trying to kill me, and only then go on and kill him? As for women, never in my life have I killed a woman whom I could possibly love; and there are very few—"

"I believe you there!" cried Sibylla, finishing his sentence for him.

Thus when Gunhorst now beheld a man, without any weapon at all, or any shield, or any armour, calmly stop as they came towards each other and pull up by the roots a quite well-grown young ash tree, he felt as if he had been fighting against this man from the very beginning of the world. For it was not concealed from Gunhorst that a man who could, quite casually, as he came into battle, pull up a well-grown young ash tree by its roots to use as a weapon was a man of unusual and rather disconcerting physical strength.

Gunhorst was powerful enough, but not exceptionally so; and what his life experience both in Germania and in Gaul had impressed on his mind was that the thing which enables the tribes who have wise chieftains to overcome their enemies is not the strength of individual warriors but the superiority of weapons.

He had, therefore, in all the ups and downs of his adventurous career, been very much alive to every type of new weapon; and recently, not many weeks after landing with Colgrim in Britain, he had been converted to a particular kind of light battle-axe as the best weapon for the sort of fighting into which this invasion of Britain had plunged him. He especially esteemed the particular axe he was swinging aloft at this moment; for, among other attributes, it possessed some peculiar proportion or balance in its shape and moulding which made it an extremely effective missile when flung by a skilled hand.

Gunhorst was not ambitious. He rebelled against being treated as a slave and would never have endured to live out his life like many of his relatives who were peasant-serfs, bound to the acres they cultivated. But he had no desire to be in any way different from what he was. He hadn’t the faintest wish to attain wealth or power or influence.

And as for glory, all the glory he wanted was the extremely simple one of being praised by a woman for killing a man, and by his chief for killing several men. He was affectionate after his fashion; and, though faithfulness didn’t emerge between them, Sibylla knew that he would never weary of her and that she would be his woman, and he her man, until the end of their days.

And so, as Porius approached, holding his tree for a club, with its roots dropping earth mould and even earthworms as he shook it, Gunhorst had a strange, almost mystical feeling that he, with some kind of superior weapon, had been for thousands of years contending against this man whose strength was in his arms and who like the giants of Jotunheim could fight with his bare hands.

Cautious warrior as he was, Gunhorst recognized that he had one considerable advantage over his opponent, namely, that the sun at that particular hour, though shining from a cloudless heaven, was by no means shining perpendicularly down on both their heads. It was in fact shining so definitely in Porius's face that Gunhorst observed, as the Gaer champion drew near, that his eyes were almost closed in the wrinkling of his heavy brows.

"He can't do me much harm with his tree," Gunhorst thought, "and I don't believe I will throw the axe. If he is the son of the prince—"

Sibylla had cried out to him this information as she went on untying Drom's wrists, and Gunhorst said to himself: "Colgrim will value this man's head more than any slave's hands. But what's come to the woman over that idiot?"

The inexplicable consideration shown by Sibylla for Drom added a drop of definite, though rather obscure, jealousy to Gunhorst's general urge to kill. Glancing round, as a wise combatant instinctively does, so that he might make sure of the precise position of the rocks and trees around him, Gunhorst's eyes chanced to fall on a particularly tiny bird which he had known in his native German forests as a "treecreeper." This small creature was pecking furiously at the bark of a willow tree, pitting the agility of its thin beak against the self-protective instinct of certain succulent and somnolent insects to whom a tree was a universe; and just as the inexplicable tenderness of his woman to their idiot-captive strengthened his hand, so also did the lively strokes of this tiny bird's beak.

Gunhorst felt as if the rich autumnal sun — to his Germanic senses as feminine as Sibylla herself — were twining warm golden fingers round his enemy's head, confusing as well as blinding his eyes so that his strength should be diminished.

"No! I won't throw at him," he decided. "One of my best straight-down strokes shall do it!"

Concentrated as he had been all his fighting days on the relative efficacy of various weapons, he took for granted that when a man came into battle carrying a tree he intended to make that tree serve him as a club. That he himself had recently practised axe throwing with assiduous diligence made no difference. That was his own premeditated contribution to the use of a new weapon in this sort of loose war.

But that a man, however muscular, should contemplate, and that too without having practised it, the use of an uprooted tree as a missile was beyond his power of imagination. But, as Einion ab Iddawc was wont to complain to his guests at the Gaer, his son Porius was as ignorant of the art of war as he was unskilled in the art of the chase and unpractised in the art of love.

And the Prince of Edeyrnion was right. From his childhood Porius had acted in every crisis into which he drifted in the way he acted now. He followed his momentary inspiration; and by doing this he somehow managed to tap that mysterious life-preservative instinct which seems as if it were only available in a matter of life and death.

For just as Gunhorst was clutching his axe and drawing a deep breath, preparatory to his deadly rush, Porius flung the tree. He managed his throw in such a way that it was the entangled roots of the little ash, matted and caked with earth and small stones, that struck Gunhorst full in the face and brought him to the ground while the axe fell from his loosened grasp. Possessing himself of his fallen antagonist's weapon, Porius leisurely proceeded to help the man to his feet, while he calmed his lively fear of being incontinently put to death.

By the time he had got Gunhorst on his feet and had reassured the agitated Sibylla and had called Gunta and Neb to his side, Brochvael and Drom had evidently reached between them some important conclusion about their mutual plans for the future; for approaching together in an atmosphere of comprehensive understanding, they both showed signs of considerable relief when Sibylla took not the slightest notice of either of them.

Having come so lately from the presence of one of Drom's former masters, Porius, content to keep a firm hold upon the wrist of his conquered Sais, couldn't help speculating on the secret of the obvious spell cast, and quite independently cast, upon such different persons as his scholarly uncle and his father's fancy girl.

"He must be," he decided, "a sort of primitive Christian, able to make use of the magic of Christ just as old Rhun would like to make use of the magic of Mithras."

But it was now Porius's privilege to witness an emotional scene whose subtle poignancy he never afterwards forgot. Sibylla and Gunta were bidding each other farewell forever; and in the course of this farewell, which clearly stirred them both to the depths of their natures, all the contradictory strings that had been strung by destiny in and out, out and in, between this mother and this daughter, were plucked at with merciless fingers!

The climax of this scene occurred when both mother and daughter joined in a sort of tragic antiphony of infantile memories, recalling to each other the manner in which they used to repeat some ancient jingle about breadmaking, and trying to remind each other of the various turns and quips and gestures of this antique play, slapping each other's hands and murmuring unintelligible fragments of weird half-forgotten incantations.

Disputing over some portion of this game, they fell at last, however, into what — to all their masculine onlookers save the experienced Neb — was an inexplicable and furious quarrel in which, the bread-baking game totally forgotten, they began accusing each other of treacheries, secrecies, stupidities, blindnesses, crudities, and finally of things of which it was unthinkable that either of them should be guilty.

This finally reached such a point that Sibylla, apparently hardly conscious of what she did, struck her daughter's face with her clenched hand, first on one side, causing her to reel to the east, and then on the other, causing her to reel to the west. She did this just as if Gunta had been some annoying inanimate entity like the child's own doll, whose head and feet — objects that for some minutes had been puzzling the contemplative Porius — protruded from the gathered-up folds of her mistress's woollen cloak.

But after striking her in this way, Sibylla's anger, and apparently the little girl's too, died down completely, and the child's flaxen head was soon tightly squeezed against her mother's breast. And while with both hands Sibylla thus pressed her offspring against her body it almost seemed as if she were struggling to merge their two natures into one nature, in fact to force them back into what they had been before the child's birth.

And while they clung to each other in this way, Sibylla began to call upon the air and the earth and the sky to bear witness to the truth of her feeling. Certainly no one could deny the intensity of her feeling, nor that she was powerfully moved; but considering her audience at that dramatic crisis, the possibility of distinguishing between the various emotional channels that mingled in her passion was faint indeed.

"I can't blame him over there," thought Porius, still visualizing his begetter, even today, as a blur of spilled mead on the far horizon, "for loving this woman. She certainly has an appeal that's peculiarly her own."

And he was right. With her thin expressive features upraised towards the sun, with her finely cut lips parted, with the tears streaming down her cheeks, with the torrent of lamentable invective she was now pouring forth on the head of her defeated Sais, Sibylla at that moment — and even Gunhorst himself watched her with a half-sulky awe — became the centre of that whole group.

Neb alone, from his complicated if brief experience of court circles, remained unmoved and detached. Indeed he made use of the whole episode as if it were a cloudy horse block from which he could mount into the saddle of his own winged imagination.

"My master's in great danger," he thought, "but if with Gunta's help I don't put a spoke in Mistress Nineue's wheel, may the devil fly off with me!"

And then an event took place that changed everything; and though it was not till the tide of Time had tossed up out of its waves a considerable shoal of that queer stuff that is called Space that Porius realized what he now beheld. For it happened that Chance had arranged it that the spot where these four men were staring in fascinated silence at Sibylla was the precise spot where Brochvael had halted with this very Sibylla when they both were running at that exhausting pace to carry the order to Porius and Rhun to stay where they were.

This indeed was the crucial meeting place where the path between the Gaer and Saint Julian’s Fount was intersected by several other well-trodden forest paths; and it was from this spot and towards this spot that Porius now saw the well-known forms of Gwythyr and Nesta escorting none other than the Lady of the Gaer herself.

Gwythyr and Nesta at once fell back from the meeting between mother and son, a meeting sufficiently painful and awkward in itself, and naturally rendered more so by the fact that wherever Porius moved he had to drag the captive Gunhorst after him.

“Your father’s hurt, Porius. We must pray to the Blessed Christ that it’s not worse than that. Rhun ran all the way from his side to bring me the news. I sent him back to him to say I was coming at once. You’ll come with me, my dear, won’t you, now we know where he is? They’ve carried him to the Craig Hen, but Rhun says they’re afraid of taking him any further. Rhun says they saw someone belonging to the emperor leave Craig Hen just before they got there. But anyway that’s where they took your father, and that’s where I’m going. Why are you holding this man? He can’t do more harm than he’s done already. You’d better let him go, and this woman with him. Your grandfather’s badly hurt, Porius. He was down almost as soon as he left the Gaer. Nothing could hold him back. Aulus saved his life. He’d have been killed if Aulus hadn’t kept them off. But he’s badly hurt. It’ll be a miracle if he recovers. He thinks himself he’s going to die, and he keeps talking about his monument and how he must have the words ‘Christianus fuit’ engraved on it, and how he wants it to be where he picked up that legionary’s flask he was so fond of. He can’t lift his right arm. He can’t get out of bed. Aulus has to do everything for him. He insisted on seeing the emperor. Do, for God’s sake, Porius, let that man go, and send this woman away!

"Yes, the emperor sent to say he was coming; and he did come, but only for a few hours. And all that time, save for a minute or two, he was studying maps and giving orders. Colgrim's army's in full retreat — not scattered, you understand, but avoiding battle — and off to join his brother, the emperor told me that himself, in his off-hand way, to join his brother at Badon Hill. That's just what, he says, he meant him to do all along. He said Colgrim has gained nothing by his invasion of Edeyrnion — nothing but causing the death of his own friends. I suppose by that the emperor meant the Three Princesses and the druid, but he oughtn't to have said that; and those nearest to him felt he made a mistake in saying it!"

"Those nearest him?" thought Porius. "So that's been Medrawd's line with her!"

"For God's sake, Porius, let that man go; and let him take that insolent woman away with him."

"In a minute, Mother, but where was Father hurt?"

"Do you mean in what part of his body? Or do you mean in what part of the forest? I have no idea. All I know is what Rhun told Morfydd and what Morfydd told me. My own feeling is that your father's hurt isn't as bad as your grandfather's. But Christ must indeed be trying my faith and tempting me to sin by sending me both these disasters at the same time and following so quick" — here she lowered her voice a little so that Brochvael couldn't hear— "so quick upon the death of Minnawc Gorsant! Oh, I wish he were with us now to pray for them both! Oh dear! I know what he would tell me to do. He would tell me to stop talking and to pray! But I've got so much to tell you, haven't I, Porius? For I haven't seen you since Thursday, and it's Monday today.

"For one thing the new priest has come. He's the same young man who — Morfydd's been wonderful! She's been doing everything for me, as well as I could do it myself. It's she being there that's made it possible for me to go to Einion at Craig Hen. And now, Porius, for the third or fourth time I beg you, let these terrible people go. What's the matter with that woman? Is she ill? Is that her child?"

Never had Porius felt less attraction to women in general — to all women — than he did at this moment. His imagination had been playing him the most monstrous tricks all the time she had been speaking. A strange and terrifying sex horror had laid hold of him, and he felt as if women were not only of a different sex but of a different species.

What had seized him as he listened to his mother, hearing her and yet not hearing her, was a different feeling altogether from what had reached him from that bottomless water hole, that Erebus of the Cader, whence he had seen Creiddylad's eyes staring up at him through the blood-clotted greenness. That was the terror and horror of the truth of Nature. But to feel this appalling suspicion of his own mother, suspicion that everything about her was false, that she deceived herself through and through, that she had no honesty in her, that she was false in her deepest spirit, this was something quite different from her seduction by Medrawd.

"The emperor had sent to say he was coming." Had sent whom? Well, had sent Medrawd. Oh, she had known Medrawd all her crafty woman's life! She had been brought up with him! He was the son-cousin, the son-nephew, the son-darling of Uthyr Pendragon, whose pet she'd herself been at that corrupt, degenerate, Romanized court! He could see this grave, resolute, competent, spiritual face change its expression as Medrawd had his way with her.

Yes, he could see it all! And he could forgive Medrawd. What he couldn't forgive her was her falsity in herself and to herself. The abnormally active consciousness with which destiny, moulded by fate and twisted by chance, had endowed him, had led him among other curious mental habits into a way of saying to himself: "I must try to remember exactly how this scene looked, just here and just now, so that, years later and long afterwards, when I pass this way I can say to myself 'Well! I got through that anyway,' or 'Life has turned many corners since then,' or 'Not a single one of all those faces are now left above ground,' or 'By the Mother of God, I won't make a fool of myself like that again!'"

The level of the small llanerch, or "open space," in the forest, where Gunta had just faced her mother, and where he was now facing his mother, was lifted above its surroundings just enough for a glimpse to be offered of that reedy and muddy corner of the lake's edge into which the massive masonry of the eastern wall of the dead Brother's cell projected so far as to create a curious and quite special kind of loneliness, the haunted and magical loneliness where some deep-foundationed work of men's hands is reinvaded by the wilderness it has dominated for so long. It was through these reeds and this mud that he had himself forced his way after his first encounter with the emperor's nephew; and now, after trying for the second time to save this tragic creature's life, here he was, looking down upon this mud and these reeds over the tear-stained faces of Euronwy and Sibylla!

That the spot where he was now listening to his own mother, as he kept his eyes on the white face of Gunta's mother, was indeed a regular meeting place of Edeyrnion forest paths was conclusively proved to him, as he stood there holding his prisoner and looking quite as lethargic and dull as his father had always considered him or had pretended to consider him, by one not very pleasing piece of evidence. For there, not far from where he was standing as if he and his prisoner had been chained together, was a large fresh deposit of human excrement.

The man who had eased himself there — and he must have had bowels that badly required easing — had partially concealed the shining red-brown heap, of which hosts of brilliant coloured flies were already aware, by throwing down a piece of rag upon it; but instead of concealing what he had done at these immemorial crossways, sacred to older deities than either Jesus or Mithras, this unhappy Manichean rag emphasized the sacrilege, neither discouraging the flies nor obliterating the disgust.

But his mother was still talking. She was explaining how it had come about that she had permitted Porius Manlius to go down into the valley beyond the walls. She was explaining how in his weak condition the old man kept reverting to his wish to be buried on the exact spot where he had picked up the water flask of his favourite vanished legion, and also to the nature of his tombstone upon which he wanted it recorded, for the information of future generations, that he was a Christian.

How well Porius could remember that excursion when he was a boy in order that his grandfather might mark out with little white stones the place where he had found his precious flask!

It was on that day — though he had seen the old-fashioned lettering many times since — that the crazy verb "to cavoseniargize" had first got lodged in his mind.

And then he suddenly wondered, just as if the mere idea of his sacred-secret practise made him unwilling to believe in such wickedness, whether Medrawd might after all have lied? But what conceivable motive could he have had for lying? And why had Brochvael assumed that the outrage to which the man had confessed had taken place? Of course, Medrawd might have lied to Brochvael too and deliberately given a false impression to the whole Gaer. The primeval snake escaped from the baby Jesus was quite capable of twisting the natural courtesies between hostess and guest, between cousin and cousin, into anything that suited his purpose. But what was his purpose? Only this madness about fighting life in the interest of death?

His eyes turned now from Euronwy's face to Sibylla's. The girl was ghastly white and trembling from head to foot. He glanced at the profile of his prisoner. Yes! Gunhorst was suffering from the same interpretation as his own of Sibylla's look. Then she really had loved the prince! He had no sooner reached this conclusion than the man he was holding by the arm made a violent lurch towards the girl, while Neb, clearly afraid lest matters might get out of control, seized Gunta by her arm.

At that point Euronwy spoke with decisive authority, and Porius, thankful enough to give himself a momentary respite from responsibility and mocking himself in his heart for his weakness and recklessness, obeyed her to the letter.

"Let the man loose, Porius! Let him take the woman and go! Make him leave the child with us. She's too young to follow."

"And thus," as the Henog of Dyfed in his best vein would have put it, "and thus it was done."

But very different from the more picturesque effects of that inspired narrator was what followed Gunhorst's release. Its stage setting was in fact dominantly mental, and nothing could have been calmer, more commonplace, more ordinary, more natural, than the picture presented by Gunhorst as, without so much as a sideways glance at Porius to divine his intentions, he stepped hurriedly forward, picked up Sibylla, who had slipped from her daughter's thin arms, and carried her off at a run. He ran with her straight down the slope towards the lake; and Porius noted with interest the shrewd practical care he took to avoid getting entangled in that tricky expanse of reeds and mud and yet to convey his burden towards the eastern end of the lake, where the unfrequented moorland began which led towards the great free forest that stretched away to the west of Saint Tysilio's shrine.

And then it was Porius's turn to assert himself. "If he's badly hurt," he announced in a raised voice, "all the more reason for my doing exactly what he told me when he took Morfydd to the Gaer and left me to look after things here. No, Mother, I cannot go. But Uncle Brochvael and our good friend Drom here will help Gwythyr and Nesta — it would be a shame to separate them — in escorting you whither he is. I only wish" — here he just uttered what came into his head at that second rather than any considered suggestion— "I only — wish — I — could — get — that — Jewish — doctor — to — go — with — you."

As he uttered this, pondering these things aloud, Porius became aware of a vibration of suppressed magnetic emotion in his immediate neighbourhood. He was so self-centred and impervious to social shocks that it took a heavy bolt of this sort of psychic thunder to pierce his defences, and he stared round him now with a quaintly puzzled and reproachful air as if someone were making a fool of him.

And then his eyes met those of the silent and embarrassed Gwythyr and he knew it was from him that this voiceless appeal had come.

"Well, my lad?" he said, speaking more gently than the youth expected; for Gwythyr, unlike Afagddu and a few others of the older Gaer men who had known Porius as the foster-child of Alarch, misinterpreted his sluggish self-absorption as family pride, his shyness and ungregariousness as inhumanity, and his lack of humour and of quick and easy repartee as a stiff and stilted attempt to copy the reserve of his Roman grandfather. "Well, my lad?"

“I think, my Lord, that Lot-el-Azziz would willingly come if Nesta went to look after the child and the foreign woman.”

Gwythyr was astonished at the simple gratitude with which Porius responded to these words, as if this suggestion of his had solved the hardest of all problems in this present confusion of moves and countermoves.

“Oh, please do go — both of you! — that’s the thing to do, isn’t it, Mother? The man’s a most experienced doctor and a very clever one. I’ve seen him with Brother John.”

Although the assent they received from their mistress was little more than a faint shrug of the shoulders and a self-pitying gesture, in the shape of a weary adjustment of the carefully folded satiny strip of pali she wore round her head and allowed to descend over the front of her robe as far as her left breast, the newly married pair darted off down the slope towards the southwest with as much alacrity and naturalness as Gunhorst the Sais with his woman in his arms had hurried down the parallel slope towards the southeast.

Euronwy now turned to Brochvael, who was talking to his new friend Drom, and sought to catch his eye with a statuesque expression of resignation.

“Even though my unkind son,” her look said, “dismisses all my servants, I shall still go forward alone whither Destiny beckons.”

“Neb!” called Porius suddenly.

“Yes, my Lord!” the son of Digon answered; and an echo carried those two syllables “Neb! Yes! Neb! Yes! Neb! Yes!” over the lake, over the dead Brother’s cell, over the Cave of Mithras, over the deserted camp, over the rock ridges towards the Cader, over the shrine of Tysilio Sant, over the church of Collen Sant, till they died away beyond the deserted unlit hall of Pengwern, among the ruined heights and the grassy hollows, haunted by owls and badgers and wolves and foxes, of Porius Manlius's vanished Uriconium.

"Go back quickly to Myrddin Wyllt — no! never mind what he told you to tell me; I have a feeling that he himself is in danger — and tell him I'll be at his tent in a few minutes! Tell him about my father and about the Patrician and do what you can for him, and don't let him out of your sight till I come. No, don't be afraid about Gunta, lad! I'll keep Gunta safe with me. Don't you worry about her. I'll bring her along with me in a few minutes. But I want you to be free to look after Myrddin Wyllt till I come. I have a strong feeling — yes, and you have too; I can see that! — that he wants help from you and me, now at this very second! You know what he is, and how he can — but go! go! go!"

And Neb, whose eyes had grown big under his words, showed himself for once too agitated even to make an obeisance and rushed off.

When he was gone, and Porius was left alone with little Gunta, watching his mother whispering to Brochvael something that was clearly of great importance to them both and probably — so he told himself — had to do with Morfydd, he deliberately set himself to play one of his earliest boyhood's tricks, a trick which had been forced upon him by the natural submissiveness of his phlegmatic strength combined with the unnatural liveliness of his rebellious mind, as these things were affected by the fatality of his having always lived with persons of a more dominant and more self-assertive will than his own.

By this trick he metamorphosed himself into a drowsy, well-meaning, and rather babyish animal, an animal who has been deposited by chance into a scene of high mysterious dramatic tension, the protagonists and antagonists of which could argue and dispute and contend across him and around him without having the slightest effect on his sense-absorbed identity.

Every now and then, as they whispered together now, Euronwy or Brochvael would glance at him as he sat with his back to the copper-coloured blob of excrement, and their attitude suggested, as the object of these glances well understood, that this curious trick bequeathed to him from his troubled boyhood made not the slightest difference to the manner in which they regarded him.

"There's a tynged on me," he told himself with a not entirely mock-dolorous plaintiveness, "as there was on Llew Llaw Gyffes, a tynged that sets me outside the ordinary human relations. Why the devil don't I feel more upset about what's happened to him over there? I wonder whether I'm the coldest-hearted wretch in Edeyrnion! I don't feel as if I were. I feel as if —"

His thoughts were interrupted by little Gunta, who now approached him so boldly and recklessly that he cried out to her, with a sweeping movement of his arm: "For God's sake be careful, child! There's a patch of awful filth behind me here! We ought to clear out of this curst crossways place. It's a regular cloaca!"

Gunta took no more notice of his outburst than if she'd been a bluebottle fly. With a hurried spontaneity that betrayed the move as purely due to a faintly felt pang of loneliness, she settled herself down at his side, made use of his legs as a holster for the back of her neck, sighed contentedly, and closed her eyes.

"If anything happens—" she murmured.

"What did you say, child?"

"If anything happens to Neb I shall bite her throat and suck her blood till she's dead."

"Of course you will! Of course you will!" he whispered stroking her hair. "Of course you'll bite her throat!

When the wife of the devil kisses a man
There's more than fish in the frying pan."

And with this he also began, as he stroked that flaxen hair, to feel extremely sleepy. But it was to the rocking of a giant nurse that he found himself falling to sleep with a Sais child leaning against him, his father and grandfather wounded to death, his mother seduced, his bride in love with his friend, and he himself the clumsy murderer of the great ghost that lulled him.

He was awaked with a start to discover that he hadn't the faintest notion how long he'd slept. The customary sequences that we call laws of Nature would have accounted equally well for half a minute's or half an hour's interim.

At any rate it was his mother's voice, announcing the return of Gwythyr with Lot-el-Azziz, that brought him back to life; and glancing quickly round to make sure that the heap of excrement was as it was, for he had established himself as a sort of organic pharos, or living watchtower, against that hapless phenomenon, he scrambled to his feet, only to find that the flaxen head of the little Gwyddyl-Sais was no longer near him but was flitting about like a sulphur-winged butterfly in and out of the figures that surrounded the newly arrived doctor.

Porius was however a trifle shocked by the doctor's present mood. Had the man already been drinking in spite of it being, as he could tell by the sun, only halfway between one and two of the afternoon?

No! On the whole, as he listened, he thought not; but el-Azziz was certainly behaving in an odd way and talking with a lack of restraint that seemed totally unfitting to his profession.

"Gog and Magog, great Princess," he was now saying, "existed in my wife's mind as ideas before they existed in her womb as persons. Magog's happy birth, of course, changes everything. Now we shall not sail with Dion Dionides. It is therefore my happy privilege, great Princess, to offer you, on this twenty-second day of October in this year of the Son of David four hundred and ninety-nine, my humble services as the royal, I mean the princely, physician in your Dinas-Gaer, I mean your Mynydd-y-Gaer household, of the king, I mean of the prince, of this northern province of Britain."

Deep into the nature of the rebellious Gwythyr had sunk the fact that it was by his advice that Nesta had been left to look after the Jewess and the Jewess's baby and that Lot-el-Azziz had been brought here.

All this gave him deep satisfaction; but he had now to confess to having refrained from using physical force to prevent el-Azziz from doing what as a professional physician as well as a scrupulous Jewish parent the man had felt impelled to do; and Gwythyr was conscious of no small nervousness.

He looked at his mistress as she began to make a quiet and courteous reply to the doctor's cautious startling offer. He looked at Brochvael who had snatched at the opportunity to take Drom a few paces apart, so as to discuss with him further exciting details of their settling down together in Ty Cerrig.

Finally he looked at Porius, who suddenly struck him as deliberately acting at that moment as he himself was so often driven to act, that is to say, acting the part of a prize fool. For it struck the intelligence of Gwythyr, quickened as that intelligence now was by a feeling of justifiable self-confidence, that Porius was pretending to have a great deal less alertness as to what was happening about him than he really had.

And this flash of insight gave him the courage to do a thing that Nesta would have been astonished to see him do. He went straight up to the apparently dazed and staring Porius, asked boldly whether he had permission to speak, received this permission, and in a clear and rapid whisper told him how Lot-el-Azziz had spent five hours that morning — indeed from the hour of five to the hour of ten — digging a deep grave for Brother John just outside the entrance to the porch of his cell.

Porius listened intently to every word of this and made no sign whether of approval or disapproval, though Gwythyr felt he had his wits about him, since at one point, when in his own anxiety to explain exactly where the grave was the younger man moved a random step or two, the other plucked at his sleeve indicating the unburied excrement.

Gwythyr was right. Porius had seldom had his wits about him more definitely than at this moment, and more than his wits. His memory raced back along the years, calling up one impression after another of his old friend's face and forcing himself to see that face lying at the bottom of this deep hole. Rapidly he decided that this sudden impious and sacrilegious disposal of Brother John's lean bones and haggard features was the best thing that could have happened.

He had thrust away when he left the cell all wish to see the old man's dead face again; and if he'd been himself the one to decide on the place wherein, if they did not burn the body, it might decompose in peace, he would have selected this very spot.

And there was another reason for his satisfaction in what he had just heard; namely, his deep and secret attitude — secret in a curious and subtle sense even to himself except at certain extremely painful moments — towards the young man his father had chosen to accompany Afagddu in the task of escorting Medrawd out of the provinces of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy.

Thus it was in no mood of cruelty or even of careless teasing that he kept Gwythyr waiting for his verdict on this grave dug in five hours outside the Brother's cell for the Brother's corpse. His eyes were fixed on a clump of greenish white moss that clung to the edge of a small trickle of water, a trickle whose drip-drop made so faint a sound that it was only audible in the pauses of their human talk.

But this particular species of white moss — already familiar to him, as it was to all Brythons, as a substance most precious in the staunching of blood and the binding up of wounds — was destined to the end of his days to be associated with the painful glimpse he now had into his feeling about this nameless young man.

Well did he know now why the self-healing instinct of his deepest soul — with its fatal tendency, as with all the descendants of Cunedda, to a quite special kind of nervous insanity — kept this youth nameless.

His consciousness hovered now like a swift black butterfly over the purple bruise whose surface was still liable to be speckled by minute out-jetting spurts of red blood when a certain idea brushed it with its wings!

His mother — under the influence of Minnawc Gorsant — had sent this boy, who was one of the leaders of the orthodox gang who had murdered Morvran, to learn church Latin and be consecrated priest by the bishop in Porius's own old school beyond Moel y Famau.

His knowledge that at the bottom of her heart Morfydd had never entirely absolved him from a share, remote enough and merely negative, but still a share in her brother's death, was constantly intensifying his own secret remorse and causing renewed outspurtings of bloody drops from that particular bruise. Thus the self-created tendency to be pursued by the very association of ideas from which he shrank away was always forcing him to employ all manner of curious devices; and he had, indeed, become a successful adept in a thousand self-healing tricks to help him escape his self-created devils. One of these tricks was the extremely simple one of forcing himself to forget what to himself he would call “the horror.”

But another was to pile up a monstrous mountain of appallingness, so that it became possible to deal with it, so to say, on its own terms; in other words to imagine himself to be a compounded identity of monstrosities so shocking that he became a veritable leviathan whose maw was terrific enough to dispose of any conceivable behemoth.

In most cases, however, the tricks he employed in this self-healing magical ritual partook of both wisdoms; firstly the wisdom of running away himself, and secondly the wisdom of transforming himself into a monster of such appalling desperation that any spectre he could possibly encounter would be the one to flee.

Moreover, since accident and chance only provided the occasions out of which his self-tormenting soul invented its own obstinately returning secret horror, so fate and destiny, endowing him with his parents, with his wife, with his teacher, with his foster-brother, and even with the ancestral Creiddylad, had fixed the boundaries and set up the barriers that of necessity limited the stage of his interior comic tragedy.

And now as he surveyed that trickle of water and that patch of greenish white moss he gave vent in his heart to a soundless howl of exultation over the fact that in a world where the foundations had been laid so long ago, and where necessity and chance vied with each other to reduce the amount of plastic life clay at the disposal of a person’s individual will, there were yet such unbelievable opportunities for asserting oneself craftily, powerfully, and effectively.

And certainly, he felt, he had asserted himself during these last four days and not without power, though in one case with disastrous enough results, and this forcing himself to forget the name of the young priest was, he now felt, a real evidence of his accomplished success in the art of mental escape.

It certainly did seem to Gwythyr, as he watched Porius at that moment, that he was watching the face of a man for whom an authentic crack had yawned in the familiar system of things, letting something else show through.

Whether, as Porius later was inclined to think, the exceptional effort he had made to dominate with his will the workings of his mind in the matter of the new priest's name, was the cause of this illumination, or whether it was a metaphysical reward for the obstinate animal tenacity of his "cavoseniargizing," the truth was that to his own consciousness, while Gwythyr stared at him, waiting a verdict on Brother John's grave, it seemed as if that greenish white moss were a greenish white passage leading straight into the secret roots of life.

And never to the end of his days did he forget exactly how he saw the mystery of life at that second. He invented many obscure emblems and many grotesque parables after that; but the particular vision of things as he apprehended it at that moment remained with him as the authentic response of the secret self of Porius ab Einion to the mirage known as human existence.

And just as he had been successful in destroying a natural habit of the mind by forgetting that boy's name, so now he set himself to inject all the crafty ignorance and all the cautious doubt he could muster up into every drop of rational explanation offered by every teacher he had ever had, and by Brother John most of all, of the mystery of things. For in this glimpse of reality seen through this white moss he saw existence not as one creation, or as one world, but as many worlds, and he saw all the innumerable consciousnesses of these worlds as possessed of creative power.

He saw all creatures, even as Brother John had seen them in the calm of his death-ecstasy, as composed of a natural human clay and of a natural human spirit activating that clay, activating it and motivating it with desires, purposes, instincts, impulses that on the whole were not only natural but absolutely necessary if the individuals composing the human race were to enjoy as well as endure their short and troubled lives.

Such were the thoughts that visited the mind of Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc on this twenty-second of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine. And if the confused events which had brought to Edeyrnion from the battlegrounds of Ynys Prydein both Colgrim and the emperor had deepened in their most secret sluices and most recondite reservoirs the feelings of Porius, they had worked quite as remarkable a change upon the sensitivity of Gwythyr, the husband of Nesta ferch Aulus.

That young man was at this moment watching Porius's face with an attention so absorbed and intense that Porius couldn't help being aware, for the second time that afternoon, of the stream of magnetic energy directed upon him.

"Was Brother John," he enquired, "laid there at once — I mean in that deep hole you had dug?"

Gwythyr gathered together the weight of his newly born self-confidence. "Yes, my Lord," he announced, speaking frankly and firmly, "I helped lift him into it."

"How did you lower him down?"

Gwythyr's reply was given with the faintest flicker of a smile. "The doctor had thought of that," he said. "The doctor mentioned the cave that Abraham bought. I forget from whom he bought it or how much he gave for it, my Lord!"

"You mean the man actually told you how much gold or silver Abraham paid for his grave?"

"Yes, my Lord, he spoke of it twice."

"Then you didn't have to lower the body down?"

"Oh, no, my Lord, the doctor explained carefully to me that in the time of Abraham graves were so large that people could walk about in them. That's why it took us so long to dig; and when it was finished the doctor's little boy Gog held the torch for us, and I stood in the grave, and the doctor lifted the body down to me."

"Is the grave filled in?"

"Yes, my Lord."

Porius gave a great sigh; and it was a sigh of unfathomable relief. He had been dreading all the while that it would be his duty to kneel on the brink of that huge grave, dug as they dug them in the days of Abraham, and see Brother John gazing up at him from down there with a look he would never be able to understand.

"You have done very well indeed, Gwythyr, you and the doctor. You have done exactly right."

This moment was one of the happiest moments of Gwythyr's life. He felt that the fate of the House of Cunedda, so inextricably bound up with his own, was set upon the right path. But they were now, both of them, compelled to turn from ideal patterns of life and death to such practical concerns as a suitable residence' for Gog and Magog; for it had already become clear to Porius that his mother had no urgent desire to see her destiny associated with that of Lot-el-Azziz.

This excited personage was now pacing up and down between the proud and sorrowful figure of the Lady of the Gaer and the self-absorbed figure of little Gunta. Euronwy was standing now on the highest spot where the various paths converged and was lost — so her son told himself — in some patient and intricate calculation that included the manipulation of human entities, whether dead or alive, with as much competent authority as if they were fish in a weir.

Little Gunta, on the other hand, had snatched at the opportunity of combing her doll's hair with the withered stalk of a dead thistle, and of arranging the few particular hairs she had pulled from the doll's head into squares and triangles on the globular dome of a spotted toadstool.

Never had Porius's mind raced round and round its cage of the moment's fatality with a more savage fastidiousness. He had no wish to change everything, but he had a great wish to enjoy the status quo more than seemed possible just then. It seemed as if his conscience had been aroused from its usual quiescence by the sight of Gunta combing her doll's hair. He felt as if he had been combing a great many dolls' hair while his mocking father and his taciturn grandfather had both got themselves wounded, probably to death, in defence of Ynys Prydein.

But what in the devil's name was this mad Jew doing now? Lot-el-Azziz was actually dancing! Yes, dancing a solemn dance of religious ecstasy; just such a dance as David is described as dancing before the Ark of the Covenant.

"It's over that little human Ark, Magog," thought Porius; and as he watched the physician's antics and saw how he lifted his legs under his brown robe and waved his ram's horn, and how he tugged violently at the twist of hair in the centre of his skull, and how he cried aloud in his glorying, "The Lord — He is the God! The Lord — He is the God!" it crossed his mind that Edeyrnion was a very small portion of Ynys Prydein, and that Ynys Prydein itself was but a mouthful compared with the whole planet.

That an enemy spear had entered the body of the ruler of the small tribe to whose service he had just dedicated himself clearly meant nothing to Lot-el-Azziz. A daughter of Moab had been impregnated with the seed of Judah; and unto Gog had been added Magog.

"But what on earth," Porius asked himself, "is keeping Mother now? She's got the doctor, and here's Gwythyr ready to start, and Uncle Brochvael. Well! I'll be off anyway; and I'll just carry away Gunta and go straight to Gwendydd's tent! Mistress Nineue is up to something. God! I pray she won't hurt little Neb. What a devil the woman is!"

With a vehemence that was unusual in him his imagination now got to work; and he felt as if there were a long invisible thread, one end of which had been tied to his midriff and the other twisted round Myrddin's thumb, and that this thread had been giving several vicious jerks. "We've both got a tynged," he thought, "from the same dark star."

It was at this moment that there entered the brain of the elated Gwythyr a yet bolder idea; and once more he moved close up to Porius.

"My Lord!"

"What is it, lad?"

"I think the foreign doctor is praying to his gods."

"Well, lad, why not?"

"I think he's praying that you, my Lord, may with a final and deciding voice accept him as the physician of the Gaer household."

Had the exultant Gwythyr consulted his bride about the wisdom of this presumptuous utterance, she would have been horrified and would have thought he had gone mad. And her horror would have been a good example of the completely erroneous view of Porius's nature held by those who had seen him daily since the death of his foster-mother, Alarch the Fair.

For so far from being annoyed by Gwythyr's forwardness, Porius smiled at him with genuine gratitude; and he thought in his heart: "If he over there did die of this hurt, what a thing to have a sensible, intelligent, and quick-noticing boy like this to keep me in touch with reality and prevent my making a fool of myself!"

And he promptly proceeded to discuss with Gwythyr which of the two long unoccupied and spirit-haunted chambers in the interior of the Gaer wall would be best adapted for the initiation into life upon earth of Magog the son of el-Azziz of the tribe of Judah.

Meanwhile Gunta, holding her doll in one hand and her thistle comb in the other, was showing herself as bold as Gwythyr. What however was bothering her had nothing to do with the Jew's prayers or with his gratitude to his god. It had to do with the man's Asiatic notion of offering up the pain in his own body in thanksgiving to heaven.

Nor perhaps would even this pain offering to Jehovah have offended the small creature if it had not had to do with the celebrant's hair. It was entirely connected with the frantic, shocking, and crucial tugs, which had grown more and more intolerable, at that unfortunate topknot growing from the apex of the man's Semitic skull.

In his exalted ecstasy, doubtless a religious characteristic for thousands of years of his particular branch of the tribe of Judah, Lot-el-Azziz evidently fancied that Gunta, with her flowing yellow hair and her great doll, had caught his infectious aberration and was developing it according to the rites of some primordial hyperborean Amazonian race which, in its reluctance to shed blood, sacrificed images of wood and wax, painted to resemble children.

El-Azziz was indeed so carried away by this notion which lent itself so perfectly to his mood that he allowed himself, as though under the hypnosis of a mystic dance dominated by a small child and a big doll, to imitate precisely Gunta’s treatment of her doll’s hair in his own behaviour to his unlucky topknot. The oddly consorted pair of celebrants were indeed so absorbed in their ritual that when Porius lifted up his voice, and to the evident surprise and distress of his mother, declared in louder and more authoritative tones than she, or anyone else, had ever heard issuing from his lips, that from now on, “Lot-el-Azziz of the tribe of David is henceforth to be accepted as the official physician of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy, with his domicile at Mynydd-y-Gaer, and the right to meat and drink at the prince’s cost,” so startling was it to everyone present to hear this new voice of authority from such a quarter that in the deep silence that followed there was actually audible a faint but distinct echo.

“Prince’s cost! Prince’s cost!” repeated the echo.

This phenomenon naturally produced a vague uneasiness in the minds of its hearers, an uneasiness that was increased rather than diminished when in the silence that followed there descended from the high ridges above Craig Hen the harsh note of a solitary raven. It was the Lady of the Gaer who broke the spell.

“Come!” Euronwy said. “Let us be going! Brochvael, give me your arm. Doctor, you will be pleased to attend us. Gwythyr, you will need some weapon if you’re to escort us to any purpose. And you too, my man. What did you tell me your name was? Oh yes, I remember, Drom. Drom’s a good name, and borne, I am quite sure, by one worthy of it. How is it I’ve never seen you before, Master Drom?”

Now Porius knew perfectly well, as sons always do know with their mothers, and husbands with their wives, that the Lady of the Gaer was deeply disappointed in him. Well did he know that she longed for him to take command of the situation, and to show himself a man, a hero, an irresistible and overpowering force. But so contradictory was the element of obstinate animal maliciousness diffused through his natural docility that merely to know this was enough to make him emotionally hostile to it. In other words, though he outwardly obeyed, he inwardly mocked at his own obedience; and though he did what his fate called upon him to do, he did it with the air of old Gwrgi, ploughing behind his ox rather than with the mystic discipline of a soldier of Mithras or the romantic emotion of a servant of Christ.

But though his irritation with the woman for wanting him to be a clever hero protecting a tragic mother, when he felt like a stupid cawr teased by a household of Ffichtiaid slaves, was intensified by his doubts of her integrity, he obeyed her patiently, looking about till he found Gunhorst's axe, and when he had picked it up from the ground presenting it with a smile to Gwythyr.

Meanwhile Brochvael, shifting his ebony staff to his right hand and letting Drom have his spear, began to lead Euronwy down the incline. Matters were at this stage, and Euronwy, leaning ever so lightly on Brochvael's arm, had already arranged the pali scarf that covered her head, and with a resigned, tender, and only faintly reproachful gesture had waved farewell to her son, when they all became aware of voices reaching them upon the wind, and coming too from a quite different quarter from the one to which they were setting out.

"Mother! Mother!" Porius cried. "Did you hear that? It's Rhun! He must be carrying him! He must be bringing him here! They must have found out where you were. Wait, Mother dear! Wait exactly where you are! I'll bring him to you. Yes, you can trust me to bring him. Only don't let anyone stir a step from here."

“May I come with you?” enquired little Gunta eagerly. “I can run very fast.”

But Porius shook his head.

“No, child,” he said, tightening his belt and straightening the leather straps round his legs. “It isn’t only a matter of running. There are a lot of other things to be thought of. Besides I want you to be here if Neb comes back with the counsellor.”

In spite of his words about its “not being a matter of running,” it is certain that Gunta couldn’t have kept up with him on that particular occasion, as he rushed from the side of the woman who bore him to the side of the man who begat him. Probably nobody in Mynydd-y-Gaer could just then have kept up with him unless it were Rhun.

As he ran he wondered desperately what he would see and how he would see it. There was no question of the direction; for Rhun’s voice came on the east wind, and came characteristically enough, in steady, unagitated, measured repetitions. And yet when he did see them it proved an experience completely different from anything he’d yet known.

What he first saw was a white object jolted or being jolted, swinging or being swung, and moving at some speed about a foot from the ground; and as it moved, being crossed at frequent intervals by a couple of human shapes that seemed at once connected and completely independent of it.

“My father’s face!” he thought. “It’s as white as death!” And when he came up with them it seemed to him that Rhun gave him an angrily exhausted, and yet an almost amused, look as much as to say: “So you can do it when you want to do it!”

Porius was too much out of breath to do more than sign to them to go on as they were doing, nor was there any opportunity for him to exchange more than a glance with Rhun as he went along at their side.

Three times he tried to interrupt the feeble stream of delirious words that kept issuing from the wounded man's mouth; but it was a vain attempt. Either Einion didn't recognize him, or his presence only increased the incoherence of those feeble outpourings. It was one of the most painful experiences of Porius's whole life, and so many contradictory emotions swept over him that his features assumed an expression as he walked along that was very unusual to him.

It was indeed a matter of small wonder that Porius should undergo sensations at this minute that distorted his features; for it would have been painful to a complete stranger to note the feeble struggles Einion kept making to roll off the hurdle on which he was stretched and to tumble to the ground. He must have been moved by some obscure Antaean feeling that if only he could touch the actual soil he would be cured of his hurt. The man's ghastly pallor would have been disturbing to anybody; but it was the obstinate intensity of the efforts he kept making, contrasted with his hopeless impotence to achieve his purpose, that made his state so peculiarly pitiful to his son.

"I don't see how he can survive this," Porius kept saying to himself. "I don't see how he can survive this."

But the prince was not only struggling to slip off the hurdle on which he was being carried; he was also pouring forth an unending stream of wild incoherent words, and he was doing this in a curiously high-pitched tone, a tone different from his ordinary one, but resembling a little the tone he used when he was drunk.

And though the man didn't look at his son as he rambled on in this delirium it wasn't long before Porius fancied he was conscious of his being there, and that his presence was in some way disturbing to him.

At least that was the excuse he gave to himself as with an audible groan of relief he fell back, and walking behind that swaying and jolting hurdle, which was carried between Rhun's right shoulder and Afagddu's left, began to try to realize what was happening. No, not to realize! To do that, ever since his suckling by Einion's romantic sister Alarch, had been impossible to Porius. He lived as much in his immediate sensations as his half-brother Rhun lived in his immediate mystical piety.

Porius's whole life had been one long series of private sensations limited by domestic authority and tempered by tribal responsibility. And now as he contemplated the bare heads of the two men who were carrying his father, the brown locks of the one and the grey curls round the sunburnt skull of the other, in place of what the world calls "realizing what has happened," in other words, in place of pondering upon the fact that his father was dying in front of him on a swaying hurdle, what Porius gave himself up to was a weird feeling that some sort of slippery caul or filmy cocoon had been torn from his father's habitual consciousness, so that what was apprehended now, what was in fact heard now, from the motions of that consciousness, was some kind of underlying machinery, whose working, like Uncle Brochvael's Boethian water clock, had always been going on under the surface but had hitherto been decently, elegantly, and discreetly covered up.

"Soul of Creiddylad," he groaned in his heart, still seeing, though more dimly than before, those eyes under the green water, "don't let me die talking. Let me die in silence!"

But there came over him now a curious sense of something monstrously grotesque in the way he was plodding — left leg, right leg, left leg, right leg, left leg, right leg — behind this death-stricken creature who couldn't stop talking.

He quickened his pace a little so that he could catch a glimpse of his father’s face. How horribly, how sickeningly white it was! “It’s as if a living skin has been stripped off,” he thought, “and some horrible underskin, like a foul scab or scum or film of corruption, has risen to the surface drawn by the approaching shadow of death. And what will happen now between him and Mother? Will the shock of finding her here bring him to his senses? Will he blurt out the truth before he dies that they’ve grown to hate each other?”

A wave of childish anger against both these creators of his life rolled over him, accompanied by an impious regret that they hadn’t gone off happily together like the parents of Gunta.

“And what about me?” he thought, comparing himself with the little Magog, whose parents would always dote upon him as they did upon each other. “What about me if they can’t restrain themselves from some outburst of pent-up fury?”

Thus did Porius commune with himself as they approached the spot where his mother was awaiting them. But the kindest of the immortals, the great goddess Chance, behaved as is so often her wont and rattled the dice to a completely unexpected upshot; for Einion ap Iddawc either was or was pretending to be drowned in fathom-deep sleep when they reached their companions.

And this enabled his newly appointed court physician to win a hushed and awed respect for himself by an elaborate handling of the ram’s horn and a decisive announcement that the prince still breathed.

It was then that some curious fatality at this dramatic moment in the history of the House of Cunedda placed it in the power of old Afagddu to become the mouthpiece of their recent triumph.

Driven to speak by an accumulated remorse that had by this time assumed ungovernable proportions, Afagddu snatched the opportunity offered by this particular audience to give them a lively description of the rout of Colgrim by the emperor, of the outstanding gallantry of Porius Manlius, and of the way in which the old man had seemed unable to think of anything as they carried him back into the Gaer but where he wished to be buried and what he wanted written on his tombstone.

Watching his mother's face as she knelt down and bowed her head in prayer, while her fingers clasped and unclasped themselves without touching the prostrate form beneath them, Porius experienced the feeling of being so far away from both these persons — from the conscious one equally with the unconscious one — that he found himself wondering, and not for the first time, whether he oughtn't to be horrified by his inhumanity and regard himself as some sort of monster.

He fervently wished Afagddu would cease his penitential discourse and brush away the cloud of midges that hovered over the dying prince making the rich October sunshine seem still more heavy and sultry. He couldn't help recalling, now that the wind had dropped, that sultry October day in his boyhood, when, near the place that was still named "Helen's Causeway," he had picked up and presented to his grandfather, who was delighted to possess it, the Roman flask, dropped years before by some careless legionary from Uriconium, and which, during the desperate and tragic confusion of these last few days, he had, rather ridiculously perhaps but with a genuine instinct of piety, dragged about with him wherever he went.

How vividly he could see that flask at this moment, and how palpably he could feel it, just as if he held it in his hand! And how odd and weird was this whole business of the unreal reality of the thoughts in a person's mind! He remembered Brother John explaining to him once how Plato in his Timaeus holds that there is an image of the universe in the mind of God which serves as the pattern and model of all perfection. If such were God's "thoughts," they were certainly very different from his!

Suddenly into his own fantastic and morbid mind the unpleasant idea entered: "What if to certain avidly greedy insects certain thoughts in certain minds possessed the same sort of attractive taste as this shining heap of excrement? Why shouldn't certain thoughts, which could be as vivid and palpable as mine of that Uriconian flask, possess enough of the substance of matter to be actually nibbled at by greedy flies?"

And Porius suddenly began to see his own thoughts and those of the whole group gathered round the wounded prince as offering to these bronze-coloured dung flies an entertainment richer than the ordure of kings. And into the morbid circle of this weird fancy he went so far as to drag certain small, feeble, end-of-the-season brown moths, who with a weak lurching movement were fumbling round about that same clump of white moss that had already proved a leaping-off place to his own ideas, and he allowed his imagination to dally with the conceited notion that while the bronze-coloured dung flies and the bluebottle blowflies were nibbling at the ordinary human thoughts of his father and his mother, his own more philosophical thoughts and his uncle Brochvael's more literary thoughts were proving a temptation to these languid brown moths.

There is no doubt, however, that had the servant of the late druid, who was soon to be established in Ty Cerrig, used all the thought-reading power he possessed he would have been in a position to show that, instead of Euronwy's and Einion's thoughts being fit food for lively dung flies while the uncle's and the nephew's were worthy of languid moths, it was, in the judgment of higher beings, just the other way round.

Both Porius and Brochvael were at that moment projecting thought clouds into the autumnal sunshine by no means marked by any superiority over those of the wounded man or his wife. Porius's moral advantage over his mother was just then, as if Chance were determined to put him to shame, associated with one of her bare ankles, clearly visible now as she knelt, from which the sandal strap had slipped.

This ankle happened to be both slightly swollen and slightly reddened, and without any remotely rational justification Porius both grossly and morbidly linked it with her seduction by Medrawd. Brochvael too was dallying with an ignoble thought; for he who had let the Ostrogoths of Ravenna drag out every one of his teeth rather than betray a literary colleague indulged himself now in a self-satisfied, secret, animal satisfaction that while his courtly, lucky, amorous, witty brother had got his death blow, he, the awkward eccentric one, whom women regarded as a fastidious fool and men as a coward, had a good chance to look forward, now that the emperor had defeated Colgrim, and now that Morfydd ruled in the Gaer, to some heavenly years of translating Aristophanes into the purest Brython, with careful sprinklings of this new colloquial Cymraeg, while his Platonic emotion, as his young Roman friend Boethius used to call it, would be more than satisfied by the companionship of his new friend.

On the other hand, the kneeling Euronwy — whatever may have been the cause of her swollen and reddened ankle — was with closed eyes and clasped hands throwing herself upon the mercy of the living God in whom she felt convinced she "lived and moved and had her being" and imploring him to make her his own.

As for the dying Einion, had Drom turned his attention to his thoughts, he would have been found vaguely and obscurely but quite unmistakably to be given up to a struggle to shake off his allegiance to Time and Space preparatory to entering some completely unguessed at dimension of life outside them both.

Thus would the occult perception of the servant Drom in that sun-misted forest clearing have detected, whether the flying things about the excrement or the flying things about the clump of moss responded to them or not, that among the four thought clouds projected into the air, those of Euronwy and Einion were inherently philosophical while those of Porius and Brochvael were inherently unphilosophical; a contrast which, could it have been brought to the attention of the uncle and nephew, would have astonished them not a little.

A great many events were happening at that moment within that oddly assorted group, as they watched Lot-el-Azziz put his ram’s hom to a series of surprising medical uses, and while some of these events were, as we have hinted, purely mental, and, if noted at all, noted only by beings considerably below or considerably above the level of human intelligence, there were others that clearly belonged, at least in large part, to the visible world.

The most striking of these latter was the sudden appearance upon the scene of a completely new figure, that of a formidable-looking young man in the garb of a priest, whose arrival had an instantaneous effect.

The Lady of the Gaer rose to her feet. Brochvael moved a step nearer to Drom, while Porius and Rhun instinctively drew together. This new personage had evidently been sent for by Afagddu, for the remorseful old man broke off at once his confused account of the recent battle beneath the walls of the Gaer, hurried to meet him, saluted him with profound respect, went so far as to propel him with superstitious haste and veneration, as if his touch might work a miracle, towards the prostrate prince, and proceeded to watch with open-mouthed awe while the newcomer uttered a few authoritative words to Euronwy and in undisguised disregard of Porius and ostentatious disregard of Lot-el-Azziz began murmuring a series of Latin sentences over the closed eyelids of the man on the ground.

Not altogether to Porius's surprise, he found himself recognizing this formidable young priest as the silent youth whose inauspicious name, hovering in the recesses of his consciousness, he had so obstinately, so viciously, so maliciously, and, above all, so successfully refused to let himself recall.

Now that he again saw the fellow before his eyes, instead of finding it harder to forget his name, he found it much easier. In fact he came extremely near to really forgetting it! But aye! How clearly, how horribly clearly, he recalled the young man's face and the way he had looked at him last Thursday night, the night Einion had broken his sword and had made towards Medrawd that particular gesture which seemed so like the traditional gesture of homage!

And it came over him now — and he could see in his foster-brother's confused and troubled expression that this feeling was shared — how absolutely unknown to one another, in any group of friends and relatives and companions, however intimately bound together, the really dominant intensities of thought and feeling are.

He noticed that his uncle, with the courtesy of a traveller and of one who has lived in the classic cities, had beckoned to the Jewish doctor to join himself and Drom in some grave philosophical discussion concerning the living value of such rites for the dead as were practised by modern Christians and ancient Greeks.

Now since the tender-hearted Gunta had already moved up close to Gwythyr, who was clearly so afraid of getting into trouble over his hasty disposal of Brother John's corpse as to be unable just then to think of anything but what this masterful young priest might do next, and since

Euronwy seemed to have given up her whole soul into this man's keeping, Porius had a moment to himself in which to collect his thoughts and to try to realize — giving the fellow's name to the devil — just what it was he felt about him.

It was certainly a surprising thing for the grandson of Iddawc the Apostate to have to confess, but he soon acknowledged frankly to himself that there was a mental atmosphere about this mysterious young man that filled him with a curious fear as well as with an instinctive loathing.

If he had been forced to reveal in ordinary human language what he felt, it is possible that the very fantasy of it would have broken the spell, and he would have seen the mood as the crazy superstition it probably was.

But superstition or not, since at this moment he could only glance from Rhun's well-known features to the priest's strange ones, he could put nothing of what he felt into words. Though the man was muttering his psalms to himself and was keeping his head bent, he was so near that any reference to him made in their talk would almost certainly reach his ears.

As Porius exchanged glances with Rhun, who seemed too tired and worried to be embarrassed or self-conscious, he decided he must have another long and intimate talk with him and challenge him frankly about Morfydd. He felt as his glance hovered over those familiar features that were so like his own that it was extraordinarily unfair that he and Rhun should be able to exchange their thoughts and feelings so completely about Mithras and Myrddin Wyllt and their own mission to Byzantium, and yet that he might die without knowing whether they had, or had not, possessed the same woman!

And then his thoughts took another turn and a more curious one still. "If this is the end of him" — and he glanced at the figure lying as motionless under the murmurings and motions of the priest as if it were already a corpse— “and I keep you” — and his eyes returned to his foster-brother— “from going off with that Greek, and we live together as before, why shan’t I shrink from Morfydd because of you as I do from Mother because of Medrawd? Do adulterous mothers hurt us so much worse then than adulterous wives? No, it’s impossible! It can’t be. But that’s how I feel!”

But he now became aware that old Rhun had given him a heavy, sluggish, friendly, and most natural nod, as much as to say: “The young fellow over there acts as if he were the Pope himself. But it’s no use making a fuss. Soldiers of Mithras can put up with worse silliness than this!”

Porius met his nod with a smile. It was clear to him that his foster-brother was too worried over his own affairs to realize that this was the first word they’d exchanged since the night before the Feast of the Sowing.

What was not clear to him, and indeed what would have been a startling revelation to him if Rhun had blurted it out, was that Gwendydd had already confessed she had agreed to marry Dion Dionides and at the same time had assuaged Rhun’s outraged pride by a long and intimate account of her early life as Myrddin’s half-sister. She admitted that their mother would never reveal to her the secret of the prophet’s paternity. She made a frank acknowledgment of her own humble birth.

“I am not worthy,” she told him, “of marrying a son of Alarch the Fair and a grandson of Iddawc ab Edeyrn; but if I marry this elderly sea captain” — thus, it seemed to Rhun, he had forced her to let him tear out the truth by its roots from her reluctant heart— “if I marry this clever merchant, and if, in the absence of Porius, for it is clear that Arthur will never let him go while the Saeson keep landing on these coasts, you, my sweet friend, consent to let us take you in place of him to the feet of Anastasius, we shall find, I doubt not, many heaven-sent opportunities to talk of the Mysteries of Mithras.”

Now the truth was that Rhun's deep gravity and troubled silence under this provocative suggestion had puzzled the ambitious court lady, who saw herself reaching heights on the Bosporus she could never have attained on the Usk as completely as his absentminded camaraderie at this moment puzzled his foster-brother.

But Porius was puzzled by other things than "old Rhun's" ponderous and weary familiarity. He had begun to be aware of something grotesque, indeed of something almost comical, in the manner in which they were all standing in that unholy circle round their dying prince. The impious vision darted through his brain of his mocking begetter suddenly leaping from the ground, tossing the priest head over tail, lifting the lady to her feet, and indicating that he'd been playing a trick upon the whole lot of them.

But the eyes of the ruler of Edeyrnion remained closed. No one knew then, no one knew later, no one ever knew, whether while that sonorous Latin was murmured over him he was conscious or unconscious. Porius experienced a shiver of unexpected loneliness as his glance wandered from this haughty hard-faced young priest chanting his psalms to the excited doctor scratching with his ram's horn the ticklish spot on the top of his elongated skull where the hair was twisted.

"Is the fellow," he thought, as he noted the glazed stare on the man's face, "wondering how soon Magog's mother will let him circumcize that imp of Bashan?"

Nor did his mood of irritable reaction against the characteristic gestures of each one of these people at this crucial moment stop there.

"Why do they all," he thought, "from Mother to old Afagddu make me feel so savage? Is it because at the sight of him sinking into the dark their natural human self-assertion grows furtive, secretive, and pitifully indirect? O Creiddylad! O Creiddylad! But could I have gone on with her, even had I managed to kill the old cawr? Could I have kept her hidden in a cave up there for the rest of my life? Perdition! I doubt it — I greatly doubt it! But it must be the other one in my blood that makes me so sick of them all and so longing to have her back!"

He turned to Rhun; but his foster-brother, having given him that one familiar nod, as if they were still boys, had retreated into as thick a cloud of his own private concerns as that which had already closed in upon Lot-el-Azziz.

"O Creiddylad!" he groaned, and there came upon him not exactly a desolate sense, but a grim sense of loneliness. He felt as if he were swimming round and round the solemn figureheads of a flotilla of ships stranded on a hidden reef; and it was with a sense of humorous relief that he suddenly noticed that his uncle was deriving some queer kind of mystic-erotic satisfaction from keeping the handle of his Gallic staff, as he held it loosely by its ferrule end, in contact with the desirable person of Drom, who himself, judging from the faint smile on his lips, was not wholly unresponsive.

But what with the immobility of the prince, the agitated piety of the lady, the rigid ceremoniousness of the priest, the self-absorbed trances of Rhun and the doctor, it was a comfort to Porius, in his present Cewri mood, to be confronted — even though manifested through a philosopher's staff — with some sign that the living sap of the world hadn't altogether dried up.

Then quite suddenly and, as it seemed, beyond all human volition, the long drawn-out dramatic tension, stretched to the breaking point at that parting of the ways, cracked clean across. What actually happened to break the spell was simple enough. There came from the prostrate man the unmistakable sound of breaking wind, followed immediately afterwards by a querulously pitiful appeal in plain unashamed words such as a child might make to its mother. But the effect was startling. It was as if before a host of worshippers a sacrosanct but entirely new altar had been heaved up from the seaweed-strewn and shell-strewn windrow where it had been erected in all innocence on the sleeping head of a huge scaly antediluvian monster who was now, after many centuries, beginning to reawake.

The tension that had been holding them all relaxed at once. The Lady of the Gaer swayed like a great white doe that has heard the hounds. Porius never forgot the series of spasmodic movements, more like those of a startled vestal than of a Venedotian princess, with which she addressed herself to the priest.

She had grown so stiff from her long kneeling that the priest was impelled to take her by the arm and support her, while in passionate whispers she began to supplicate something from him which — so it seemed to her son — the man was not at all reluctant to grant.

The doctor and old Afagddu were now flinging themselves down by the side of the dying prince, and Porius was already beginning to protest against further applications of the ram's horn when he felt himself twitched by the sleeve. With an angry gesture he straightened his back and swung round, only to find himself, to his horrified astonishment, confronted by Neb ap Digon. The expression of the small creature's face had lost at that moment all its self-confident shrewdness. The boy's features were pinched, and the skin was, or gave the impression of being, drawn as tightly over the small bones as if the soul beneath the flesh had endured months rather than a couple of hours of harrowing agitation and anxiety.

Sinking down on one knee, Porius pulled Neb towards him with one hand, while with the other he fumbled awkwardly between Einion and the doctor, till, touching the latter's ram's horn, his fingers closed over it.

"What's happened?" he whispered. "Tell me quick, Neb, only very quietly, for Jesus' sake!"

The little page began whispering rapidly, though he had to stop at intervals, to recapture his breath.

"She got out of him," he whispered, "all about that stone on the top of yr Wyddfa under which he's going to disappear! He called it his Road to Annwn. I said that word over and over, so as to be sure of it. And that's what it was — the Road to Annwn. She's never been able to get that out of him before; and I could see it put the devil's own candlelight into her head. And since the moment he told her, the same sort of light has gone out in him. He looks like a corpse moving about among living people. You know, Prince Porius, he's often talked to me about the stone that hides the Road to Annwn. But he's never told me where it was.

"But now, when once he's gone down that hole, however long he may have been down there, she'll know where to find him when she wants to be loved, and she'll do just what I've always known she had in her mind to do; she'll fasten the stone down so that no one but she can lift it. And then she'll have him really to herself. She'll go to him whenever she wants his love; and she alone in all the whole world will know where he is, and he'll never be able to come out. You know, Porius ab Einion, what at the bottom of my mind I've always dreaded? That in the end, in spite of all his tricks, she'd be too much for him! And I tell you it looks as if the end was beginning now."

He stared pitifully at Porius, who, though he was aware that Lot-el-Azziz was giving violent tugs at his ram's horn and was making increasingly vigorous protests, remained outwardly unmoved. But his soul was torn within him. Never had the peculiar and special pain with which the gods have afflicted us by giving us freedom of will seized upon him more savagely.

He felt as if to leave this spot while his father remained alive would be a culminating act of irresponsible impiety. And yet to send Neb back whence he had come — wouldn't that be to betray the counsellor, to desert Neb, and to let this vampire of a Ffichti witch suck the blood of the greatest magician in the world?

"Curse this free will!" he cried in his heart. "Curse it! Curse it!" And he remembered how he had once listened, like a great hulking cawr, dumb and silent, while Brochvael tried to explain to Morfydd how much the characters in Homer suffered when their minds were "divided in opposite directions" and how gladly they accepted the will of the gods; just as the gods — even Zeus himself, father of gods and men — gladly accepted the will of destiny.

"There's no pain," Brochvael had declared on that occasion, "worse than the pain of free will." And thinking of that saying now Porius was tempted to echo it, tempted so strongly to echo it, that he let go the ram's horn, and swinging clean round towards Neb, took upon himself the shape of a humped jug with wide-extended handles, and sticking out his elbows awkwardly to right and left and keeping his face so lowered over Neb's face that there was no possibility of anybody else hearing his words, he groaned out in a harsh, husky, emphatic whisper that he couldn't possibly come until the prince was either better or dead.

Neb's distress at hearing this was so extreme that Porius couldn't help murmuring aloud to the small boy portions of the metaphysical dialogue that was going on in his own painfully divided soul.

"Don't curse me, child," he whispered. "Don't you hear the prince? He's muttering his death mutter. I tell you I know that sound. It's the death voice.

I heard it yesterday before Brother John died. After all, he's my father. And she here too. And that vulture of a priest waiting to arrange everything! Please understand how it is, little one. And go back to him quick now, child, and do what you can.

"I don't think Gwendydd will be able to get round the Lord Rhun. Oh, you needn't tell me my fate's mixed with the fate of Myrddin Wyllt. I know well of myself it is! I've known it longer than you have, my little son! And you needn't tell me I'm risking the life of a man who is like a god; for that too I know of myself, Neb ap Digon.

"And you needn't tell me that in this world we have to let the dead bury their dead, and to follow Nature and leave our parents to the parents of us all — to the earth and the sky! I know all this, Neb, my child, as well as I know how you'd give your life for your great master. But there come moments, child—"

But with his face so close to the page's face, as he bent there above him with his hands pressed against his knees, he saw such anxiety and concern in Neb's expression that, bending lower still, he instinctively took the page's small face between the palms of his two hands and held that small skull as if his words were wine that he was pouring from a larger vessel into a smaller one.

"There come moments, child," he went on, "when we simply don't know whether the part of our 'divided mind' that we've had to follow is the part of good or evil, of strength or weakness, of courage or cowardice, of wisdom or folly. All we know, my little one, is that it's the part of fate. So go, my dear friend, go quick for the sake of all we hold—"

But he was interrupted by the projection into their crucial moment of a small thin arm, an arm which terminated in a warm and competent hand which proceeded, resolutely and calmly, to detach Porius's fingers from the boy's face.

"Yes! You'd better go back, Neb," cried the little girl. "But I swear to you on my dying oath that when Porius ab Einion's ready to come, I'll come with him."

She drew her arm away and with both her hands began rocking her doll.

Neb straightened his thin shoulders and with the knuckles of his left hand and the wrist of his right hand rubbed his forehead and his eyes.

"It... wouldn't... do... " he murmured hesitatingly, addressing himself to Porius, "for her... to come... with me?"

Once again the pain of free will caught Porius by his most sensitive nerve and shook him where he stood. Once more his soul became like one of those Homeric souls that between one choice and another are torn in two. But it was the little girl herself who answered firmly:

"No, Neb, I should only be in the way. But when they've decided what they're going to do, and when the master is left alone again with you, I'll be of use to you then; but just now I'd only be a drag, and she" — here she bent her head over the doll and smoothed the hair, above its staring eyes— "doesn't want me to go. She's from Germania like my dad. She loves the Gwyddylaid but hates the Ffichtiaid and they hate her. She thinks Mistress Nineue would sprinkle her with berry water and turn her skin black, like the Ffichtiaid did in old times to every baban-y-gawr they found by itself."

Neb looked at Gunta with a puzzled, grave, speculative, but only faintly reproachful look, a look that said: "Why do clever girls who know so much and understand these difficult modern times go on still with this business of dolls?"

Then with a shrug of his shoulders worthy of the halls of Caerleon he turned to Porius.

"If by ill chance, my Lord, I were to lose touch with you or you with me, before night falls, will you appoint a place of meeting?"

Porius felt a pang of shame that he hadn't envisaged the confused misery of night descending on the most important of all his unfulfilled projects, the rescue of the emperor's counsellor from that woman; and that he had left it to this child to suggest the comfort of possessing an alternative plan in case the worst came to the worst.

"I'm a fool at these precautions," he whispered, loud and hoarse, "but let's say Brother John's cell; for that's where, unless things go differently from the way they're going now, I seem likely to spend this damned end to a damned day!"

Both Gunta and Neb looked at each other significantly enough; for in place of whispering these last words he had uttered them so loud that the eyes of all the company, including the Lady of the Gaer and the priest and Lot-el-Azziz, were drawn to the three of them.

Gunta gave Neb a little push with her left hand; and with a second courtier-like shrug of his shoulders he scampered off, the slender figure, with the sun haze upon its green-and-yellow livery, looking like a fledgeling greenfinch that a magician had just turned into the last dragonfly of the year.

Gunta watched this dragonfly as it vanished with so much concentrated attention that if her doll had been a real baban-y-gawr it would probably have slipped to the ground. Then she ran off to continue her imperceptible and unofficial attendance upon Euronwy.

Porius made an ogrish grimace. "Why can't I," he thought, "shrug my shoulders like Neb, and, while I keep my wits about me, let the world drift as it will, turn as it may, and end as it must? I have obeyed my mother. I have honoured my father. I have lost my teacher. I have married my playmate. I have killed my love. And now I have most likely left to the mercy of that succubus, that vampire, that she-devil, the only true prophet there's been on this planet since Tiresias! If Christ is God, why has he a devil for his priest? If Mithras is God, why has he old Rhun for his priest? It's fate. That's what it is. Not God, not Christ, not Mithras — simply fate — and I am the fool of fate!"

CHAPTER XXVII. The Homage of Drom

IT WAS ONE OF THE MOST unpleasant moments in Porius's life when he turned his back on the departing Neb and called upon all the magnetic energy he possessed to meet face to face at these crossroads the man who despised him and the woman he despised.

Well! He was once more under the old bondage, the bondage that had come to fit his powerful frame more easily than the lightest yoke that Gwrgi could have invented for his ox, but still a bondage that would have branded with humiliation a prouder man.

But strangely enough his sudden decision to relax on the giant curves of fate's current, rather than to use the power of his will to swim against the tide, had given him a completely unexpected inrush of nervous energy.

Even if he was fate's fool there was nothing to prevent him enjoying fate, nothing to prevent him "cavoseniargizing" fate. "Tungerong larry ong!" as the Cewri would say.

Meanwhile the prince had followed up his pitiful cry with a ghastly series of gasped-out incoherences of which Porius could make nothing. But it soon appeared that it was not from his son that the prince was seeking understanding.

Urged by some far-off vaguely remembered impulse the dying man's eyes sought out and fixed themselves upon his brother; and Brochvael, realizing this, moved close up to him, and crouching low down at his side began not only listening to him but actually answering him.

It was then that Porius, unwilling as he was to assume any masterful role in what was going on, couldn't resist stepping forward and laying a hand on the shoulder of Lot-el-Azziz, who having got possession of his ram's horn was beginning to loosen the prince's vest.

"No! No! No! No!" Porius protested. "If this is the end you mustn't torment him any more with that thing!"

Meanwhile, though she still clung to the priest with one of her beautifully moulded and gleaming white arms, Euronwy leaned forward as if she wanted to lose no syllable of this incoherent colloquy of the two brothers.

"She'd like to throw herself between them!" thought Porius.

But she was now addressing a rapid and passionate appeal to the young priest; and Porius, who was not only holding back the doctor but was also listening to the murmured rush of boyish memories that was reuniting the brothers, divined correctly — for, except for this affair with Medrawd, yes, always except for Medrawd, he knew her pretty well — that she was straining and stretching every fibre of her nature, in a sort of psychophysical dive, to force her way into those fraternal secrets that so tantalized her, even while she was pleading, passionately, persistently, and rapidly, though in a very low voice, with the representative of her god.

Nor did her son miss — though in the process of listening to his father he couldn't catch every word — the general drift of her appeal, which was indeed simple enough, though it concerned one of the most dangerous and controversial points possible at that moment, that is to say, whether, in the case of Einion's hurt proving fatal, he should be buried with his fathers in the centre of the Gaer, or by himself, but with a place at his side left for her, in the choir of the newly erected church. To overhear his mother making this particular appeal at this particular moment brought back all his anger against her.

As he well knew, it had for long been the idea of Minnawc Gorsant to add a tribal consecration to his precious new building by burying there the remains of at least one of the Princes of Edeyrnion.

Well enough did Porius know that he over there, who was now murmuring his childish memories to his childhood's companion, would have laughed at his grave son's grave prejudices and given this lonely woman, so neglected in his life, all the pleasure she could get out of the disposal of his bones.

But it was all very well for him. He hadn't caught the gleam of triumph in the eyes of Gorsant's successor. He hadn't heard the whispered syllables of unctuous affirmation from those pontifical lips.

And then the idea entered Porius's head, and it brought him a respite from anger and a sense of extraordinary relief, though he knew it was a cowardly idea if not a base one, that he might strike a bargain with this devil of a priest, and let him bury Einion's remains where he pleased, as long as he consented to leave Brother John's wasted carcase unmolested.

But the atmosphere among them all had changed greatly. The unaccountable relaxation that had followed their unnatural tension had separated them once more into pairs. Quite freely and calmly they were waiting for something to happen. If this "something" were not to be the death of their prince, it could hardly help being something equally momentous.

Was the man going to rise up even now, burst into a sardonic laugh, and declare the whole thing a joke? The eldest son of Iddawc the Apostate was not incapable of such a proceeding.

At any rate the Lady of the Gaer had given up the attempt to catch her lord's last words; and Lot-el-Azziz, the trumpeting horses of his Hebraic soul once more harnessed to their fiery chariot, had been whirled away from all these moist sub-mergings and shadowy obscurings of twilight suns in dying leaves, and was once more glorying in having sown the seed of Abraham in a Canaanitish womb so that Gog might be followed by Magog, and the Lord justified of his servant in the land of idolatry!

A sideways glance at Rhun's profile was quite sufficient to make it clear to Porius that that simple soldier of the sun god was as absorbed in the emotion out of which children are born as was the Jewish doctor in the emotion into which their birth flings us.

"Has that woman broken with her Greek? Has she decided to cast in her lot with old Rhun? How strange," he thought, "that I can caress with my eyes this rugged profile, so like my own, and yet not be able to catch a single one of the thoughts that are even now racing through that corrugated head!"

This gulf between what was going on in his own mind and what was going on in his foster-brother's mind struck him at that moment with double force because of the curious pleasure those two old heads, each of them so nearly touching the ground, were obviously deriving from their memories of childhood.

Rhun and he, he thought, had never understood each other as the owners of those elderly skulls had done. No, for all their nurture at the same breast they didn't possess those mutual animal memories, shamelessly gross and scandalously intimate, such as, from what he could overhear, these two sons of Princess Indeg shared.

Brochvael was now hunched up like a great human toad, as he crouched on the ground beside the prince, with his beardless chin and toothless mouth only a few inches above the other's beard. Whatever it was they were whispering they were as completely oblivious of him as he bent over them as they were oblivious of the doctor and the priest and the lady. Names, places, events, occasions, passed like bubbles between them, forming and reforming on the tide of their memories. Encounters with men, with ghosts, with snakes, with wolves, with sorcerers, with madmen, with King Eliseg of the Rocks, with Prince Uryen of Rheged, all these came rising up from the dark waters of oblivion, came gathering into form and shape from the shelves and shoals and sand-locked estuaries of more than half a century of forgetfulness.

Derelict toys, lost weapons, forgotten games, images of blood and phlegm, of horns and hobbyhorses, of bottomless ponds and haunted pools, of hollow trees and secret chambers, were recalled in gasps and hinted at in groans, while their days together became something sacred and miraculous and supernatural, something lived in a light that had been lost from the common earth.

It had been, of course, Einion's son told himself, the personality of Princess Indeg, following her old Berber custom in defiance of the Brythonic tradition, that had procured for Einion and Brochvael all these mutual memories.

And gradually, as his gaze followed a little swarm of autumnal gnats that rose and fell on a faint breath of air that was too imperceptible to be of service to anything heavier than a fleet of midges, he felt aware of a power within him capable of actually enjoying — as if he had swallowed the nepenthe that Helen of Troy put into the wine of Telemachus — this spectacle of the death of his father and the treacherous piety of his mother; yes, of a power within him that could enjoy not only the bodily presence of all these people but also the distracting pressure of their thoughts, such as he imagined them to be.

He suddenly got the feeling that he possessed, or that his soul possessed, the head of a huge Avanc, out of whose mouth projected a forked tongue, a tongue that licked with a sort of ecstasy the spiritual shapes of these various thoughts!

All the thoughts in this forest clearing were in the same dimension of Space; and they were all directed towards the same division of Time, namely, the past; all, that is to say, except the thoughts of the priest, of the little girl, and of the little girl's doll.

The priest looked frantically and furiously forward — at least that is how Porius took his measure — to the world being under the domination of Christ for the rest of its interstellar existence.

Little Gunta looked forward to her future with Neb ap Digon and told herself clear-cut, minutely detailed stories about their life together; sometimes in the palace on the river Usk, sometimes in the palace on the river Camel, sometimes in the camp at Badon, sometimes in the imperial hunting lodge at Caergwynt. Her doll also, with that dim, vague, blurred, vicarious, secondary consciousness of a soul embodied in an intensely loved but inanimate companion, looked forward to encountering, in one or other of these palaces, the legendary doll of dolls, the princely Morddwyd Tyllyon!

But all the other human thoughts that Porius imagined to be mounting up past his flickering saurian tongue were slaves to the past. Euronwy, for all her eager talk with the priest about Einion's burial, was contentedly letting her mind sink back and away to her first love affair with Medrawd in the empress's garden house.

Young Gwythyr kept caressing in his mind the breasts of Nesta ferch Aulus and even reproducing the awed and thrilled and reverential wonder with which he felt those breasts respond to his touch.

Lot-el-Azziz was naturally recalling every single momentous second, so glorious for him, so painful for her, that followed each other in Brother

John's cell during Magog's birth. As for Drom, who like the rest of the company, had no thought for anything but the past, what he thought of was a particular day in the service of the last druid of Edeyrnion when, as he heard Minnawc Gorsant describing Saint Paul's conversion, he actually felt a delicious shock of uncovenanted reality; nothing less than the soul of the Lord entering into him and dwelling within him, the very soul of the Lord Jesus, so that from henceforth he never felt sure whether the thoughts and deeds that proceeded from him were his own or the Lord's.

Although neither the mysterious, formidableness of the beautiful young man who called himself Drom, a word that in the Brythonic tongue signifies "glimpse," nor the secret of this young man's influence over Brochvael, were at all clear to Porius, he felt sorry for him at this particular juncture; for he fancied he caught in his eye the expression of that peculiar kind of pang such as afflicts small dogs when their master caresses another and a much larger dog.

Thus with a view to consoling the deserted Drom and also of leaving the two brothers undisturbed in their exchange of childish memories, Porius tossed away his drowsy fantasy of being a forked-tongued monster, and turning to Drom enquired of him, in as low and penetrating a voice as he could command, what the word was in the language of the Cewri for "struggling to the last."

"There is such a word," he declared to Drom, who moved at once towards him and gave him his full attention, "and it is a word of only one syllable; but at the moment it has escaped me. I heard it from your half-brother — at least I think so — but that's of no consequence. It doesn't matter where I heard it, does it? The important thing is to get hold of it again. It's like one of those flying fish we read of, that jump upon the deck of a ship, radiate for a second the colours of the rainbow, and then, leaving behind like a small comet a trail of fiery vapour, jump overboard again and vanish from sight. But I'm sure it's a word of only one syllable, and I'm sure it has a very complicated though a very imaginative meaning. I think it means to enjoy fighting, and to be fond too of what you're fighting for, or of what you're fighting against. But about that point I'm a little vague.

"At any rate it means enjoying life to the end or at least fighting to enjoy life to the end. In fact what I liked about the word, Master Drom — I don't know whether you've talked to my uncle about it — is that it seemed to declare in one breath that you were glad to have lived and that you'd struggle to the last to feel you were glad, in fact fight to the last to feel it; to feel, I mean, that weak as you might be, that defeated as you might be, that humiliated as you might be, that feeble and ridiculous as you might be, and as much like a wounded insect as you might be, you still refused to curse life."

The odd thing about Drom's expression as he listened respectfully to all this was its gentle pity. Porius received the impression that this ex-servant of the secret druid felt towards him, towards the man who would soon — if Einion died — be their prince, and who undoubtedly was — though he had never been specially proud of it — the Samson or Hercules of their race, a profound and sorrowful pity.

It would be untrue to say that this expression in Drom's face didn't disturb Porius. It didn't disturb him very much, but it did disturb him a little; for there was something about Drom that made it impossible to discount any emotion he might display. Why did Drom pity him, and why did this particular request of his bring this pity to a head?

"I seem to recall," Porius went on, "that the word your brother tried to repeat to me — but of course he may not have got it right — had a sound not altogether unlike the quacking of ducks."

The habitual expression of the ex-servant of the dead druid was full of such benignity and amiability that the fact that he never smiled was rarely noticeable. But when Porius saw that this casual reference to the quacking of ducks hadn't drawn from him the faintest smile, he began to feel a little more disturbed.

"I think the word you mean must be 'gwork,'" said Drom quietly. "Yes, I'm sure that's what my brother told you; and it does mean fighting and struggling and not yielding. Yes, and it is a word a person might use who felt that, though life had been cruel to him, he wouldn't curse it, but for a secret reason would force himself to praise it. Yes, it is that kind of word."

"Why don't you like the word yourself then, Master Drom?" enquired Porius, who couldn't help noticing that across those calm and comely features as the man uttered that single queer syllable there had passed a sort of shiver, like a winged insect ruffling a placid pool.

"Gwork... Gwork... Gwork... Gwork!" repeated Porius in a humorously harsh whisper, as if he were teasing both himself and the disquieted Drom. "But no! I'll tell you exactly what I feel 'gwork' means, as sure as if I were one of the Cewri of the Cader myself! It means using the soul in us to fight and enjoy the universe at the same time.

"And to achieve this trick we've got to feel the soul in us as if it were in some sort of way independent of the body, although not necessarily, you understand me, capable of surviving the death of the body. We've got to feel it as if it were an unconquerable generator of energy within us, as if it were a self-quickening pulse of power and force, like a bodiless living creature, a creature of an airy rather than of a fluid or fiery essence, but a creature we can feel — if you understand me, Master Drom — in our two hands, our two legs, our sex organs and all our senses; and yet — if you understand me, Master Drom—"

But here Porius stopped, for he suddenly realized that he had been talking too fast about his sense of his own soul, and he began to feel as if his soul and his body were quite loosely connected, and as if he, the strong man of their tribe and likely enough soon to be their ruler, had touched as he hung about in his heavy, hulking way for the death of his father, some magic stone or stump or root or fallen thunderbolt, that had worked this loosening!

Was it a certain placidity about the countenance of the man he was addressing that made him irritable and self-depreciating, that made him feel as if his enormous strength — the strength he had never fully put forth — was irrelevant compared with any contest of men's souls, compared with such a contest for instance as he could easily imagine happening between the self-possessed Drom and that imperious young priest over there now playing the stern Christ with Euronwy?

He let his gaze move slowly round the circle of these faces. The wind seemed to have dropped, and the warm, golden mist, for the sun's rays were now nearly horizontal, seemed to be assisting the voice of the priest in throwing a drowsy spell over them all.

"Why is it, Master Drom," he enquired in a voice that was louder than was quite appropriate to the occasion, "that you don't like the word 'gwork?' I could see you didn't, you know, and I could see another thing too!"

Drom's eyes shone with benevolent interest.

"What could you see?" he enquired.

"I could see," replied Porius, "that you had more reasons than one for your dislike of my interpretation of the word."

Not a flicker of annoyance or indignation crossed the placid features opposite him.

“Go on, Master Drom,” he cried, “and tell me just exactly where I went wrong.”

But Drom astonished him by what he did then; though indeed if the whole group of them, if the two sons of Indeg with their memories, if the doctor with his ram’s horn, if Gwythyr with his worship of the daughter of Aulus, if Gunta and her doll, if the Gaer Lady and her priest, had followed his example it would have seemed almost natural, so deeply as a group did they appear to have lapsed, whatever their physical position, into a sort of weird unanimity.

Drom, the son of Twryf Mawr, or “the great tumultuous one,” shut his eyes tight and kept them so all the time he was speaking.

“‘Gwork,’” said Drom, “does mean what you say, but in these matters, for we are all weak, we must listen to the splash of the stone, to the whirr of the arrow, to the rustle of the wind, to the flapping of the flame, as these sounds gradually die away, and we must think of them as more than stone, or arrow, or wind, or flame. And this ‘more’” — here the man’s words became so low that Porius had to move forward a step or two to catch them — “this ‘more’ is what goes against the grain with me. For there is a defiance of God in this ‘more’ and in the word which expresses it, a lack of submission to the Will of God, a determination to enjoy yourself at all costs, whereas—”

But the man who had been converted on the road to the Gaer seemed unwilling to continue.

“Has he,” Porius asked himself, “lost the thread of his doctrine at the critical moment?”

At any rate Drom opened his eyes and looked placidly at his interlocutor with an expression that said, “The Lord has spoken and the Lord has stopped speaking; and that’s how it is.”

But Porius hadn’t stopped speaking. He stared at Drom while the broken fragments of speech still reached him from the crouching figures of the two sons of Iddawc; and the more continuous murmur of the colloquy between his mother and the priest flowed round them all, like a foamless wave round rocking boats.

And then quite suddenly there slid into his head another Cewri word, only he couldn’t remember where or from whom he’d picked it up. It was the word “ruggerug”; and, as he reproduced this aboriginal growl, he pronounced the twice-repeated syllable “rug” as if it rhymed with “hug.”

Out of some lost chasm in his memory this queer word scrabbled forth, like an Avanc aroused from sleep, and it was presently joined by the word “gwork”; and these two words took hands and became one word, so that he was soon repeating, with no little satisfaction and quite loudly: “Gwork ruggerug! Gwork ruggerug! Gwork ruggerug!”

The effect upon Drom of this startling outburst, with its catapulted sequence of raucous “ruggerugs,” was very noticeable. But it was the last sort of effect that Porius desired. The young man Drom advanced a step nearer to him, grasped his hand, lifted it to his lips, and kissed it several times, kissed it with a kiss that made neither the scarcely audible susurration of one class of kisses nor the genial smacking noise of another.

The kisses of Drom were as unusual as his other actions. And their sound was peculiar. It bore an odd resemblance to the popping of certain seed vessels that swell to explosion when they grow ripe. But never had the druid’s servant been nearer death than he was at that moment. A blind rush of furious anger convulsed Porius, and he jerked up his hand. There was something about the kiss of Drom that excited in him a murderous fury. But he restrained himself. He dropped his hand. Then he turned sideways and stared like a man dazed by some mortal shock straight into the sun.

By a fortunate chance the full circle of the descending luminary could be seen clearly between two fir trunks; nor had its atmospheric aura been in the smallest degree reddened. To his confused eyes its outer rim was composed of a ring of indescribable blue fire, while its interior body seemed made of a white light so dazzling as to bear the same relation to fire as fire did to diffused daylight.

With physical relief he turned from this dazzlement to the moist coolness of that greenish white moss. For the kiss of Drom had been the last straw. Porius's wild-animal fastidiousness was outraged as if by a spiritual rape; and his psychic struggle to recover his equanimity brought him to one of the most crucial occasions in the whole life of his thirty-years-old soul.

Drom indeed had withdrawn himself to the further side of the dying prince. He had clearly done so in order to think; and it would have been of intense interest to Brochvael, though of very little to Porius, could these thoughts have been apprehended by some occult process. Such a process, even if only faintly successful, would have revealed the fact that Drom was unable to decide whether that impulsive and pitying kiss, which had so clearly offended its recipient, had been given by himself at his own initiative or by Jesus Christ, using him as a medium.

Porius, on the contrary, who was prepared to accept complete responsibility for his violent acts as well as for his erotic ones, sought desperately to conceal his revulsion. It must have been, he told himself, as he stared at that greenish white moss, the blood of the first Creiddylad in his veins; but even as he thought of this, something in him cried aloud for the hardly begotten, barely conceived offspring of his rape of the second Creiddylad, that shapeless baban-y-gawr so abortively drowned and lost forever under scoriac rock and greenish water!

Everything important in his mental life always took on some simple, sensuous, physical embodiment. He couldn't help this. It wasn't his choice. It was what his uncle, that traveller in classic lands, would have called his anangke, or "fatal necessity."

Even now, though the man was dying only a few yards away, he found himself inevitably mingling with that white-faced figure a floating and fading residue of the honey yellow vapour on the horizon which from his boyhood had been to him like an exteriorized projection of his begetter's soul.

Well! The best thing he could do with this loving kiss of Drom, which he would have liked to have washed from his knuckles with the loving blood of its bestower, was to make it just one more horrible experience among all the other things in life he found revolting, loathsome, unspeakable.

Yes, from now on, to the end of his days — exactly as that clump of wet moss suggested — it would be a good thing to pile up in a mighty mound in his imagination all the things that horrified him; not only his own secretest loathings and manias, not only other people's treacheries, stupidities, idiocies, ferocities, but all such disgusting objects — like that bronze-coloured excrement covered with livid flies that was now visible to him again between Afagddu's bare ankles and the muscular legs of Gwythyr in their leather straps — as humanity has agreed to keep out of sight.

The "Mound of Horror" then was to be kept quite consciously and deliberately at the back of his mind, and it might even be associated with some definite spot in the landscape, like that far-away hollow in the hills where, if he understood Afagddu rightly, the Patrician wished to be buried.

But anyway it was to be kept there; and when some new addition attached itself leechlike to his shuddering senses it was his business to drive it back into the mass of the mound with obstinate blows. He didn't need just then to analyze very far what it was that made the homage of Drom so horrible to him.

The kiss of Judas crossed his mind, only to be rejected at once. There was no treachery, no cruelty, no hypocrisy about Drom's kiss. It was worse. It enslaved the person kissed to the person kissing. It took away the former's ultimate human right — the abysmal right to choose, to choose not to love Drom, or any other living creature, if he preferred to live alone, and finally to choose death if he preferred death to life.

The kiss of Drom condemned him to the holy glory of life if he longed for the unblest anonymity of death. The kiss of Drom was not the kiss of a corpse god, or "deus mortuus," whose embrace sucked the lifeblood from both the tragedy of life and the tragedy of death, nor was it the kiss of a god who wanted to die but couldn't die and who wished to share his horrible immortality with as many as possible.

It was simply the kiss of life without the possibility of evil or the possibility of death. It was the kiss of that which couldn't mock, of that which couldn't cry, of that which had forever wiped away all laughter and all tears. It was the kiss of that which lives forever in the ecstatic contemplation of itself. It was the kiss of rounded identity, of perfect balance, of the reconciliation of all opposites, the kiss of absolute peace, the kiss of unutterable sameness, the kiss of pure divinity, the kiss of anti-man.

The only thing he could do therefore was to fling the kiss of Drom upon his Mound of Horror and so get rid of it, and with it get rid of the appalling fit of loathing it had stirred up within him; and get rid too of something worse than that, a ghastly feeling of sinking down through the floor of the world into pure insanity.

He began to stare now at the clump of white moss as if it really were something to cling to on the edge of a precipice. But the revelation that reached him through it soon swept the precipice away. It taught him just what his peculiar kind of imagination needed, namely, a mental symbol to clutch at when the Horror heaved up.

And it gave him this symbol. It gave him the symbol of striking this imaginary Mound of Horror with his not less imaginary hunting spear. He was doing this very thing now in his mind under the magic hint of his clump of white moss!

He was doing it with the hunting spear Einion had given him in his boyhood, the hunting spear Rhun carried for him, the one whose silver bands had sunk so deep into the wood that he could always feel with his hand the perceptible irregularities they had made.

Mentally clutching this spear now and caressing those indents with the inside of his fingers he struck fiercely, so that his whole thought world rocked with the imaginary blows, at this so dreadfully powerful kiss of Drom, resting there like a great shadowy cuttlefish on the Mound of Horror.

So absorbed had Porius grown as he stood in the centre of that group of people, all of them awaiting, as if under some vast raven’s wing of death, the event they felt was approaching, and so lost was he in conjuring up that Mound of Horror and in beating down upon it Drom’s dangerous kiss and in answering Drom with the primeval ejaculations of giants of the Cader that it was only by degrees he became aware that old Afagddu had been addressing him for some time and repeating some particular thing which he was clearly very anxious should reach his ears. Like other older Brythons of the Gaer, however, Afagddu had so long tried to imitate the laconic words of command of the Roman legionaries who were left, particularly of a few old Spanish veterans, still living in Deva, who had taken Brythonic women to wife, that he had acquired the habit of communicating the most intimate piece of news as if it were an order on a battlefield, not loud enough for the enemy to hear, but in curiously level tones that quelled all lively curiosity.

But Porius smiled at his old friend now and tried to indicate to him with a gesture of mock hopelessness that all these events coming so thick and fast, one on the top of another, had reduced him to a state of dazed confusion.

At any rate the old warrior, satisfied that now he had got his young master's full attention, went on in his deep discordant voice to relate in detail Porius Manlius's fatal wounding and how he himself had assisted Aulus in carrying the Patrician back into the Gaer.

"One minute, old friend," interrupted the younger Porius, turning to Rhun while Drom discreetly effaced himself. "Did you hear that? Afagddu and Aulus have learnt from my grandfather what he wants inscribed on his tomb in case he dies of this hurt."

Rhun's wandering thoughts were brought back with a jerk; but they still required a little assistance before they could get the full significance of this information. Porius saw him screwing up the muscles of his heavy brows, as he gradually gave the matter his full attention. The shadows of the leaves that flitted across that familiar face, as the autumn air stirred the boughs, gave Porius the feeling that certain elemental powers were at their antics in this particular spot where the paths had crossed for centuries.

This was an impression that had crossed his mind several times in the last twenty-four hours, in fact ever since the deaths, in different places but all about the same time, of those Three Princesses of the far-away Iberian past.

And now it was hard to resist the feeling that these palpitating leaf shadows that flickered across Rhun's face were deliberately teasing the poor man, just as the sun's rays, that fell a little more — though not much more — perpendicularly down into his eyes, were purposely trying to confuse his wits.

But Rhun's brain functioned at last in spite of the shadows and the dazzling sun rays.

"What does he want written?" he enquired.

"Yes, what does he, Afagddu?" echoed the other.

Under the direct scrutiny of both these young men, who had learnt to hunt wolves and shoot stags and train dogs under his instruction, old Afagddu became unnaturally excited. He was obviously very proud of his knowledge but at the same time extremely uncomfortable at having to communicate it in intelligible words and at such a crisis.

"What does he want written?" repeated Porius.

"It was Master Aulus," the old man began blunderingly to explain, feeling, as Porius could clearly see, as if Euronwy were listening to him more than to the priest, Gwythyr more than to the doctor, Brochvael more than to his brother, and Gunta more than to her doll, "it was Master Aulus who heard the words and he of course understands Latin as well as they do at Rhufein, though whenever I ask him if he understands Greek he says he doesn't believe they talk in that tongue any more. He says it died out in the days of Ul-Kessar. Though he says that before that emperor's time there were those in Caer Cystennin who knew it well."

"Does the Patrician," enquired the practical Rhun who had joined in the common chat of the Gosgordd a good deal more than his foster-brother, "want it written in Latin? Or will it be enough to put it into the Coelbren-y-Beirdd?"

The exultant hideousness of Afagddu's countenance changed into a harassed look. It was evident he felt himself to be treading on slippery ice. The limitations of Porius's knowledge had become clear to him. But who could sound the secrets of a sun worshipper like the Lord Rhun? Rhun's father was a Greek and his grandfather a slave. Afagddu could even remember seeing this same grandfather once in the legion's camp at Uriconium. He was sharing the contents of an enormous jar of olives with his mates, and Afagddu never could see any classic coin since that day without being reminded of that handsome and reckless profile.

The tone therefore — and perhaps more than the tone — of Rhun's direct question brought the old man's spirits down by several pegs.

"The Patrician," he said, "made Master Aulus say the words over till Master Aulus knew them; and Master Aulus told them to me."

"Can you repeat them?" enquired Rhun.

Old Afagddu uttered a curious humming noise. This was evidently a method he had been taught at the old Bishop's School across the mountains for the evocation of difficult words.

"Don't disturb him, Rhun," whispered Porius. "He'll tell us in a second." And Porius was right.

But what hadn't been foreseen by either of the foster-brothers was the tremendous voice in which the disfigured old warrior repeated his lesson. In his youth, when such customs still lingered among the Ordovices, Afagddu had been the official herald of his tribe; so that now when he uttered these Latin words they startled every living person in that spellbound circle.

"Porius hic in tumulo iacet Homo Christianus fuit."

The sentence was uttered slowly and solemnly, but quite evidently without the faintest comprehension of its meaning; for the two words that Afagddu emphasized as the most important were the words "in tumulo" and "fuit," that is to say, "in the mound" and "he was"; just as though the fact that the old Roman was dead was the essence of the situation, not the fact that being a Christian he had hope of overcoming death.

The reverberations of that heraldic voice were carried — by reason of the configuration of the ground and the direction of the wind — as far as Gwendydd's pavilion. Indeed they must have been audible to every member of the singular company gathered about Myrddin Wyllt; that is to say, to his sister Gwendydd and to Nineue ferch Avallach and to Dion Dionides and to Fflam and Tegvan and to the anxious Neb ap Digon.

And the odd notion entered Porius's head as he heard an echo repeating the word "fuit," that just as the sounds made by various birds, such as crows and wild geese and curlews and seagulls, were carried to varying distances according to the air-dividing shape of each particular cry, so it was with human language, and that of all languages the Latin tongue carried the furthest!

"Why can't I detect," he thought, "from the sound of that echo, whether Afagddu's shout entered a deserted and desolate tent, without lamp or candle or cushion or screen, or whether it found the place full of human company?"

That the violence of Afagddu's announcement had in fact brought back no more than a curiously furtive and secretive echo gave him no clue. He wondered if his dead Creiddylad had ever hunted in the mossy swamps of her mountain for a fallen and dying echo?

He remembered how his foster-mother, Alarch, used to make certain echoes answer her, and how she told him once that if you found a dying echo and promised to build a betws, or "chantry," for it when it was dead you could persuade it to tell you all manner of extraordinary secrets.

He was interrupted in his interrogation of the echo of "fuit" by a phenomenon which, though it may have had a natural cause, partook of many of the aspects of a supernatural marvel. There suddenly commenced a palpable movement from all points of the circumference of their little group, a movement forwards and inwards towards its centre.

This centre comprised the wounded but still elegant form of the ruler of Edeyrnion and the unwounded but ungainly figure of his toothless brother, while above them, like the Pillars of Hercules, stood the son and foster-son of Alarch the Fair.

The curious thing about this movement was that it was wholly and purely a masculine one, and did not include Euronwy or Gunta or Gunta's doll. And it was just as if there were moving forward with these men a potent magnetic force, a force stronger than any prayer to a dead giantess or to a perishing echo, a force that was bent on some actual contact with Einion's departing soul.

Had it a message for that receding soul trireme, whose lantern, in spite of the mellow sunshine, was already lit in face of the absolute night? Pushed forward, as it seemed to Porius, by this revolt against the appalling acquiescence to which Euronwy and Gunta in their feminine realism had abandoned themselves, and of which the terrible submission in the doll's staring eyes had become a symbol, old Afagddu now advanced yet nearer.

"Master Aulus," he murmured, "was mightily vexed because he wasn't wounded like his master; but I told him" — here out of his distorted features the old man gave Porius what was perhaps the subtlest look he had ever seen on a human face— "I told him that considering how the world went in these latter days he was lucky not to have betrayed his master like Judas; so that he'd never see a sound branch on a sound tree without seeing himself hanging from it."

Afagddu uttered these words in something approaching his heraldic voice; but once having uttered them he drew back with a heavy sigh. What would have alone satisfied him at that moment would have been for the dying man to have cried out: “Take this bowl of mead to my faithful servant Afagddu!”

But the prince didn’t even know his servant hadn’t been faithful, and there was no mead at these crossroads. Moreover, the occult attempt that seemed to be taking place to cast on the deck of that anchor-heaving ship of a departing soul some message to its unknown destination was now proving a failure. Nature and the natural feminine acquiescence of Euronwy and Gunta and the doll were having the final word.

Porius began to realize that two new things were happening. Brochvael had straightened his back and was now kneeling at his brother’s side, while Euronwy was making a series of violent tugs at the priest’s vestment. At this juncture he met the eye of the Jewish doctor, but what on earth was the man thinking?

“Is my father dead?” he asked himself. “If so, the fellow ought in courtesy to tell me. But all our thoughts are—” He broke off abruptly for his own thoughts had begun to descend, amid clots of blood and tangles of hair, into an abyss of greenish water.

He began repeating to himself the words “Damn you, damn you, damn you, is my father dead?” but felt tongue-tied under the doctor’s stare.

But suddenly the dying man opened his eyes and began struggling to lift himself up, supporting the weight of his head and shoulders on the palms of his hands. Brochvael rose from his knees to help him, while the doctor dropped his absurd horn and placed both hands behind the prince’s shoulders.

Einion now uttered a husky pitiful heartrending cry, like the painful scaly sound a big fish will sometimes make when the hook is jerked from its gills.

"Mother! Mother! Mother!" he cried; and then, sinking back with the doctor's hands under his head, "She will turn out the lamp!" he whispered reproachfully, though with a faint amusement in his tone, and as if he were taking the whole of Edeyrnion into his confidence. "But I've learnt how to checkmate her! Do you know what I do? I simply shut my eyes. With my eyes shut I see all sorts of lights — more than she knows exist! But she oughtn't to do it! She oughtn't to be let do it! It's not fair for a man to have to shut his eyes to see the light! Not fair, not fair—"

His voice rose querulously and with a queerly high-pitched intonation. Then he drew several long and very deep breaths, each one of which was accompanied by a curiously harsh sound, not unlike the sound uttered by a grouse as it whirls up, but with a certain gurgling afternoise resembling the clucking of a hen-pheasant when it is guiding its young over difficult ground.

By one of those mysterious certainties which take possession of the consciousness of all men at certain moments, independently of their reason or even of the evidence of their senses, everybody who heard these sounds knew them for what they were, a man's death rattle.

When they ceased and Einion's jaw had fallen, there wasn't a soul present who didn't take it for granted that the priest should kneel at the head of the corpse and murmur his appropriate singsong; and that the doctor should bare the breast of the corpse and apply his appropriate ram's horn.

Nor was there a soul present — except perhaps her own — that was surprised when the Lady of the Gaer stepped forward and with her hands tightly clasped high above her head burst into the ancient Brythonic funeral wail for a princely warrior.

It had been the custom in the tribe of Cunedda long before the first Christians appeared, a custom that Brochvael with his mania for the ancient Greeks always swore was an Homeric one, that while the wife of the dead uttered this catastrophic cry every member of the princely household knelt on one knee with his head bowed against the spear or axe or staff or shield or bow's end or whatever else he might be holding, forming in this manner an architectural monument, carved, as it were, out of the very bosom of the earth and culminating in the grandly outlined figure of this woman of sorrow.

This ceremonial gesture was so natural to most of them as to be almost automatic, but the two aliens among them were rendered uneasy by it; and Lot-el-Azziz sought to conceal this uneasiness by behaving as if he and the corpse had been alone in the desert and it was his affair to close the man's eyes and fasten a strap about his head and chin.

But the other alien, the little daughter of the Sais invader, who all this while had been watching Euronwy very intently and even pointing her out to her doll, was so astonished at the formation of this motionless and multiple monument surmounted by that white-robed figure with uplifted arms, that clutching her doll to her breast and covering its head with her hands, so as to save it from seeing this disturbing vision, she moved slowly, as if in a trance, towards those uplifted arms.

The traditional thing that Porius would soon have to do if he did what Einion had done when Indeg was the Gaer Lady, or what Iddawc had done when the figure above the mounded shields was none other than the original Creiddylad, was to lift his mother bodily from the ground with one arm, while with the other he brandished over all those bowed heads whatever weapon he might at the moment be carrying or might be willing to accept from one or other of their number.

For all his mockery and irresponsibility Einion had never rejected the old customs; nor, for all her piety and pride, had Euronwy shaken them off.

But Porius couldn't remember when he hadn't inwardly rebelled against these ancient ways. Outwardly he had submitted; but today, holding in his mind what that green water held, he glanced stubbornly and grimly about him, praying that something — yes, that little Gunta and her doll if nothing else — might break up with some fresh and unfamiliar gesture this whole compulsion of the tyrannical past.

Nor was his prayer — or possibly the massive magnetism of his phlegmatic will — expended in vain. Threading her way among those motionless and absorbed figures the compassionate little girl, who must have obscurely divined that Euronwy's ritualistic lamentations were the flowing veils of an older and bitterer grief than any sorrow for the death of Einion, didn't pause a moment in her advance till she reached that white-robed figure whose bare arms lifted to heaven looked so statuelike in the misty sunshine.

Then with the firm unfretful decision of a girl who lays an infant down to cope with an elder child, Gunta thrust her inanimate charge under her sheepskin and flung both her thin arms round Euronwy's hips.

Had the common gesture by which Einion's death was accepted been less instinctive and automatic this daring interruption would probably have been swept aside. But, as it was, so relaxed after its long tension was the whole group, that when Euronwy hesitated, wavered, and finally yielding, dropped her arms, bent down, and began stroking Gunta's yellow hair, all the kneeling men rose heavily and wearily and with sighs of relief, uttered in as many varieties of susurration as there were lungs to utter them, moved — save for the priest who remained busy with the repose of the soul, and for the doctor who remained busy with the repose of the body — straight towards Porius whom they now proceeded formally to recognize as their new lord.

Each one of them, when they reached him, lightly made the motion of pressing the ground with one knee while they touched one of his hands with their own, and it would have interested the courtly Neb to note the mixture of grave taciturnity and shy embarrassment in each separate offerer of homage as they followed each other, the taciturnity being especially emphatic in the case of Brochvael and Rhun, and the embarrassment most disarming in the case of young Gwythyr and old Afagddu.

Porius's responses to these informal acts of homage were easy and sincere, but below the surface he felt towards Gunta, for saving him by the skin of his teeth from that traditional ceremony, a gratitude that was quite desperately intense.

Deep though his relief was it didn't prevent his mind from playing its usual tricks. Indeed at the very time this informal recognition of his accession to the chieftainship was going on his brain was at work harassing him with more than one complicated problem.

He could catch glimpses all this while of the corpse stretched out on the ground; and he soon began, after his curious fashion, associating the pointed beard of the dead man, which, even under the hands of Lot-el-Azziz, had been only slightly deflected from the perfection of its courtly shape, with the dangerous contest he felt was bound to break out, whatever happened to himself, between the new priest and Morfydd, just as it had done between the old priest and Morfydd's brother.

His father's beard kept appearing and disappearing under, above, between, or beside the heads and shoulders and backs and bellies of the men who were now swearing allegiance to the heavy-handed fool whom the dead man had mocked all his days.

And was he destined to go on in this forest till his own hair was grey, associating the look of that beard, as he saw it now, with his struggle against the religion of Christ?

One thing was certain. The whole Gaer would be divided into two camps from now on. On one side would be Morfydd, her father, and old Rhun, that is to say if Gwendydd went off with Dion, and on the other, Euronwy and the priest.

And here was he, receiving these vows of service from them all, and with no more idea of what was going to happen to them all than if he'd been Gwrgi's ox!

How monstrous was the impenetrable darkness that covered up the whole future! He felt he could actually touch it with his fingers, this darkness. It covered up the next year, the next month, the next week, the next day, the next quarter of an hour!

As he listened to his friends' vows and felt their heavy breathing on the back of his hand he saw this unknown future like a towering black wall of falling water, whose thick density and the very speed of its descent gave it the appearance of smooth but absolutely impenetrable basalt; and it struck his mind how at this same second all over the world there were human creatures like himself facing some crisis in their lives and confronted by this same impenetrable blackness.

What a world to be born into! And the past absolutely unchangeable, whether like this priest he swallowed the creed of the Bishop's School, or, with old Rhun, licked the honey of Mithras, or, like Uncle Brochvael, translated the Eleven Comedies.

And as for the future, so his thoughts twisted in and out of his friends' homage, this black wall of nescience must be an illusion. Possibly the fact that the sweat of each of these men, as they remained in contact with him for their allotted moment, brought such different smells to his nostrils had something to do with the direction his thoughts began now to take.

Yes, he had only to imagine this black wall against the future receding in front of him moment by moment as the march went forward of the iron-shod elephants of time, while he and all other living things fulfilled their quota of world creating, to realize that in one sense this black wall was a pure illusion.

While he looked at it he was already through it, was already creating, for his own particular universe on the other side of it, his own particular ego!

Yes, the whole idea of the black wall dividing him from a future already determined was one of those dramatic illusions that the wily old World Henog loved to create, as he carried his myriads of creators forward and chronicled their shape-shifting creation.

"Every living creature," he told himself now, "is groping, fumbling, gliding, scrambling, hopping, stumbling, crawling forward, or marching — yes! marching like a brave soldier of Mithras — into the future, and, once there, there is no black wall at all. Well, what is there? There's a dizzy empty space, my friend! In fact I rather think there's a glimpse into the ultimate void, into the abyss where—"

His thoughts were not so much interrupted by the particular vow of fealty he was receiving now, which was from none other than Lot-el-Azziz, as they were draped by the oriental panegyric upon the House of Cunedda in which the doctor was then indulging— "into the abyss where moved the myriads of new beings" — for as the doctor's eulogy grew more grandiloquent Porius's speculations grew more extravagant— "each smallest living entity, of the psychophysical procession we call the world, adding something to the aeons-old creation of new forms."

When it became young Gwythyr's turn to go through the traditional ritual these confused thoughts of the new ruler of Edeyrnion were brought back from their imaginings by the sudden conviction that it was this lad's

Italian bride who was destined to tip the scales in Morfydd's favour and to outmanoeuvre the campaign on behalf of Christ.

So powerful was this odd prophetic feeling, and so suddenly did it rush into his mind, that in place of the dead man's pointed beard his acceptance of Gwythyr's homage reached him across the rounded breasts of the daughter of Aulus.

"Where the devil did this idea come from?" he thought, and he dismissed with a faint weariness and even a little distaste the notion that he could himself be concealing some sensual attraction to the Italian girl.

"Somebody or something has put it into my head," he thought. And then, as he kept Gwythyr at his side asking him questions in a low voice about the burying of Brother John, he suddenly remembered exactly how the impression had originally reached him. It was during the trouble over Morvran's murder. It was when Minnawc Gorsant was endeavouring to justify the manner in which his fiery preaching had worked upon the more religious of the Brythonic Gosgordd.

Not the faintest idea had young Gwythyr why it was that his new prince whose hand now rested on his arm suddenly tightened his grasp as if he had caught sight of the horns of a stag between the trees. But it was a mental vision that had arrested Porius, the memory of a scene that made him aware of what indescribable value to the heathen side in their Gaer struggle with this formidable representative of Christ Nesta ferch Aulus might prove.

It was during an explosive encounter between old Aulus and Minnawc Gorsant that she had intervened, and he now recalled, though he had been a very young man and the girl little more than a child, how amazed he had been at her wisdom. How much of it was instinctive diplomacy, how much of it feminine piety, he couldn't tell then, and in retrospect it was equally obscure.

But she quelled the anger between the two men simply by making use of an ordinary Italian woman's natural feeling for the Mother of God. It was like watching her walk upon stormy water to see her work this miracle.

And so it was brought about that as he let Gwythyr go and turned to announce his own pressing business with Myrddin Wyllt and to issue his first authoritative orders as Prince of Edeyrnion, it was not the excitement nor the nervousness of playing the ruler that gave a certain abruptness to his tone, but the simple annoyance within him that there was no longer any Brother John to whom he could explain his theory that, though this reconciliation between heathen and Christian had been brought about almost by accident, there was something in the idea of the theotokos, or "god bearer," which had the power of reconciling extremely conflicting atmospheres of feeling.

"Listen, Rhun," he whispered, making a sign to Gwythyr to remain near them. "This is what I want you to do. My uncle will take the body to the Gaer and look after my mother. What I want" — and he drew Gwythyr close to them both— "is for you to tell the Lady Morfydd that if the Patrician dies before I can get back to the Gaer she must let Aulus, with Gwythyr's help and the help of anyone Gwythyr can trust, bring the old man's body to the Brother's cell at Saint Julian's and wait for me there. Nesta ferch Aulus will still be there — won't she, Gwythyr? — for she'll be with the foreign woman and her child. But what you must make Morfydd understand," — and the new ruler of Edeyrnion reduced his tone to a yet lower pitch— "is that I want her to keep the priest out of the Patrician's chamber and to keep the Patrician's condition out of the priest's hearing."

"Out of the priest's hearing," repeated Rhun, echoing his foster-brother's words in a dull, flat, even voice. "I must get ready for a run, then. You'll excuse me, Porius ab Einion."

Thus speaking he began loosening the straps of his leather thongs and tucking certain folds of his woollen jerkin with meticulous care into his embroidered belt. Apart from their relationship, Rhun evidently felt privileged as a professional runner to sit down in the presence of his new chief in order to shake out of his sandals every fragment of moss, leaf, twig, gravel, or snail shell, that could conceivably affect the motion of his feet.

It was upon the lower portion of the same bank where grew the clumps of white moss that had recently struck the eye and stirred the imagination of his foster-brother that Rhun seated himself.

But Porius was not too stupid to perceive that it was in more than loosening his ankle straps or shaking out his sandals that the son of Alarch the Fair was absorbed as he crouched under that mossy bank with heavily drooping head. The faithfullest of the few surviving adherents of Mithras between Caer Efrog and Caerleon was indeed at that moment under the fatal necessity of making the supreme choice of his life.

And the choice had been already made. The choice had been made, though by a blessed dispensation of Nature Rhun hadn’t realized it, even while he was still listening to Gwendydd’s cajoleries in that pavilion of sorcery. She had fallen into the great mistake of taking him into her confidence with regard to her real attitude to Dion Dionides. And this had turned her into a different being. And yet his feeling for her remained. It had, in fact, become a ghost ship, sailing over other seas than those famous classic ones; as if the vessel of Dion Dionides, still so safe at the wharf under the White Tower, with the tide gurgling about its prow and the Thames seagulls circling round its helm, had secretly slipped away, dodged the Pillars of Hercules, and was steering for the Isles of the Blessed.

“I’m only saying you’d better tell Morfydd that I’ve explained everything quite fully to Gwythyr, and what he doesn’t know Nesta will be able to tell her father when the moment comes."

But Rhun had never shaken his sandals clean, or eased his ankle straps for running, with a mind so torn into two halves as he felt it torn within him now. "For if," he'd been shrewd enough to say to himself when she was telling him all this, though he had lacked the gall to utter any final ultimatum to the lady, "for if she can marry this man without loving him and yet can make him think she loves him, how do I know that she isn't fooling me too? What's to prevent her using him to get to the Sea of Marmora, and then using me, when she's got there, to establish herself with the empress and perhaps even with the emperor? Arthur's camps are no mean school for court ladies, and Byzantium can't be much more corrupt than Caerleon."

And now, as he flicked the ash stump beneath him with one of his leg straps and stared at a depression nearby where somebody apparently had lately been lying full length upon the grass, he felt a sudden cold shiver of something extremely like nervous panic.

"Woman's love," he told himself, "is a tricky thing, whether it's hers for us, or ours for her." The very simplicity of his nature rendered this dividing of heart more drastic. If only he had more time! But he had no more time. The choice had to be made very now, as he sat on this rotten ash stump; amid dry birch leaves and wet moss, with so many smells he knew and so many he didn't know, and something about this heavy misty sunshine that made him feel sick in his stomach.

Well enough did he realize that though Porius was prolonging his instructions to Gwythyr he had his eye on him, even as he had his on him. They knew each other so well, knew each other much better than they'd done when they were Morfydd's playmates.

Indeed, by a curious irony the strain and tension of these last days, each day containing a triple quantity of drawn-out crises, had in some odd manner, a manner to which Morfydd alone could have done justice, rendered their heavily moulded faces more like each other than they had ever been before.

But even at this crucial moment in their ticklish relationship the difference between them was grotesquely emphasized by the workings of Porius's mind. That wayward organism, which might have been using, to intensify its concentration, some daylight lantern of Boethian invention, was so painfully aware of the struggle in Rhun's heart that the notion flitted across it that so intense a struggle would inevitably leave on the psychic atmosphere of these crossways an impression capable of manifesting itself long afterwards, at least for sensitive persons who passed that way.

And he now became aware of an odd coincidence. For although he himself was ostensibly occupied in repeating and enlarging upon his instructions to Gwythyr, and although Rhun was ostensibly occupied in the business of getting his ankle straps exactly as he wanted them, he knew perfectly well that they both had been simultaneously struck by the same oblong impression left on the soft woodland grass, as if some delicate human form had only recently — perhaps only within the last twenty-four hours — been lifted up from that spot and carried away.

Several slender grass blades, delicate as human hair, for there is no grass in Ynys Prydein as filmy and tenuous as the grass in the forest of Edeyrnion, had already raised themselves up, but the greater mass of them remained just as they were when the body that had lain there had originally pressed them down.

"If there's to be," Porius thought, "anything left in this clearing capable of bringing a traveller to a pause in future times, it won't be the bronze-coloured excrement, it won't be that bruise on the grass, it won't be the stare of Gunta's doll, it won't be Mother's thoughts about Medrawd, it won't be Father's thoughts about his mother, that'll catch this traveller by the throat. It'll be my decision to put Mother and Morfydd and the Gaer out of my mind and serve the Emperor of Ynys Prydein! It'll be Rhun's decision to put the Emperor of Caer Cystennin out of his mind and serve Mithras and Morfydd! But what, in the name of all our forest devils, makes old Rhun so magnetized by that mark in the grass?"

It was a hard question to answer, though the fact that he himself was also attracted to the same mark might have given him a clue, might at least have made it occur to him that something out of this place was crying aloud to one or other of them. But prolific in the stirring up of problems as Porius's mind was, it was not a skilful machine for settling them after they'd been stirred up.

A more practised thaumaturge than he in psychic mysteries might have guessed that it was in some daydreaming or preoccupied brain nearby that the solution lay; but so far, what with the attraction of Drom and the death of the prince, the responsible Brochvael had so far failed to recognize the spot where he himself before noon on the previous day left the love-slain body of the second of the Three Princesses unprotected upon the ground.

In any event, to follow up Porius's idea about something more than impressions on tender forest grass being left in particular places by the mental stress of human decisions, it cannot be denied that of Morfydd's two playmates at that moment it was Rhun's corrugated skull that concealed the more painful turning point.

It was indeed only the accumulated psychic force that hung about the name of Mithras and had been gathered there by means of the discipline of so many heroic soldier-souls throughout the entire Roman world that enabled Rhun to call to his aid out of the universal air a Macedonian phalanx of defence for his ancient loyalty and so fortify and back up the decision he had already made.

But the pain of resolving not to sail for the Bosporus with Gwendydd and her Greek was so freezing and numbing to the life force in his blood that he felt, as he established this crucial decision, as if every fibre of his torso, every muscle of his thighs and ankles, had contracted and coagulated into a substance opaque as stone.

He went on finishing his preparations, however, without any flagrant sign of what he suffered. And when he was ready he rose without a groan to his feet.

“So I’m to tell Morfydd,” he murmured in a voice so low that even Porius who stood quite close to him could barely hear what he said, “that the moment the Patrician dies Gwythyr is to help Aulus carry the body to Brother John’s cell and wait there for further orders.”

He then turned to Gwythyr. “You’ll stop me, lad, won’t you, if I run too fast? When I think of things while I’m running I forget I’m not alone.”

Nesta’s youthful husband gave the famous athlete a quick respectful glance. “I’ll tell you, my Lord Rhun,” he said.

“Well then,” gasped Rhun, as if he were already out of breath with running or had been pulling a mandrake up by its root, “we may as well be off,” and without another word, and in full view of Euronwy and the priest who exchanged a questioning and perturbed glance, the two of them set off side by side at a swinging trot.

This was a signal for everybody to move; and as Drom and Afagddu, helped by Lot-el-Azziz, took up the hurdle with the body upon it, and as Brochvael drew his sister-in-law’s arm through his own, and as little Gunta, clutching her doll to her ribs and smoothing out its hair and its skirts with the concern of a harassed great-aunt in a besieged castle, hurried, in obedience to a wave of Porius's arm, to join him where he stood, this latter became aware of a man running towards them.

He certainly was not approaching them from the direction of the Gaer, but, even if he had been, the configuration of woodside and hillside was such that he could easily have reached them unseen by the two runners who were now themselves out of sight.

When the man came within a few hundred yards of the dispersing group he stopped short, evidently taking stock of the persons who were moving away and making up his mind as to which of them he should approach.

Porius beckoned to him, and he promptly obeyed the signal. But as he came towards Porius, the priest, who was clearly intending to follow the dead body, and as he followed it, to chant an appropriate psalm from a psalter he had produced from some slit in his garments, made an attempt to intercept him.

Porius, observing this attempt, moved quickly forward to counter it; and after another hesitation, this time under the conflicting magnetism of two pairs of commanding eyes, the messenger, whom Porius now saw to be the man from Deganwy named Owain Pen Uchel, whose horse had been rechristened Valkyrie by the emperor himself, disregarded the priest and came straight up to the new prince.

Even now there was a chance that Euronwy might intervene; for she had seen the messenger and seen the priest's movement to intercept him, and her eyes were now fixed indignantly on her son with the sort of appeal to him he found it most difficult to disobey.

But just when, according to the old Brythonic catchword, the turn of a hair could make all the difference, Brochvael asserted himself. He had given his support to his sister-in-law in spontaneous courtesy, but, to confess the truth, he had nothing at that critical moment but the most vague consciousness of her existence. His head was too full of Drom. This mystical reincarnation of Jesus Christ — for Drom's attitude to the Son of God differed materially from both Saint Paul's and Saint John's — possessed without doubt a figure of striking beauty; nor were the curves of his almost too feminine form rendered less appealing by the grace with which, as he assisted the disfigured Afagddu, he bent over Einion's corpse.

And it was to retain this agreeable sight within the reach of his vision that Brochvael instinctively dragged Euronwy forward, dragged her in fact to a point from which, although a great deal more of the landscape was visible than had been visible before, the face of the priest had become invisible.

"With this intelligent and beautiful creature at my side," said Brochvael to himself, as he supported Euronwy and thought of Drom, "I don't see why I shouldn't make a translation of the Eleven Comedies into Brythonic as will delight every scholar in Gaul, and perhaps even be carried across Italy to Cassiodorus, to be bound into a book by his monks."

What Brochvael didn't say to himself but left to that imprint in the grass which remained to him only an imprint in the grass, was that, whatever portion of the soul of Aristophanes may have been brought to Edeyrnion by Dion Dionides, one portion of it had not been brought; for there was no eye to see, no tongue to taste, no throat to swallow, no belly to digest, no prophet to spew out, what might be called the Aristophanic Twelfth Comedy, the comedy of the way the things we call "dramatic events" swoop down like hungry vultures to devour the religion-sweetened straws of premeditated sequence that connect our rational purposes with their irrational upshots.

It was given to Porius now to have a clear glimpse of what lay before him if he continued to set himself against this young priest of Christ whose name he had for the last twenty-four hours struggled to forget. The young man had been occupied in turning the massive gold-encrusted pages of his psalter, all gules and argent and azure in the gnat-swarming, horizontal sunshine, preparatory to following the corpse of the dead prince; but his lack of success in intercepting the messenger from the Gaer so bit into his soul that before he hurried after the bearers, with the book still open but the page he sought unfound, he threw at the new prince a look so branding, so blasting, so blighting that the latter experienced the sensation of using a large dark-brown puffball upon which his eyes fell, when he looked away, as a protective retreat.

He had evidently been allowed this anticipatory flame from the Pit, so that he might not be without a hint of the nature of what awaited him. And he was glad to have had this warning, glad to have drawn from his enemy even so small a flash of premonitory vengeance. That look may have given him only a faint smell of his own scorched flesh, but it had shown him in what quarter of the sky to look for such bolts.

And he seemed to see clearly now that to fight this priest with anything resembling the man’s own undying frenzy of love-hate would be impossible, and that the only hope, as had already crossed his mind, would be to use the feminine element in the heart of the religion itself, an element that would in the end resolve everything back into Nature.

But he turned now from staring at the retreating figure of his enemy to greet the newcomer, who was considerably out of breath and kept panting and pressing his knuckles into the pit of his stomach. In spite of this temporary exhaustion the messenger was so clearly attracted to Gunta that he managed to combine an introduction to her doll with his salute to Porius.

“Get your breath first, Owain Pen Uchel, while I guess at your news.”

“The Patrician is dead, my Lord.”

“And so is my father, Owain. Dead, both of them dead. Did Mistress Morfydd send you to tell me? Did you meet Rhun ap Gwrnach and Gwythyr?”

“My Lord, then it is yourself who are now ruler of Edeyrnion? I vow to serve—” and the man from Deganwy bent his knee.

But Porius interrupted him. “No, no, friend, there’ll be time for that later. If it weren’t for the emperor there’d be nobody to serve and no Edeyrnion to be served. Did you meet Rhun ap Gwrnach?”

“No, my Lord — I mean, no, my Prince! But I confess I came a little out of my way. I came by the camp. I wanted to see where they’d buried my horse and my Lord Rhun’s dog.”

Gunta bent her head, lowered her doll till she could hold it between her knees, and then began ostentatiously smoothing its hair with both her hands. Like a true woman she was ready to draw upon herself any threatening storm pressure between these two, and to her it was obvious that this lover of dogs and horses had put his fancy before his duty.

But Porius seemed only amused.

“A little out of the way! Why, you must have passed quite close to us, that is, if you didn’t go all round by Craig Hen.”

With a sigh of relief that seemed to mount up and sink down the whole distance between the top of his head and the soles of his feet, Owain of the Hilltop admitted that he had been round by Craig Hen.

“Well, now that you are here,” announced his new lord, “you’d better stay and play armour bearer for me. I shall want somebody; and these young ladies” — he nodded at Gunta and her doll— “are bent on carrying off the young man who is my chief support. But come, Owain, what we’ve got to do now is to hand over these little ones to their proper protector, who is squire to the counsellor. Then we've got to see the counsellor on his way. Then we've got to go to Brother John's cell — I suppose you've heard of the Brother's death? — and see to it that the Patrician is buried exactly as he wished. So come, my friend, come, my child!"

With Gunta's hand in his and with the horse tamer keeping step on the other side of the little girl, Porius moved away at last from that eventful llanerch, or "forest clearing," where so many paths met, crossed, mingled, began, and ended.

"There's not," he said to himself, "a single strip of earth in Edeyrnion that hasn't a magic power of its own, a power you can feel if you stay for more than a second, but this one has more than its share. Well, so the old Roman is dead! Another Manlius lost among barbarians, and it's my lot to bury him! What a world!" Pondering on his namesake, he led them down the slope towards the shore of the water, following no particular path but directing his steps towards that pavilion of Gwendydd where Rhun and he had first met the counsellor's sister and the fatal Nineue.

"Is Myrddin Wyllt," he thought, "in actual danger from that girl? I'd give a lot to know the nature of her power over him. But I doubt if I ever shall! We've got a destiny, or tynged, in common; but their secret is their secret."

He then became conscious that there was a fresh wind in the branches from the southeast and that a light procession of ragged clouds had swallowed up the sinking sun.

This wind, though it came from a direction a little to the south of the Cader, soon made him think of the Cewri; and since Owain Pen Uchel, who, like most adepts with horses, had an instantaneous power over children, had already slipped into a whispered conversation with Gunta, he was at liberty to follow his thoughts to the limit.

It was the image of Nineue, and the idea of her proving a ghastly and horrible danger to the counsellor, that supplied these thoughts with their present direction.

"This corner of the land," he thought, "for miles round the Cader must have been saturated for aeons before the forest people came — and they must have come a thousand years before the Gwyddyl — with the tricks those Ffichtiaid slaves played on their Cewri masters; magic tricks, wicked tricks, appalling tricks, and yet I could see that woman was still afraid of the Cewri."

The wind as they advanced towards the water was growing colder and colder. It seemed to Porius to be outside the world and to be blowing the world out of its proper position in Space.

"And a good thing too!" he thought. "No! No! No!" his soul cried from under his ribs, "I can't go on living here, struggling day and night for years against this priest of Jesus, and with only old Rhun and his Persian god to help me; and with Morfydd, for all I know, bearing children to Rhun, and with Mother, for all I know, meeting Medrawd and plotting against the emperor. No! No! No! No! I shall go to the emperor at Badon, tell him I'm his man from now on, and just see — double-dyed fool though he considered me — whether I can't outwit, outplot, and certainly outfight the worst enemies of this old isle!"

They were approaching the water now, and a grey mist came out of the water and closed round them, and the mist was very cold. And within the mist, though quite distinct from the mist, there were white vaporous shapes that were of the size and form of small men and women. And these shapes moved to and fro within the mist and remained distinct from it; and as they moved they made grotesque signs and antic signals to one another.

And the nearer Porius and his companions approached the water, the greyer grew the mist and the whiter grew the vaporous shapes that gesticulated to one another within the mist. And by degrees Porius began to discern, as if through gulfs that, as Homer says, had been “wrenched out of the mist into the unspeakable ether,” huge, dim, faraway clouds, rank upon rank, ridge upon ridge, battalion upon battalion, that were heavily and slowly moving forward, impelled by the wind. But more to the southwest than the west, and where no Homeric gulfs had been “wrenched out of the mist into the unspeakable ether,” Porius suddenly became aware that he could detect the enormous bulk of Craig Hen, heaped and humped, and, as it seemed, on the point of toppling forward into the water.

At the sight of Craig Hen the image of Creiddylad came upon him with such overpowering force that it seemed to roll up all his past and present into one huge bundle of fatal experience as gigantic as the beautiful creature herself, and he felt as if he could fling that bundle of his destiny recklessly, desperately, and his soul after it, into those “wrenched-out gulfs” of the aspetos aitheer.

It was partly, no doubt, the rushing down of the wind in a sudden whirling gust from the peaks of the Cader that had this effect upon him; but he suddenly felt as if everything in life — the earth, the sky, the water, the sun, the moon, the signs of the zodiac, and all the beings dwelling among them, himself with the least of them and his thoughts with the least of their thoughts — was not as wholly, as hopelessly, as desperately real as, with the horrors of reality on him, he imagined it to be.

And the odd thing was he felt at that moment that no fellow Brython in the world, no fellow Roman in the world, no Gwyddyl-Ffichti in the world, could understand what he was feeling as well as this deep-natured little Sais.

And the truth was that Gunta was not so caught by the charm of the horse tamer from Deganwy as not to feel, through the hand that held her hand, that her strongest and wisest of mortals was hit to the heart. With weird long-drawn shrieks the gusts of wind from the mountains were whirling round the three of them now; and Porius was made aware, gradually, steadily, irresistibly, of yet another Cewri utterance, this time the last he was ever destined to learn.

It had a quality very different from the wild-goose cry of "gwork, gwork," and equally different from that "ruggerug" noise, as if a Cyclops' jaws were cracking human bones. For curiously enough the sound that now came into his head, or was being blown round his head by these reckless gusts, was totally incapable of being represented by any signs or any syllables.

Porius felt as though his memory for words were one of the things that he had just flung into the aspetos aitheer. Nevertheless the subtle essence of certain sensations, salt as the roots of mountains covered by the sea for aeons of winters, bitter sweet as the sap of forests nourished by the leaf mould of centuries of summers, had been gathered up and distilled in the strange tune he now chanted.

It must have been from the lips of Creiddylad he had caught it; but as this wind from the Cader whirled away the grey mists and the white vapours and even lifted up the limitless earth with one tremendous heave and launched it like an ice-bound ship, keel-free in infinite Space, he felt as if it emanated from the whole body of his cawres-cariad, and from her living soul. It was the tune of the wind from the Cader; and it must have been the power of that wind that made it seem to him perfectly natural that both the child of the Sais from the forests of Germania and the breeder of the mare that the emperor had named Valkyrie should echo the word as if it had been an incantation.

And grotesque though it sounded in the man’s bass and the child’s treble it seemed to Porius that his decision to serve the emperor was rounded off when his companions joined him in tossing that wordless cry into the “unspeakable ether.”

CHAPTER XXVIII. Burial and Sleep

IT WAS WITH A SIGH of profound relief that Porius let fall one of the military spades brought by Aulus and Owain Pen Uchel to the spot designated by the Patrician for his burying. The three of them had been digging for well nigh an hour; and now that before them lay the result of their labour, an oblong hole of about five feet deep and two feet wide, the bright moonlight and the cool air and the fragrance of the upturned mould, threaded intermittently by the straggling roots of small forgotten trees that had long ago perished in the cold winds of this exposed place, created an atmosphere of such detached and islanded tranquillity that he felt as if he could throw himself down by the side of the spade, where the grass remained untouched, and there sleep an untimely sleep, while the powerful horse to whose back the Patrician's body had been corded moved slowly round the open grave in an uneven circle nibbling waveringly at patches of particular grasses or at leaves of particular plants that tempted its nocturnal fancy.

The moon herself was not yet visible, but being nearly full she had begun to pour forth, as if from a transparent porphyry sluice beyond the rondure of the horizon, a stream of pallid luminosity, which when once it reached the firmament spread into a delta of pearl-coloured watercourses, all of them feeling their way out of cloudy mudflats into an expanding estuary of lunar transparence.

It was a grey horse of enormous though sluggish strength somewhat like Porius's own that had brought the Patrician's body, and if Porius had not been so ignorant of horses he would have known that the animal had surpassed itself on this particular night.

He had indeed recognized that, along with the corpse on its back, the horse was dragging in a wheeled cart another and yet heavier object, an object which had been carefully concealed in a purple blanket. It was with this object that Aulus the ex-centurion, now that they had dug the grave, was concerning himself, while Owain Pen Uchel, also on his knees hard by, was arranging, according to the unclassical notions of the stables at Deganwy, the historic folds of the old Roman's toga, an immaculate relic of the Manlian gens.

Aulus had no sooner dropped his spade than he had set to work industriously cleaning with water tilted out from that same old legionary flask so well known to both grandfather and grandson every single letter of the inscription which he himself, the moment his master was dead, had caused to be chipped out, for he knew every word by heart, with the man's sharpest chisel at the Gaer stonecutter's bench.

In that diffused moonlight, for though the goddess's form was still invisible the pallid radiance she was diffusing grew more luminous and more unearthly every moment, it gave Porius many strange feelings to see the impenetrable visage of his grandfather's old friend bent thus assiduously over the words "Porius hic in tumulo iacet."

He had already at Saint Julian's cell studied every feature of the Patrician's dead face and wondered not a little at the odd effect produced by a slight wound — it was not the serious hurt from which he had died — between the right-hand corner of his mouth and his right nostril. It was a nasty gash, and though made by a Sais javelin that had already spent its force and been turned aside it was disfiguring enough in its effect on the Patrician's countenance.

And the curious thing was it brought out the old rugged rustic strain of Italian farmers that lay — though a good deal more than skin deep — below the urban pseudo-Greek sophistication of the ruling class of the world's capital.

It certainly made the old man's face less cultured and cosmopolitan; but it gave it an autochthonous dignity. In making it rougher and more rural it made it more Italian.

"What a barbarian I am," thought Porius as he contemplated the Brythonic tamer of horses arranging with such artistic grace — for every now and then in that ghostly light Owain Pen Uchel would step back a pace or two and gaze at the dead man as if he had been modelling him out of clay instead of preparing him for dissolution under clay — and arranging too with as much simple ignorance as poetic reverence the immemorial lines, curves, and folds of the public dress of a Roman senator, and as he turned from the tamer of horses to the tamer of men and watched the sternly impassive profile of Aulus as the old man cleansed with the sacred water and a scrap of rag every letter of that inscription. "One of them's interested," he thought, "in how the old man will look when the mud and the gravel rattle down, while the other's wondering what travellers will feel who come this way and spell out 'Porius hic in tumulo iacet.' But all I can think of is whether Morfydd's children will look like me or like old Rhun."

He picked up the purple rug which had been wrapped round the newly inscribed stone and spreading it out on the grass by the edge of the upturned mould sat down on it hugging his knees.

One peculiarity of the spot selected by the Patrician for his burial was its limited horizon. It was surrounded by grassy ridges that hid the distance in every direction. But this very fact of the exclusion of distance had an effect entirely opposite to what might have been expected. Instead of producing the impression of anything enclosed this unique place of burial produced the impression of being a shallow bowl, or perhaps a deep saucer, full of waving grasses, illuminated by unearthly light, and suspended between earth and heaven. It produced the effect, indeed, as though the last of the great House of Manlius had not been interred at all but had been hung by invisible cords in illimitable Space.

Porius had his wits sufficiently about him, when over the northern rim of this grassy bowl the figures of old Afagddu and young Gwythyr appeared, each of them leading a horse by its bridle, to note with curious interest the shock of pleasure he derived from the fact that here was an excuse to postpone the lowering down of his grandfather into that gaping hole.

Though the moonlight and the darkness reduced the external difference between the living grass and this scooped-out cavity in the earth mother's flesh, it left the essential difference between the mysterious texture of vegetation and the much less miraculous substance of gravel and mould unaffected.

And Porius began to be more vividly aware of this difference than he could remember ever having been in the whole of his life. And it struck him with a ghastly intensity that between the flesh of this body of a man and the various substances composing the body of our planet there was a scraping and rasping discordance even more pronounced than between stony earth mould and pliant vegetation.

He began to experience an unexpected shrinking from the necessary contact of his grandfather's face, however wrapped in his toga, with the gritty mould they would so shortly be shovelling down upon it.

Thus it was with the deliberate purpose of delaying the impact upon those proud old features he knew so well of the mould and gravel and stones and roots and snail shells and earthworms which were shortly to be spaded in on the top of them, that after warmly greeting both the newcomers he left old Afagddu gazing in awed wonder at Aulus, as the ex-centurion went on with his slow meticulous task of removing every speck of dirt from the precious inscription with the fringe of his military cloak, and in addition to this, and not without irritable glances to the quarter of their amphitheatre where the moon's appearance was imminent, of trying in vain — for his old-fashioned knife was as unsuited to such work as was his notion of the formation of letters — to improve the shape of the aspirate in the inscription's "Hic" and "Homo." But having given Owain instructions as to how he wanted the stone set up, Porius now felt justified in drawing Gwythyr aside and asking him for more details about the death banquet for Einion ab Iddawc at the Gaer.

He had already heard something of this ceremony when he met the lad at the dead Brother's cell, but what he began to hear now proved so startling that it broke up his sensitivity about the weight of that menacing five feet of rubble bearing down upon the Manlian eye sockets, consular nose, and proconsular mouth, as the old man's skull, resting upon the water bottle he had entrusted to his grandson four days ago, prepared to resign itself to putting off the chemistry of the organic and putting on the chemistry of the inorganic. In fact Porius now issued an abrupt, and to Aulus and Afagddu so startling and disconcerting an order, that they looked at each other in dismay before obeying it; the order, in fact, that they should lower the body into the grave at once and postpone the death prayer until the grave was filled in.

"Where were you sitting yourself when you saw the man you thought was the emperor's nephew?"

"I wasn't sitting at all, my Prince. I was standing. I was standing just behind him at the back of the hall. The hall was crowded. Lots of us younger ones had no seat. We ate and drank standing. It was the most crowded death banquet I've ever known, and I've known three — no! four, my Prince; yes! I've known four."

"But this man — tell me, Gwythyr. Did you see the emperor's nephew closely when he was at the Gaer that first time? Are you sure you'd know him again?"

"Not as closely as I saw this man tonight, but near enough to refuse to trust my eyes again, my Prince, if this wasn't the man."

"Did anyone else notice him or know who he was?"

"I can't say for sure, my Prince, but I don't think so. Everybody was watching what was going on. There was anger in the air, my Prince, and more than anger. There was murder in the air."

"Was the priest at the death feast?"

"Yes, my Prince."

"And both my mother and my wife?"

"Yes, my Prince."

"Were you in his chamber when the Patrician died?"

"Yes, my Prince."

"And you heard the Patrician tell my mother that Aulus was to bury him out here, and that the priest wasn't to come near him?"

"Oh yes, my Prince! And when he was dead and the Lady Morfydd was talking to Aulus, I saw the Lady Euronwy kneel down by the Patrician and pray over him. My Lady Euronwy was crying pitifully, my Prince."

"He was her father."

"I swear to you, my Prince, by my own mother's head, and I would swear it before God and the emperor, that the Lady Euronwy was glad that the Patrician's will should be done, and that he should be buried as he told Aulus, and that the scribe in the tomb shed should set down on the stone the words he'd made Aulus learn."

"Do you think the priest understood that my mother knew about it and agreed to it?"

"I don't think so, my Prince."

"You mean he supposed it was done without her knowledge?"

"I'm sure that's what he thought, my Prince."

"But the trouble at the death feast? You say that had nothing to do with the Patrician?"

"Oh no, my Prince! That was about Einion ab Iddawc being buried in the new church. It was Brochvael ab Iddawc who objected; and the Lady Morfydd supported him."

"This was after Aulus and Afagddu had brought the body away to Brother John's cell?"

"Oh, my Prince! They started before the death feast began. The Lady Morfydd told me to wait so that I could tell you what was decided about your father."

"And nothing was decided?"

"Not a thing, my Prince, not a thing. It came near to blood and murder, and then — I told you at the Brother's cell how it was — then it all suddenly... suddenly stopped."

"When Nesta cried out on the Mother of God?"

Gwythyr nodded.

Porius could see that the lad had been deeply moved by what had happened. He had already gathered as much from the words the youth had dropped at the Brother's cell earlier on this eventful night. He had even divined from Gwythyr's reticence about it that he, and probably others beside, felt that a miracle had actually happened and that the Blessed Virgin had answered Nesta's appeal by appearing in person.

As he faced the girl's husband now he suppressed a question that had risen to his lips as to how it happened that Nesta, whom he understood to be looking after Magog's mother, could be at the Gaer at all? He had been aware of her absence at the Brother's cell, but he had been too concerned in getting the Patrician's body safely away to give it much thought. But he was amused to notice in himself now the instinctive Brythonic prince's assumption that while it was natural for himself to spend his time hunting and fishing and exploring the forest when he wasn't serving the emperor or fighting his enemies, it was wholly improper for serving girls and serving boys to leave their work without special permission.

"Holy Jesus!" his philosophical self retorted to his princely self. "Why shouldn't the boy have his wife with him at the tribe's death feast?"

He glanced at the three men to make sure they were obeying his unaccountable orders and were really filling in the grave. When he was sure of this, though he could see they were doing it stubbornly, broodingly, and in an outraged silence, he told Gwythyr to bring him the purple blanket in which the inscribed stone had been wrapped; and as they sat down side by side upon this and tightened their cloaks round them against the chill of the autumn night they saw Afagddu pause in his work and stretch out his arm.

Aulus and Owain stopped too and straightened their backs to see at what he was pointing. Thus all three men became outlined against the half-circle of the craterlike ridge, that henceforth was destined to confront the buried Roman until his bones were indistinguishable from the earth piled on them.

The motion of the tall grasses shivering in the night wind gave Porius the impression that in their waving to and fro these grassy sentinels were trying to utter certain obscure half-thoughts to the unheeding clouds.

And as for the three men, they assumed for him just then an appearance of such unsubstantial unearthliness that they might have been a group of nameless prehistoric Ffichtiaid drawn back from the dead to bury once more in vaporous recurrence on this night of the full moon some bewitched cawr they had in the far-off past ensorcerized to his destruction.

And then both he and Gwythyr realized suddenly at what it was that Afagddu had pointed. Like a dethroned goddess released from captivity and able to ride with absolute assurance to where a thousand years before she had ruled over a race lost in the gulfs of Time, the full moon, that had risen like this, month after month, though not upon a scene as momentous as this, from times before Ynys Prydein was an island at all, mounted the ridge, allowed the grasses waving their confused half-thoughts to throw their gnomic pattern against her breast, and swept into her royal highway.

But in thus repossessing this particular air province of her domination the full moon of Monday the twenty-second of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine proved her power by exorcizing the demons of hostility from the minds of every one of these five men.

With this divine visitant above their heads Aulus and Afagddu and Owain began in earnest, to fill up the Patrician's grave, free now from the sense that they were breaking a sacred custom of a thousand years.

And Porius suddenly thought of how his cynical father, when he was drunk, had persisted in quoting those crazy modern verses of that mad boy. Indeed one of the queerest of Taliesin's poems drifted through his mind even now as he watched the men's spades reflect the glitter of the full moon. The poem was concerned with just such a night as this; and several disturbing fragments of its obscure cadences came back to him, recording old intimacies of his with the moon and declaring how heavenly it was to forget the human race in the mystic alterations of the lunar hours. "Greatest of all the enchantments of Annwn is the full moon," one of these fragments said, "for the full moon changes everything. It lifts up the low and brings down the high. It steals their fluidity from the waves of the sea and their solidity from the peaks of the mountains. It makes murder a sound far off and birth a wailing upon the air. It makes yesterday's love seem like laughter in another life and yesterday's hate like an owl hooting over the rooftops of a city of ghosts. It turns death into the crying of kings' daughters forgotten in frozen forests; and it turns the battles of old races into the sinking of deserted cities lost in the sand."

Back again by young Gwythyr's side, and seated once more on the blanket, Porius felt as if the immediate presence of the moon, so utterly removed from all human values, gave to the human race and to all the individuals he knew a sort of endearing grotesqueness. He felt disinclined now to attribute calculating and crafty rather than spontaneous and impulsive motives to the opposing figures, known so well to them both, who had come so near that night, as he was learning now for the first time, into turning that death banquet in the Gaer into a scene of wild and frantic contention.

Porius implored his young retainer not to hurry too fast through his startling narrative. How clearly as he listened could he see every detail of what went on! Vividly before him rose their low-roofed hall which he hadn't seen since he set out with Rhun four days ago.

He said to himself, "That's it; that's what has been growing on me all day!" And what he meant was that he had a weird prophetic feeling that it might be months and months before he entered that hall again.

Vividly could he see, as he listened to Gwythyr, the dais at the northern end of the chamber on which there were always two throne chairs. Hugging his knees as he sat on the blanket at Porius's side, and with his face turned eagerly towards him, Gwythyr was now explaining to him what he could have explained without seeing it to Gwythyr, namely, that at the ceremony that night one of those throne chairs was empty, while in the other sat the Lady Morfydd. The Lady Euronwy, Gwythyr told him, sat on the other side of the throne chair upon an informal and quite ordinary seat, a seat that had been unceremoniously brought there from her own private chamber.

"Are you perfectly sure, lad," Porius murmured, "that my mother had no idea of the emperor's nephew being there?"

"As far as a person of my age and my position can be sure," replied the young man, "of anything concerning so great a lady as your mother. I've been her special messenger" — as he said this he turned away his head from the great lady's son, and one of those looks that the moon alone of all the immortals seems able to call up, or to comprehend when it is called up, came into his face— "since I was fifteen. No, my Prince, according to my way of looking at it she couldn't have known. Of course after the death feast he may have revealed himself to her. No one can speak one way or the other in regard to that, and I wouldn't want to be the one to try. But that she didn't recognize him while the feast was going on I am certain.

"But you must remember, my Prince, that there were so many crosscurrents in the Gaer that it's hard to follow them; rumour upon rumour, my Prince, and plot upon plot, and vengeance upon vengeance, and many of them going back so far that the ones who use the words don't hardly know what the words mean. Things have changed a lot in these modern times, my Prince, and yet there are people who still don't see what's happening when the signs are all round them."

Nesta ferch Aulus, wise as she was, and great as was her magnetic power, would have been astounded to hear the free and easy manner in which her youthful husband was talking to the great-grandson of Edeyrn ap Cunedda.

But the truth was that Porius's removal as an infant, according to custom, to the house of his foster-mother, followed by his long years at the Bishop's School on the other side of Moel y Famau, and that again by his betrothal to Morfydd, had had the effect, combined with his introspective nature, of cutting him off from the day-to-day life of their tribal fortress.

His only companions, apart from his teachers, had been his boyhood's playmates, that is to say, for Morvran had always been a lonely scholar, Morfydd and Rhun. Thus to have revealed to him, practically for the first time, just as he had become ruler of the province and at the same time had decided to leave the province in order to serve the emperor and the whole Island of Britain, to have, I say, revealed to him what might be called the Gaer's political and social secrets was, although so ironically late, of absorbing interest. He continued questioning Gwythyr so closely and learning from him things so amazing, that long after the men had finished their job and the inscribed stone had been put up at the grave's head, and the three gravediggers had themselves fallen into an excited argument, this intense low-voiced dialogue between the two of them was still going on.

"Do you mean to tell me, lad," Porius protested at length, "that this matter of burying my father in Minnawc Gorsant's new church of Saint Julian in the centre of his new town of Corwen divided them all tonight into who were for the emperor and who were against him?"

"It was when the Lady Morfydd called upon my Lord Brochvael to support her against my Lady your mother, and my Lord Brochvael got angry because the priest made reference to his son, and Master Drom said it was directly through Christ himself and not through any priest that we knew the will of God, and it was when my Lady your mother—"

"But for mercy's sake, son, what's all this got to do with the emperor?"

"It's like this, my Prince. The party in the Gosgordd who followed the old priest weren't really for the emperor at all. They always said as much as that. They said they were soldiers of Christ, not of any prince or king or emperor! I know what I am saying, my Prince, for when I was younger" — he caught himself up with an embarrassed little laugh— "I know I'm not very old yet—" but Porius had laid his hand on his knee.

"Was there any surprise among them," he enquired, "at my absence?"

In spite of the floating effluence of lunar enchantment all around them the young man's face became perceptibly clouded with misgiving.

"Do you command me to speak frankly, my Prince?"

"God, no! I don't command you anything, lad. Talk to me as your friend; for if we're not that by this time we never shall be."

"None of our Gaer people, my Prince, have the faintest notion of what you're like. There are the maddest stories going about among us concerning you. Now that I know you — and even Nesta, clever as she is, doesn't know you as well as I do — I find these stories ridiculous."

"What stories?"

"Well, the commonest one is that you are sold yourself, body, soul, and spirit, to the devil. Those who say this believe that Myrddin Wyllt has revealed to you all his secrets and that you are to be his successor with the emperor."

"But the counsellor isn't an old man."

"They say he's going back whence he came, now that the Saeson are driven back whence they came! They say when he leaves here he'll go straight to Caer Sidi."

"Who says that?"

Porius's question was abrupt and imperative. Being now in the position of a despot he had already discovered the importance of personal detail.

"Nobody in particular, my Prince. We all say it and we all question it. And it's the same with yourself! Nobody expects you to be an ordinary Prince of Edeyrnion any more than we expect the emperor to be an ordinary crowned King of Ynys Prydein. Oh, I don't know how to make you see the way it is, my Prince! I can only say it seemed quite natural to us to look at that empty chair at the end of the hall, now that your father's gone. But if you'd suddenly appeared seated in that chair, my Prince, that also would have seemed natural! Everybody knows that Brother John taught you all the wisdom of the enchanter Pelagius who died in his arms and was a much more powerful magician than Myrddin Wyllt."

Porius removed his reassuring touch from the young man's knee at his side. He looked at the three figures before them, who were now seated upon the long-dead trunk of a perished mountain ash, much of which had already resolved itself into dry powdery dust, and, with their backs to the old Roman upon whose face and chest and belly and legs they had just thrown a cartload of British earth, were absorbed in a game of Roman dice, the numbers upon whose cubes, produced from a pouch at the ex-centurion's belt, were apparently discernible at the bottom of this magic ocean of moonlight.

And he looked through these figures, dicing there with their backs to the buried Patrician. He looked through them as if they had been transparent phantoms. And he saw the Gaer hall, with Morfydd in his mother's place, and his father's place waiting for himself to fill; emptily waiting, as for some unknown sorcerer-prince liable to appear or disappear at any moment. And as through the forms of these dicers he saw the familiar Gaer hall grown so strange, with Morfydd on the dais and the religious and irreligious parties of the Gosgordd disputing across their meat and their mead, so through the Gaer hall, as if it too, like the dicers, were a thing of vapour, moon-gendered and moon-nourished, he could see another vision, this one being simply his own clear memory of what he himself had seen that very day.

He saw little Gunta's floating hair and felt her hand snatched away as she rushed to meet Neb ap Digon. He saw Neb himself slip hurriedly from off the back of a plump roan horse and proceed to drag the animal towards him, proudly requesting him, as if the small page and not himself had been the ruler of the land, to lift them both from the ground and place them on that broad, sleek, inviting back.

And he saw Dion Dionides on a jet-black horse and Gwendydd on a snow-white horse; and with them he saw their diminutive retainers Fflam and Tegvan. He saw these alert beings seated upon an animal that arrested his attention, not only because of its colour which was of a shade of sorrel he had never seen before but because of the fact that it only had one eye. It appeared to be an eye, however, that was prepared resolutely yet cautiously, impracticably yet shrewdly, to find the way to the Port of London.

At that moment it struck him that there was something queer about being able to see all this through the bodies of three men dicing on his grandfather's grave, as well as through the walls of their familiar, yet now so strange, Gaer hall. But the thing of all things that rose most vividly before him out of the unusual group of persons and animals he was now conjuring up was the extraordinary figure of Myrddin Wyllt in his rough disguise as a "herdsman of the south."

The magician was seated on an enormous grey horse, that for all he knew might even have been a stallion, while behind him, balanced sideways on the creature's rump, with her long bare arms tightly clasped round his waist, he saw the handmaid Nineue. The mysterious Ffichtiaid was clothed in a warm, soft, tight-fitting garment reaching below her knees and made entirely of moleskins. Yes! There she was, the creature from whom it was his fate to protect this man. But who among us can predict the particular intensity of any single mental picture in a crowd of others?

Porius was not only surprised to find that the image of this woman stood out more clearly now than any other. He was surprised at the particular nature of the impression he received. The lissom outlines of her seductive body from the moment he first saw her had sensually attracted him. And now what he expected when their eyes met was a cruel and voluptuous gleam of triumph; but he got nothing of the sort.

She smiled her recognition, but the smile passed at once, without any sort of mocking defiance; and a calm, dreamy, somnolent look, the look of one who is too deeply absorbed in some immediate personal sensation to feel either love or hate, either cruel exultation or delicious laceration, either contempt or uneasiness, the look in fact that corresponded with what he himself felt when he was too absorbed in "cavoseniargizing" to notice anything, hear anything, or be aware of anything, beyond the magical ecstasy of mingling his whole being with the elements!

In plain words Nineue, the Ffichtiaid, Nineue, the notorious she-devil, was losing herself in earth and air and water and — sweetest release of all — in the afterglow of fire. For the sun had set; and this same afterglow, lying upon the reeds and the mud and the lake, was producing an effect that gave to the whole vision of things, extending from the ground at their horses' feet to every rim and verge and ridge of the landscape round them, a golden insubstantiality.

The reeds and the water and that tall grey horse and Nineue, with her white arms round Myrddin Wyllt's waist, were indeed the last things to melt away as his consciousness, retreating now from its airy propulsion, left this scene that had come floating up from a mere fathom's depth of memory, passed once more through that familiar yet strange Gaer hall described just now by the lad from whose knee he had withdrawn his hand, and found itself once more aware of the three men dicing with their backs to the filled-in grave, and of Gwythyr's white face and earnest moonlight-mystified eyes.

"So it seemed natural to you, lad," he murmured gently, making a movement to rise but remaining for a second half-risen, supporting his weight on the palm of his outstretched right arm, "to see my father's seat empty? I'm glad to hear it, for it's likely enough that more than a few days may pass before I take my place in that seat."

So saying, and with a groan caused by a sudden spasm of cramp, he stood erect. Once on his feet, however, he found himself staring at the three figures dicing about the buried Patrician as if they were the final fragment of a broken dream that refused to dissolve into the moonlight.

But the grasses waving on the top of the ridge behind them were real enough, and it struck him as a typical reality of this mortal world that five feet of rubble and clay and peat and dirt and stones should be lying with all their weight on the toga-wrapped Manlian nose and eyelids, and the tightly closed Manlian mouth.

Porius shivered and felt a natural relief when Gwythyr, who also was now on his feet, bent down and handed him the blanket on which they had been sitting.

"You're cold, my Prince. Wrap this round your neck. I know," he went on, "I am young. But that doesn't make me as stupid as some of us. I know we ought to expect you to come and go in quite a different way from your father. They say in the Gaer kitchen that you're more like your grandfather than Prince Einion, and he certainly used to come and go; nobody knew how!

"The Church has got a hold on us today, my Prince, yes! on both Gaer and town as it never had in Prince Iddawc's time. I'm too young myself to remember the days of Prince Iddawc and Princess Indeg. No, I can't speak for myself. But I can tell you this, my Prince, and you can lay it to heart, for it's the very truth. The trouble nowadays is all about the future and it is all between the young and the young. The older people are too settled in their ways to care one way or the other.

"And I'll tell you something else, my Lord — I mean my Prince — something that everybody doesn't know. The Gosgordd boys who laid that ambush for Morvran ap Brochvael after Minnawc Gorsant's sermon against the enemies of Christ were the youngest of the stable boys. I'd have been one of them myself; only I used to go boar hunting with Morvran ap Brochvael, and he had told me, while we were waiting for the boar to charge, and while we didn't know whether we'd come out of it alive or dead — you know what those boar tusks are, my Prince — that all the learned books his dad brought back from Rome and Constantinople and Athens — yes! every single one of them — said that the religion of Christ had been invented by madmen who believed that the end of the world was at hand; and he would say that there never had been and never could be three gods in one; and he would say" — here Gwythyr impulsively and instinctively gave an irreligious twist to his revolutionary feelings— "if Christ was a god, Mithras was an older and much stronger god! That's what my Lord Morvran used to say when he took me out hunting.

"You see, my Prince, all of us who worked in the kitchen in those days, carrying the dishes into the hall and carrying them back when the feast was over, were the quiet and religious ones. The wild and wicked ones, the ones who hated everything to do with religion, the ones who mostly used to go about with Morvran, worked in the armoury or in the stables. You wouldn't know them, my Prince, for you and my Lord Rhun ap Gwrnach were grown-up men when we were all boys; so it's not betraying them to you for me to mention them, though I only mention them to cry shame on the mothers who bore them!

"Only a few of the ones who worked in the kitchen were big or strong enough to join the Gosgordd. I expect you know them, my Prince. They are Tudor and Rhydderch and Rhisiart and Jorwerth and Sieffre and Adda; and they are still on my side and would always do what I tell them, so if ever you—"

"Pardon me, lad, for interrupting you, but do you remember the prayers for the dead who die in the Lord?"

Gwythyr's expression in the moonlight looked so completely confounded by this question that the impious thought flashed through Porius's mind: "Suppose he says, 'Which lord, my Prince?' How shall I answer then?"

If it hadn't been for the full moon, and for the waving grasses on the ridge, and for the sound of Aulus's Roman dice tinkling against a particular stone which had been lucky enough, if it was luck to an entity as inanimate as a stone, to escape reburial, the primeval simplicity of the boy's answer, when it came at last, might have had a different effect.

As it was it made him feel completely ashamed. In fact it smote his whole life illusion just as the old cawr had done with Creiddylad, broke it in pieces, and "dashed it," as the Psalmist says, "against the stones."

And over a pool of green water, whence a horrible redness behind a bar of scoriac adamant pitilessly watched him, he decided that all this while he had simply been making use of the mysterious tynged that linked him with Myrddin Wyllt in order to escape the necessity of returning to face his mother and Morfydd. But to have left, as he had done yesterday and today, the cruelty of the father of the gods to have its way unchallenged with both his wife and his mother struck him as he thought of it now in this unearthly light as something so monstrously inhuman that it put him outside the tribes of men.

It was to Cader Idris he belonged, and the sooner he went back there the better.

"I only know three Latin words, my Prince," had been Gwythyr's answer. "But I think the Patrician would be glad if you said them over him before we went away."

"What is this thing," thought Porius, as he went back to the grave with Gwythyr beside him and made a sign to the three men to go on with their game till it was over. "What is this thing I call my life illusion? Aren't I still myself when it's utterly destroyed as it is now?

"Oh, but I'm deceiving myself! The second it's destroyed it starts growing again — only on different ground. Perdition! Am I forced by the power of life itself into this childish vanity? Is this what Jesus meant by becoming like a child, like a vain showing-off child?

"What I've got to do is to kill this life illusion of mine so that it can't start growing again! But what exactly is it I've got to kill? That's the question. There! Afagddu's thrown a double four! 'In eight days,' as we used to say at the Bishop's School, 'there'll be a new emperor!' It's a sort of diffused conceit of yourself, that's what it is; a sort of feeling that to be what you are and to feel as you feel makes you a person in some peculiar way superior to the people you meet. In reality, of course, it only makes you different. And since every creature is different from every other creature, and since, as Brother John told me, according to Pelagius, there's *experi*mentation in values going on all the time, a person who wants to be wise must analyze and criticize, even while he obeys, the values he's received from the past."

With a sharp tinkle the little oblong cube of Roman numbers was again flung on the stone, this time by the horse tamer from Deganwy.

"Well done, Master Owain!" cried Gwythyr in high excitement. "It's double six, isn't it?"

But Aulus rose to his feet laughing, and the others laughed with him. He replaced his dice and poured meticulously into the same receptacle a considerable number of small silver coins, the final one of which seemed as it disappeared to have been clinging piteously to the ex-centurion's sweaty palm.

And it struck Porius as though the wretched little thing, with its familiar Caesarean profile, were offering, ere it sank into darkness, all it could purchase for one moment more of moonlight!

"It did look like that, my boy," Aulus muttered, "but it's the one I showed them when we began! It's lost its enamel in two places and its losing that makes it look like double six."

"Can you remember, Aulus," enquired Porius earnestly, but without the faintest trace of reproach, "those words that you used to recite when I was little and you came to our house in the town forum with a message from the Patrician to Alarch the Fair? I don't mean any church psalm. I mean those words you always told Rhun ap Gwrnach and me that the old captain of the guard at Uriconium used to chant when he buried the ashes of one of his soldiers."

Aulus looked at him sharply with a most peculiar expression and with his lips sucked in to such an extent as to endow his visage with the air of one of those drinking troughs that have been taken for granted so long that it would give even a horse a nervous shock to credit it with any human feeling.

“But those were old Roman words,” he said, “words of divine sleep after long toil, words of eternal peace in the bosom of alma mater terra in place of bloody war on behalf of Senatus Populusque Romanus.”

There was something in the tone of his wife’s father that caused Gwythyr to throw upon the new prince a hurried, anxious, and almost protective look. His own long-suppressed feelings of revolt against both Roman and Brython, feelings that had of late been disarmed by Porius’s unexpected friendliness, had found a fresh channel in a young man’s general religious hostility to the particular religious ideas that surround his youth. Gwythyr’s revolt was no longer against the emperor and his princes. It was against God and his priests.

But if there was anyone in Edeyrnion qualified to catch the most intimate implications in the old centurion’s outburst it was the Patrician’s grandson. Infinitely less scholarly than Brochvael, Porius had what the other lacked, a living stream of actual Roman blood in his Ultima Thule veins; and having this he could recognize what Morfydd’s father, for all his books and his travels and his Greek comedies, could never have done, the appalling weight of the infinita potestas orbis terrarum, the limitless empire that was at that very moment ebbing hoarsely back, down the steep slimy shingles and the long shell-strewn sands of the coasts of time, and against the burden of which this too-faithful servant of the Urbs Beata was relieving his soul in tragic bitterness.

The ex-centurion must have uttered what he uttered spontaneously enough. How could he possibly have had an answer ready for so completely an unexpected request? But he had spoken so solemnly and slowly, and in a tone so profoundly sad that the man from Deganwy and old Afagddu regarded each other with a look that seemed to say: “If a Roman centurion from the Uriconium legion and one who has served in a castrum as rich and luxurious as the one at Deva can be as unhappy as this man sounds we may as well thank the gods that we are the conquered and not the conquerors!”

But Porius spoke again, and as quietly as he could. As he spoke and as he looked from face to face in the moonlight he was fully conscious of that other face watching him from the bottom of the grave and carrying such a weight of rubble upon it that it was hard to imagine it retaining its familiar features.

“How long does the animula vagula” he wondered in the pauses of what he was saying, “hover about its guest and comrade?”

But whether the Patrician’s soul had utterly perished with its body or, naked and pallid in some new embryonic state, was already shivering on the threshold of a new dimension of life, there is no doubt that, though the authoritative spirit of the Manlian gens had only reached him through the evasive channel of an emotional woman, Porius did suddenly feel rushing through every portion of his being a magnetic quiver of irresistible command.

“Recite those Roman sentences slowly, if you please, Aulus,” he said, “and Afagddu and Owain and Gwythyr and I will repeat them after you as well as we can.”

All the men glanced quickly at him; and then instead of looking at one another they kept their eyes fixed on his face while Aulus without a moment’s pause began with the words the Twentieth Legion must have known so well: “lmperator ait — the emperor declares.” So long was it since the centurion had repeated these words, and so much longer was it since he had actually heard them uttered, that their significance had grown faded and dim. Indeed the words themselves, entombed in an old man’s memory, had become discontinuous and fragmentary. But there were still so many Latin phrases, Latin aphorisms, Latin proverbs, not to speak of snatches of the liturgical Latin of the Church, floating on the surface and even melting into the stream of the common people's new Cymric, that though for Aulus himself the words he recited were blurred by half a lifetime of Christian invocation they carried many familiar overtones to each one of his hearers.

What Porius himself derived from them was vague enough, but they seemed to declare that by some imperial edict any ground must be venerated as holy ground whether it were a shrine, an altar, the ground of a standard, a special place, or anything else that had been dedicated and consecrated as sacred to the gods; and as for the sepulchres of those who had died for their country and for their children's children, they must be held sacred for evermore.

And indeed as Aulus went on playing one part, so perfectly suited to him, of a soldier-priest, these ancient Roman words, breaking the silence of that phantasmal moonlight, gave Porius the feeling of an invisible confraternity of free souls binding together the living and the dead, and building the foundation, in the midst of all life's chaos of destruction and disaster, of an imperishable city of justice and security.

"lmperator ait sacrum esse quocunque modo atque instituto civitates consecratum sit, sive aedis, sive ara, sive signum, sive locus, sive quid aliud quod deis dedicatum atque consecratum sit; pro patria, pro liberis, pro aris, atque focis suis, loquenti consecrata et sepulchra defendimus."

The whole scene left a quite special impression on Porius's mind. At moments indeed the antique solemnity of the centurion's tone, combined with the emotional tension they were all feeling, brought him very near laughter as well as tears; for there was something that struck him as extraordinarily quaint in the pedantic pronunciation of the horse tamer from Deganwy compared with the old-fashioned forest-people’s accent of Afagddu, for whom the syllables were just magic gibberish, and each of these compared with the guttural consonants and far-drawn, poetical vowel sounds of Gwythyr’s modern Cymric.

But it was when it was all over, and himself and Gwythyr and the Deganwy horse tamer were riding off, leaving Aulus and Afagddu, who preferred to walk for five hours rather than ride for one and who had friends who would give them shelter for the night among the tents by the lake, that the new Prince of Edeyrnion got the full impact of his slowly accumulating thoughts. The Deganwy man had chosen a horse for him that was as steady as it was strong; for his knowledge of horses was nil, and he rode a little ahead of the others, neither of whom, though they knew horses, knew the sheep tracks across the moors as he did. And, as he rode, his soul hardened in its resolution to leave his new responsibility and to follow the emperor, even as the emperor was following Colgrim.

“Colgrim,” he told himself, “is clearly against giving battle till he has joined his brother; and the emperor’s horsemen are too few to do more than harass his march till he reaches Baldulf at Caer Badon.”

What he remembered later of this moonlit ride, during which, as far as his horse was concerned, he might have been mounted on a centaur who knew every mile of the way, were chiefly his thoughts about Creiddylad. He was heading now for the Brother’s cell, whither he had earlier that evening commanded little Neb, with Gunta mounted behind him on that plump roan horse, to meet him that night for food and sleep; and he kept thinking as he constantly had to pull up and look back, so as to keep the horse tamer and young Gwythyr in sight, how fate in four days, Thursday night to Friday night, Friday night to Saturday night, Saturday to Sunday, and Sunday to Monday, had changed his whole life and his whole life's future.

"What that Sais felt for Gunta's mother," he said to himself, "what Mother feels for Medrawd, what Brochvael feels for Sibylla, what Morfydd feels for old Rhun, I feel for Creiddylad! And she'd be alive now if it weren't for me. That's the way life goes. That's what life is. And a person has to face it. I shall enjoy myself still. I shall 'cavoseniargize' to the end of my days. But my Creiddylad is dead; whereas Edeyrn ap Cunedda's Creiddylad lives in her great-grandson, that is, in me."

It was by the edge of Lake Tegid that his longest pause was made, for an unexpected mist had come down from the Cader and the moonlight was obscured. It was a white mist that had descended, not a yellow one like that which he had seen on Thursday when he watched the river from above the Gaer gate. And it did not conceal every stretch of the horizon, but it produced, all the same for that, and in a sense because of that, an effect that increased the feeling he had that this night was destined to be a turning point in his life.

What the mist really did was to reduce the particular segment of the solid planetary orb upon which he stood to the quality of the airy space above it. This it did by taking the waters of Lake Tegid into partnership and by using them on this particular night as a magician might have used some powerful magnetic force to reverse at this special point in Space and Time the normal processes of Nature.

Certainly what Porius felt, as half a mile off on the mountainside the two horsemen who were following him appeared and disappeared and again reappeared, was that all the men and women he knew — his mocking progenitor excepted perhaps — were acting like madmen in the seriousness with which they took this business of life. "What does it matter," he asked himself, as he played with the fancy that a circle of rocks rising out of the water near him might be that actual cauldron of Ceridwen turned to stone for a thousand years, that cauldron upon which the boy Taliesin had brooded so long that he had come to believe the great goddess to have carried him in her womb, "what does it matter that I love Creiddylad, and that my mother loves Medrawd, and that Morfydd loves Rhun? Why should I take it so seriously that, as I stand here with the power of swimming backwards through Time or of flying upwards through Space, I have decided against going home to the Gaer? Why should there be in the world at all such tiresome actualities as Time stretching backwards without end, and Space stretching outward without end? Why should there be such a grotesque concatenation of incongruities as this clumsy Herculean fool that calls himself Porius ab Einion standing between Space without end and Time without end and holding it a tragic and important matter whether he, a dark-haired skeleton, covered with powerful muscles and hard flesh, should decide to fight against light-haired skeletons, also covered with powerful muscles and hard flesh, rather than stay at home and see his mother love his emperor's enemy, his wife love his own friend, and this same friend struggle to make Mynydd-y-Gaer, with all its relics of Rhitta Gawr, love the Persian Mithras more than the Jewish Jesus?

"Uncle Brochvael would be wiser," so his thoughts ran on, "to let me carry off Master Drom to Caergwynt, and go back to his chair by the fire, with Aristophanes on the table and Morfydd's old nurse within call.

"No, no! The real madness in this world is to take anything too seriously. Heaven help me, if that's not just what I'm doing now! How he over there would laugh at his solemn son turned mocker! The Lord help me, no! What I'll do for the rest of my days is neither to love nor laugh nor curse nor cry.

I'll pretend to be a god, a god who can create something out of nothing and can enjoy anything."

He remained by his imaginary cauldron of Ceridwen till Owain and Gwythyr reached him; and from there to Saint Julian's Fount — a distance of less than ten miles — he explained his intention of leaving Edeyrnion for an indefinite time.

Owain Pen Uchel made no precise comment; for he had the peculiarity, a useful one in his occupation, of expressing himself by extremely slight movements of hands and features, body and head. But his intermittent way of breaking the silence by subtle gradations of inarticulate sighs, groans, grunts, murmurs, and whistlings indicated that he possessed levels and layers of feeling from the recesses of which what he had just heard could hardly be accepted at its face value.

But it was a totally different thing with Gwythyr. Porius was affected a great deal more than he had supposed possible by the way Gwythyr received his cautious confession. He forgot that his thirty years of hunting and fishing and learning Latin and acquiring philosophy from Brother John struck Gwythyr as the life experience of a statesman. Not having the faintest notion how utterly his self-conscious reserve and his inability to mix easily had been misunderstood at both Mynydd-y-Gaer and Ogof-y-Gawr, it never occurred to him that a thoughtful and rebellious youth to whom his indulgent good nature had been a revelation could in this short space of time grow as devoted to him as was, with the natural difference of their age and sex, little Gunta herself.

"I'm a fool in every kind of way," he thought, when he actually caught a choking sound in the agitated protests of Nesta's youthful husband. "I ought to have kissed that cauldron-shaped rock in Tegid Lake; and then maybe I'd have got a sprinkling of the great goddess's wisdom and known how to deal with that touchy Pen Beirdd and with this sweet-natured boy too!"

Very soon, as they followed the curves of the sacred river, in order to distract Gwythyr's mind from their separation he began again asking him questions about the trouble at the death feast. This had the instantaneous effect of making the horse tamer drop behind. "Well! I shall take him with me. Our old Gaer stables can get on without experts. Besides, being used to Deganwy, he'll help me with the emperor's court."

"Yes, my Prince," Gwythyr was soon proudly saying. "I didn't see Her myself. But when the priest began calling on the crowd at the back where Nesta and I were standing to bear witness to the piety in our river town and to the pleasure we all got down there from building the church to Saint Julian and from the changing of the name from Mithras Market to Corwen or the White Choir, and some of us began supporting Master Drom and shouting that a Christian like him who followed the teachings of the learned Pelagius was far nearer to the truth than an upstart boy from the Bishop's School across the Mountain of the Mothers. She'd been whispering to me for some time what she felt, and when the old woman from Ty Cerrig shouted in the hearing of them all that the death of the Three Princesses and the murder of the druid and the plundering of Ogof-y-Gawr and Ogof-yr-Avanc by the Saeson were signs that the great powers of the forest and the river were angry and needed to be appeased, I couldn't restrain her; nor, my Prince, for I see you can endure all truths, did I try to restrain her. And she spoke like an inspired prophetess. She knew her father was away burying the Patrician, or I expect she wouldn't have dared to do as she did. And she knew the Lady Morfydd and not the Lady Euronwy was our ruler now.

"'Men of Edeyrnion,' she kept crying to them, 'why must you entoil and moil yourselves over difficult points of doctrine, disputing among yourselves whether the bishops are right or that saintly one from the sea the Greeks call Pelagius, and whether the Son of Man is best revealed in the marvel of a voice in a man's soul or the marvel of holy bread on the altar, when all the while we women know that it is the Mother of Jesus, the most pure, the most wise, the most merciful Mary, who can alone read the heart of her blessed Son and understand the will of the heavenly Father? What's the matter with you that these things are concealed from you and revealed to a girl like me?'

"And it was then, my Prince, as she cried those words aloud, that she suddenly began pointing with her finger to the part of the hall that was most shadowy, the part opposite to where the Lady Morfydd was sitting on the dais and the Lady Euronwy was sitting on that ordinary chair from her chamber, and as she pointed she cried, and I can hear her cry still, my Prince.

"'There!' she cried. 'I've called to her and she has come! I've prayed to her, and she has answered. There! There! — Look! Oh, look!' And at that she sank on the ground, covering her face and crying: 'Mother of God, save us! Mother of God, save us!' I was ready to kneel with her; though, as I say, my Prince, I had seen nothing, but the old nurse from Ty Cerrig pulled me aside and began undoing her clothes and slapping her hands, and acting as if she had a fit or something like that."

Out of respect for the lad's feeling Porius had been letting their horses move so slowly that it was not long after Gwythyr's narrative came to an end that he realized that the horse tamer from Deganwy had pulled up and was waiting for them. Indeed, when they reached him he fancied he detected an extremely cynical expression on the fellow's face.

"It's a trick of the moonlight," he told himself; but he had an uneasy feeling that the court which surrounded the present child-Prince of Deganwy, though not as yet as sophisticated as that which surrounded the emperor, was on the way to becoming so.

Arthur’s perpetual absence on his campaigns corresponded with this little boy’s perpetual absence on his pony or on his hobbyhorse; the result in both cases coming to resemble what was going on in Constantinople, namely, the rule of savage warriors and cruel despots alternating with that of passionate women and crafty priests. Thus though that curious look on the horse tamer’s face, when they caught him up and all three rode on abreast, might have been an effect of the moonlight, it might also have had to do, Porius decided, with the effect produced on the Deganwy man’s mind by the close link which had obviously come about between the new prince and his youthful retainer in the absence of their newly enjoyed wives.

It was anyway due to this link, whatever its nature, as well as due to Porius’s wretched horsemanship, that they had ridden so gently; and this had brought it about that their horses had remained quite fresh, so that now, when he would have liked to forget everything and to drown his feelings in the pure sensation of rapid movement, he couldn’t satisfy this craving because of a simple fear of being thrown from the animal’s back. Nevertheless, he did derive a quite peculiar and special satisfaction from pretending to himself he was crushing under his horse’s hooves all manner of thought excrescences and feeling excrescences that, like the toadstools the forest people called frog food, seemed to him, under the keel of that white moon-ship, to be dropping to the ground, like the diseased flesh of Gwydion’s wounded eagle who was in reality his incestuous son.

Along the well-known edge of Saint Julian’s Water he was leading his companions now, his consciousness as detached from that of the creature he rode as if they had been animals of different planets.

Under the wooden walls of the camp kitchen he went, and along by the edge of the water where the reed stalks had gathered to themselves out of the moonlight an unearthly tint that was neither green nor grey nor black nor brown, and could only be described by the adjective "Cimmerian," and, as his companions followed him, the hooves of their three horses struck against isolated pieces of wood and stone, splashed through water, and sank into mud; and though the sound they made in doing so was a confused one and could hardly be described by any of the usual poetical terms, the thudding past those ramshackle erections of what Homer might have called a dozen uncloven hooves would certainly have been audible to anyone lying awake, watching the moonlight, and listening to the lapping of the water, from the security of Craig Hen.

When at length they reached his own nuptial shelter the younger of his companions arrested his attention by the interest he showed in this small pavilion with the result that he himself, swerving in his seat and forgetting what he was doing, gave a blind and thoughtless jerk to his horse's head and came extremely near having a dangerous fall.

So near did he come to this undignified disaster that he pulled up altogether and jerked himself stiffly and awkwardly from the saddle to the ground.

"You two had better ride on," he said, with no attempt to excuse, or apologize for, the shock he had given them and given his horse. "Unless the ladies especially desire to see you — and of course it's possible they may — my advice to you both is to go to sleep as soon as you possibly can and for as long as you possibly can. Leave all drastic decisions till tomorrow. Don't think of dangerous things or of horrible things. Just go to sleep up there, thinking of nothing at all! Only remember I shall need you both back here by noon tomorrow and on horseback, though not necessarily on the same horses; fresh ones might be better. Don't tell different stories to the two ladies. In fact you'd better tell them the truth. But, truth or untruth, for God's sake tell them the same thing."

There was indeed a certain element of hesitation and reluctance about leaving him in both the men's manners. Porius dallied with the idea that it was pure personal affection for him on the part of Gwythyr and pure self-interest, though of a kind too subtle for him to follow, on the part of the man from Deganwy. One difference he could clearly gather from their words and behaviour: Gwythyr would have liked to have shared his wife's bed at the Gaer even if it were now nearly dawn; while Owain Pen Uchel would have been glad enough to tie up his horse outside Brother John's cell and to have enjoyed a pleasant midnight's colloquy with the new Gaer physician. Porius could read in his crafty but very expressive face his hope of finding somebody beside baby Magog celebrating the passing of midnight by a warm Jewish hearth where — though both mother and infant would doubtless be hushed in natural sleep — there might well be some savoury Israelitish brew, or at least some richly spiced Arabian drink, that had been solacing the occult studies of the learned doctor.

But Porius, suddenly attacked by all manner of alarms and apprehensions, had recourse now to his most taciturn, reserved, and aloof manner, begging them to be as silent as they could and to take his horse as well as their own back to the Gaer. As long as he could catch the faintest sound of their departure he remained motionless as an upright wooden post between the reeds and the blank wall of stone. But when, save for the faint lapping of the water, there was nothing to be heard but those infinitesimal night noises, for the naming of which there would be needed — on a moonlit night as much as on any other — the concentrated ear of a being as superior to man, in its apprehensive senses, as to any bird or beast, noises which might have been the faint squeals of shrew mice dreaming of predatory claws, or the languid ascendings to the surface of immature pond newts dimly stirred by the inescapable motions of Eros, or the sliding down into the watchful grasses of oak apples emptied of their softest dust, or the breaking of minute eel bubbles between the reed stalks, or the relaxing of bent leaves as the warm bodies of sleeping birds press closer to the branches, or the escape with a stir indescribable, yet not unworthy of being called a sound, of a feathery moth, whose desperate thirst for the last drop of perishing sweetness in some old dark-hidden, half-sucked poison berry had made it defiant of the shameless moon, then, indeed, save for the lapping of the water and these faint intermittent sounds of the creatures of the night, he was as completely surrounded by silence as the prow of an ice-bound ship in a frozen sea.

The curious feeling came over him as he stood there that he had entered an enchanted bubble of quiescence, gathered up for himself of his own volition, and hung by himself — though he had the power of entering into it — between the horns of Time and Space.

And he remembered how during all his years at the Bishop's School across the mountains when the talk ran upon the mysterious personality of Myrddin Wyllt there would be mention of some newfangled Gaulish word sounding — though it couldn't have been exactly that — like the syllables "esplumeoir." The feeling he had now was certainly connected with Myrddin Wyllt, and it suggested to his mind some interminable epoch during which he, along with Myrddin Wyllt, would be waiting for the arrival of some year, some day, some moment of time, that would prove the signal or the opportunity for a tremendous achievement which they were fated by an inescapable tynged, or "destiny," to accomplish together.

He looked at the massive silent grey wall of the Brother's cell. "It's still only Monday night," he thought, "and it was Thursday when I ate the Mithras honey with old Rhun and came here to sleep, my head full of Medrawd and that snake picture. Well! If it weren't for the emperor there'd be more of us dead than those two and the Modrybedd."

But it wasn't "those two" nor the Three Aunties who dominated his mind as he moved to the familiar entrance. It was Brother John himself. Fresh from the Patrician's grave he noticed at once the disturbed earth and the strange collection of pious offerings which at the order of Lot-el-Azziz, or of the recumbent Moabitess, or even perhaps, by the look of certain small objects, from the hands of the youthful Gog, decorated the edge of the newly replaced stones and gravel.

And then he was aware of an aspect of his feelings that struck him as a curious phenomenon. He hadn't seen the Patrician die; whereas he had seen Brother John die. Was it for this very reason that in spite of his much greater intimacy with the latter he felt far less concerned about his face than he had felt just now up there on the mountains.

He felt as though there was nothing really essential of the old Brother's identity that had been laid away in that pit. But he had scarcely come to this conclusion than he heard a horse — or it may have even been two horses — make some small uneasy movements in the old shed, beyond the left-hand doorpost, and he had barely advanced a step in the direction of this sound than he found himself facing quite a large group of sleeping forms. There indeed were the horses — all three of them — just as he had left them outside Gwendydd's pavilion; and crouching beside these animals, their heads pillowed on fresh-cut bracken, were the immobile figures of Neb ap Digon and Gunta ferch Gunhorst.

Both the children were so deeply asleep that they might have been dead. Gunta's right arm lay across the boy's chest, and her own face was pressed against the deep mass of green bracken under their heads, while the relentless moon, like an Egyptian spirit of judgment, made clear by the way the doll's feet were protruding from beneath its mistress's cloak that she had overlaid it in her sleep.

Neb was lying on his back, his little pinched face carrying upon its indrawn lines and hollow cavities such a weight of responsibility that Porius hurriedly tiptoed backwards and bending down to avoid the low stone lintel entered the portico.

"The poor child! The poor child!" he thought. "May I be damned as deep as Medrawd if I add to his cares tonight!"

And that small face, tossed back against the moonlit heap of heavily scented bracken, the face of some infantile descendant of ten generations of world rulers, hovered at the back of his mind during all the impressions he received that night and only melted away when he too was asleep.

It seemed indeed that it was into the very citadel and sanctuary of sleep that he entered now. The Moabitess was asleep by the fire with the newborn in her arms and little Gog on the floor at her feet. Stretched out on the bed where the Brother had died and propped up by every pillow in the place, including the one that was stuffed with the softest feathers and kept for royal or at least for courtly visitors, was Myrddin Wyllt; while Lot-el-Azziz, balanced on the edge of the bed, was rubbing the counsellor's legs and every now and then listening intently through his familiar ram's horn to his formidable patient's heart throbs.

Reposing on the couch Porius himself had so often used and on the side of the fire opposite to the daughter of Moab, lay, and she at least was fully awake, the perilous and lovely Nineue. The fire was burning warmly and steadily, for there was peat mixed with the wood, but at this particular moment there were few flames, and the only light in that chamber of sleep came from a torch just above Nineue's head with its brown curls and wide-open eyes.

There was something in the mere fact that the couch on which the beautiful Ffichtiaid lay was on the floor and not raised up, as was the bed beneath the centre arch of the chamber, that intensified the attraction of that prostrate figure by making it, as it were, the magnetic pearl at the bottom of a shadowy wooden bowl, the meaning of which was that the whole circumference of this softly curving rondure drew a stranger down to the shell-like loveliness ensconced in its depths.

Porius noticed at once that at the head of the raised bed under the central arch there was a tall table whereon rested a massive silver bowl full of steaming mead on the surface of which floated two small cups, from which it looked probable that at increasingly short intervals both patient and doctor had been heavily drinking.

The doctor in truth was already nodding over his task, and the counsellor was unmistakably in one of those semi-trances from the depth of which he might utter any tremendous planetary oracle, or, on the other hand, might start babbling some incoherent gibberish that sounded like ancient Greek.

Nobody but the doctor seated on the edge of the bed and the Ffichtiaid woman lying on the floor by the fire seemed to notice Porius's entrance; and, of these, the doctor merely made a helpless shrug and a deprecating gesture, indicating his complete inability to suggest in what portion of this hall of sleep the newcomer could find a place, while Nineue, without beckoning to him or smiling at him, deliberately and quietly made room for him on the couch by her side.

No sooner had he made an answering gesture to this unequivocal though mute signal than the doctor went back to rubbing the magician's legs, while Myrddin Wyllt, apparently unaware of his presence, went on muttering a sentence in Greek which he knew from his schooling on the other side of the Mountain of the Mothers must refer to the huge earth hiding something.

Hiding what? But in truth such an overpowering longing for sleep had begun to fall upon him that he cared not what it hid. All he desired just then, all he could endure without pain just then, was to sink down to the uttermost floor of the universe and sleep there while aeons of time moved through their fatal spirals.

But there was not for Porius at that moment a single moth's-wing shiver of hesitation as to what he should do. He crossed over to the couch on the floor of the chamber just as if it had been on the floor of the universe, and he met the grey eyes of Nineue under that single torch as if they had been the eyes of the mother of Cronos.

But the strange thing was that when he stood before Nineue and shamelessly began undressing as if they had been alone in that place and had known each other for four years rather than for only four days, though he was craving for the release of sleep as if it were the removal of an iron band from his forehead, he was not in the least drugged in his wits or confused in his senses. The movements of his muscles as he took off his clothes and untwisted the deerskin straps from his legs were accompanied by the rapid movements of thoughts so detached, so uninvolved, so independent, that it was a wonder they didn't paralyze the natural reactions of his senses or reduce them to a tantalized sullenness.

But there was no such effect. His mind moved actively on its plane and his senses abandoned themselves on their plane. And there was an easy and natural interplay between them. Had his mind been less active his senses would not have been led on as they were nor have recorded what they did. And yet it would be untrue to say that the man's conscious self behind his thoughts and behind his senses was happy that night. It was unhappy. It was a self in pain; it was a self with an iron bar round its forehead; it was a self that behind its thought dancing and sense swimming had only one infinite longing — the longing to go to sleep.

Among the thoughts that raced through his mind as he lay down by Nineue, and for several minutes contented himself with thrusting his left arm beneath her body so that he had her so to speak at his disposal, was a somewhat poignant awareness of the comic element, that element so cruel and merciless and universal, which the refining of human lechery for good and evil by the Christian revelation had introduced into the bed of Eros.

He was also aware as he lay there of a thing that struck him as very odd; namely, that whenever he met her eyes under the single torch — for, turned towards her now, he had begun stroking her side as if she were a feathered creature liable at any second to take flight — he got the impression that his caresses were only a minor element in a long-drawn-out, quietly muted ecstasy to which she had begun to abandon herself before he appeared on the scene at all, a subsexual sensuous ecstasy, practically identical with his self-centred "cavoseniargizing."

And this suited Porius perfectly. Nothing indeed could have been easier for him just then than to fall in with such a mood if only, yes, if only he were not so sick for sleep.

But, for all that, if this strange being desired to enjoy every subtle delight of the first approaches of male to female before she would let him sleep, if indeed Nature had given her a skin as uniquely responsive and delicate to the touch and as slippery-soft as Aphrodite's own, for no other purpose than that the deliciousness of sex free from all passion should be added to the planetary sensations he called “cavoseniargizing,” who was he to reject such delicate sharing, even if, for still another painful moment, he had to hold sleep at bay?

He was never able afterwards — intensely as he tried at a later time and painfully distinct though all his thoughts were in retrospect — to trace the connection between the look of his grandfather’s closely cropped and proudly moulded Roman head as he caught a glimpse of it on the back of the horse when, holding in his hand the loaf of Jewish bread he was devouring, for he had been hungry for hours, he hurried out to meet the two who had brought the body, between, in fact, the look of the old man’s skull as he saw it then and the taste of the honey Sacrament he had shared with Rhun in the Cave.

But that there was such a connection he felt certain; and he trusted, as he might have done in a dream, that all would presently be made clear. As the distracting and maddening silkiness of her yielded body began to make dalliance predatory and desire rapacious, he found that his desperate craving for sleep which a moment ago had become a band of iron round his head had dissolved away. Its place was taken, however, by a dance of thought that was as frantic in its desperation as it was shameless in its direction.

And yet as he recalled his feelings later in cold blood he recognized that at the moment when his embrace of that Persephonean form was in the act of being perfected he received from some divine power — from which of the divine powers how the devil was he to know? — a lighthouse-clear intimation as to his affection for Morfydd and reckless love of Creiddylad. For he recognized now what the real cause was of the fate, or tynged, laid on him never to know what normally is called love.

Yes, at the age of thirty he had to accept the fact that he could never know the famous passion as his mother knew it for Medrawd, and Morfydd for Rhun, and Rhun for Gwendydd, and even, if the Gaer rumour could be trusted, Sibylla for the late prince.

And the cause was that with him all erotic feelings were distinct and separate, and, though he could feel many different emotions for the same object and even at the same moment, they never coalesced or were fused into one; whereas it was out of the fusion into a single burning flame of many different elements that what is called "the passion of love" comes into existence.

And now under that torch and to the tune of the steady breathing of the exhausted Moabitess and her two sons varied by the guttural invocations of the doctor as he murmured an ancient Rabbinical prayer for the punctual appearance of a divinely directed sunrise, the new ruler of Edeyrnion drew from that form between his hands in the ravishing of which he seemed to be ravishing, or the perilous full moon was indeed fooling him, all the waters of the Divine River itself and all the enchanted swamps and forests between Deganwy and Eryri, such a revelation about his fate in regard to the women of his life as he had never imagined could be revealed about what Brother John used to call ta erotica, or "the things of Eros," by any woman to any mortal man!

And these things were not revealed to him in words by Nineue, nor by looks, nor by the passage of her thoughts into his. She, as he knew well, was "cavoseniargizing" in his own fashion. That is to say, she was drawing into herself the torchlight on the rafters, the oriental abandonment to the peace of the desert of the mother of Gog and Magog, the boyish fits and starts of Gog, the impenetrable serenity, like the moon on the Lake of Galilee, of Magog's slumber, the extraordinary, hardly human shadows, thrown upon the wall beyond the bed of the doctor and the magician, physically so closely involved, but mentally further apart than the Pillars of Hercules and the Sea of Marmora; and beyond all these she was drawing into herself the whole vast moonlit night outside this place, and the ridges beyond ridges of rocks and precipices and forests and hilltops and mountaintops, including those across which — played hither, played thither, by the great chess-playing emperor to whom the game of war was the breath of life — those simple-minded young horsemen were even now driving and decoying and coaxing and again driving the savage yellow-heads of Colgrim the Sais, driving them towards Badon Mount in Gwlad-yr-Haf, yes! and including scenes of which she could know nothing, such as that appalling mountain tarn, not so far away from here, whose horror, of all the dwellers in Edeyrnion he alone knew, knew indeed so well that he had only to shut his eyes at this moment to see it clearly and completely.

"Yes," he thought, "she's enjoying herself just as I do. There's the difference, of course, that she draws into herself the things she enjoys, whereas I fling myself into the things I enjoy. But that's only because she's a woman and I'm a man. Otherwise our enjoyment's the same. Sex is a side issue with both of us. I knew it directly I first saw her. I guessed it when the old counsellor first spoke of her to Rhun and me on our way to Gwendydd's tent."

Once more the taste of that Jewish loaf he was so ravenously munching when he heard the horses and went out to meet Gwythyr and the other with the old Roman's body came back to him. He had swallowed the whole of that loaf before he rode on with them, and it was twice as large as those of the Gaer kitchen, thrice as large as those made by the old woman at Ty Cerrig.

Magog’s mother must have baked it just before her pains came on — perhaps while they were actually beginning. It was Jewish bread and it was family bread, and how remote, how absolutely alien to his whole world of sensation was the family — the holy, sacred, must-be-preserved, must-be-obeyed family!

“I’m like him over there,” he said to himself, “in this business of the family. Only I yield to it entirely when I’m in it and run away from it altogether when I get the chance; whereas he defied it, treated it with open irony, and acted as if it didn’t exist.”

And then it occurred to him that the very manner of making love to her in which he was at this moment indulging, was, though full of the particular kind of imaginative and poetic subtlety that evidently suited them both so well, more like the lovemaking of one of the saurian monsters that his prototype Hercules was always slaying than it was like the furious rush of erotic obsession which marked that hero’s amours.

“Am I so like this she-devil, this ellylles,” he said to himself, “that I can leave Morfydd, shake off my mother, treat the tragic death of the Three Aunties as if it had happened when I was a baby instead of yesterday, separate myself from old Rhun with whom I entered into a covenant of brothers-in-arms, and finally — and finally—” But at that point he became aware of a singular fact. The image of his mother, the image of Morfydd, the image of Rhun could all float up and down on the tide of his present dalliance, but the desperate gasping cry of passion and pain with which Creiddylad had yielded to him, and that false, old, stupid, Christian tag about “love” being “enough” which she had so proudly and pitifully allowed to be torn from her heart, these things he had to hold off; and as a man in a boat on a swift stream pushes away with his oar across the dark water some huge floating log that otherwise would sink his light craft, so he had to thrust from his mind the thought of Creiddylad.

But what he couldn't shut from his mind was the figure of Myrddin Wyllt as he lay on Brother John's bed throwing a monstrous shadow that was divided into two halves. He remembered how last Thursday night from that same bed Brother John had jested about the Homeric epithet for the father of the father of gods and men! "Crooked counselling" enough looked the emperor's counsellor, as he lay there in his huge unwieldiness, but his shadow was different. His shadow divided itself into two portions, one of which fell on the stone arch, just beyond the bed, and the other on the broad wooden rafter, above the window slit that faced east.

And Porius found himself, as he thrust both his hunger and his dead giantess out of his mind and went on making love, more in the procrastinating manner of one of Hercules' monsters than of their slayer, catching a glimpse, if he turned his head away from Nineue for a moment, of an aspect of the counsellor's face — and this appeared more in the shadow than in the face itself — that would, he thought, have aroused awe even in the prejudiced Rhun or the exacting Brochvael.

The man's actual features, as Porius caught them at this particular moment of his own shameless preoccupation, were just as ugly, just as monstrous even, as he had noted them at his first encounter, but they were something else.

Lot-el-Azziz was sound asleep now, his high forehead resting on his ram's horn, which itself, either by chance or providential intervention, was neatly and firmly balanced upon the counsellor's bare chest, and his breath coming as evenly and quietly as the sleeping breath of a wild ass, safe in a cave on the slopes of Mount Hermon.

But the weight of that rabbinical forehead seemed to cause not the slightest discomfort to the counsellor. His breath also rose and fell evenly, causing the oddly shaped head upon his breast to rise and fall with it; but it was not his impenetrable quietness that gave Porius this strange feeling of awe and that animated with so majestic a dignity the counsellor's subhuman features. An emanation of some tremendous magnetic force — some godlike force Porius was tempted to call it — radiated from that monstrous physiognomy.

It was as if quite lazily, languidly, carelessly, easily, naturally, the counsellor was in the act, at that very moment, of playing the part of some pre-Olympian creator of cosmic powers and shapes and essences.

What in fact soon became a kind of background to his "cavoseniargizing, "as that itself was already the background of his dalliance with Nineue, was the sense of being upheld, he and Nineue alike, and all the rest with them, on a cloud of magnetic power, that might take, if the god who was moulding it and directing it so willed, the familiar forms and colours of the world to which they were accustomed, but which might also, at the fiat of the same power, assume startlingly unfamiliar and overwhelmingly new forms and shapes!

It did just flicker once across his consciousness before this semi-rational condition vanished in sleep that it proved how correctly he over there had estimated the intelligence of his offspring, that he who had undertaken, he who had felt himself entrusted by the emperor and by all Ynys Prydein to undertake the protection of the counsellor, and who had sworn to associate himself with Neb ap Digon in the same task, should now have given himself up to this she-devil; given himself up to her who was, after Colgrim the Sais, and after Medrawd the madman, and after the nameless young priest, the worst enemy the counsellor had, and maybe that all Ynys Prydein had!

Why then didn’t he feel compunction at sleeping with Nineue like this? Why didn’t he feel the faintest prick of conscience? Once more he turned his head round a little and surveyed that tremendous shape with the Jewish doctor’s high forehead rising and falling with every breath the figure drew.

Yes! There was the reason! He and this woman, together with Neb and Gunta outside, and all of them within this place, and together no doubt, if the “herdsman from the south” cared to summon them, with all the birds and beasts and reptiles of the neighbourhood, were completely in this mysterious being’s power.

Nineue herself — ah! she must have known that all along! — couldn’t really hurt her titanic lover against his own will. What Porius felt for Nineue was certainly not love. But on the other hand it could not be called unmixed lust. The odd thing about it was that it revealed itself — this queer strong link between them — as naturally, and easily, and as completely without shyness, as if they had been disembarking upon a familiar shore every inch of which they had known in former times and known together.

Whether she fell asleep before he did he never discovered. Probably their separate consciousness faded into oblivion simultaneously; but at any rate for Porius, as he sank into nothingness at her side, there came, just before he slept, a sensation that had to do with poplar leaves, poplar leaves that were whirling and circling, eddying and circling, drifting and circling, quivering and circling, and were finally lying at rest; lying at rest among the willow leaves that had drawn them there, and that themselves had come to rest upon a moss that is softer than any leaves, the soft white moss that grows on the bank of the ocean-river, across which, however long you look, you cannot see the bank on the other side.

CHAPTER XXIX. The Half-Woman

IN HER ANXIETY TO FIND EURONWY, so as to ask her advice about the agitations of that disturbed death feast, Morfydd hurried from end to end of the dimly lit corridors of the Gaer. After seeking her in vain in her chamber she began looking for her and asking for her in the eastern part of the great fortress.

Glancing into the littered and desolate banquet hall, which, save for dead bodies and spilt blood, resembled the hall of Aegisthus after the murder, she was startled to see a man talking surreptitiously and furtively, but with an eager, nervous, shivering intensity, to a group of young men belonging to the Gosgordd who were helping to clear the hall. There were several serving girls in the open doorway watching and listening; and since her own head was covered — as were the heads of the other girls — so that her features in that shadowy torchlight were neutralized to an obscure white blur, she didn't hesitate to advance among the other loiterers a little nearer to the man so as to catch something of what he was saying. She had inherited from her mother not only a bold light step but a bold light spirit and a mind prepared for unexpected and even improbable events.

So that when she recognized in the man, though he was specially dressed to avoid such recognition, the features of Medrawd the emperor's nephew, heir to the sovereignty of Ynys Prydein, she retained her presence of mind in a manner that few Brython maids could have shown. She pulled her shawl still closer about her head and moved up near to the group.

At the first she had suspected treachery; and she soon found that Medrawd was explaining to the young men the total impossibility of the emperor’s overtaking Colgrim before he joined his brother at Mount Badon, the certainty that the combined armies of the Saeson would be unassailable in that particular spot, and his own secret information from friends in Northern Gaul who knew the ways of the Saeson in their native land that since their population was increasing so rapidly, and increasing in proportion to their growing skill in ship building, there wasn’t the faintest chance that the emperor would be able permanently to keep them out. Colgrim’s invasion was nothing, she heard him explain, to what would follow.

The important thing was that all the Brythons who were sick of the House of Cunedda and sick of the other Christian princes in the south who resembled them should join with the forest people in calling themselves “comrades,” or “Cymry,” and be prepared, when the signal was sent round, to act as the great Gortheyrn did and cry “Drincheil!” and drive out Rome and her Christian bishops and return to the Derwyddon and the ancient ways.

“Yes,” she heard in that low clear deadly voice, “yes, we must do more than Gortheyrn did! The great Gortheyrn’s work was undone by his son Gorthevyr Bendigeit, who brought back all those curst foreign priests and bishops before Ronwen had time to stop his mouth forever. But we must do better! We must kill off not only the leaders but all their perverted followers.”

Morfydd had the wit to slip out of the hall before the heir to Arthur’s throne had finished explaining his plans for the transformation of the people he wished to rule, by the massacre of half of them and the introduction of thousands of fair-haired Ronwens from the forests of the north for the founding of a new and less scrupulous nation; but she was now assaulted by many troublesome doubts.

Did Euronwy know of Medrawd’s presence here? And, if she did, what was she going to do? Did she know how far his treacheries went? “I must find my father,” Morfydd thought. “And if I can’t find him I must just swallow my pride and send somebody to get hold of Rhun. This is without question what they call a man’s business.”

She smiled as she moved slowly down the corridor, her feet instinctively seeking the chapel, for without troubling to give her feeling the form of words she thought vaguely of various occasions when she would have liked the chance of settling such “businesses” out of hand.

But she followed her instinct and moved slowly down the torchlit passage, trying to compel her thoughts to settle themselves into some sort of practical direction. “I wonder,” she thought, “whether Mother felt like this when she first came to Ty Cerrig. I’d give something to know what she’d do in my place.”

But these thoughts were only ripples crisscrossing the surface of her mind, and below them there went on, swimming backwards and forwards, like two great dark-finned fish, the question “Would that one single night with Porius result in a child?” and the question “If not — for it was too soon to know yet — and if Porius remained away with the emperor for half a year, would she have the courage and spirit to make Rhun give her the child she must have?”

And then as she came to the chapel door and smelt a distinct wafture of this morning’s incense still hovering about the place, she remembered the vow she and Euronwy had made there together, she on the relics of Rhitta Gawr, and Euronwy on the Holy Sacrament.

Standing now on the threshold, but sufficiently in the shade of the doorpost for her presence to be invisible to anyone within the chapel, she remembered exactly the terms of her own vow, for she had obeyed every one of these terms, in spirit and to the letter.

She had sworn to exert herself to the limit on behalf of Porius as a warrior and a prince and a descendant of Cunedda; and she had done so. Euronwy had sworn the same. But had she done so? If the rumours that ran through the Gaer were true she scarcely had. At least the old Patrician wouldn't have considered she had; nor would Porius himself, if he'd heard what his wife had just heard from the emperor's nephew!

That same wife who might, for all she herself knew so far, have the embryo of a new descendant of Cunedda within her, now found herself staring at her own shadow as it was waveringly and dimly thrown by a smoking torch suspended in a bronze sconce by an iron hook in the wall a little to the left of her sheltering doorpost.

"You've got to be brave," she told herself. "If you can only be brave and can manage to stay brave, anything may happen! But you must know what you'd like to happen, you who threw the man you wanted out of your bed to keep yourself for the man who doesn't want you! You must know what you'd like to happen, and that's not so easy!"

"Not so easy!" repeated that fluttering shadow of a girlish Gwyddyles with a Brythonic cloak over her small head, as the new Gaer Princess straightened her shoulders, swung round the doorpost, and crossed the trothwy, or "threshold," of that prehistoric place of worship. Rededicated to the Trinity as it had been since the days of Edeyrn, in the heart of the old fortress of Pen-y-Gewri, where reposed the relics of Rhitta Gawr, King of Kings, this rock cavern had gathered into itself, fold upon tremendous fold, the hierarchic mantle of the sacred terrors of aeons of Time.

True child of her mother in this, for, as Prince Einion used to declare from his knowledge of Sibylla, every Gwyddyles is a walking weathervane of response to the supernatural, Morfydd had taken very seriously her covenant with Euronwy to build up the career of Porius as the heroic strong man of the House of Cunedda.

So seriously had she taken it that, during the recent eventful days, she had avoided like a sacrilege the entrance to this ancient shrine. And even now, had her shadow been able to watch her movements, it would have noticed that her long white wrist and nervous fingers clung with a lingering caress to the time-worn doorpost of the chapel as though it needed an effort to leave even that poor protection.

There was someone in this consecrated retreat, but instead of it being Euronwy, whom she expected to find there — lo! it was Rhun! And what on earth was Rhun doing at this hour and in this place? She stood motionless, watching him in petrified silence, praying desperately that the steps she kept hearing in the passage she had just traversed wouldn't approach this threshold. Nobody but herself and Porius — for her dead brother regarded him as a superstitious fanatic — could possibly know how unnatural, how weird, how beyond all rational possibility it was to find this faithful soldier of Mithras in a place where the new worship of Jesus overlapped with the prehistoric cult of Rhitta Gawr.

But it was clear to her, though it wouldn't have been clear to anyone else in the world, that Rhun wasn't thinking of his hero-god or of any god, heroic or otherwise, at that moment. He was sitting on the kneeling bench with his back to the double shrine, a broken sword across his knees, broken in half it would seem, with the pointed end clutched in his hand and his head drooping above it, and he was crying like a small boy. The difference, however, between the crying of a grown man and that of a boy is a difference hard to describe because there is more in it than the contrast in mere weight and volume of feeling.

Though Homer compares the expression of heroic grief to the wailing of sea eagles, there could be found a nearer likeness for a strong man shaken by a storm of feeling in the swaying trunk of a knotted tree that shudders to its roots under the rush of a storm, or even in the groaning bulk of a vast ship yielding to the pressure of monstrous waves. It was not only the yellowish rays that spread out into the chapel from the torch above Morfydd's head that gave to this primeval shrine its unusual appearance.

Although the moon itself was invisible it was impossible not to feel the unearthly influence of moonlight. There was indeed a weird atmosphere in the place that was almost like the atmosphere that hangs about a corpse. A ghost herself, the invisible moon seemed to have sucked out the whole inward life, the pith, the sap, the blood juice, of this heart of the old Gaer fortress. In some odd way the Gaer itself seemed to have been detached by some magnetic pull of moon suction from the rest of the earth, as if the moon were anxious to draw it into herself so that it might soothe the icy ache of one of those hollow breasts of extinct craters.

And if the moon were thus sucking the blood from the Gaer, she was doing the same thing to a couple of faint, barely perceptible stars that were just visible to Morfydd through the arrow-slit window. These stars appeared to be receding, and receding under the compulsion of some secret purpose of their own, into an infinity of moon-sucked, life-drained, corpse-grey Space.

If Morfydd neither advanced instantaneously towards Rhun, nor retreated as quietly as she had come, it was not because she lost her self-control or suffered any diminution of her initiative. On the contrary, the self within her that had the power of watching and criticizing her active and instinctive self, hurriedly, suddenly, and with a shock of astonishment, noticed the fact that the sight of Rhun with his head bowed over his broken sword and big tears falling between his knees, instead of driving her to collapse into an emotional chaos, heartened, strengthened, and solidified to an incredible concentration of power and confidence the force of her love for him.

And this was not all. The sight of his weakness not only put strength into her; it rendered that strength calm, resourceful, and disinterested. This moment's pause, therefore, during which she took with her whole soul a deep restorative breath was one of formidable illumination. And it was on the strength of this that she acted at once. She recrossed the chapel threshold and standing on tiptoe on the stone bench under the wall succeeded in disengaging the solitary torch from its support. With this she re-entered the chapel; and after closing the double doors with an iron bar thrust the light she carried into an ancient silver sconce that projected from the wall and going straight up to her old playmate, slid down on the bench by his side, and heedless of the sword on his knees threw her arms round his neck and pulled his head against her shoulder.

And the odd thing was that though she had done this spontaneously she told herself with convincing force that Rhun had counted on her appearance, had willed her to join him here, and with a blind, simple, animal-like instinct had drawn her to his side on the bench.

And with that spluttering, smoking, spitting, shadow-throwing torch full in her eyes, and his forehead against her chin, what she now felt was that he was doing the thing he had come to do, namely, to pour out in a torrent of hurt and outraged feelings the whole accumulation of his wrath against Gwendydd.

And Morfydd had good need of the deep reservoir of strength upon which, to her own growing surprise, she found herself able to draw. Rhun was certainly letting himself go as he had rarely done even in their old childish days. His bitterness against Gwendydd kept expressing itself in animal-like groans of pain.

“She simply led me on,” he kept groaning, “from start to finish. She must have taken me for a prize fool, for a gullible fool, for a double-dyed, uneducated, rustic fool, in fact for the tribe’s pet idiot! She intended just simply to use me and our whole quest about Pelagius to establish her and her damned Greek pirate in the favour of their emperor!”

But if Morfydd’s natural human tendency — feminine realist though she was — to give Rhun’s feelings the imponderable turn that suited her best was fully alive, as he confessed his infatuation for Gwendydd, and his shameful sins against the Sacrament of Mithras, she couldn’t help detecting that he was able to tell her all this only because the kind of brother-and-sister comrade trust he had for her precluded the shyer, more complicated, more touchy aspects of sex relationship.

And when he came to tell her about Sibylla’s return and what had been happening that very evening she withdrew her arm from his neck and allowed him to sit straight up on their bench and face her. She had noted his absence from the death feast, but no rumour had reached her as to why he’d been absent.

But he was blurting it all out to her now, shamelessly, pitifully, recklessly, just as if she had been one of those select “participants” in the secret Mithraic rites who were the spiritual “directors” and “sin absolvers” of the humbler “soldiers” of Mithras.

“It was when your father,” he was telling her now, “with that handsome idiot he drags about with him had gone back to Ty Cerrig after leaving the prince’s body in the church. I had a feeling that Porius ab Einion had treated me unfairly; leaving me to fight with this thrice-accurst Jesus man for the honour of our House while he — you don’t mind my talking like this, do you? — was defending Ynys Prydein and going about with the emperor! I tried to tell Porius ab Einion what I felt when I was doing him homage — you don’t mind my talking like this, my dear, do you? — but you know how oddly remote and inhuman — superhuman you could almost say — our Porius can be when you tell him things outside the scope of his own interests, things I mean that haven’t to do with Rhitta Gawr, or with Pwyll Pen Annwn, or the Cewri of the Cader?”

Rhun was sitting erect and facing her now, and only at agitating moments when she asked direct questions did he lower his head or fix his eyes on his broken sword. The bronze point of this sword was a dancing place now for two separate reflected flames from the torch in front of them, flames which kept advancing by mutual leaps and bounds only to vanish into nothingness where the point ended.

She couldn’t help smiling when Rhun spoke of Porius’s inhuman aloofness and absorption in his own reactions, and she felt no treachery to her husband in nodding her sympathetic agreement with this philosophical discovery.

Rhun went on to tell her how he had always recognized this same characteristic in Porius’s father.

“It was because of this feeling of mine,” he explained, “that I had no heart for Einion’s death feast. You’ve always defended Einion ab Iddawc; but I’ve never — peace to his soul! — understood him, nor he me. Nor do I think he understood my mother, his own sister. You never used to agree when I told you that Porius was more like him than either of them realized — but we won’t argue about that now! Anyway the idea came into my head that you and Porius would want somebody to keep Ogof-y-Gawr from falling to bits. I don’t mean keep it, of course, anything like what it’s been with the Aunties there; but not let it fall into complete ruin; and I thought I'd go over there anyway and see what the place looked like."

He paused and gave her an almost sharp look in the flickering light that was suspended opposite them. Yes, it seemed to him that her attention was grave and sympathetic. She wasn't despising him or laughing at him, even if she wasn't, and naturally couldn't, go on feeling, in spite of that morning at the Cave, fond of him in the way girls can go on feeling fond of men.

"Well! Do you know what I found? And you must remember, Morfydd, that I was upset, really upset, though I feel so different now that I can scarcely believe I'm the same person as I was when we left Einion ab Iddawc in the church. I found Sibylla, the Gwyddyles! Yes, the mother of that little girl you brought to my cave. Yes, Sibylla herself, your mother's pet! I was feeling desperate, Morfydd. In fact I was feeling — for I don't mind telling you, who know me so well, everything I felt — I was feeling as if I couldn't go on with my duty to Mithras, or with my duty to Porius, or with my duty to the emperor. And then suddenly I came upon her. She was — well! it doesn't matter exactly where — but she was on the threshold of Ogof-y-Gawr. Amreu ap Ganion was standing over her, staring and smiling — you know the way he smiles — and he was smiling still when I bade him take himself off and told him I'd question her myself as to what had happened and what she hoped was going to happen. Amreu and his wife seem to have gone back to Ogof-y-Gawr directly the Saeson left. Your father had put that wounded High Prince from the Southern Isles under their care at Ty Cerrig, but old Canna took one of her crazy dislikes to the fellow, abusing him shamefully, accusing him of cowardice, and declaring that he ought to be driven into the sea along with the Saeson, and saying—"

But Morfydd interrupted him impatiently. "Never mind the High Prince, Rhun," she cried. "Go on about Sibylla! I suppose you're going to live with her now?"

To her startled sight she actually beheld Rhun give a grave little nod.

The new Lady of the Gaer leapt to her feet and swung round to face him while he remained still seated, doing his best to assume a careless and nonchalant air. But she looked over his head at the deep aperture of the window through which it was still possible to see one of the two stars. This star was still travelling on and on, travelling where anything was possible except an end to possibility. And as her eyes followed that small mistily visible speck of quivering light, while her knees touching his knees caused the broken sword to give a shiver, she realized that this was a crisis.

If she gave way to a weak outburst of jealousy at this moment her whole command of the situation — Porius carried off by this mad magician, her father lost in this fantastical Drom, Euronwy under the spell of this treacherous Medrawd, and now Rhun, in his fury with Gwendydd, caught by a returned Sibylla — yes! her whole command of the situation might be lost. Backwards and forwards her whole body swayed. Her emotional agitation wasn't perceptible to him; but it would have been perceptible to the spirits of the long-dead invokers of Pwyll Pen Annwn, and of Pryderi the son of Rhiannon, and of Ceridwen of the magic cauldron, and of the all-powerful Rhitta Gawr.

The air in that ancient sanctuary of her father's people seemed full of witnesses as her vow with Euronwy came back to her. If Euronwy, the daughter of a Christian Patrician, could break her vow, she, the descendant of the heathen Cunedda, would not break hers. "But it isn't the vow," she thought. "And it isn't that Porius has gone to the emperor without seeing me again, or that you can't love me, and it isn't that you" — and she caused the sword to slip a little further towards her— "are so easy a prey for that woman. It's that—" And she only half-listened while Rhun told her how he had found Sibylla so worn-out and so pitifully still, so ragged and dishevelled and half-naked, and yet "with something about her."

Ah, how well Morfydd knew that "something about her!" That was the "something" that had caught Einion ab Iddawc and had come so near to catching Brochvael ab Iddawc too!

And had the Henog of Dyfed been describing her feelings at that moment he would have made her tell herself in bold Silurian words: "I shall require no one to demand my rights but myself."

But she did wonder a little at that moment, so clear-headed was the realistic Gwyddyles in her blood, how long he could go on talking to her two breasts, both of which seemed more conscious than usual of the pressure of the garment that covered them, while she continued to stare out of the window at the solitary star that was still slowly and obstinately pursuing the vanished one.

What was the fantastic relief that this childish creature, whom fate had made her one of all, found he derived from telling her all this? For he was actually confessing to her now how he had carried this tragic wanderer, half-naked as she was, into the bedchamber nearest to the porch, the chamber that had once been the murdered Erim's, and how he had seduced her there, or been seduced by her there, and how he had left her with a promise to seek permission to carry out a daring plan of hers.

At this point Morfydd caused the broken sword between them to slip down with a clang upon the stone floor, and at last their eyes did meet.

"What daring plan of hers?" she enquired as calmly as she could.

And he began to explain, looking into her face as freely and happily as if they'd been at the home rock waiting for the slow-running Porius, how it was really a plan of the smiling Amreu's— "or of his laughing wife," thought Morfydd, "or more likely still of Sibylla herself' — and how in his own opinion it was a very wise one, as far as the interest of the House of Cunedda was concerned; the idea, namely, that Ogof-y-Gawr should once more become the dominant centre of the forest people, with the son of Alarch the Fair, daughter of Princess Indeg, as its head, and he, if possible, with a Gwyddyles for his wife.

Morfydd let him go on with all this talk about a new era of history for the old llys of the Aunties, but, as he talked, something in the depths of her soul rose up in proud independence, in defiance of him, and of her husband, and of her father, and of them all.

"Though Porius has gone," she told herself, "and though Rhun is like this, and though Dad's caught by that Jesus pimp of a man-girl, and though Euronwy's broken her vow and gone over to Medrawd, I'll be myself still! After all, I've got the power I've always told myself stories about. I've got my vow to Rhitta Gawr. I'll show them I can rule Mynydd-y-Gaer and Edeyrnion and Ardudwy. I'll show them I'm not like that baby, Malcunus of Gwynedd. Come what may between my soul and my life. Let there be wall after wall of deadly mist! I'll never give up what I've got. I'll fight for it to the last!"

She had no sooner allowed this thought to sweep with its dark-flapping wings through every corridor of her heart when an unexpected fountain of life force suddenly burst up and out through a crack in the very floor of her soul, and in strength of it she felt that she could rule, like any of the great queens of antiquity, a far wider dominion than Edeyrnion.

And as she met Rhun's imploring gaze and noticed that his face had begun to twitch a little as if with the approach of some new access of agitation and shame, she experienced an odd sense of almost humorous tenderness for him. She actually bent down and pressed his skull between her fingers — God! and how like in shape it was to Porius's; for she had once taken that in her hands and in a mode too not so very different from this, when he had turned to her like an exhausted animal after some amorous excess; but, as she did this now to Rhun and kissed the rough stiff hairs of his forelock, a totally different impulse assailed her, and in a flash she imagined herself stealing away with him through the deserted passages of the Gaer until she brought him to her chamber, which at present was the one occupied by Nesta before her marriage. She even went so far — while hardly knowing what she was saying she promised on behalf of Porius that he and Sibylla should be put in possession of the llys of the three dead Aunties — as to imagine undoing the knots in her clothes the moment they were alone so as to put her body entirely at his disposal. She even went further in her unashamed thoughts, while Rhun explained, talking more and more freely and naturally and with the old craig-y-gartref abandonment, how he wished Gwendydd could know how happy he was with Sibylla, while she was being treated like a Cretan slave by that Greek pirate.

Morfydd even went as far, though her cheeks got a little hot as she did it, as to use her vivid memories of Porius's caresses on their bridal bed, to which she had heroically rather than amorously submitted, as a starting point to help her imagination as she conjured up these sweeter violations.

What broke up this perilous vista of delights, forbidden as much by wanton Eros as by stern necessity, was the sound of steps outside the barred doors and a faint rattling of the doors themselves. Someone was clearly on the point of interrupting them! The sound was a faint one and was not repeated; nor was any attempt made to push the door open, but the shock was enough to fling her back upon her natural, critical, observant, energetic self.

She drew in her breath with an angry sigh. She felt as if she could stamp indignantly on the floor of her soul, on the floor of the whole planetary system, on the floor of that Platonic idea of the universe about which her father used to argue with Morvran; in fact so extreme was her revolt as a woman at that moment against the foundation of everything, that she felt she could show how little it mattered to her what any of these men did just by her reckless supporting of Rhun's mad wish to be put into possession of Ogof-y-Gawr, only that he might fling the matriarchal llys of the dead Modrybedd into the lap of Sibylla!

This was a crisis in her life, and well she knew it! This was the moment that she had at the back of her mind — no! of her heart — always known must come, sooner or later, when she had to disgorge, like some enchanted Avanc, that drop of her true love's blood she had swallowed on the morning of eating the honey of Mithras.

Rhun was on his feet now. They were both on their feet. They were going to separate. The last star had escaped from that curiously shaped orifice that looked down over the Divine River, and far away across the perilous forests towards the old camp of Uriconium.

She was assuring him now in a calm friendly natural voice that Porius would undoubtedly agree to let him install Sibylla as his wife and as mistress of the place in the old palace of the Modrybedd.

It was only when his steps began to die away down the corridor leading to the northeast gate of the Gaer that she replaced the guttering torch in its original sconce.

But even after she had done this she could still hear his dying-away steps. Why didn't they stop dying away? Why didn't they die? Her feet seemed putting out roots that buried themselves in a bottomless crack between the flagstones!

But those feet that were retreating down the passage were the feet of Rhun, her Rhun, who could run faster than any man or boy in all Ynys

Prydein. They were the feet of the man whose flesh she had bitten so as to swallow his blood and make them one for ever! She would find out in a few days, she knew that much anyway, whether her night with Porius had been enough to start a child.

Oh, why couldn't she run after Rhun now, throw her arms round him, and make him see that all this business with Gwendydd had been silliness? Why couldn't she tell him now that he'd only have to wait till she was sure that night had made no difference; and then, since Porius had joined the emperor, he could give her a child himself, Rhun's child, grandchild of Alarch the Fair, and great-grandchild of Indeg.

But Rhun's steps had died away at last — and a good thing too! Let them die away till she was sure that that night had made no difference. Well, she could lift her feet out of the floor now and go where she liked. And once more she thought of Medrawd and his treachery. But no! She had no heart to challenge Euronwy about Medrawd tonight, even if the two of them were not together. To do anything about them tonight would be what her father used always to tell Morvran his Lucretian outbursts against the Church were — hypermoron, beyond what was indicated by destiny! "I'll go," she told herself, "to Nesta's old room, for she'll be with Gwythyr, and sleep for ten hours! Tomorrow I'll go down to Ty Cerrig, and tell Father about Rhun and Sibylla. In his dotage over this Jesus lad I don't suppose he'll care a bit! But if he does — well! let him look to it! I can't carry my father's burdens."

As she repassed the entrance to the hall she picked up one of the rushlights that were kept on a ledge there alongside a perpetually burning oil lamp. Carrying this light in one hand and sheltering it with the other she hurried through the dark and draughty passages until she reached her destination.

As soon as she was safely inside Nesta’s virgin chamber, which, though not far from Euronwy’s, possessed such thick walls that they excluded every sound from both without and within, she set herself to light the Etruscan lamp that stood on a bracket in the wall to the left of the bed’s head. As she did so she glanced with satisfaction at the luxurious Roman blankets which still covered the bed, telling herself that if their owner was happy in a man’s arms it was only fair that somebody else should at least be warm.

It took her quite a while to get the Etruscan night lamp to burn; for the oil in its head was dusty and old, while the fragment of newly twisted cord that floated in its belly kept igniting before it was saturated.

Morfydd’s attention while engaged on this task — for, though she had barred the door, and the only window was a narrow arrow slit, she felt reluctant to fall asleep in absolute darkness — was caught by the exquisitely carved creature that served as the lamp’s handle. This creature was Chimaera, the terrible daughter of the yet more appalling, because the slightly more human monster, whom the ancients called Echidna; but so skilfully had the nameless artist blended the nature of the lion with the nature of the serpent, and both with the nature of the nanny goat, that the primeval horror of the whole conception of such creatures was in some strange manner transmuted and transformed — transfigured, you might almost say — by the incredible enchantment of a delicate if demonic beauty.

But near the Chimaera lamp, which Morfydd had now at last really succeeded in lighting, there stood a very different sort of idol. This was nothing less than a very small but mysteriously lovely image of the Virgin Mary, carved in a sort of semi-transparent porcelain.

The face of this image had a most curious and haunting expression and what at once attracted and teased Morfydd about it was that it reminded her of someone; and she could not think who the person was! When at last the Chimaera lamp was lit and she had blown out her rushlight, whose extinction resulted in the passage through the chamber of a trailing wisp of most evil-smelling smoke, she felt such an overpowering longing for sleep that without removing her clothes she slipped beneath Nesta's Roman blankets and sank into the swift undertide of dreams, into that flowing tide of mirrored reflections which, as we sink into it, seems the surcease of all that has form or shape or purpose or trouble, and yet, when it has once swept us away, turns out to be the same old river, only madder, queerer, more cantankerous, and even less ready to accept the wicked as damned, the good as saved, or the dead as dead!

How she was first aroused from this world of dreams, which, though full of its own madness, has the power of so ineffably healing the hurts of ours, remained a mystery to her, for though, over and over, she seemed on the edge of recalling it, a blackness came down and it always escaped.

But she must have lain, whatever her dreams may have been, between Nesta's blankets for five or six hours in undisturbed sleep, watched over by the terrible and yet exquisite Chimaera and by the lovely and yet haunting Mother of God; though what it was that whirled her back into life, when those hours ended, remained completely dark.

All she could tell her father concerning it, when she was with him later at Ty Cerrig, was that the dawn had already begun — that she knew by the cold grey light lying on the stones of the arrow-slit window — when she threw off the blankets that covered her and opened the door.

"No!" she replied to Brochvael's irritably repeated question. "No! I don't remember any voices, or any knocking, or any fall, or any noise! I only remember opening the door and finding the girl outside."

Oh! It would have been impossible to tell her father, and impossible to tell Rhun, all she had experienced that morning and all she had felt, and all the thoughts she had had. And yet, strangely enough, she felt as if she might, if she had him to herself — only it seemed as if the last person you could have to yourself in this day and age was the man you'd just married — yes! she felt she might have told Porius a great deal about this whole event, and a great deal about her feelings concerning it now that it was all over; only Porius would have had to have liked her enough to spend a second night with her before leaving for the war. But even with him she could have remembered nothing before opening the door. It all began when she found the girl out there. After that every smallest occurrence, every faintest impression, seemed to have possessed itself of its own appropriate tool and inscribed itself on the living skin of her consciousness.

The girl was crouching against the door, too weak to stand up, and indeed already dying. It was clear that she had been attacked — probably assaulted and raped — for her clothes were disordered and stained with blood. She behaved as if she had drained some deadly philtre and knew that at any second it might kill her but was desperately eager before she died to unburden herself of a secret that would drag her soul back and impede the wings of its flight to freedom.

"It's Teleri, isn't it? It's Teleri, isn't it?" Morfydd kept repeating; and then, realizing this was a stupid question, like asking the girl if she were herself, she substituted for it an utterance hardly less absurd: "You'll soon be better! You'll soon be better!" gasped over the body in her arms, as she lifted it and dragged it and swayed and staggered and stumbled beneath it, while the odd idea came into her dazed mind that it might be a law of psychic gravitation that dying people were heavier than either the living or the dead.

But though these questions were a foolish accompaniment to the girl's stream of words, they didn't dam up or muddy up or in any way affect the parallel tide of Morfydd's own thoughts, which were extremely active as she straightened the girl's garments, caressed her hands, and smoothed back the hair from her forehead.

She looked round the room once or twice from where she sat by Teleri's side, but there was nothing she could lay hold of to dip into the heavy double-handed vessel of water that stood against the opposite wall; nor did she know whether that jug of water was fresh. But, as the girl's voice grew fainter and her face became a more ghastly white, she began to wonder whether she oughtn't to leave her for a minute while she roused Euronwy or one of Euronwy's women.

"But I can't leave her like this! I can't! Anyway, not till she's finished her tale!" What certainly made it harder to leave the dying Teleri was that the latter had begun to clutch her hand with that peculiar tenacity in which the power of a departing soul seems to make itself felt with a force beyond what it ever reached in its lifetime.

Even had the watchful Chimaera, whose polybestial curves composed the handle of the now needless lamp at their side, been able to record what it saw it is doubtful whether it could have described the subtle difference between the two girls, as the one, so full of heroic vitality, bent over the other, so voluble with the urge to die.

The Brythonic element was obvious in the hair and eyes of each; but Morfydd herself had already recognized something about Teleri that was totally beyond the intelligence of any daughter of the half-woman Echidna, namely, the quite startling resemblance between Teleri's features and those of the image of the Virgin Mary, beneath whose fixed and indescribable stare she herself had been sleeping all night, and upon whose unearthly expression both the white light of the dawn and the yellow light of the Chimaera lamp were at this moment concentrated.

As Teleri lay there stretched out beneath her, murmuring so fast that the sentences followed each other like overlapping ripples, and her eyes clung to her eyes as desperately as her hand to her hand, Morfydd began to realize that she had vaguely been aware of this unearthly and shadowy girl's existence for several months, in fact ever since she had been betrothed to Porius. No one had told her about her, and on her own visits to the Gaer she had been too agitated and preoccupied to ask questions.

But now as she listened to her and stroked her forehead and every now and then lifted the fingers she held to her lips she realized that, as a passing image crossing her path here and there as she went about her affairs, she had accepted this lonely woman as a part, an obscure part, but still a part, of her life as the betrothed of Porius.

But now another and much more serious speculation came into her mind. Was it possible that Nesta's vision of the Virgin during that riotous and even sanguinary disturbance with which the death feast had ended, that vision which some had seen, some had half-seen, and some had indignantly denied, was not a vision at all but a flesh-and-blood reality; and that Nesta's passionate Italian piety had created out of the real Teleri the miraculous witness she required?

"He said he knew what I felt," Teleri was murmuring now. "He said he knew that when they pitied me for having no mother and no father and being funny in my head it was at them I was laughing. He said he laughed at everybody who thought him wicked because he didn't want to keep Ynys Prydein for the Romans and Brythons but wanted the forest people to have it and the Gwyddylaid people and the Ffichtiaid and the Saeson from Germania too — why not? — and the Coranians if they wanted to come back!

“Since God was one and the earth was one, he said, all the nations were one too. But he said there was a better one than God and a better place than earth and in this one all were equal, and in this place all were free, and this one was quiet death, and this place was comforting and soothing nothingness.

“He said it was silly of them to say I was wicked because I thought it was dreadful to be alive and lovely to be dead. He said the head bard, Taliesin, who served Cynan ap Clydno and Owain ab Uryen Rheged, was younger than me and yet he too said life was hell and death was paradise; and that was because like me he has no mother and no father and because like me he’s always been funny in the head after he swallowed a drop from the cauldron of Ceridwen. He said if I’d let him do you-know-what he’d give me the same drops from the same cauldron as turned the head bard from boy to man. So I said, ‘Give me the drops now and you can do what you like afterwards!’ So he gave me the drops and did what he wanted, and the drops put me to sleep. And when I woke he was gone; and I knew they were death drops he had given me. Then I knew I was on the brink of Paradise. What he did to me hurt me and made me bleed, but I didn’t mind because I knew the drops from the cauldron of Ceridwen would soon send me to Paradise.

“He didn’t know I knew he was the emperor’s nephew, and that’s because having no father nor mother has made me funny like they say it’s made the head bard funny; and that’s because having no mother nor father turns a girl too quick into a woman and turns a boy too quick into a man. But it’s everybody knowing I’m funny that’s let me sleep in the day and go about in the night; and it's going about in the night that's helped me to meet him so often. He used to say to me: 'I'm the big ghost, Teleri, and you're the little ghost!' and I liked the way he said 'Teleri' just in the same tone he said 'Euronwy' when he was in my Lady's chamber. They say in the kitchen my Lady lets him into her bed, but down there they don't know anything.

"I know because having no father and mother has made me hate daytime and life, and made me love nighttime and death. And I know my Lady never has and never will let him into her warm bed. He walks round it. He sits on the end of it. He shivers and shakes till you'd think she couldn't bear it. I couldn't bear it, but I'm only half a woman.

"But my Lady can bear anything, for my Lady is as strong as three women and that's because my Lady had a Roman Patrician for her father and a niece of Uthyr Pendragon for her mother. Holding hands we are, aren't we, Morfydd ferch Brochvael, and you helping Teleri over the eel bridge! You took me into your warm bed; but now I want to go, you're not holding me back, are you, Morfydd ferch Brochvael? You mustn't mind if I shake because the mud's so cold, or if I shiver because the spray's on my face. It's coming and it's what I've wanted as long as I can remember! He never guessed I knew who he was when we met night after night in the passages; but he said he was the big ghost and I was the little ghost.

"My Lady kept him shivering and shaking at the end of her bed; so you see when he begged I had to let him do it, because I couldn't be cruel like proper women can be. Your tears are cold, Morfydd ferch Brochvael, but your fingers are warm, and you've taken me into your warm bed as my Lady wouldn't take the other one.

"Oh, you must never blame him for anything! He gave me the drops of death, and the drops are lovely, lovely, lovely! It's coming now, Morfydd ferch Brochvael. It’s coming now, and oh, the happiness! Never, never, never blame him... oh, this is... this is—”

When her visitor lay dead on her bed none knew better than Morfydd what it behoved her to do according to custom. She had to tell the news to three persons. She had to tell it to the prince or to his “representative”; and this was easy because she herself was the “representative”. She had to tell it to the head bard; and this was easy because the young Taliesin was still to be found in the pavilion of Cynan ap Clydno, though Cynan himself was away with the emperor. But finally she had to tell it to the head druid or the head priest so that measures could be taken for the deceased’s entombment. This was not only difficult but next to impossible, considering the feud between her father and the new priest and considering that the last of the druids was dead.

But easy or difficult she now decided to do none of these things. Standing over this dead girl she made up her mind that this should be a turning point in her life. She was the Princess of Edeyrnion. Whether her husband wanted to live with her or not, he certainly trusted her, and he wanted her to assert herself. And assert herself she would.

In the matter of serving the emperor she and Porius were absolutely at one; and here she knew well that her vow over the relics of Rhitta Gawr would hold her up. She had put her pride and her life into that vow. In some queer way it had become her religion. It was stronger than love. It was life itself. Well, she would assert herself now. She would defy this new priest. She would make the obsequies of Teleri the half-woman an entirely feminine affair. She would seek out young Nesta and warn her that her virgin chamber was occupied by the dead and tell her she wished Gwythyr to put himself at the disposal of old Canna whom she would send up to the Gaer from Ty Cerrig.

Yes, she would go at once to her old home, despatch Canna up here, tell her to close the half-woman's eyes and lay her out, and tell her to see to it that young Gwythyr, with a man or two to help him, dug a grave for her in the Gaer burying place.

But there was something that she felt she wanted to do herself for the dead girl before leaving her to Canna or even to Nesta and this she set to work to accomplish at once. With some difficulty she succeeded in divesting Teleri of her underclothes, and then, boldly stripping herself so that in her outer garments she now appeared startlingly thin, she clothed her in her own. She had no sooner taken in her hands the least oppressive covering she could find in the room wherewith to cover the girl's face, for the staring eyes looked so unnaturally, so appallingly large than she was suddenly seized with a reluctance to put anything between those terrible watchers, judges, and condemners, and the light of that sun they had seen through.

As to the emperor's nephew, here again Morfydd was aware of a knot of complicated feelings that she could no more have attempted to communicate to her father than she could have attempted to communicate them to the man she loved.

And here again she felt she could have made her runaway husband — and him alone in all the world — understand certain subtle and startling and shameless thoughts that had come into her head, since Teleri's death, about Medrawd. Since Teleri's death?

As she stood motionless now, glancing from the girlish shape on the bed to the bestial shape on the handle of the night lamp and thence to the ineffably sad features of the Mother of Jesus, she felt that the vow she had made those days ago over the relics of Rhitta Gawr had become a springing fountain of new life within her that was not bound by any set of rules.

One of young Nesta's most treasured possessions was an inherited Italian cloak; and in this cloak Morfydd now wrapped herself and moved close up to the bed with the intention of taking a final farewell of that covered shape by touching it with her lips; but suddenly feeling the compulsion of a different mood, she hurried to the door, unbarred it, and let herself out, closing it quietly behind her in the grey dawn light that came in through that arrow slit in the wall.

She was lucky in being able to leave the Gaer unseen of anyone but the old watchman at the eastern gate who knew her too well, and had known her parents too well, to respond to her greeting with any questions, as he hammered back the massive bronze bar, wrought in the rough rondure of a serpent, and pushed the heavy gates apart.

Whether young Nesta had purposely left her Italian cloak for the new princess and had been too shy to say so, she couldn't tell. She may have left it simply in case those blankets didn't suffice. At any rate Morfydd felt extremely thankful to have it as she faced the chilly cloud of autumnal mist mounting up from the river. Straight into this white mist she went, hugging Nesta's cloak tightly about her, stumbling now and then over old grass-grown molehills, sliding sometimes when her too-smooth sandals encountered declivities made slippery by cartwheels, but getting a youthful pleasure from the dramatic effect of particular trees and roofs and hilltops which rose out of this undulating sea of mist like islands emerging from snow-white waves.

She took for granted that it was too early to expect to find any ferryman at the Ford, so she hurried on to the wooden bridge which was further upstream and just beyond the curve to the east of the Divine River. Halfway across the bridge she couldn't resist an impulse to stop for a minute to lean over the ancient oak-wood rail. She was now aware that a slight wind had suddenly begun to blow, a wind that was more disturbing to the mist, which, now she was within it, was no longer white but desolately grey, than it was to her.

Troubled and wild were the shapes the mist was beginning to take as the wind scattered it. All along the surface of that flowing water grey ghosts were twisting and turning. They were greyer than the water; not a single one of them was white any more — in fact, the bubbles of foam on the river's surface were the only white things she could see.

Grey were all the shifting shapes her fancy could name as that wind fell upon them and troubled them. Eagles' feathers, lions' manes, the waving tails of wild horses, and frantic ghosts in fluttering shrouds, all were grey as death. And among these imagined shapes as she leant over that rail she saw Rhun embracing Sibylla.

"Are all women as ignorant of themselves as I am?" she thought. "Are they all astonished at what they feel?"

What wrung this cry out of her was the fact that she felt no spasm of jealousy, indeed hardly any anger in this matter of Sibylla. She had felt little over Gwendydd, but she had attributed this to the woman being so much older than herself. But Sibylla was about her own age, twenty-two at most, which would make her only four years older. "Would I," she asked herself, "put a tynged on that girl so that she should never bear a child to Rhun?"

Staring down into that tumultuous procession of shapes as it passed beneath the bridge, and clutching impatiently with three fingers and a thumb the fluttering corner of Nesta's cloak, which by its flapping obscured her vision, Morfydd tried desperately to do what to her own mind she called "seeing the thing in proper proportion."

"No," she thought, "if I had the power to put such a tynged on that girl, I wouldn't do it!"

She removed her fingers from the flapping cloak and her hand from the rail. “No, I wouldn’t,” she repeated, “though goodness knows what that implies! But I don’t care what it implies. I don’t care whether it means I’m a heathen and not a Christian or whether it means I’m such a funny sort of Christian as to be no better than a heretic.”

She lifted her hands, which were very cold, and pressed their palms, first the right one and then the left one, to her mouth. And then, while she imagined herself, the childless princess of a childless prince, bending over the cradle of a baby Rhun, a most surprising and indeed rather a shameless wish came into her mind that she might have a long and perfectly free talk with Porius about all these things; about what as a woman she wanted to happen and about what both he and Rhun, as men, wanted to happen.

“Am I,” she thought, “different from other women, or are we all alike in things like this, that I can talk perfectly easily with Porius and am dumb as a fish with Rhun?”

With one hand clutching the rail of that wooden bridge and with the other squeezing Nesta’s mantle tight round her throat, she looked with interest to see what effect this newly risen wind would have upon the mist that covered the old houses and the new church.

Yes! There were gaps and fissures in this tattered grey cloak already; and through the first of these she could now clearly see the childhood’s home of both her men, suckled as they both were at the bosom of Alarch the Fair, for though the llys of Gwrnach and Alarch had been partially destroyed and partially incorporated into the edifice of the new church, enough of its massive antiquity was left to remind her of many a long summer afternoon spent down there with her aunt and her boy cousins.

All she could see of Ty Cerrig was the extreme tip of the little stone tower containing her own room, which was, as she had discovered with great interest not many years ago, just discernible, and only just, from the centre of this bridge, though not from either bank of the Divine River. Of Ogof-y-Gawr she could see nothing; although the hill beyond it, which ended in the precipice where the Avanc's Cave of Auntie Tonwen's mysterious friend looked out upon the valley, was now clearly visible through a gap in the mist.

Whether due to the sight of this hill or to the mere fact that her mind was hovering round Ogof-y-Gawr, Morfydd now felt upon her the full force of the complete disappearance, just as if they'd been swallowed up by an earthquake, of the Three Aunties. Careless whether such feelings were, or were not, reconcilable with her vow in the betws of the Gaer, she gave herself up to a sudden surge of wild and passionate tenderness for those three dead women. They were right, the Aunties!

This uncontrolled conviction within her seemed to ride like a Maenad the maddest of the cloud shapes that were whirling away beneath her, around her, above her. Her mother, the Gwyddyles, always used to tell her that though the matriarchy of the Modrybedd was too primitive for these civilized times, in the pith and sap and pulse of everyday life women were the rulers.

"Where I come from" — and she always made mention of the city of Dulyn in Iwerdon— "it's known and acknowledged as the truth. We're nearer Nature than men; and the only safe test we shall ever have, little daughter, as to what is true in life, is nearness to Nature." Thus would her mother express herself, when they were alone in her tower bedroom, after listening to Brochvael, fresh from some visit to Gaul, lamenting the effect of feminine influence in hastening the decline of Latin literature.

What would her mother think — what did she think, were the dead alive — seeing her suspended above the Divine River between the Gaer and Ogof-y-Gawr, between Porius and Rhun, between being her father's pupil in Greek and fighting for the House of Cunedda against the religion of Rome, between innocent daydreams in that Ty Cerrig tower and ruling Edeyrnion by cunning and wit?

Clutching Nesta's cloak at her throat with her left hand and drawing the tip of the third finger of her right hand along the rail, she completed her crossing of the wooden bridge.

"The Modrybedd are right," she thought, "and Mother is right, and I dare say Sibylla is right! The steering of events from day to day is with us and not with men! Teleri knew Medrawd better than the emperor will ever know him. And I know Rhun as Rhun will never know himself. There isn't a man in the world who doesn't cling to some woman — though she may be a dead woman — but all men are children to women — every one of them! And every woman, yes, even the most virginal of maids, at the bottom of her heart is a mother to the whole world, and, like Nature, absolutely alone!"

With this in her mind Morfydd made her way, without looking back, straight to her father's house.

CHAPTER XXX. The Home Rock

LONG BEFORE MORFYDD REACHED her father's house she found she had grown extremely hungry. She also realized that she had lingered so long in the mist with her exciting thoughts that the day's business in the market between river and church was already beginning.

She threaded her way hurriedly between the booths, skirted the new church wall, too occupied with her purpose to look to see, as she generally did, how far the transformation of the old llys of Alarch the Fair, where Porius and Rhun had been boys together, into an ecclesiastical annexe had proceeded, and set to work to climb with resolute and rapid steps the rough ascent to Ty Cerrig.

She entered the house quietly by the back entrance and was delighted to discover that her old nurse, having waited on the master and got his meal disposed of, was prolonging her own and Gwrgi's breakfast by a lively discussion of the rumours, that had already reached the kitchen but had not yet been communicated to Brochvael, about Sibylla's return.

Her father at this moment, she learnt to her great annoyance, had a visitor with him who was none other than the new priest, and while old Canna buttered hot cakes for her and made her taste a little of what Gwrgi was enjoying as a special treat, namely, her father's Gallic wine warmed on the fire and sweetened with honey, she was able not only to relate to the pair of cronies the tale of Teleri's death but to enter fully into all the details of what she wanted them both to do.

It was the first time that as their lawful tribal princess, beyond being the cherished daughter of the house, she had had occasion to appeal to their loyalty; and, since each of the old couple was all alert to serve her, it was soon arranged that Gwrgi should saddle the donkey and lead it with Canna on its back up the Gaer hill, and that while Canna duly prepared the corpse of the dead girl for burial Gwrgi should get what help he needed and dig a grave in the official tribal burying ground outside the fortress's northeastern wall.

She was surprised to find that the old couple's attitude to the handsome Drom was much less hostile than she had anticipated. "He must have learnt some devilry from the druid," she thought. "Why, he must have bewitched them!"

They left her to rest by the fire, sipping Brochvael's warmed-up wine, while they made ready for their expedition; and she found her thoughts still turning to Teleri. What with the wine and the cakes and the warm kitchen and her disturbed night she could very easily have fallen asleep, but she forced herself to stay awake in the most effective of all possible ways, namely, by imagining all the reactions her father could conceivably display, and these were as numerous as they were violent, to the establishment of Rhun at the Modrybedd's palace, with Sibylla as its mistress and Mithras as its tutelary genius.

But though she struggled against a strong tendency to fall into a deep sleep and thus to forget entirely the unburied Teleri and the agitated Rhun, and her own susceptible parent and this devil of a Drom who pretended to be possessed by the mind of the living Jesus, she couldn't help feeling strong, confident, and happy.

But how curious this was, that the death of Teleri, the life hater, had brought to her, the life lover, such a rush of energy that she felt almost ashamed, as if she had absorbed into herself part of the very substance of the dead girl's being, only to use it for the purpose opposite to hers, that is for life, not death. “But I must just take it as a mystery,” she told herself, “as an absolute mystery.”

But to call this feeling of happiness and power a “mystery” didn’t explain it. It was as if the desperation of Teleri’s hatred of life which now seemed to hang about her clothes, her hair, her skin, her lips, her throat, like an exhalation from the marshes of Annwn, possessed such imaginative force that without being neutralized or appeased it could be used as a powerful weapon by one who loved life well enough to remain like Agenor at the Scaean Gate when he stood aleis, or “with all his forces gathered together,” to await his doom, and, although “far weaker,” ready, alla kai empes, “all the same for that,” for whatever fate brought.

But when finally she took up the struggle again and entered Brochvael’s room, her first glimpse of the scene she interrupted was something she never forgot. Her father, with the majestically bound volume of the Eleven Comedies open before him, was leaning back in a chair whose hairy tassels gleaming and enchanted in the firelight looked as if forgotten fragments of the “aegis” itself had been woven into them. He was hugging his knees with his clasped hands and looking up at the priest with an expression of petulant contempt; while at his side leaning upon the charred rod with which he’d stirred the fire, his beautiful womanish eyelids modestly lowered, his gaze fixed upon the flame and his lips parted in a dreamy smile, Drom permitted his whole personality to murmur in silence that the sensation of being denounced was sweeter than the figs of Lemnos!

In her present mood of Gaer Princess, freshly initiated into the role of all women by a dying half-woman, Morfydd felt an impatient impulse to dismiss both the priest and Drom with a negligent word and a wave of the hand and as soon as they were alone to relate to Brochvael the story of Sibylla’s return; but a warning glance from the man in the chair restrained her, and shrugging her shoulders she went over to the window and stood with her back to them staring at the heathery slope of the rocky ascent towards Ogof-y-Gawr.

“I refuse to argue that point or any other point,” she heard the priest declare in his harsh official voice. “I have already sent messengers round the neighbourhood announcing that the funeral rites for the deceased prince will take place at noon today. I have had the grave dug to the right of the altar; and one of the men in the Gaer workshop who is a really devout Christian worked by torchlight all last night upon the monumental stone — flat upon the ground, of course — that will cover it. The place in front of the altar has already been consecrated, and quite properly so, by the remains of that saintly man Minnawc Gorsant whom I might call a blessed martyr, for he broke his heart denouncing heresy, idolatry, and devilry.”

At the mention of the instigator of his son’s murder, Morfydd, who had now swung round and was facing the three of them, saw her father close his folio of Aristophanes with a violent gesture and proceed to clutch it with the fingers of his right hand very much as Homer describes Athene doing, when she seized the huge stone placed by men of old time as the boundary of a field with which she presently knocked all desire for fighting out of the god of war.

She saw the propitiatory Drom throw down his blackened staff, balance his lithe and lissom body against the back of Brochvael’s chair, and lay an affectionately restraining hand upon the fingers that clutched the folio.

Hitherto the young priest had not taken the slightest notice of her entrance — a neglect which astonished her, for was she not now the reigning Princess of Edeyrnion? — but he now turned upon her a cold, apathetic, and extremely lacklustre glance, a glance, in fact, that stopped short of her skin, stopped at less than the surface of her being, and displayed not the faintest intention, either for the sake of malice or for the sake of understanding, to advance a thousandth part of an inch further.

"I am fully aware," he went on, "for our revered bishop, when he selected me for this great work as the successor to Gorsant the martyr, made it clear to me what I had to face in the infidelity and hostility to Christ and His Blessed Mother of the present descendants of Cunedda. The lord bishop has been kept fully informed by the blessed Gorsant of how that great man came near to baptizing and confirming in the faith — blessed be the Holy Trinity! — that converted sorcerer who called himself a Derwydd and of whom you" — and the young man's thin white face with its burning eyes became concentrated upon the figure of Drom— "are the degenerate servant. I can't tell how far the immoral and heathen books among which I find the brother of the deceased and the wife of his successor are the cause of this falling away from the Christian faith; but the bishop is not ignorant of the manner in which the insidious and corrupting heresy of that devil in human shape the abominable Pelagius has been propagated until yesterday by that false hermit of Saint Julian's cell who called himself John.

"And now I am to understand that you, the servant of a convicted and converted sorcerer, have been teaching in the kitchens and sculleries of your Gaer and in the marketplaces of your town, some of the very worst of the sly, subtle, and corrosive heresies of this demon Pelagius. And when I call upon you in the name of our bishop, that is to say, in the name of the successor of Saint Peter to whom the God of all worlds has given the keys to heaven and hell, you answer me with the most horrible blasphemy of all, the blasphemy of blasphemies, the heresy of heresies, namely, the devilish claim that you, Master Drom, contain within you the living personality of Jesus Christ Himself, yes! of that God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, who has taken to himself as his eternal Bride the One Church with its One Head! It is to Christ's Church as a whole, Master Drom, not to any single blighted, blasted, blinded, blaspheming individual, that the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity reveals the one hope and the one truth and the one faith that saves us from damnation!"

At this point Morfydd began to move to the door, and during a momentary silent beat of their pulses Morfydd and her father exchanged looks. Brochvael tried in his look to indicate that he intended to keep calm under every conceivable ecclesiastical tempest, and that everything would be the same when it was over as it was before it began. She herself tried to express something even more definite, namely, that when she had given certain instructions to Canna and Gwrgi she would return to his support, yes! and would support him against Pope and Church and if necessary against the Holy Trinity itself!

The significant look that passed between father and daughter was intercepted by the priest as he paused to take breath; and since he was no fool it reduced him to silence. Moreover it clearly crossed his mind that if he were to make any impression on this man and this woman he would have to deal with them separately. With this in his mind therefore he began to argue with Brochvael in a different tone. Meanwhile Morfydd had found the old couple, as she well knew she would, listening in the passage, and she managed to smile sympathetically when Gwrgi thrust his thumb between his first and second finger and pointed it at a place in the wall that might have been considered on a level with the priest's head.

When, however, she had got them safe out of the house with the donkey's saddle and bridle in the old man's hands and Canna with the particular unguents she used for laying out corpses, it became her turn to listen in the passage. Assured that her father was holding his own she took the opportunity to climb as silently as she could the staircase leading to her own former room.

This room she had not entered since her struggle with Rhun, and the sight of it brought back her childhood and girlhood so vividly that she had to shut her eyes and even to press the back of one of her wrists against her mouth and bite it, before she could control herself enough to do what she'd come to do.

Her emotion once conquered, however, she derived a definite pleasure from dislodging a small piece of wood from one of the lowest of the sloping rafters and from extracting from this hiding place a child's necklace of snail shells, which, as a sign of something she couldn't have explained even to the runaway Porius, she had decided to plant, as if they were flowers, on Teleri's grave.

"Yes," she said to herself, as she descended with the snail shells uncomfortably cold between her breasts, for she still wore, under the cloak she now had on, the high-belted banquet robe in which she had slept; "yes," she said to herself, placing each foot very slowly on each step and recalling the look on Canna's and Gwrgi's faces after Rhun's flight in the early hours of Sunday, "just as I can't help loving Rhun, so I can't help liking Porius a lot better than Rhun and missing him as much as I missed Morvran! In fact" — and her left foot, as if anxious to give its twin slave an equal chance to listen to their mistress's shameless soliloquy, swayed with rhythmic negligence from heel to toe till the other had joined it, when side by side they swayed together, all their mistress's weight on their insteps now, the balance kept by a long bare wrist thrust through a slit in the mantle so that a couple of fingers could just touch the stone wall, while the girl's gaze was fixed on a strip of red sky just visible — and oh! how long, as long as she could remember, had she known that streak of visibility! — through an oblong space above the front door— "In fact," she concluded, "I believe I miss him more than Morvran! Morvran always wanted me to listen to him just as Rhun does; whereas Porius likes listening to me."

Her first thought on re-entering her father's chamber had to do with the difference between men and women. Here were these three men exactly as she had left them twenty minutes ago! Physically they were in the same positions, and mentally they were swinging up and down in the same logical dilemmas, and delivering the same ideal blows at the same shadow-puppet notions, as when she had slipped out.

Once again not one of the three men seemed to notice her entrance; though this time she was convinced that her father at least had done so, though for "reasons of state" he didn't dare to greet her!

As before, she crossed the room and proceeded to stand with her back to the window facing them. This time she was struck even more than on the first occasion by the impassioned fanaticism of the young priest's face as he denounced the falling away from the religion of Christ of both branches of the House of Cunedda.

"You at the Gaer," he declared, "are sunk into a worse state than they are at Deganwy, and they have the excuse of their prince being a child. Their condition is just the old heathen state which our great Mother the Church and her Holy Head in Rome have found ways of leading to the Blessed Truth.

"But here — as Minnawc Gorsant used to swear to the bishop, though the bishop could hardly believe such a thing to be possible — here it is much, much worse than the old heathenism. Spiritual perversions of the religion of Christ are far more dangerous than the old ignorant idolatries.

"Minnawc Gorsant himself told me he had lost his first hope of being able to convert that magic-mongering druid" — here the priest gave the still dreamy, still docile, still tenderly smiling Drom a flashing glance— "who was, I understand, your master; and I know for myself that your husband" — here for the first time since she had entered the man turned full upon Morfydd— "is the pupil of the heretical old man who without any authority from Rome dared to call himself 'Brother' and moreover dared to defend that dragon of spiritual perversity, the twice excommunicated and thrice-damned Pelagius."

At this point Brochvael gave his daughter a quite humorously beseeching look, as much as to say: "Well! If he starts attacking Porius, who has only married you to desert you, we needn't bother to answer him!"

But the priest waited for no answer. "If," he went on, with another severe glance at Morfydd, "your husband were here now do you know what I should recite to him? I should recite to him a prophecy truer than any devilish gabble howled forth by Myrddin Wyllt, that son of a fiend. I should recite to him the prophecy concerning this very day and age uttered by the Apostle Paul. 'Know this,' the Apostle says. 'In these last days dangerous times shall come — in novissimis diebus instabunt tempora periculosa — men shall be covetous, they shall be boastful, haughty railers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, criminal, without natural affection — cupidi, elati, superbi blasphemi, parentibus inobedientes, ingrati, scelesti, sine affectione — without self-control, fierce, without goodness, traitors, headstrong, puffed up, lovers of pleasures more than God — incontinentes, inimici, sine benignitate, proditores, protervi, tumidi, voluptatem amatores magis quam Dei' — and I would go on to tell him—"

Here the priest lifted his head higher still, and looking no longer at any of them in that chamber, nor even, Morfydd felt, at her invisible husband, rather, it seemed to her, looking over centuries upon centuries of human history, began to speak in a new tone, a tone that arrested her astonished attention, a tone that, though it caused her to breathe so hard in her revolt against him that both her breasts pressed against the snail shells, struck her as being appallingly charged with the dreadful blood dew of destiny.

"I would go on to tell him," he cried, "that there is nothing, whether in the heavens above or in the earth beneath, that can stop the City of God, with Jesus as its absolute King, from reigning over the whole earth! His enemies will howl in vain in hell forever! Lo! It is Jesus Himself who tells us so! — and the blessed ones will hear their howling; and the sound of their howling and the gnashing of their teeth — fletus et stridor dentium — will mount up forever!

"Yes, He must reign till He has made His enemies His footstool! And what Christ commands me to tell your husband is this: that the reading of heathen books" — and the priest gave a quick hurried blasting look at the Comedies of Aristophanes on Brochvael's knee— "must, under his rule, be a punishable offence; that blasphemy — the worst of all sins! — must be punished so publicly and so penitentially that all those subject to him will be afraid to breathe a syllable against Christ or against Christ's sacrosanct state which has absolute authority over the whole world!

"It is Christ Himself who enjoins your husband to consider himself Christ's regent in these forests of Edeyrnion and to rule in such a way that every man, woman, and child shall confess with contrition every single thought that enters their heads that does not redound to the glory of... to the glory of—"

But the words suddenly faded from his lips and melted like a mist that has been caught up and lost in sunlight. And Morfydd, who had been watching his face, realized that he was so completely dominated by some interior vision that he had altogether lost the sense of words.

“I must,” she thought, “fix in my mind this man’s expression and the queer feeling it gives me, so that I can tell Porius about it when we’re next together.”

It struck her then that it was somewhat ironical that, while she was only waiting for the fellow’s departure to discuss with her father Sibylla’s reappearance and to get his support for Rhun’s establishing himself in the llys of the dead princesses, what she longed for most in the world at that moment was to describe to her husband this priest’s madness and implore him to explain it.

Thus when the young man returned to normal consciousness after his spiritual ecstasy, she began to wonder as she listened to his recovered words whether she really and truly was in the strange state of loving two men at the same time. And with the simple realism of a woman, compared with which the humorous shamelessness of men is either savage fastidiousness or philosophical fooling, she began to compare her present feeling for Porius with what she had felt before he had possessed her; and she admitted to herself that she felt quite differently now.

“And yet,” she thought, “I still love Rhun. Am I therefore an unnatural girl, or are all women like me, and does being forced into carrying a man’s seed turn the man himself into our child?”

But what was this? Brochvael was now slowly wagging his head from side to side over Aristophanes, whom he had, apparently, while she was absorbed in watching the priest, dared to reopen. Drom, on the other hand, having relapsed into a more comfortable position, wore on his unruffled, tenderly moulded face an infinitely sweet smile of compassionate pity.

“What on earth,” Morfydd thought, “is amusing that lackadaisical lad now about this crazy man?” And she told herself that it was tragic how cruelly unfair every human being was to every other.

Meanwhile having recovered his voice the priest was repeating a passage from Ignatius's famous letter to his fellow Christians in heathen Rome. This awe-inspiring document was not unknown to Morfydd. Porius had more than once repeated it to her as an example of the self-lacerating atmosphere at the Bishop's School beyond Moel y Famau, never forgetting to inform her that the wise Pelagius, according to Brother John, had called it "a dangerous vein of insanity in the faith."

But now as she heard it from this man she began again desperately longing to discuss the whole subject with Porius. She felt as if Teleri's soul were murmuring on to her still out of the air, and, by defending the emperor's nephew, to be defending worse fanatics, defending even— "what crazy ideas are coming into my head!" — defending even that murderer of Morvran!

"Teleri," she thought, "could never smile at anyone as this self-satisfied Drom is doing — effeminate little Narcissus! I'd sooner be as she is — dead on Nesta's bed — than be a man like Drom. Yes! You little eunuch, magnetizing your master to love you and loving yourself as few girls love themselves! I'd sooner be Gorsant, Morvran's murderer, than I'd be you."

Meanwhile the priest recited: "From Syria unto Rome I fight with wild beasts, being bound and tied to ten leopards, I mean the soldiers appointed as guards who grow more cruel by our kindnesses... O salutaris bestias! O beasts of Salvation! When will they come? Quando emittentur? When will they be let out? When will it be free for them to enjoy my flesh?... If they delay I will force them to it; I shall rush upon them! Bear with me; ego novi quid expediat mihi. I know what is expedient for me. Nunc incipio esse Christi discipulus. Now I begin to be a disciple of Christ."

It seemed to Morfydd as she watched him that this hollow-cheeked young man with eyes like black fire was actually feeling the lions' teeth he talked about tearing his flesh, and that some force beyond the stretch of the whole visible world was pouring through him and turning excruciating pain into the quivering triumph of far-away trumpets!

But suddenly there came a change in the tension of his voice. A strange relaxation loosened his limbs and he lurched and slackened where he stood. Morfydd could feel that the words he was murmuring now, in this odd sermon addressed to a doting scholar, a deserted wife, and a sorcerer's pimp, were penetrated by a curious atmosphere of exhausted humility, a startling contrast to his previous exultation.

He was now murmuring a quotation from the Book of Amos; and as he uttered the words, "not a prophet's son but a goatherd plucking the fruit of sycamores," his voice trembled with a certain youthful weakness and a pathetic simplicity, and there passed into it a distinct sense of the struggle he had gone through as the chosen pupil of Minnawc Gorsant, and as the soldier of Christ selected by the bishop to carry on the fight, and Morfydd was definitely touched.

He was a younger man than Gorsant, and he hadn't, she felt sure, been one of the actual murderers of Morvran. Besides, she had too much of a woman's common sense not to know that Morvran had allowed his eloquent atheism to become a nuisance to the older people in Mynydd-y-Gaer and a real offence to the naturally religious people in all Edeyrnion, whether old or young.

Nodding casually at Brochvael and Drom, as if they had been a pair of pillared capitals on either side of the hearth, the priest now crossed the threshold and disappeared in the narrow dark passage between Brochvael's chamber and the kitchen.

Here, after she had caught a glimpse of Drom straightening his shoulders and clasping his shapely wrists and soft fingers round the back of his skull and after she had replied with a conciliatory gesture to Brochvael's "Don't go back with him, for heaven's sake, child! He doesn't want you at Einion's grave!" she overtook the young priest and clutched at his belt.

"There's been a death up at the Gaer," she whispered. "Last night it was; and I want you if you will — I can speak for my husband in this — to let the girl lie in ground that's not under a curse! I don't mean necessarily in consecrated ground, you understand, but I don't want her put in that swampy place by the Gwyddyl huts where they say" — here she paused for a second, tightening, however, rather than relaxing, her hold on the young man's belt— "anyway where Canna ferch Glam says, the devils come up from hell to play the game called 'hunt the souls' and chase them like rabbits round and round those pools of black water and in and out of those reed beds."

The young priest released his belt from her hot dry fingers. "It's that wretched Teleri you're talking of, I suppose? Yes, I've heard all about that unhappy creature. She's been fed by your family since her childhood and hasn't done one day's honest work to pay for it — no, not all her life! 'Kept in luxury' is what they say of her in your kitchens; and they tell me — you see a low-born priest in a scullery hears more truth in a day than a high-born lady in her bower hears in a year — they tell me she's been having a bad influence over Nesta ferch Aulus."

"Whoever told you that—"

"Don't interrupt me, Princess, and please speak quietly. There's no need to disturb your father. But the chief thing I've heard in these humble quarters — where a man like me who's lived like Amos on fruits and berries, vellicans sycamoros, knows how to search for the precious jewel of truth — is that this wretched female has been acting as a spy for that arch-enemy of our bishop and of our emperor and of Rome and of Jesus Christ, that incestuous son — so they say — of the emperor's sister, that friend of the druids, that adept in all the black sciences of Africa — Medrawd ap Llew! And this abominable treachery performed every day and night while your family are giving her meat and drink and shelter! Biting the hand that fed her she was — the wicked snake!"

Long before this indictment was over Morfydd had gathered up her indignation like a ball of scarlet thread and hid it against her heart, hid it deeper even than those brittle snail shells, now warm from their place between her breasts; and with a light step and a burning cheek she led the priest forth, out of Ty Cerrig, and out of the hearing of her father. Then she turned on him. Once clear of the place and once satisfied that Gwrgi's ox was the only denizen of the shed, she unwound to the full her scarlet ball of moral indignation.

"Bit the hand that fed her, has she? What better thing could she bite? Fed her! Fed her! Fed her! Fed her! Thus are justified all the abominable oppressions, all the burdens, all the dead weights, all the leaden monotonies, all the dusty samenesses, all the loaded dice, all the gilded harnesses, all the branded backs, all the rights of pastors and masters, parents and grandparents, corpses and carrion! The hand that feeds us? What else should we bite?"

Her voice was so crystal clear and her face so illuminated that the priest's eyes narrowed into slits of suspicious astonishment. It was clear to Morfydd that he considered her plainly and simply out of her mind.

His brow was furrowed in the naive process of agitated thought. "He's wondering," she told herself, "whether it mightn't be possible to use a completely mad Princess of Edeyrnion to great religious advantage. Not that it's clear to him yet how to get Porius ab Einion's insane consort into his power. So it'll have to be this questionable 'how' that I must dally with, and tantalize, and prolong, if we're to keep the status quo till Porius comes back!"

She let the priest depart in this mood of contemplative silence without adding a word either to increase or to diminish the effect upon him of her interesting lack of normal human intelligence. She had in fact begun to do with this young man what her Gwyddyles mother used to do with people and things; that is to say, to float over them and under them and into them till she could, so to say, lead them "by the lining of their souls."

But as she watched him recede further and further down the hill towards the church she grew aware that his departing form was being dodged by a new arrival. This was none other, as she knew at once, than the small page, Neb ap Digon. Rather to her surprise her heart began to beat quite excitedly.

"This," she thought, "can only mean one thing, a message from Porius," and seeing that the priest was now out of sight, she threw dignity and custom to the devil and hurried to meet the little page. Yes, he had brought a letter! It was inscribed on a fragment of parchment torn from some old medical prescription in a language she took for Arabic. But Porius's words were in simple Brythonic and were written in the clear, round, boyish hand he had used at school and that all his education with Brother John had been unable to change.

Neb watched her face intently as she read and he could see that the words were as few as they were distinct. A more living script was also distinct to the eyes of a page from the court of Arthur! For as the new princess read her husband's letter the blood slowly spread over her face — a face that her long vigil by the dying Teleri had left noticeably strained and white — and having drawn her underlip for a second into her mouth as if it were a bite from an apple of the Hesperides, she proceeded to lick both her lips with the scarce-visible tip of her tongue, a proceeding that gave to her countenance, at least in the eyes of Neb ap Digon, a touchingly natural, girlish expression of intimate surprise and delight.

“I shall be,” the letter ran, “in a few minutes at our old home rock, craig-y-gartref, and I beseech you to meet me there. I’ve got the start this time, so don’t be surprised if I get there first!”

There was no signature, but she knew it was a peculiarity of Porius to assume that he was the only man in Edeyrnion who could write a letter.

“Any answer, Princess?” and Neb’s gaze gave her the feeling that he was reading not only her unexpressed thoughts but her inexpressible thoughts.

“Say I’ll be there,” she replied, “as soon as I’ve told my father about Lord Rhun and Ogof-y-Gawr.”

On hearing this Neb ap Digon gave her a very sharp look and made a motion of shrugging his small shoulders, as who should say: “I can’t see the necessity for going into these details, but if you insist—”

The new princess did insist, and, as she turned away from her husband’s sophisticated messenger and ran back without feeling the ground under her feet to her father’s house, she invented to the tune of her own beating heart a proud and high-pitched lie, such as would have confounded Neb himself. She would tell Brochvael that she was going to meet Rhun. At all events she would keep from him, as if it were a ritual secret, the identity of the person she was really going to meet.

She had divined, with an occult intuition for such matters inherited from her Gwyddyles mother, that Brochvael would be more puzzled than agitated by the reappearance of Sibylla. For herself she didn’t feel in the least puzzled. It was indeed what she had told herself more than once was extremely likely to happen. But she did feel a lively desire to witness Sibylla’s discomfiture by the smiling Drom.

But this malicious joy would have to be put off for the present. Meanwhile — oh, how much she had to tell Porius! She heard a sorrowful noise from Gwrgi's ox as she passed the shed and she went in to stroke the creature and move some fresh hay within its reach. But the solitary beast recommenced its moan before she was out of the shed.

"It's saying," she thought, "'I know you're a well-meaning girl and all that; but you're not an ass, and you never can be an ass, and in these things I am a slave of habit.'"

It gave her a queer sensation to pass through the kitchen and find it empty. "They haven't had time to get to the Gaer yet," she thought. "Teleri's still lying on Nesta's bed waiting."

She thrust her left hand as far down her neck as she could and gave the string of snail shells a shake so that it shouldn't scrape quite so uncomfortably against her skin.

"I'll have," she thought, "to tell Porius everything and to get his leave to do what I decide is best in all these troublesome affairs."

"Morfydd!" It was her father calling. He must have heard her. Well! She mustn't stand staring at Gwrgi's tools and at the few faded and tattered pages which were all that was left of Canna's "Book of Prognostications," which lying on its particular shelf, along with a pot of fragrant ointment, she had from infancy associated with the old woman.

But this meeting with Porius was a thing she wanted to think about in undisturbed calm. The last thing she felt she could endure, with her nerves strung up as they were, was an encounter with a young man who contained in his actual body the spirit of Jesus.

She had accepted the fellow without giving much thought to his relation with her father. She had heard that his chief cynneddf, or "magical peculiarity," was a power of carrying about with him in mysterious secrecy, the actual personality of Jesus of Nazareth and carrying it so closely and intimately that when he spoke or made any move, or loved or hated, or accepted or rejected, it was difficult to be sure whether it were he or Jesus who was speaking, acting, or feeling.

Morfydd had indeed regarded the young man with a careless and casual eye as only another infatuation of her inflammable parent and no more worthy of him than was the impassioned Sibylla. In the flickering wing beats of attention she had given him she had put him down as a simple, pious, undesigning catamite, upon whom had fallen the fate of being an innocent accomplice of the designs of the treacherous druid and who was probably as surprised as anyone else at Brochvael's interest in him.

She had imbibed so much of the paganism of her father and brother — nor was Rhun, nor Rhun's mother, nor any of the Aunties a counterbalance to the influences round her — that for a young serving man to harbour the notion that his body was a dwelling place for Jesus Christ no more arrested her attention as a marvel than it would have arrested the attention of some energetic young sister of the youthful Boethius with her head full of political schemes for freeing Rome from the Ostrogoth, had Drom appeared in their senatorial household.

"Morfydd!"

"Coming, Father!" and snatching up and throwing down a polished silver plate of Canna's in which the old lady had shown her to herself from infancy, she rushed into the passage between kitchen and chamber out of which ascended the stone steps to her tower bedroom. The obscurity of this narrow corridor was at this time of the morning pierced by a stream of sunlight, which, entering through the orifice above the massive outer door, ran along the whole passage till it broke like a golden wave upon the lowest step of the winding staircase.

It was with their heads and shoulders equally flooded by this shaft of yellow light that Morfydd and Drom met, and this meeting, casual though it was, and quickly past and gone, was so full of significance for Morfydd that she found herself describing it to Porius an hour or so later with an interest that compelled her hearer’s closest attention.

But Neb’s message had turned the least thing she noticed into a kind of winged boat landing her through wind and wave upon the shore of the home rock.

And this magic conveyor of inanimate mysteries brought into the sun ray as she passed Drom an old mark — well! a mark of ten years ago — that she herself had made, when, as a little girl, in the act of showing her brother a store of small but very heavy quartz stones she’d collected for the sham battle she was waging with Porius and Rhun, she had been so flouted by this young philosopher as a disturbing child that in a fury she had barely missed his face with one of the heaviest and sharpest of these missiles; and yet the sight of this dint in that stone doorpost brought her nothing but pleasure and the feel of the grey lichen on the surface of craig-y-gartref.

Only half-aware of what she was experiencing, since everything wove itself into an air bridge to the home rock, the experiences were nevertheless vivid enough, and her mind commented on them as they came and went, though in a manner that even Porius might have found somewhat confusing.

Obscure visions of two imperial courts, for instance, Arthur’s and the one at Constantinople, both of them very vague and phantasmal, for the only real courts she had ever seen were the extremely primitive ones of the Gaer and Ogof-y-Gawr, kept offering themselves, without any attempt at relevancy, as an explanation of the astonishing politeness, so deft, so discreet, and so profoundly delicate, with which Drom was now moving out of her way, stepping backward and bowing low as he did so. He certainly had the power, this weird servant of her father's, of reducing at will the amount of psychic and physical weight possessed by his personality, as if some vessel arriving at a particular wharf could enlarge or lessen the amount of water it displaced; and it suddenly came to her to ask herself an odd question: "Did our inmost soul have any sex at all?"

This was the first time she had been alone with Drom, and though they were together only for the few pulse beats during which they crossed each other's path in that sun-pierced corridor, something, she told herself in her aroused susceptibility, passed between them that, though it tossed her up like the rest on the home rock, failed not to leave a shell, a feather, a shining scale, on the sands of its withdrawal.

But once past that stream of sunlight, with the dint in the doorpost and the bowing Drom, everything became painfully real. No sooner had she crossed the threshold into her father's room than she saw in a flash that he was in no easy mood. She hurried to his chair and kissed him on the forehead, leaning, as she did so, so low over the Aristophanes that the snail shells for Teleri pressed uncomfortably against one of her breasts.

But he was clearly in a querulous state, and it annoyed her to see that for him to be left for a moment without Drom implied a loss in the sufferance of which to be alone with his daughter was poor comfort.

But with the home rock in the offing she was prepared to be generous. Giving Aristophanes a firm but respectful push she flung open her cloak and seated herself in front of Brochvael, her legs swinging against his knees.

"I've got some news for you, Father," she began, thinking, while she watched his drooping glance turn obstinately and sulkily back to the open page by her side, how absurdly ignorant she was of women's feelings! Canna had always told her every possible thing she could, but she had never told her that being taken by a man made a girl want to be with him so much! And yet she didn't love him as she did Rhun. She couldn't understand herself.

"When's your man coming back to you? That's all the news I want to hear! How does he suppose we're going to prevent that precious mother of his joining up with Prince Medrawd? No! Don't interrupt! I know Medrawd's up there. Several of the Gosgordd have come expressly to tell me they've seen him. I don't know whether you realize it was to your man he went when I first found out about him. He took it all quite calmly, your man did! And now I don't suppose it would bother him a bit, eh, if his mother and Medrawd were to join forces?"

"What's that word, Father?" she enquired impatiently, pointing to the top of the page on which his gaze was fixed.

"It's the name of the play, girl," he responded, and added grimly, "and it wouldn't do you any harm, or Euronwy either, to read a little of it."

"What a word!" she murmured, "Ecclesiazusae!" And then she thought, "But why does he hate Porius so? Why did he let us marry if he's going to do his best to spoil our marriage?" And feeling no shame at a growing impulse to tear a few pages out of the Ecclesiazusae in the face of that peevish, toothless, cantankerous, grey head, and thinking, "And now for Sibylla!" "You haven't heard yet, Father," she announced in a clear, cheerful voice, throwing her head back, and catching up one of her knees between her folded fingers, "about the return of Sibylla, have you, Mother's Gwyddyles-girl, the one they say was so in love with Uncle Einion?"

She was avenged already. He was visibly agitated. And there was no Drom at hand to convey vicariously to his too-human nerves the godlike magnetism of the Son of Mary. His hand actually trembled as he tightened finger and thumb upon the parchment edge of the Ecclesiazusae, concealing thereby a most beautiful "E."

"Rhun found her," Morfydd remorselessly went on, delighting in giving him the impression that she too was seething with furious jealousy, though as a matter of fact — and it was to her own astonishment that thus it was — she felt no particular anger either against Sibylla or against Rhun.

"Rhun found her and they've joined up together; whether she killed her Sais or just ran away from him I don't know, and whether Rhun will ever tell me I don't know. But I know that in Rhun, as long as she doesn't spit at Mithras, she's got a man she can do anything she likes with — one of her own age and one who—"

"One who's got the blood of that slave's son," interrupted Brochvael, "who seduced my sister! But, girl, girl, tell me this in the devil's name! Where do these faithful and loyal friends of ours intend to set up house? Alarch's place— 'Llys Gwrnach,' Einion and I used to call it, to tease her! — well, we all know what's happened to that, since Gorsant got hold of it. None of us can bear to go near the thing! 'Gorsant's Latrine,' Gwrgi calls it. And that's what it looks like, from all I can see of it, when I go to the market! But where can they go? The whole place is gone. 'Twas Mynydd-y-Gaer and Rhyd-y-Gawr once. Before that it was Gaer-y-Gawr and Rhitta-Trefnant. After that it was the Market of Mithras. But now, thanks to Morvran's murderer, it's become Cor-wen, the 'White Choir' — Corwen!" And he repeated the two syllables with a sigh of bitter contempt, squeezing as he did so the first letter of Ecclesiazusae so violently that his thumbnail turned white as an oyster shell.

Then, after a moment's silence, "However! One thing I do know: Einion will be laughing in his beard at everything they do, and Jesus will have joined the Titans in Tartarus! But in the devil's name, child, where will they live? She wouldn't like it in that cave of his and I can't imagine—"

But his daughter had slipped off the table and had pushed past him. “What a pair we are!” she thought. “But he’s much nicer than I am! He really wants them both to be happy. I’d like to see her madly jealous of Drom, if not of me!”

She ran to the window. The shutters must have been opened by Canna when she brought the two men their daybreak loving cup and with it a bite of cheesecake; for there were a few yellow drops of the former and a few crumbs of the latter.

The two must have stood there, side by side, sipping and nibbling and watching the sun come up. She hoisted herself by the help of her wrists and the tips of her toes and leaned over the sill. The autumn air blew cool against her cheeks. She had never been a girl to be specially conscious of her feminine attributes, and the way she now thrust her hair back from her forehead and held it there was a good deal more of a direct and practical gesture than would have been made by most young men.

As she leant there the wind seemed to be blowing from a little to the right of the sun; so it was southeast. Well! It blew from the direction of the llys of the three dead Modrybedd. But it was as characteristic of the daughter just then that she didn’t give a thought to Ogof-y-Gawr, either in relation to the dead princesses or to the living Rhun, as it was characteristic of the father that, having released the beautifully turned “E” from the duress to which it had been subjected, he plunged at once, bearing apparently no grudge against anyone in the world, into the unalloyed pleasure of hearing Praxagora’s democratic rehearsal and her spirited declaration: “I have an equal share with you in this country and I am vexed and annoyed at all your public transactions.”

And if his daughter found at that moment that the touch of the dead Teleri’s snail shells against her breast was like a caress and that the world-shaking mischiefs murmured by the toothless mouth behind her were as friendly as the grey lichen and purple heather of the home rock, Brochvael beneath his rhythmic muttering was thinking of one domicile after another that might possibly satisfy the romantic Sibylla.

Neither father nor daughter can have been completely unaware of the curious irony that had brought them to this particular turning point in the changes of their human hearts; and in so small a space, and in so short a time! Would the genial ghost of Kymeinvoll the Gwyddyles have smiled wryly at them, thinking how much shorter she could have made their path to this makeshift wisdom, such as it was, had she been permitted to live as long as old Canna?

Probably her smile would have been amused and tender and not wry at all; but it is also probable that the high-handed semi-royal impetuosity, a little capricious but quite shrewd, with which her daughter seemed fully able to play the part of Princess of the Gaer, would have astonished the superstitious woman from across the water.

"Why did I lie to him?" Morfydd thought as she took the shortest cut she knew — and she knew them all — that led to craig-y-gartref. "There was no purpose in it, no reason for it! A silly motiveless falsehood it was!"

She had told Brochvael she was going to Ogof-y-Gawr to assure Rhun that she could promise him the full support of both her husband and her father. There was no falsehood about this support. Porius, she knew, would give all of it at her asking. And she had found, as she expected, that her father was fully alive to the political value of establishing a strong new branch of the House of Cunedda in the ancient palace of the forest people whence the traditions went back to Marrakesh of the Berbers.

"He was scared, the darling old fool," she said to herself, "that Rhun and I would be making trouble for the tribe. But I think I made him see that if Rhun has children by Sibylla and keeps up the glory of Ogof-y-Gawr it'll be a support for us all, not a falling away! But why did I say I was going straight to Ogof-y-Gawr to tell Rhun? He certainly looked pleased! How did I know for a surety he would be? Not to make her jealous! No, it's always for the same reason. It's always Porius! Why does he hate Porius so? Is it perhaps because he wishes he'd been his son and not Uncle Einion's? Is it because of Morvran? I shall never know! Well, there it is! But why did I lie?"

She suddenly stopped, panting, for she had been running. There, before her, huddled up, curiously reduced in size, not so much out of fear as out of shame and humiliation and extreme unease, was a blinking, cowering, whitish grey owl!

"Blodeuwedd!" gasped Morfydd, and the two of them, the excited girl and the agitated owl, stared at each other in absolute stillness.

For both these two-legged beings, for the creature with soft breasts and brown hair, and for the creature with hooked beak and greyish white feathers, the two great cosmic motions as Brochvael's Aristotelian boyfriend in Rome might have put it, of the energeia akinesis, "the motion without motion," that eternally moves the world — the motion which is the stream of events in Time, and the motion which is the growth of events in Space — appeared to stop dead. Then in the hearing of them both a faded poplar leaf fluttered down upon the moss; and once more the causeless, indetermined fluctuations of anangke and tyche, of "necessity and chance," flowed and wavered on.

"I know, if you don't know," the owl seemed to be saying, "why you lied like that!"

"You don't, you don't, you don't!" Morfydd's very soul longed to cry out.

But her heart couldn’t utter the words, for deep within itself it knew the owl was right. “If I did,” she whispered, “it was the other way round from you. I turned from my light-of-love to my mate. You turned from your mate to your light-of-love.”

“And I’d do it again! And I’d do it again!” cried the owl. “Gwydion created me for his own glory and for the glory of his choice. Oh yes! You’re listening to me now, Gwydion son of Don! But I shall defy you forever! And I shall have my choice forever! Erre! Erre! Erre! Erre!” And screaming that “Begone! Begone! Begone!” by which Homer’s demigods despatched their enemies to Erebus, the bird tore herself out of the tangled mass of holly and poplar from which she had been blinking at the sun and swept away towards the river.

And Morfydd went on, following the upward slope of the winding track that led to the home rock, but she ceased running, and as she went she knew well that she had never before reached quite such a point of unashamed candour with herself. Indeed she proved this to herself by the realism of what she now proceeded to do. “I want him to make love to me,” she said to herself, “and I don’t want our love disturbed by his finding the snail shells on me!”

She waited therefore till she came to the neighbourhood of the home rock where two paths converged. Here, or not far from here, had been, since her earliest childhood, a series of large badgers’ holes. It had been one of the Iberian peculiarities of Princess Indeg, her father’s mother, the elder sister of the Three Aunties, to regard badgers as sacred animals.

Einion ab Iddawc had, in his humorous way, encouraged this humane superstition, so that Morfydd had been brought up to regard badger baiting as an indecent bestiality, only excusable because to the ancient forest people all these Celtic invaders, whether Gwyddylaid or Brythonaid, were no better than ignorant barbarians.

When therefore she reached this crossing of paths she wasn’t at all surprised to find stray shreds of old scattered wasps’ nests lying about. But at this spot, at the foot of one particular fir tree, there was a different sort of orifice altogether. This was a miniature cave, so clear of dead leaves and rainwater and bird droppings and fungus that the general effect of the place resembled that of an antechamber to an elves’ winter palace. And it was here that kneeling on the moss she pulled out the snail-shell necklace and arranged it in a circle, even going so far as to place the under-part of each shell, from which the owner had vanished into the immeasurable Hades of all the forgotten crustaceans of the world, face down; so that in case there were any inhabitants of this minute sanctuary the intrusion would be pleasing and not disturbing.

It was while she was thus engaged that she suddenly heard voices approaching. A party of men — for the voices were all male — was rapidly drawing near, coming up the one of the two paths that led from the direction of Brother John’s cell. Her decision was rapid, helped out, so Chance had willed, by the fact that she was already crouching down on hands and knees. She moved forward very cautiously, first on one knee and then on the other, straddling her fairy circle of shells, and forcing her way onward, like a diver at the bottom of entangled marine seaweeds, under hollies and willows and birches and alders, till, sinking down on a bed of this year’s dead ferns and last year’s dead leaves, she lay dead still, trying to breathe inaudibly, but feeling as if her very heartbeats must betray her.

Before she curled up in her harelike form she had caught Porius’s voice. Of the two others, for she was soon aware that there were only two of them, she felt sure at once by his foreign voice that one was the Jewish doctor, and by the drift and burden of the third one's words she wasn't long in guessing that it was this strange boy-poet whom Einion had refused to receive into his household.

It was no displeasure to her to find she could follow the precise feelings of Porius by the tone of his voice; and it was an exquisite pleasure to discover from these same tones that his feelings were identical with what hers had been ever since Neb had delivered his message.

He was evidently exercising something of the same sullen but massive and patient self-control that Gwrgi's ox was wont to exercise when he had to swing his back round one more time on the darkened east and see the glow in the west touch the stubble stalks before him with a flicker of red ere the plough he was dragging turned them over into eternal night.

The arguments of these disputing men were having the same effect upon Porius as her father's recent reception of the news about Ogof-y-Gawr had had upon her. As she had done with her father he seemed to be laboriously defending with the help of all manner of propitiatory side issues a course of action which he had already determined to take for some quite solid, sensible, practical, and utilitarian reason.

"My wife spoke to me very earnestly on the matter only last night," the doctor was saying. "She feels that Gog and Magog are too young to be plunged into a crowded community like that of the Gaer. She feels that I myself would do better work as the Gaer's physician if I had a home a few miles off — if in fact I was permitted to settle permanently where our son Magog was born and where we at present are. In fact, she says she has had a clear token from the gods of her tribe — for she is, as I have explained to you, a woman of Moab, and her respect for the only true God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is, I am sorry to confess to you, extremely undeveloped — a token from her gods, false gods no doubt, but false gods can, alas! give signs and tokens — such is the measure of the power allowed them — that are not as false as themselves; a clear token, she says, that there is danger to Magog, if not to Gog, if she and her children leave the place where they are and move to the Gaer."

"A bard doesn't beg for lodging like a beggar!" the high-pitched voice of the boy-poet broke in. "But I must, if you please, and if the prince will let me, say just this. Your wife's gods are no doubt powerful gods. I'm glad to learn about them. I respect them, as I respect all powerful divinities. But with yourself to feed — and a wise healer needs to nourish in his own body the magic with which he heals — and with such offspring, for I've noted those rounded limbs from the rose gardens of the sun — and with the fountains of her own bosom to be fed from the breasts of the earth — won't there be a lack of that surplusage of meats and sweetmeats, of delicacies and dainties, with which, placed on clean and polished platters on the thresholds of human habitation, we are wont to soften the hearts of the invisible ones?

"As they used to say in Caer Einion: 'The richer the steam from the pot on the fire, the greater the gods that are drawn to the door!' And what I say to you, Lot-el-Azziz, Healer of Judah, with due submission to our prince, who holds all our fates in his hands, is simply this. Suppose your wife's gods do compel you to remain in Saint Julian's cell."

The boy-bard's voice suddenly became inhumanly shrill. It became like the voice of an angry water ouzel; in fact, it rose to such a thin and piercing scream that Morfydd grew aware of a personal, almost a physical, shrinking from this unseen semi-human being who owned a voice like the squeak of a Tartarean bat flying in and out of the oozy chasms in the black rock face above the waters of the witch-goddess Styx.

“Yes,” screamed the boy-bard of Ynys Prydein, “why, I ask you, O Doctor of Devils, shouldn’t I share your abode with you? I can make tasty and savoury dishes as well as any daughter of Moab. With me in that place, your Moabitess would rest from her labour, her gods while she slept would pour their precious ointments upon her head, you and your children would grow fat before the Lord, and all the rulers of Ynys Prydein would send offerings. Gold and silver would be accounted nothing of in Saint Julian’s cell; for let me tell you this, Doctor, and do thou lay it to heart: the gifts that reach the cup and platter of the Chief of the Bards of Britain are such as no curer of palsy, or leprosy, or even of the sacred sickness itself, ever sets eyes upon in all the days of his life!”

It was then that Morfydd softly lifted herself up upon her elbow and listened intently while a vibration of delicious thankfulness quivered through her, for Porius’s answer to the two men was exactly the answer she would have given herself.

“Surely,” she thought, “the evils of marriage are past when the man does what the woman wants without a word passing between them!”

But, all the same, hearing Porius’s words she sighed. “He must be harassed to the breaking point,” she thought, “to take this flippant tone.”

“In the name, therefore,” cried Porius, in a tone worthy of his father, so ironical and careless it was, “of all the gods that the Church of Christ is destined to swallow up alive in all the mountains and rivers and forests and valleys of Ynys Prydein, I appoint thee, Taliesin, Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein, to be keeper and guardian of the Betws of Pelagius, sometimes called Ty-Llys-Sulian, and otherwise known as Brother John’s Cell, while I give and bestow by the right and authority of my ancestors to the Physician of my Household at Mynydd-y-Gaer in the Princedom of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy, that is to say, to Lot-el-Azziz of the Tribe of Judah in the Regions of the Jordan the special usage, licence, right, custom, privilege, perquisite, and prerogative, of eating and drinking and sleeping with his wife and cherishing the offspring of their two bodies within the precincts of the said cell of Brother John, whereof I have appointed the said Bard to be the honourable Keeper; and may he who breaks this solemn compact and covenant hereby proclaimed at the Holes of the Badgers in this Forest of Edeyrnion, where the path from Ty Cerrig crosses the path from Ogof-y-Gawr, fall dead as Brother John is dead, and be damned as Minnawc Gorsant was certain Brother John was damned!"

She was sitting erect now in her hiding place, scooping up handfuls of rubble with both hands and letting it fall like dust or sand through her fingers. It was a curiously composite rubble that surrounded her here, a rubble in which few creatures save moles and mice and beetles and slowworms took any interest, but which was already proving the best nourishment in the world for a particular species of large, dusky brown, dung-coloured fungus, the victim of or perhaps the happy wearer of a marvellous worn-white mould which surrounded its rim and half covered the interior of its concave saucer like a fairy leprosy.

Morfydd stared at this infected or hymeneally invested growth without seeing it, or rather while she saw it, substituting for all the things called up by it all the other very different things called up by the tone of her husband's voice. How well she knew that tone! In the depths of his being he was happy; but on the surface he was irritable and irresponsible. Everything except his interior happiness was irrelevant.

Above all, he was in a mood almost as cynical as the prevailing mood of his father, the dead prince, a mood she had always enjoyed and indeed had encouraged in Einion but had hardly dared to hope to see in Einion's son.

She herself had got it in her to be a very competent ruler; and of this power in herself she had already begun to enjoy the taste.

And along with this power she undoubtedly inherited from her grandmother enough of the old Iberian strain in the matriarchy of the Aunties to feel a certain humorous gratification when formidable men — her father with his Aristophanes, her husband with his Herculean muscles, Rhun with his sun god — showed themselves so ignorant of the real realities of life, so led astray by childish distractions.

She felt an intense desire to laugh aloud when she heard the way in which Porius was prepared to settle this dispute. “Does he suppose,” she thought as she stared at that white-blotched fungus, “does he suppose that a woman from the tents of the desert will submit to suckle her baby on a pile of pillows, while a boy with a voice like the shriek of a bat is stirring her cauldron at her fire?”

Since, however, there was no visible woman on the scene during this princely proclamation at the “Holes of the Badgers” it soon became clear to the listening girl that her formidable dispenser of hearth space and roof space in the province of Edeyrnion had not only succeeded in pacifying the rival claimants to Brother John’s cell but had actually put them into an extremely good temper; for the doctor could be heard murmuring some resonant and rhythmical chant that she supposed was Hebrew, while the high-pitched voice of the young Pen Beirdd was without question uttering jubilant self-congratulations over his new status as an independent, unattached sharer of domestic satisfactions.

She couldn’t catch the doctor’s words, and even if she had done so she wouldn’t have understood the rabbinical symbols that floated in and out and round and about every syllable the man was uttering; but the young bard’s song of gratitude to the new Prince of Edeyrnion seemed to be proceeding from a totally different dimension of human emotion from the one that gave birth to this ancient vibration of Hebrew piety.

Kwrw to drink and a lovely dwelling!
Kwrw yfet a chein trefret!

carolled the boy-bard in childish exultation.

And she soon heard him improvising verses to a tune that might well have been called "the autumn song of the yaffle," so joyously and jocundly was it adapted to the pine-scented, sun-warmed wind that was whispering through the branches:

It is meat that he gives to me, to me,
That he kills, that he hangs, that he rears, that he feeds,
That he feeds, that he rears, that he kills again,
Yt ladd, yt gryc, yt vac, yt vyc,
Yt vyc, yt vac, yt ladd, yn rac!
Kwrw to drink and a lovely dwelling!
Kwrw yfet a chein trefret!
Though the olives ripen on Olivet!

"Is he silenced," the girl thought, "by his own daring in introducing the Mount of Olives into his thanksgiving?"

And she couldn't repress a sigh of relief when the boyish and high-pitched voice took up the strain again:

A noble giver is he, is he
Who gives of his bounty to me, to me
To live with the greatest marvels three,
With a Healer, with a Mother, with a Babe on knee;
A bed to sleep in, an oven to bake in,
Willows and waters and winds to wake in;
While fire can warm and water can wet,

And olives can ripen on Olivet,
The fate of a man can still be met!
Kwrw yfet a chein trefret!

Thus was Morfydd's appreciation of her husband's diplomacy in reconciling a Wandering Jew with the Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein justified by the Muses themselves. But her pride was short-lived; in fact, it was changed into heartbeating agitation, when, upon the two rivals' departure, this same husband summoned her in a whisper to leave her hiding place.

"Porius! How on earth did you know I was here?"

"Know, sweetheart? Haven't I been spying on you ever since you left Ty Cerrig?"

There was nothing for her to do but obey him; and as soon as she was in his arms he lifted her off the ground and began carrying her towards their childhood's home rock.

Previous to her giving her father the false impression that she was off to Ogof-y-Gawr, Brochvael had informed her — for he always seemed to be announcing to her the direction of the wind at the moments when she was most conscious of the wind of fate — that it was blowing that morning from the southwest. So that when Porius lifted her up and cried in high spirits, "There'll be a fine wind blowing at craig-y-gartref, for it's due west today!" she felt a contrarious impulse to raise her hand — for he was holding her high up against his chin — twist her fingers tight in his hair, give it so vicious a tug that he'd be driven to drop her, and then, once on the ground, outrun him, as she and Rhun always could outrun him, and take refuge in Ogof-y-Gawr!

When, however, they entered the part of the forest that surrounded the home rock, where the trees were mostly pines, he was compelled by necessity to lower her body to the level of his ribs and to take a tighter hold of her.

Now there was something about this tighter hold that changed the whole current of her mood. It wasn't that her irrational revolt collapsed in the presence of reason. It wasn't that her resistance ceased in the presence of superior strength. There was a much more intimate cause. Though he was only clasping her in the bend of his left arm with his left hand against her body, Chance arranged it that he held her now precisely in the manner in which in her earliest and vaguest young-girl reveries her imaginary lovers had always embraced her.

During their whole betrothal he had never held her quite like this. As Homer would say, "it loosened her knees." And it was her first experience of the real feminine ecstasy of yielding, for on her bridal night she had blindly, resolutely, and almost heroically forced herself to submit to him. On that night, as far as she was concerned, there had been no delicious tantalizations, no tremulously sweet delays, no advances and retreats, no entranced hoverings on the brink of surrender. But now, owing to the way he was holding her while his free hand brushed from her face the fragrant sharp-pointed fir foliage, and while her intelligence, fluttering like a light-winged butterfly round them both as he carried her, missed no single pulse beat of this experience, her whole body was reduced to a quivering cloud of delicious yieldingness. And, moreover, though she dodged all attempts to penetrate into the secrets of his male lovemaking, she knew very well that with nobody else in the world — certainly not with poor dear Rhun — could she discuss the things of love.

This also was a new discovery for her. "I could almost," she thought, "tell him what I feel for Rhun!" and after wondering why this thought gave her just then no twinge of pain: "But I'm certain things have happened to him in these last days, and things about women too, that he couldn't bring himself to confess to me for anything."

Her father had often described to her the figure of Eros with which, between the scrolls of Plato and Aristotle, his young friend Boethius, of no greater age than the boy-bard Taliesin, had caused his ivory bookshelf to be adorned; and something now about the rush of the wind in her face as they came out from the trees made her recall her girlish imagination of that divine figure.

It was lucky for them both perhaps that there was no beautiful and inquisitive Eros flying with them at that moment, as they emerged into the clearing at the foot of craig-y-gartref. Such a fatally wise presence, its head full of every aspect of the amorous experiences of each of them, might have revealed to Morfydd that when it came to pure sensuality neither she nor Creiddylad could compare, in satisfying the voluptuous demands of Porius's exacting nature, with the mysterious and dangerous Nineue.

Whether even Eros could have revealed to Porius the secrets of Morfydd's heart is doubtful; but it was certainly lucky that such a visitor from Cytherean shores would have been too scared of Aristophanes to visit Ty Cerrig and reveal to Brochvael that in the last couple of days this Hercules of a son-in-law had, in the very vein of that virile hero, embraced, in addition to his bride, a cawres from the caves of the Cader and a Ffichtiaid from the Gulfs of Annwn!

But this same Eros, whether in the spiritual shape wherein Boethius's artist had imagined him, or diffused, by the mystery that moves our world, not only through these married lovers' nerves, but through each "guest and companion" of their excited bodies, suddenly decided against the home rock as a bed for love; and "taking," as Homer would say, "other counsel," compelled Morfydd's enamoured centaur to lay his living burden, whose heart was now beating as fast if not faster than his own, on a soft expanse of lavishly grown lichen that flourished at the foot of the rock.

This was a dedicated bed for such a purpose for the lichen that grew there was of the rare kind, characteristic of the margin between forest and mountain, that had always made Morfydd think of the bottom of the sea.

Out of the sea had risen the fatal Aphrodite; and it was because of the deep sea of loneliness in that hidden spot that Porius, urged by Eros, had been impelled to turn from the windy eminence of their playtime resort and lay her down here. Once or twice his hot excited fingers met hers — feverishly, shamelessly occupied now, hers as well as his, in loosening her garments — but, if their fingers met, their separate consciousnesses, impalpable, indefinable, without form or shape, but forced to function no less than their excited fingers within those ghost-god mysteries of Time and Space that dominate our particular world, exchanged those alternations of sex excitement that with the quiver of sun flames, air clouds, sea waves upon the sweet resistance of earth furrows make a fusion of the sexes and press forward to the supersexual.

At no point save the infliction of sudden death is the difference between the feelings of participator and onlooker wider than in the act of love. Had the young priest of the Gaer, now busy with the obsequies of the mocking Einion, been despatched by the Furies to behold this amorous scene, what would have obsessed his brain had he possessed the facts of the case would have been the thought: “Now with her and yesterday with a Ffichtiaid of Eryri and the day before with a cawres of the Cader!”

He would have visualized those others with the implacable fury of the self-denying for the self-satisfying; and, while he turned his eyes away from the attraction of this lascivious scene, to his indignant chastity Nineue would have appeared a devilish succubus and the second Creiddylad a loathsome corpse-devouring she-ogre.

It is even doubtful whether the great Myrddin Wyllt himself would have been able to feel with them, though a deep green gap in the drooping fir trees above these lovers combined with the azure sky of that October afternoon to create a cosmic arena by means of which the four elements of Space drew nourishment from the union of these children of Time, and enhanced the rapture they were enjoying.

Certainly, with his pre-human, million-years experience, the counsellor would have seen much that they were missing. He would have seen how their shared playmate memories — just as if it had been incest between brother and sister — took much of the sweet strangeness of love away. He would have seen how their unusual mental intimacy — so lucky an addition in other respects — was likely to lessen the elemental tragedy, at once so beautiful and so terrible, such as Porius had drunk to the dregs in the blood of the cawres, and Morfydd had tasted along with the honey of Mithras.

And finally he would have seen that their simple affection for each other would cause them to miss all that subhuman, almost saurian, sensuality such as Porius enjoyed in his protracted dalliance with the cold-blooded Nineue.

But even the prophetic insight of Myrddin Wyllt, deepened by prehistoric memories of one Golden Age, and inspired by mysterious intimations of another, even could it have been concentrated upon their reckless though most lawful union, would almost certainly have missed the one thing which each of them felt would have been nonexistent without the recognition of it by the other.

This was nothing less than the thing of all things that romantic lovers most dread to feel. It was in fact the thing, the secret of which Morfydd's father was at that very moment trying to extricate from the Eleven Comedies. It was their mutual recognition of the whole business of sex being comical, being in fact Nature's savage joke, inflicted for her own purpose upon her bewildered offspring, but a joke which, could it be turned upon its maker, either by a delicious and impious sensuality devoid of all passion or by a golden interchange of affectionate and humorous understanding, might be transformed into the possibility of a supersexual happiness in some undreamt-of future.

The first great advantage as lovers possessed by Porius and Morfydd was their mutual mania for a shameless and outrageous analysis of all their feelings, however scandalous; while their second great advantage was the one possessed by the incestuous rulers of Egypt, namely, the fact that having been familiar from childhood with each other's personalities they were able to plunge into the perilous salt sea of love without being distracted by anything strange in each other's character beyond the eternal strangeness of male to female and female to male.

They had played games together so long that their betrothal had only been a new and a rather more difficult game of which their bridal night was the complicated climax. Their present encounter was more than a game, however; it was a reality, and their enjoying each other on this grey lichen bed, guarded by these dark-bowing, obsequious, moss-scented fir boughs, was a private reality of their own, free from playing prince and princess, free from everything that implied a care, a duty, a piety, a purpose, a principle, or an obligation.

She had been absorbed in planning the happiness of the man with whom she was in love. He had been absorbed in enjoying sensations which he had come to feel were independent of his relation to any human being.

But now in their human enjoyment of the immortal absurdity of sex, of which gods and men can see the joke but which the ravishing sun as he beats down upon the earth, and the awakened earth as she lays bare the fecundity of her furrows to the sun, receive and accept with such huge solemnity, and which animals and birds and fishes and reptiles along with the whole world of vegetation and the whole world of mineral attractions and elemental repulsions accept as eternal necessity, their minds were so alike in their release from everything but their momentary pleasure in each other that they were perfectly ready to treat this encounter of theirs with a naturalness that was as humorous as it was free from every sort of afterthought.

Thus the larger part of their delight was purely the old simple human-animal ecstasy of conscious male with conscious female, that ancient rapture wherein the cunning craftiness of Nature has loaded the immemorial dice.

But Nature encouraged them to have their separate marginal feelings. He felt as if he were recklessly taking possession of much more than a desirable girlish body. He felt as if his inmost identity were piercing with a quivering shaft of palpable light, like the rush of a meteor, a deep rich gathered-up cloud of undulating mist, a cloud of sea mist and land mist, a cloud of earth vapour and sea foam.

Her feelings were less elemental and more realistic. She felt she was yielding up to the creature she knew best in the world, and liked best in the world, and with whom she had most in common in the world, everything that was hers to yield, everything, that is to say, except the evasive “I am I” within her that must stay itself whatever happened, so that his “I am I” she liked so well might stay itself also.

Thus it was that on this chaotic twenty-third of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, and on a bed of lichen that was not even within sight of their old playtime "home," the new rulers of Edeyrnion paid their tribute to Eros. Had the shadowy, scarcely human ghost of the death-desiring Teleri, noticing, as such a ghost might easily have done, that the snail-shell necklace destined to adorn her death lay among the twisted roots by the "Holes of the Badgers," come drifting past those two so locked together, it might have observed certain curious details about them. It might have observed, for instance, that Porius's eyes were fixed, not on Morfydd's face, but on a patch of brilliant yellow-green fungus mould, growing on a half-hidden rock to the left of the girl's closed eyelids. It might also have observed that Morfydd's tightly clenched fingers, at the end of one of her outflung arms, were clutching a fallen but still green pine cone, a pine cone that the descent of their two bodies into this unruffled retreat had broken from its parent branch.

But those fingers relaxed at last; and Porius, scrambling to his feet, began an outburst of rather futile and rather foolish farewell talk.

"I've got to leave you now, my angel, and God knows when you'll see me again! Before December, I hope, but it'll be the longest parting we've ever had since I used to cross Moel y Famau to go to school. I had to have you to myself before I went off, but off's the word now. God! We know whose legs I ought to have if I'm to get back to Saint Julian's before the counsellor leaves."

She let him pull her up to her feet, and they hugged each other blindly, without speaking or kissing. Then freeing herself she said, "There's one thing, my dear, and that's about Rhun."

"I don't care," he answered, "what it is about Rhun. Of course I'd like your first child to be mine. But if it isn't I shan't put a tynged on either of you. I know old Rhun and I know you. And I'd sooner never see either of you again than play the jealous Lord of the Gaer. Besides, I have no right. I haven't—"

But she interrupted him. "Hush now! That's enough! I know what these days have been, and I know what it means to be the strong man of the tribe! I forgive you all you've done and all you will do! No, it isn't that. It's only that Sibylla's left her Sais — killed him or run away from him — and come back here. She's started living with Rhun at Ogof-y-Gawr, and Rhun wants your leave for them to go on living there. He says, now that the Aunties are dead, that one of us ought to be on guard there; and since you'll be with the emperor, and my father will be alone save for this weird creature Drom, and there ought to be a woman at Ogof-y-Gawr, I told him I thought you wouldn't mind. Of course, you don't know Sibylla as well as I do. And I don't know what really goes on in her head, or what her secret thoughts and ambitions really are. I always believed she loved that Sais and was only playing with your father, and afterwards, when your father shook her off, with my father. And of course that still may be the truth!

"You can't tell from a girl's actions what she feels deep down in her heart. It's possible she was scared of going to Germania with him. She may have jumped into the sea and swam ashore the moment he got her into one of those awful-looking boats. Or maybe she escaped when he and his friends were all drunk. What is clear to me is that Rhun found her just at the moment when he was hit to the heart by that woman's going off — as I suppose she has gone off — with Dion Dionides."

Porius looked at her with a heavy, tender, glowering amusement. What on earth had happened between her and old Rhun that she could talk about him in this way, and take so calmly his settling down with this crazy Gwyddyles in the deserted halls of the Modrybedd?

But, as he continued to stare at her, the humorous expression in his face died away, and what was to him just then an extremely disturbing thought emerged from one of the side wings of his mind's proscenium and proceeded to hop like a black toad across the front of the stage, the thought, namely, that the love into which she had just plunged so deliciously with him had been only a desperate drug in which she had tried to drown her feeling for Rhun.

Women were, he told himself, liable to take these violent remedies when they were unhappy; and wasn't it possible that if Rhun had decided to forget Gwendydd in the arms of Sibylla Morfydd had decided to forget Rhun in the arms of her husband?

"I know what you're thinking, Porius," she murmured, as, allowing her to stand once more on her own feet, he perceptibly drew away a little, "but this has nothing — I swear it across my heart, my dear — to do with us, save that we've got to do our best for Rhun. I don't want him at the Gaer and I can't have him alone at the Ford, or in that woman's pavilion, if they've left it standing. But I wouldn't mind his being at Ogof-y-Gawr keeping up, along with Mithras, those old customs your mother hates so, and the priest hates so, and my father doesn't understand at all! That's where your father was so different. I know he took nothing seriously but he understood the people — Cymry as they call themselves now — and the Gwyddylaid too. He was a great man, Porius, in some ways, your father."

"He was mighty fond of you, sweetheart, I know that much!"

"And so he was, in his heart," she retorted, "of you!"

He shook his head. But he had recovered his good humour. "She is fond of me," he told himself. "And when two people understand each other as well as we do that's surely enough."

"Morfydd," he began.

“Yes, my dear?”

“You will let your first child be ours?”

“Ours?” she cried, brushing a little cloud of midges from her forehead with the back of her hand and uttering the words in a tone he always fancied she must have got from her mother the Gwyddyles. “Goodness no! My first child must be the son of that immortal youth imprisoned in Caer Sidi of whose beauty that boy-bard was chanting, imagining it was himself. And my second child — oh, I don’t know! — somebody or other from our old gods — Pryderi perhaps, or even Manawyddan, if I could dispose of Rhiannon! But I’ve got too many serious affairs of state to discuss with you, my good man, to bother about children today.”

But Porius was quite satisfied with the look she’d given him. It was the look, combined with the indulgent tone, of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles, when as a boy he would drift into Ty Cerrig to beg for a piece of the sugared ginger she alone had the secret of making. So all he said was: “You don’t think, do you, that our friend Sibylla will be converted to Mithraism? The Bull-killer’s a fine deity for us men, but Brother John used to tell most revolting tales of his effect on women.”

“Do you really want to know what I think, Porius?”

He nodded. “Though I can guess at it,” he added.

“I think it’ll be Sibylla and not Rhun who’ll strike the note that the forest people — I beg their pardon, the Cymry — will follow at the Aunties’ old llys. I know they know her as a Gwyddyles from the Swamp and as Gunhorst’s woman and as the mother of little Gunta; but they know her also as my mother’s pet and your father’s favourite; and Canna swears that if Gunhorst hadn’t carried her off Father would have made her mistress of Ty Cerrig. Her path hasn’t often crossed mine, and I wouldn’t say I exactly like her, but I have a sort of admiration for her. They say in the Gaer that the Derwydd's brother was under her thumb. I can only pray that Father isn't under the thumb of the Derwydd's servant! Porius, listen!"

"Well?"

"Aren't you going to see your mother before you go?"

"No, I'm not."

"Just because of these Medrawd rumours?"

"They're not rumours. They're facts."

"That your mother and Medrawd are lovers?"

He nodded.

She put out her hand and touched his wrist with the tips of two of her fingers. "Why are you so hard on her, Porius? Aren't we all under the same kind of fate?"

His whole face darkened and grew cloudy, while the wrinkled folds of his corrugated forehead created deep little shadowy hollows above and below his sunken eyes.

Automatically he seized the hand that had touched him, treating it as an absentminded fowler might treat a rare but useless bird, before deciding whether to let it fly away or to wring its neck.

"No, my dear," he burst out with sudden, uncouth impatience, "we're not all in the same fate. There's nothing treacherous to the emperor in Rhun's affair with Sibylla, nor in your visiting him at the Ford on the morning of our marriage, nor in Rhun's making love to Gwendydd, nor in... nor in—"

But she interrupted him. "Nor in your doing the same I suppose with that Ffichti-witch who waits on her and who — so the Cymry in the Gaer swear — has put a tynged on the emperor's counsellor!"

"But, sweetheart, think! Oh, I beg you to think! Oughtn't she at least, in common decency, to have waited till my father was under that great altar stone which her priests have been polishing for years before calling on this traitor to share her bed?"

She made an ineffective effort — more as a gesture of natural independence than as an emotional reaction — to free herself from his grasp; but it was as if her fingers had been caught between two millstones, each of them as gentle as sleep and each of them as unyielding as the anvil of Hephaestus, but such was the under-tide of her feeling for him just then that a delicious tremor of abandonment to his strength streamed like a sweet fatality through her whole being.

"Listen, Porius," she whispered. "If I were to give you unquestionable proof that your mother hasn't let this man into her bed, would you stop hating her like this, even if you don't see her before you go away?"

"Girl! Girl! How could you give me such proof? Besides, if you could, what would such proof be against this man's own word? I tell you, my sweet, he came to me and boasted of it! But whether he had her in bed or not, how can I forgive her treachery to the emperor in letting this traitor—"

But Morfydd stopped him with an impatient wave of her free hand. "You great humbug!" she cried. "How can you talk like that? You know very well how mixed-up everything is with us these days, in Edeyrnion, in this island, in the whole world! Aren't you always telling me yourself that because Medrawd is a child of Arthur's sister he has a far better right to succeed Arthur than any of Arthur's own bastards? You've even told me that the Modrybedd considered Rhun, not you, the natural heir to your father because of Alarch the Fair. And anyway I never like it, Porius, when you talk in that tone about the emperor. Serve him, fight for him, by all means. Do anything for him you want to do, but don't copy Rhun, my dear, and justify your own loves and hates by dragging in 'loyalty to the emperor' or 'treachery to Ynys Prydein.'

"But let go my hand and I'll say no more about your mother. I certainly wouldn't like you" — and her hand was free now and there was flickering across her face as much of a smile as is possible with a girl whose fingers are pressed into her mouth— "to decide for me how to treat Father! But just tell me this—"

And it occurred to Porius as he looked at her that it was going against Nature for any lovers, even though their minds beat in as close a rhythm as a pair of Boethius's water clocks, to say simply everything to each other! "No," he told himself, "she came near just now to revealing something about Mother, but decided to keep it dark—"

"Just tell me," she went on, "what you do in your mind when things get out of control, and you feel you're at the limit of your endurance?"

Without a word he seized her head in his two hands and kissed her so impetuously on the mouth that he could taste blood as he drew away. Nor was she, who at that moment recalled, and did so with a sensation like the splitting of a tablet of living stone in her breast, the taste of Rhun's blood, quite sure whose lip this time had been hurt nor whose teeth this time had drawn the blood.

"That's what I like to do!" he gasped. "But that's hardly in my mind, is it? Well! Do you really want to know, my dear?"

And in face of her serious nod, he went on with what she could see— "but it's too late to stop him now!" she thought — was a wrenching effort, a rending and tearing effort. "What I do," he declared, dragging each syllable out of his very vitals by the hair of its head and holding it up as if to show her how its roots dripped with blood, "is to repeat an incantation that has been handed down in the caves of the Cader since the day of the great Master of all Star Gazers, Idris, whose name your father told me was by itself proof enough that the Ffichtiaid were Greeks who after the Trojan War tried desperately and recklessly to find their way home by sailing between Scylla and Charybdis; and instead of getting home found themselves, after passing the Pillars of Hercules, on the beaches and rocks of these islands where they were seized by the Cewri and made their slaves."

There was something in the tone of his voice and the look on his face, and in the fact that he had shut his eyes just as a child might do in the process of reciting its lesson, that caused Morfydd, drenched though she was in that warm October sun, to shiver from head to foot.

If what she had felt a minute or two ago had resembled the breaking of a vase of precious odours in her bosom, this shutting of Porius's eyes and this murmuring of the word "Cewri" gave her the sensation that in place of the feel of the snail shells, now at the badger holes, against her skin, what she felt now — and the more she pressed her knuckles against her heart the sharper she felt it — was a splinter of ice.

"The words sound to us," he explained with his eyes tight shut — and she thought, "He's like a boy confessing he killed a deer when he ought to have been hunting wolves"— "the words sound to us like absolute gibberish, but they have an odd effect on me, an effect I've tested and proved again and again. Do you want to know what that effect is?"

The girl nodded gravely.

"Well! It's as though when things get desperate, when in fact they're beginning to beat you down, you could change the whole situation by muttering these words, either silently or aloud. There's something in the mere sound of the syllables — and of course there is magic in it whether you've wanted to have it there or not! — that gives us the power to throw off mountains of miseries and to beat back oceans of troubles."

"Let's have them!" Morfydd cried. "Let's have them for heaven's sake! Don't go on and on and on tantalizing me!"

And Porius, feeling as if he were plunging his naked arm clean up to the shoulder in deep green water covered by a scum of blood, enunciated, in clear, ringing, unnecessarily loud tones, treating the elemental sounds as if they were all one single, world-threatening, cosmos-shaking, Aristophanic conjuration, all he had learnt of the language of the Cewri, from the druid's brother, from Drom's brother, and from Drom himself.

"Thumberol gongquod tungerong larry ruggerug gwork ong gorsorb ong!"

Once uttered in this manner, it seemed to him that all the potency, all the magic, all the mystery vanished from these words and that they drifted off on the wind like so many seed husks that were lighter than gossamer and emptier than chaff.

Morfydd waited for a second until the monstrous sounds died down, then, drawing back a few paces and turning her face away, she began in extreme haste and with trembling fingers to get her garments into order.

And watching the curve of her back and how her head hung sideways as she smoothed out her clothes, and noting the way the sunshine kept throwing into relief one of her small ears making it gleam like a fragment of quartz as the west wind lifted up, let fall, and lifted up again a chestnut-coloured tress that momently concealed it, Porius said to himself: "I must keep them separate in my mind — that's the only way; separate — that's the thing! Dead ones and living ones can be kept separate! But suppose we could be as close in our thoughts as we were just now in our bodies, couldn't it —? No! It wouldn't work! It would spoil the whole difference between men and women. It would spoil the mystery on which all depends! Or am I just fooling myself because I can't and won't tell her? No — no — no — no! It would spoil everything to tell her. Besides, I couldn't say the words. No, no, no! It isn't deceiving her. It isn't lying to her. It's keeping things that are naturally apart, apart. There are things that must always be kept apart. No! I mustn't let myself think about it any more. Death is death; and life is life, and that's all."

Fiercely he forced his consciousness to leave that region of his mind where there was green water and a chasmed confusion of blood and hair; and in order to keep it away from that region he compelled himself to think of his mother and Medrawd. "I must come to some conclusion," he thought, "why it is that I'm so outraged by Mother and Medrawd and so little troubled by Morfydd and Rhun."

Hovering there in that heavy, sultry October sunshine he now, with one drastic sweep of his mind's wings, like a seahawk descending upon the swell of a curving wave, forced his attention to concentrate once more on their recent embrace.

But it was at this moment that he received a shock that would have totally upset a man of a different race; but it was not for nothing he was the son of Einion ab Iddawc. Though still within the enchanted circle of the "now" and the "near," something — he knew not what — made him glance at a low thick clump of small birch trees that grew close to where they had been lying. And then it was that what his father-in-law might well have called his daimon agathe, or "good genius," helped him with wondrous rapidity to prove himself a true descendant of Cunedda.

Without betraying by the faintest quiver of hand or face what he had seen, he allowed his eyes to wander carelessly and casually back to the girl and then back again to the clump of birches.

But there, behind that clump of birches, was the thing of all things that a man whose woman was at that very moment reclothing herself after a prolonged enjoyment of the act of love would be the most outraged to see — the gloating and infatuated stare of another man!

It is true that there was something obsessed about this face in the birches, something strained and desperate, something that reduced the man's features, though naturally handsome, to an expression almost inhuman; and it is true that this wild, mad look contrasted quite startlingly with the handsome face it transformed. And it was no doubt this spirit of mad obsession, squatting there behind the handsome eyes, behind the princely nose, behind the beautifully modelled mouth that blunted the edge of Porius's anger and left him, as soon as he had taken a few more casual and cautious glances at the face and had decided to whom it belonged, with very little feeling about it save a rather brutal humorous amusement.

But his wits were now of necessity absorbed in the task of deciding how he was to deal with this madman without giving Morfydd too great a shock. His decision was as rapid as was the action that followed it.

"Don't be upset, my treasure," he said, keeping his eye on the face in the birch grove, "but we've got an onlooker here!" And as the startled girl drew herself up and jumped back he lurched heavily forward, plunged like an angry ox through the clump of birches and got hold of the intruder by the hair of his head. It would have been difficult for Morfydd to tell anybody, difficult to tell even Porius, and impossible to tell her old nurse, Canna, all the painful feelings that reduced her sensibility at that moment to a set of raw dangling nerves. These nerves she had a good deal more difficulty in getting under control than she had in dealing with her ruffled attire.

But if Porius was able, for all his relaxed muscles, to become in a flash a true descendant of Cunedda, the girl wasn't for nothing the daughter of Kymeinvoll the Gwyddyles.

Suppressing the humiliating thought that the grotesque creature, whose distorted features in a face white with terror she could just see, as his pearl-bordered mantle gleamed and flapped in that sultry sunshine, had actually been sharing with fascinated intensity every detail of Porius's enjoyment of her, she rushed forward now, afraid lest the wretch should meet his death. She suspected the moment she glimpsed the extravagance of his clothes that he belonged to the emperor's court; and although this increased her feeling of personal shame it made her more anxious to avoid bloodshed.

"Don't hurt him! Don't hurt him!" she cried again and again.

But Porius had already shifted his grip from the man's hair to the gorgeous belt beneath his fantastic mantle. This mantle, the girl could see, was actually stiff all the way round its edges with minute pearls set in purple pleats; Porius had recognized the squirming figure within its folds as none other than Prince Galahaut, the High Prince, as they called him, from the far-away isles and the ocean promontories of Surluse.

Prince Galahaut was the very man, in fact, who, wounded in that early skirmish between the forest people and the emperor's horsemen, had found an asylum among the former, where in retired safety at Ty Cerrig he had told stories of adventures that never happened and of characters who never lived to all who would listen.

"Oh, no! I won't hurt him!" Porius muttered. "I'm not hurting you, am I, my fine dancing cock?" And tightening his hold on the High Prince's silver belt, whose massive links amid the greenery of the dark fir branches gleamed in the sultry sunshine with an almost sacrificial solemnity, he hoisted him into the air exactly as he had done with that luckless boy whose destiny it was to encounter the last of the Cewri. Nor was this all. Once having got him in the air what must Porius do but toss him up and down in the random manner used by affectionate but rough fathers with their infants.

Never did Morfydd forget how the High Prince looked as he rose and fell in the air with his mantle waving; but, as sometimes happens in situations of this sort, where the effect upon those who watch the humiliation of a penance sufferer is completely different from what might have been expected, this sudden and brutal contact with the unregenerate world outside the circle of their discovery of each other shook them both into a recognition of the limits of their mutual confidence; made it clear to him that he could never tell her about Creiddylad and clear to her that if she told him about Teleri there might come a complete scattering of the cloud that divided him from his mother, a cloud that might be of benefit to him at this juncture and was undoubtedly of great benefit to herself.

But at the very moment when the lust-distorted face of the High Prince was shaking both Porius's and Morfydd's illusion that when you love you can "tell everything," so that Porius was saying to himself, "I shall never tell her about Creiddylad," and Morfydd was saying to herself, "I needn't tell him about Teleri because, if Euronwy hasn't let that man into her bed yet, she will!" the froglike leapings of the lithe goddess of chance, clothed in the paleolithic pali of slippery green, wherein she threads the most tangled recesses of life and follows each new encheiresis of multifarious Nature, were introducing a second and a completely unexpected interruption.

No sooner, in fact, had Porius replaced the ruler of far-off Surluse upon his doeskin sandals and picked up for him and thrust into its sheath a jewelled dagger that under such rough handling had naturally slipped from the silver belt, than a disturbing and puzzling series of distant cries became audible. These disturbing and unexpected shouts as they drew nearer resolved themselves into two voices, one of which was instantly recognizable as that of the Henog of Dyfed, while the other — though it was at the sound of this one that the exile from Surluse betrayed most agitation — was altogether strange both to Porius and Morfydd.

"Is the Henog searching for you?" enquired the new ruler, glancing at his captive. But the man appeared still too dazed even to rearrange the folds of his gorgeous mantle or to pull his silver belt into position.

"Cretinloy of Gaul," he gasped at last.

Porius's expression at hearing these words might easily have been snatched from the youthful countenance of Nesta's husband, so deliberately stupid was it, so rustic in its bewildered insensitivity.

Morfydd moved up to them. "I think the prince refers," she threw in, "to some chronicler of his own from his country across the sea."

Turning her head quickly away from the doglike glance the uneasy creature gave her, "I seem," she murmured to Porius, who was now listening so intently to the approaching voices that he hardly heard her hurried words, "I seem to remember someone with a name like that in the letters of Father's Gallic bishop, some chronicler—" She never became quite clear in her mind, as she recalled this moment later, what it was in her intervention that irritated Porius so; but he suddenly ceased listening to the two men, whom they could almost see now, coming towards them through the trees, and, turning to her, burst out with an embarrassing discourtesy.

"Your father's letter writers — I hate them all, and their artful chronicles! Conceited mixtures of magpie Gallic, and of monkish Latin, flattering everyone at the court and recounting impossible prodigies performed by fantastical popinjays—"

But the two men were saluting them now, not as surprised as the girl expected them to be, at discovering their runaway in the company of the new ruler of Edeyrnion, nor at all disturbed by finding that ruler indulging in a fit of boorish rudeness.

But in such a peculiar condition of mind was the Henog of Dyfed that the emotional outburst of his princely host passed through his consciousness like a succession of pebbles dropped into flowing water, while he himself proceeded to convey to Porius and Morfydd in that oldest of all languages, the language of signs, that it was absolutely essential to propitiate, for reasons into which it was unessential to go, both the High Prince and Cretinloy his chronicler, and this without any reference at all to the merit or demerit of the stories involved, even though — and here the gesticulation became extremely complicated — even though the stories were pure fabrication and the telling of them so tedious that no listener could possibly care whether such preposterous happenings were reality or invention.

Morfydd felt as she gazed at the Henog in his faded green-black cloak and curiously shaped green-black headdress that there was an old-fashioned stateliness about the man that really was quaint and endearing. On the contrary, the whole personality of Cretinloy, the Gaul, repelled her. He was a big stout man; and though not quite as tall as the Henog his robust and sturdy figure reduced the form of Prince Galahaut to an effeminate frailty and brittleness under its rich garb.

Cretinloy was dressed in what Morfydd took to be the official court colours of that far-off Surluse washed by the western sea, an appealing mixture, the girl thought, of pale purple and dark green, but, blotched as it was now with the blood stains of hunting and the wine stains of drinking, suggestive rather of crowded supper tables than of the silence of solitary inspiration.

Cretinloy's face was sunburnt as well as fleshy, and his lively pigs' eyes, raspberry-red mouth, and protruding underlip indicated a successful narrowing down of a chronicler's concern to the events immediately preceding and immediately following the narrator's personal appearance upon the scene.

While she drew back from the four men and watched Porius's impatient attempts to cope with what was clearly a teasing and difficult situation, she suddenly found herself liking him better than she had ever done before. He was perplexed, he was troubled, he was out of his element, he was confused and sullen; but when she looked at the eccentric old Henog, when she met the haunted eyes of the High Prince, when she acceded with a grave courtesy to the exuberant admiration of the self-confident Cretinloy, she knew that her imminent separation from her playmate-husband-lover was going to be by far the worst thing she had ever had to suffer in her life.

And she realized that what was at the bottom of Porius's sullen mood and of his clumsy and clouded attention to the communications of the Henog was the fact that he too was feeling the nearness of their separation. It came over her as a certainty that just as she was dreading her contest with Euronwy and the priest, with the complications introduced by the presence of Medrawd, with the new situation at Ogof-y-Gawr, with her father's life at Ty Cerrig, so he was dreading the imperial court and the imperial camp, his contact with all those clever, subtle, and worldly people, of which this Cretinloy of Gaul was a perfect type, and all this without her help, just as she had to manage without his.

She indeed kept meeting his eyes as he stood there bare-headed and bare-handed in his leather tunic, while the Henog, having dropped his secret signs, was elaborately and pedantically explaining to him what he ought to do with regard to the extraordinary condition of things at the deserted camp of the emperor's horsemen. And, fancying at last that there was a definite appeal in the glance he was giving her, she came boldly forward into the midst of the group.

"Pardon me, gentlemen," she said, "but as I have to leave my husband now, in order to attend the Church's rites over the prince, his father, I must beg you to let me draw him aside for a second? You can await him here. I won’t take him far.”

She spoke with the authority of a true granddaughter of Iddawc the Apostate, that arbitrary and despotic ruler, who was able to hold his own even with the eldest of the matriarchal Modrybedd; and Porius, realizing as he hadn’t quite done before how spontaneously her character had responded to her new responsibility, followed her among the trees as obediently as the others remained quiescent where they were.

She was so impatient to get their parting over that, forgetting their difference in height and weight, she slipped in front of him like a young forest doe, diving under the thick-grown fir branches, dodging the prickly brambles, jumping the mouldering alder stumps, squeezing between the slender birches, and swinging across swampy places by the aid of the dusky red trunks of lonely and erratic pines.

At last, gasping for breath, she turned and waited for him; nor was he far behind, but there were blood drops on his forehead and a scratch at the side of his mouth, and the deerskin strap twisted round one of his legs was trailing on the ground.

But contrary to the touchiness of her father or of Morvran or of Rhun or of the late prince, Porius’s awareness of what was happening to his body was divided by a peculiar chasm or gulf from what was going on in his mind. He could obliterate this gulf if he set himself to do so; and when it was obliterated he was at his happiest, but it required a conscious effort, and circumstances, as at this moment, often impeded such a solution.

“Little fool that I am!” she whispered to him now; for she had a feeling that Prince Galahaut and his chronicler, and even the stately old Henog, were all listening, the former with mouth, ears, nostrils, and every pore of his skin open, wide open and indrawing, with the insatiable suction of an insane Charybdis.

“No! Wait a second, my only one! Wait while I—”

They were together in a damp and muddy clearing and she snatched up a great flapping burdock leaf, shook from its surface a couple of tiny insects, and used it to wipe the blood from his scratched face. Then stooping down she rapidly retwisted the leather strap round his leg, and having done this was on the point of rising, but instead of doing so, moved by a sudden impulse, she clasped his bare knee in both her hands and all hunched-up as she was pressed her lips against its bony surface.

Long after this some accidental association was apt to bring back to Porius not only how her kiss felt upon the hard bone and callous skin of his knee, but the way the heavy sunshine, as it fell on her bowed head, gave to her hair the coppery glint of an old Caesarean coin. But at the moment all he could do was to hold back an impulse to burst into shaking and heaving sobs.

But they were her tears, not his, that were on both their faces when, after a silent embrace from which she felt she was being torn away as old Canna used to tear certain fabrics into two halves, torn away by fate with an audible sound, they simultaneously turned their backs on each other and plunged into the forest.

CHAPTER XXXI. The Little One

IT COULD HARDLY BE CALLED curious or unnatural the extreme reluctance felt by the new Prince of Edeyrnion to act as the necessity of his peculiar situation compelled him, or so he thought it did, in thus returning, with the three men who were awaiting him, to the deserted tents of the emperor's horsemen.

That final wild pressure of salt-tasting mouths and clinging arms, struggling in vain to retain in spite of fate the moment's mystery of two-in-one, remained with him as he went. Like the reiterated breaking of the same sea wave over the stupefied senses of a man who, just escaped from drowning, has to stumble heavily across leagues of sand, that moment went with him. But, through this salt mist, Porius had to face, willy-nilly and for all his loathing, what he had known was waiting for him ever since he had seen his father die, namely, the repulsive subhuman chaos of the deserted, yet by no means empty, imperial camp.

It was horrible to him to have to re-enter all those familiar tents in each one of which some piteous relic of oriental sweetmeat, of half-drained wine flask testified both to the hurry of its late owner's departure and to the lack of thoroughness in the random scavengers who had plundered these courtly caravans.

That there had been plundering on a large if indiscriminate and disorderly scale was evident enough; and it was also evident that his three companions, though in three very different ways, were resolved that, as the person now alone responsible for order and decency in Edeyrnion, he should be made inescapably aware of what was going on.

The deserted camp was indeed just then a spectacle shocking to the fastidious, revolting to the sensitive, and extremely disturbing to the orderly and the virtuous. Many of the pavilions and tents lay on, the ground, sodden and discoloured with rain and disfigured by the droppings of birds and cattle. Others, whose supports were still standing, presented, when Porius was ushered inside, interiors that caused the distinguished features of the High Prince to twist themselves up into contortions of an aesthetic disgust that amounted to physical pain.

As for the Henog, Porius knew the old gentleman's style of storytelling well enough to imagine the sort of sentences in which he would work it out; so he wasn't at all surprised to catch from his lips various asides that showed how he was extracting from all this litter and ordure and decomposition of food and pollution of drink the particular quality of purified horror that he required for his artfully artless work.

As the three men led him from tent to tent the Henog interspersed his aesthetic reactions to what they encountered with the same obscure nods and gestures and signals whenever the attention of the others wandered.

That the Henog was referring in these signs to the relation between the High Prince and that gentleman's Gallic chronicler was made clear to Porius by the fact that at one point the crafty old man actually winked at him as they listened to Cretinloy's realistic account, brutally, tediously, monotonously drawn out, of the horrors of deserted Roman camps in Gaul, where — just as seemed to be happening here — weird half-human creatures, too weak to be outlaws and too independent to be the followers of any prince, fluttered down like carrion crows from their crannies in the hills or pattered up like rats from their holes in the cellars; but whether flapping or scampering, these poor wretches moved from rain-soaked desolation to rain-soaked desolation, and, quick as the plague, devoured all that attracted them, befouled all that repelled them, and carried off all they could carry or dared to lift from its place.

The absentminded Porius was forced at last to embrace the full nature of the present situation in this familiar region of his princedom before the Prince of Surluse and his blustering chronicler departed to enjoy their afternoon's repast and their night's repose.

These satisfactory events took place in the only tent which the scavengers had been compelled to leave intact, namely, the tent of Cynan, the bosom crony of Owain ab Uryen, which had been taken possession of on behalf of the Derwydd's lethargic brother, by that singular retainer, Morgant, the contemptuous relative of the Jesus-inspired Drom.

It was then, and then only; that the enigmatic Henog put his signs and signals into simple words.

"The emperor," he explained to Porius, "gave me a hint before he followed those barbarians south that for many reasons he had no desire to delay any longer the return of Prince Galahaut to the far-off shores of Surluse. In plain words, my dear Prince, the emperor has had enough of him. There is no need for me to enlarge on what our great monarch explained in detail; I mean the nature, in regard to both cowardice and lechery, not to speak of fantastic falsehood, of the prince's influence on court and camp. It was, in fact, in the hope of transferring this distinguished person to Gaul that the emperor obtained for him this Gallic historian, who, as you can see, will be fully able to transform the most cowardly retreats into heroic deeds and the most lecherous obsessions into emotions of piety and purity."

Porius gazed in some perplexity at the quaint figure before him.

"Did the emperor," he enquired, "wish me to arrest this mad fool and send him to Badon under guard?"

The old adept in artless-artful storytelling looked a little shocked and considerably amused.

“Heavens no, my dear young man! Certainly not, nothing of the sort! Knowing no doubt the state in which their camps are always left by these young noblemen and how, for months afterwards, all the rapscallions of the neighbourhood dig their holes in such rubbish heaps, it occurred to him, I believe, that with your permission the elevated post of ‘King of the Off-scourings’ might keep this trembling tyrant of the faraway Isles occupied and amused and his extraordinary lechery stimulated and satisfied, till, with your aid, Ynys Prydein had been cleared of the last of the Saeson. In fact — you know how courteous and yet how laconic he is — he gave me a hint to this effect: that to be ‘King of the Ash Heaps’ here would keep the High Prince busy with marvels that wouldn’t go further than his own imagination and keep this Cretinloy busy turning these marvels into Gallic rhymes.”

The deep-set yellowish green eyes of the Prince of Edeyrnion, instead of opening wide under this revelation, almost disappeared as though to convey the news to some more crafty identity concealed in his skull.

“What you have told me, great Henog,” he replied, “requires some careful thinking. I confess at first hearing it sounds a little too much” — he spoke slowly, screwing up the corrugated folds of his rugged brows and cheeks round the twin holes into which his eyes had retreated— “too much like one of those satirical Roman tricks that have been played so often on us simple islanders. But I will think it over, Henog; I will think it over. At the same time I must tell you that I can’t see myself handing over for an indefinite period this Fount of Saint Julian, that I have known since my childhood, to be a rogues’ refuge and a thieves’ sanctuary, breeding pestilence, and attracting every Ffichtiaid witch and every Gwyddylaid assassin out of their caves. But I will think it over, Henog. I will think it over."

He kept his word, if his subsequent silence was a sign of thought; and it wasn't till they had made the complete circuit of the whole scene of desolation and were standing with their backs to the burnt and trodden patch of ground, less than a hundred feet from the lake, where only a couple of days ago had been his own bridal tent that he recovered his speech sufficiently to make a few taciturn comments upon this minor shock. The tent itself was totally gone. Nothing but a few holes in its grassy circumference where the pegs had been pulled out, nothing but blackened earth and grey wood ashes where the fire had been, remained to mark those few cubits' space of thin air that had been so vibrant with human feeling.

He couldn't help glancing curiously at that couple of square yards of black mould interspersed with wind-blown grey ashes where he and Rhun had sat over their fire drinking mead from Porius Manlius's Roman flask and hovering nervously in their talk round and about that equivocal incident — how little it bothered him now! — of the girl's morning visit to the Cave of Mithras.

But where exactly did their bed stand? If she were with him now, instead of this weird old figure, would she know just where their two heads had been, and just how far his feet, her feet, had stretched over that flattened-out patch of broad-leafed lakeside grass, across which at this moment a feeble daddy-longlegs, preserved for another twelve hours of helpless sprawling by the day's warmth, danced its patient, private, hieroglyphical old insect's death dance to a sun god that had looked down on the earth for a million years without seeing a sign of any real Mithras? Or would she be as reduced to numbness as he was?

"You're intending, I hope, great Henog," Porius burst out suddenly, feeling that this was hardly a moment for further indulgence in personal feelings, "to be present tonight where unfortunately I cannot accompany you, for certain people await me at Brother John's cell? I mean, you'll be making your way presently, I hope, to sup at the Gaer. They may possibly be a little late in returning from my father's burial — for that also is debarred me by what I have to do at the Brother's cell — but there'll be according to custom in our House, preparations in both meat and wine that will have their interest for you, both as an historian of old ceremonies and as an authority on old wine.

"I don't suggest you should attend my father's funeral, for this new priest would only annoy your good sense, but I do trust, great Henog, that you will honour our Gaer board, even though my business with the emperor's counsellor, whom I have presently to meet at Brother John's cell, forbids my own presence at either grave or banquet. Will you show me, Master Sylvanus Bleheris, that you bear me no grudge for all my youthful ignorances and stupidities by directing your steps here and now towards the Gaer?"

The Henog didn't smile, nor, to confess the truth, did he look particularly pleased. But he bowed courteously and declared he would set off at once. And it was at that moment while Porius was helping him arrange a little more conveniently his somewhat awkward, though not precisely heavy, bundle of writing materials, that they were both startled by the sound — not strange to either of them — of the far-carrying, high-pitched voice of the youthful Pen Beirdd.

They looked at each other significantly, and on this occasion the old Henog did smile. He did more. He uttered a guttural cackle of hoarse goblinish laughter. With the ends of his scholastic mantle fluttering in the faintly stirring air, and with the now horizontal rays of the sun intensifying the greenish tint of what was visible of his tightly fitting black tunic, as he clutched his tablets to his breast as if afraid that the mere voice of the poet would steal them away, he resembled a portentous old crow, scared by the cat cries of an aggressive young kestrel.

"Those aren't his own verses," Porius whispered, "are they, my Lord Henog? Surely a boy like that couldn't have imagined such things, far less have put them into words?"

But the Henog only wagged his high narrow head and caused his peaked cap to sway sorrowfully from side to side. He had clearly suffered so much already from the malicious cleverness of the young that he was prepared for the worst.

In painful silence the old man set himself to listen, and so also did Porius.

"If only," sighed this latter to himself, "I knew she'd got safe through that funeral!" And he felt a sudden longing to prove to his old teacher, so safely out of it at the bottom of Gwythyr's deep hole, how much happier this life would be if the idea of future lives, and all the rites, rituals, traditions, and speculations about future lives were regarded as pleasant dreams and poetical fancies.

"Curse this incredible boy!" was what both the men were feeling. But Taliesin's voice rose higher and higher, and as his voice rose his rhymes seemed to swim and fly as if beyond all reason they were transformed into some living creature that possessed fins for swimming through Time and feathers for flying through Space!

Bu carchar Gwair ygkaer Sidi!

The prison of Gwair's in Caer Sidi!

Cadwyn dromlas cywir was cedwi —

A heavy chain for a true youth to carry
Worlds before Jesus was born of Mary! —
Neb cyn nog ef aeth iddi —
None before him came there to be —
And Pwyll knows it and Pryderi
In Caer Veddwit and Caer Vanddwy,
In Pedryvan over the magic sea —
Bu carchar Gwair ygkaer Sidi —
The prison of Gwair's in Caer Sidi!

The voice died down as suddenly as it had risen; and Porius, on the point of asking the Henog about this mysterious being referred to as "Gwair," of whom he vaguely fancied he had heard before, was caught, before he uttered a word, by the expression on the old chronicler's face.

The Henog had clearly had some sudden inspiration, but of what nature it was impossible to guess.

Porius waited in silence.

At last the old man, still pressing with one hand his tablets, pigments, brushes, and pens against his stomach, began tracing with his free hand letters of some sort or just meaningless signs upon the upper portion of his forehead, where his high peaked cap had been pushed back. While he traced these hieroglyphs upon his own skull he kept his eyes fixed on the ridges of the mountain; but a moment later, dropping his raised arm and clasping his professional utensils tightly with all his fingers, he turned his gleaming dark eyes full on his companion.

"I have decided," he announced, and Porius had the feeling that he was listening to an ancient heathen oracle rather than to a mere Henog of Dyfed, "I have decided to omit all mention of Gwair from my buchedd, or 'mystical chronicle', of Pryderi the son of Pwyll and Rhiannon. For it suddenly came into my head that this ridiculous High Prince of Surluse — for they no doubt taught you at school, as they did me, what Caesar said about Britain and the transmigration of souls — is no one else than this very same mysterious prisoner in Caer Sidi!

“This would explain everything about him — his frights, his panics, his horrors, his nerves, his mad lust for women, and finally his grotesque impotence when in their beds! All these things are just what we’d expect in a soul so haunted by the memory of one fatal incarnation that all subsequent ones become nothing but recurrent stages in one long desperate struggle to forget.”

Porius sighed. He had hoped from the look in the Henog’s face that he was to be shown a method by which he could obliterate forever all traces of this ill-omened camp that had been a curse — for all the defeat of the Saeson — from its first arrival a couple of weeks ago, until now.

But the man went on. “Assume that this poor wretch is none other than the unhappy one who in a former incarnation was the imprisoned Gwair; what better could restore his peace of mind than the idea that he still has some special part to play in the Christian Mysteries?

“This part needn’t be specified. We can trust to his own imagination for its particulars and to this scamp of a Cretinloy for turning these particulars into Gallic rhyme. All I shall need before putting the notion, drawn from this boy-bard’s awen, into the High Prince’s mind is my own knowledge that the emperor’s counsellor is not kept in ignorance of what I am doing. Mind you, Prince, I’m not asking his permission. I’m only seeing to it that he knows. He’ll be meeting the emperor shortly — in fact they have ways of communicating with each other at any moment and over any distance — but the point is that neither of them likes to be kept in the dark. They don’t mind — and you’d be wise to take that to heart, Prince — they don’t mind what any of us do, as long as they know. It's their ignorance of what's in his mind that makes Prince Medrawd such a trouble to them. That, and — at least so I think myself — some prophetic knowledge of the counsellor that the emperor's final fate is bound up with Medrawd's."

He paused; and then moving nearer to Porius, to whom he was already very close, he disentangled two fingers from the ten with which he was so tenaciously clutching the tools of his trade and twitching Porius's leather belt uttered the following words: "I would like you to make it quite clear to the counsellor when you see him that I fully admit that my motives are not disinterested. The more the High Prince disassociates himself from the Life of Pryderi and associates himself with the Life of Christ, the more space there'll be for me and for my work. I have no prejudice against Christ. I have no prejudice against Mithras. But I have a natural deep-rooted south-Dyfed prejudice against these devils of the north, these starfish idols, Gwydion and Arianrod, the incestuous spawn of that Gwyddylaid succubus, Don, with their subhuman whelp, Llew Llaw Gyffes, who was brother to the wolves and upon the maggots of whose feathered soul fed the great sow of Maenor Penardd.

"So my chief request to you tonight, Prince Porius" — and pushing forward his lean figure closer still so that the smell of his garments struck his listener as combining the fragrance of cinnamon with the sourness of the droppings of seagulls, the Henog tightened the clutch upon the other's belt of those two clawlike fingers— "is that you make it clear to the counsellor that I have no wish to give him or the emperor any false impression; and that what I shall try to put into the heads of this unfortunate creature and this rogue of a chronicler will be done very largely — though not entirely — with the express purpose of wafting them away from my subject, which is of course the Life and Death of Pryderi, the son of Pwyll Pen Annwn."

What the old gentleman would have done had Porius refused to carry out his wish it would be hard to imagine, but receiving an emphatic promise to obey him, he promptly unhooked his two fingers, added them to the eight already engaged, bowed politely and with extreme formality, and started off in the direction of the Gaer.

With a sigh from the very bottom of his soul, Porius watched his departure. He had begun to feel as if the inmost pith of his being was being nibbled away by the rats of purposeless dissolution, so that before he had even started to join the emperor all his clear intentions were growing blurred and all his sound instincts becoming infected.

He envied the Henog his simple, unvarying, direct devotion to his art. And as he watched the tall figure fade phantomlike among the trees he experienced a shuddering sense that, compared with the life of a person like this, the foundations of his own existence were shaky and insecure.

As he approached the Brother's cell he suddenly realized that a man and woman were in the act of leaving it. They evidently knew him at once, for they stopped when they caught sight of him and began exchanging excited words. He quickened his steps till he reached them, and then, as was natural to him, he greeted them with rather exaggerated familiarity.

"Why! It's you, Amreu ap Ganion! I never thought to meet you two here again! And how is the lovely Lela? Lela, I'd been praying I might see your face again before I went south. I can see she's as beautiful as ever, Amreu! But what's this? What's the matter, my dear girl? Has anyone insulted you? I can't believe Amreu's been unkind to you. What's troubling her, Amreu? For Christ's sake tell me, one or the other of you!"

His tone of sympathy seemed all that was required to cause the girl to breakdown. A fit of sobbing took possession of her, shaking her from head to foot. Her black-haired companion hugged her tenderly, pressing her head against his enormous chest, while Porius, after his fashion for noting side issues, noted that the last horizontal ray of the sinking sun, falling upon the two of them, was suddenly extinguished, even as he watched it.

But Porius also noted in his incurable mania for these natural omens that the curly-headed son of Ganion defied the disappearance of the sun over his girl's sobs with a mysterious smile of cosmic optimism, an optimism which took for granted that this chief of his tribe now confronting him would share his secret Iberian faith that all such feminine tears were the tears of life itself paying tribute to death as long as it could enjoy itself as itself and thus turn even tragedy to account.

"It was because," Amreu explained — while Porius experienced a queer feeling that, after all, even if he wasn't killing Saeson, he was, by the mere fact of merging himself in this man's incomprehensible smile, placing himself on the right side in some life-and-death struggle whereof the nature as well as the issue was unknown— "it was because Sibylla the Gwyddyles couldn't endure another woman in the same kitchen or at the same board. Lela's not proud any more than I am, but—" At this point the dark head appeared to be subjected to so much affectionate pressure that Porius felt as if it might at any moment actually disappear within that majestic torso.

But the son of Ganion went on addressing him over that sobbing head and giving him some very shameful details with regard to what had happened at Ogof-y-Gawr in this clash between Iberian and Gwyddylaid femininity.

"And so," Amreu summed it all up, "and so we came away." The smile with which he spoke of their desperate escapade seemed to Porius to follow that final sun ray as it retreated over the rim of the world, as if the man had sent it — that mysterious smile which long before the fall of Babylon had been smiled in Marrakesh of the Berbers — to sustain and re-create in vital continuity a flame that had existed when the divine babe Mithras still slept in the bosom of his maternal rock.

"Do you want me," cried Porius, "to find you some sort of a job in the Gaer?" He looked at the curly-headed smiling man, who confronted him above the weeping woman, expecting a burst of gratitude. That so emphatic a return to the old-fashioned favouritism of his House should be refused by anyone in Edeyrnion was unthinkable to him; but this is just what happened.

Amreu ap Ganion, still clutching that dark head against his breast, and still supporting, like the broad seabed the heavings of the deep sea, that soft sob-shaken daughter of desire, began now to explain that the girl's despair was not only due to their leaving Ogof-y-Gawr, but also to the fact that she had no child; and that this inability to conceive — since, as the man's rich smile in the twilight made entirely clear, it was unthinkable that the fault could be with him — must be due to a tynged, or a "destiny," cast on her by an enemy, and that this tynged could be attributed to one person only; namely, to Nesta ferch Aulus, who along with her Italian blood had unquestionably inherited Italian witchcraft. It would therefore be clear to the all-powerful and all-merciful son of Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn that for them to live in any portion of Mynydd-y-Gaer would be quite impossible.

Free from touchiness as Porius was, he could not suppress a gesture of annoyance. He had begun to feel completely tired out, both in mind and body. Was he never going to be free from all these teasing entanglements and able to plunge into his real task, of clearing Ynys Prydein of the Saeson? He looked round him in a kind of irritable desperation as if, in default of his usual support from earth and water and air and fire, he were calling upon unknown gods.

To stand thus helplessly before the helplessness of two such large, soft, robust, tender, devoted, human bodies was extremely painful to him. If they'd been enemies at his mercy he could have killed them painlessly and instantaneously or bade them run off into the forest. But they were not enemies; and they had been faithful and loyal servants of the Modrybedd. He began to feel as desperate as Lela herself.

"Where the devil," he cried in his heart, "are the gods of Marrakesh of the Berbers?" Whether the desperateness of his need evoked an occult response or whether it was all a matter of pure chance it is certain that if he hadn't looked so wildly round him he wouldn't have noticed at that critical moment the Mound of the Little One. "I shall establish them," he told himself, "in the druid's chamber." And addressing them both in the most emphatic and authoritative tone he could command, he began filling up with imaginative personal details his vague knowledge of the place, a knowledge which had been already thickened out by every gossip in the Gaer since the death of the druid.

Listening to him, Lela's tears now dried on her cheeks, and her eyes opened wider and wider.

"But how shall we live, and what will Amreu ap Ganion do?"

Porius entered into further matters in reply to this and managed to conceal the unutterable weariness of the whole business that just then was assailing his heart in wave after chilly wave. Leading them as if they were children he conducted them towards the haunted mound beneath which was the druid's chamber.

He had in fact succeeded, even before he got them to the entrance to the place, in convincing the girl that the tynged put on her by Nesta ferch Aulus would be in no danger of being strengthened — indeed, might easily be diminished — by Amreu's going every afternoon to superintend, as he would be able to do better than anybody, the great daily banquet at the Gaer.

The chief thing he feared was lest the girl should find this underground chamber with its hidden entrance and damp cavernous roof a horrible place to inhabit after Ogof-y-Gawr's torchlit corridors, firelit halls, and fragrant kitchens. On the other hand — for his restless mind, no doubt just because it was so nervously tired, seemed compelled to envisage every facet or possibility — on the other hand, it might be that the feminine instinct for making into a pleasant place a place that was absolutely and entirely her own would give her such a strong new sense of cartref, or "home," that forgetting all about Italian incantations she would conceive her first-born in the druid's lair.

Porius had always liked Amreu ap Ganion, but never had there been so close a link between them as when together they helped the agitated Lela down into that curious sanctuary. Amreu had the power of throwing round his lightest physical contact with another man a peculiar magnetic glow; and this was especially the case when he was dealing with his social superiors. He now conjured up this chemical and magnetic fraternization and applied it with a subtle good temper and tact that Porius found indescribably reassuring. And the curly-haired dark man followed it up by producing from his wallet a typical house steward's "lighter" of flint and iron and oil-soaked rag.

"All's ready for us — looks so!" he laughed, setting light to one of the druid's little earthenware hand lamps which remained just where it had been blown out during Brochvael's visit, when the two brothers left the place forever.

"Have you any drink on you, 'soul?'" Porius enquired, looking almost imploringly into the man's smouldering brown eyes and using the prehistoric word "eneit" as proof of the right kind of Iberian good fellowship.

For the first time since they had met that night, Lela's perfect lips, looking more than rose-red by the newly lit lampflame, parted in an amused smile.

"He's always got a whole cellar of drinks under his cloak!" she whispered.

Seldom have two men been more relieved and pleased at the softening of a girl's mood. But the great goddess Chance, pursuing, it would seem, some subhuman or superhuman purpose of her own, gave now an entirely new turn to events. For as Lela with an almost complacent feminine satisfaction gazed round at her new home, safe beyond the reach of any Etruscan tynged, she suddenly astonished both the men by rushing forward towards the inner chamber whose gloom was only faintly lifted by the newly lit lamp.

On the threshold of this inner room she stopped, frozen it would appear into immobility like a scared animal, and, half-turning, made a gesture to the men to do as she did. Amreu, however, who was standing close to the flickering little flame permitted himself to break the suspense. He boldly picked up the small lamp and raised it high above his head.

What he and Porius now beheld caused them both to utter queer sounds in their throats. These were very different sounds, but they were expressive in each case of the limit of masculine astonishment. For, ensconced on the lid of the chest in that secluded inner room, on the very chest, in fact, that Brochvael had opened under the instructions of the druid, there sat cross-legged, clutching a broken terracotta image of a wolf cub, a cub that had lost its tail and its ears and its front legs but was still quite manifestly of authentic classical modelling, a redheaded little boy who looked about four or five years old. The odd thing was that the child showed no alarm or astonishment at all at this unexpected meeting.

From the expression on its face and from the words it uttered it might have been waiting for them and expecting them; indeed it might have known in advance that this handsome dark lady and this curly-headed dark man had long been intending to bring into its presence the new ruler of Edeyrnion and that, therefore, their appearance tonight was no more remarkable than if for days they had been burning the fires of hospitality in this queer spot and had returned at nightfall quite as usual to its primeval shelter.

No, this grotesque little being showed not the very faintest surprise nor the very smallest agitation at their sudden appearance. What it did do, however, could hardly be called spontaneous or natural. It was more like the forced repetition of a lesson, or a charm, or a conjuration, that it had got by heart and had been waiting to deliver.

For one thing, it spoke at once of itself in the third person, as some inanimate image or idol or doll might have done. The small creature itself was as grey as a badger as to its garments, and this gave the impression of their not being garments at all but simply wood painted to represent grey wool.

“Y Bychan,” announced this miniature image of automatic heroism, allowing its gaze to wander quite calmly from the girl immediately in front of it to the two men who were further away, and Porius felt as if he were listening to heroic words from the emperor’s sword, in the absence of the emperor’s fingers, or a defiant challenge from the emperor’s saddle, in the absence of the emperor’s buttocks. “Y Bychan is the one you must beat, not Bleiddyn the Wolf-Cub. Y Bychan will not cry, however much it hurts, but if you beat Bleiddyn, y Bychan will cry so loud it will bring the Derwydd out of his grave. And if you don't stop beating Bleiddyn the Derwydd will give Bleiddyn the power to bite your heart out!"

The ferocity of these final words was in some odd way that Porius couldn't explain intensified rather than diminished by the flat level expressionless monotone in which it was uttered. But what at this odd moment chiefly affected Porius was a strong desire to burst out laughing, accompanied by a vivid compulsion warning him that if he yielded to this and did laugh it would be the most unlucky laugh in the history of Ynys Prydein.

To keep himself from laughing, therefore, and also to exorcize from all devils this resort of the Derwydd, he repeated in his heart the Cewri incantation: "Tungerong larry ong! Endure until the end!"

Though by this means he was able to suppress his inclination to laugh, his mind, below the silent syllables of "Tungerong larry ong," kept racing off, up all sorts of expanding vistas. He thought of Morfydd at his father's funeral and funeral feast, wondering whether this latter would equal the man's death feast in its wild uproar and spilt blood. He thought of the old Henog, with his tablets and brushes and pens and pigments, all pressed against his stomach, as he disappeared among the trees, a stiff, fanatical-fantastical pedant perhaps, but, compared with the voluble Cretinloy, what a true prose-Homer of Ynys Prydein!

And it came into his mind to wonder how he himself, had this absurd and ridiculous incident occurred in some Buchedd, or "Memorable Life," on which he were engaged, would treat this crazy dominance of a magic child, if it were a creation of the dead druid, over three such vigorous, youthful, sturdy personalities as Amreu, Lela, and himself.

There must be, he told himself, some very queer concatenation of occult forces in this deserted hiding place to compel the easygoing son of Ganion to keep his arm so stiffly uplifted holding that tiny lamp, to compel the passionate young Lela to freeze into a statue for so long, and to forbid himself, prince of the whole province, from uttering a word or moving a step.

Precisely in the same monotonously level voice, just as if it had been Gunta's doll talking, the redheaded child went on. And it was, Porius noted too, just exactly as if it had been talking to itself. "Was the little creature," he wondered, "created by the Derwydd out of seaweed and fungus and white bog moss and left by him here, solely for the purpose of keeping intruders away?"

The red-haired child certainly behaved as if it were some earth aboriginal, older than the Ffichtiaid, older than the Cewri, and perhaps the last of a race who had been less human than any of these; and who as long as they were not destroyed by a magic stronger than their own might be destined to outlast all other races in Ynys Prydein!

At any rate this queer infant behaved as if it had no human fear in the world except for the safety of the great terra-cotta wolf cub now in its arms; and Porius tried hard to imagine how — without any druid magic — that broken and battered wolf cub of old Rome had managed to enslave so sturdy and redheaded a native. He had only an obscure memory today of how he had left Gwendydd's pavilion last Thursday evening and stood on y Bychan's Mound; but he had been brought up to think of y Bychan as the implacable enemy of Rome.

To whom then, in heaven's name, had this image belonged before this new y Bychan got hold of it? Could it have been a temple ornament from the great Uriconium camp? And was this child a real offspring of the outlawed Little One of the Mound?

His thoughts were interrupted by the subject of them. Down came Amreu's arm replacing the lamp on a tripod table side by side with what Porius could now see was a large chessboard, while the lamp flame flickered dangerously high.

With a timidly relaxed gesture Lela let the child pass her by, as, almost hidden by the battered wolf cub it was so passionately hugging, it moved towards the lamp. Depositing its burden on the crowded wooden tripod that now supported the chessboard, the wolf cub, and the lamp, all in close contact, the child, whose hair lost its red gleam every moment it was out of the direct rays of the lamp, moved straight up to Porius. The little creature stood sufficiently close to Porius to be able to catch hold of the lappet of his tunic, while at the same time, by stretching his legs, like a doll with stiff joints, till he got them wide apart, he just managed to touch the tip of the broken tail of his Roman cub.

Porius instantaneously made a slight movement with his left hand. The impulse prompting this was the very natural one and indeed, considering their difference in height, the almost inevitable one, of placing his hand on the top of that enormous head, whose redness, with the lamplight full upon it and emphasized by the fact that the child was clothed entirely in grey, had now become startling.

But though he kept his hand on the little creature's head he soon clenched his fingers and let them remain there in that less tender position. Whether there was really something unnatural in the child or something out of the proper order of things about the whole place, the fact was that instead of making any friendly or familiar movement such as playing with the red locks of the being that called itself y Bychan he turned his attention to the three inanimate objects on the tripod; and as he did so he became aware that Lela had stolen up to the side of her husband and had clutched one of his fingers — not the man's whole hand, he could make out that much without turning, but probably his little finger — and was clinging to it for protection against what seemed a wild impulse to some extravagant maternal weakness.

"Bleiddyn may rest in peace now, in peace now, in peace now," chanted the child in a tone so calm and self-satisfied that it might have belonged to a small red-headed grey bird who had swallowed the father of all fir-tree grubs.

"In peace," repeated the grey child; while Porius became aware that the tall dark man by his side had moved so close to himself that their bare elbows were actually touching. "How hot-blooded he is!" he thought, "but I expect he is saying to himself: 'How cold-blooded he is!'"

"Rest in peace," repeated the child. And as Porius followed the infant's inscrutably steady gaze which was fixed on the three-legged wooden table, he became aware that there was a fourth object there, an object prostrate between the lamp and the wolf cub, namely, a black bishop from the bottom of the chess box. This poor prelate must have been overlooked when Morgant and Drom finished their game a few short days ago. The bishop now stared upward in chaste consternation at the rudely chipped male organ, the hairy penis of the Roman cub, just above his head, and did his level best — poor image! — to press his ribs against the altarlike pediment of the sacred-smelling little lamp.

And it suddenly struck Porius that as the child was in contact with the wolf cub, and the wolf cub with the black bishop, and the black bishop with the lamp, and the lamp with the chessboard, so Lela was in contact with Amreu, and Amreu with himself, and himself with the child.

He began to feel puzzled at the queer directions his thoughts were taking. But were they his thoughts? Weren't they rather fragments of himself, or more likely — for how could a fragment think? — mightn't they be a drifting swarm of selves, like so many gnats or midges?

"I'm dead tired," he told himself. "I've reached the point of just having to wait quietly and see what thoughts come into my head. Who can tell? Tired thoughts like stones instead of pieces of paper sometimes sink deep. Fresh thoughts sail like paper boats till a puff of wind turns them of a sudden into drifting scraps of sodden fibre! Whereas, once at the bottom of the water, stones can lie quiet beneath the wind-blown reflections of sun, moon, and stars."

Besides, if his thoughts were a swarm of separate selves, like a cloud of midges, what harm would there be in that? It would be a great deal harder to put an end to him, and he'd have a far wider scope for the enjoyment of his senses. His most eccentric desires could fly about in all directions. There'd be a hundred, or even a thousand Poriuses, all "cavoseniargizing" to their hearts' content.

But the new ruler of Edeyrnion wasn't destined to escape into the ether from this deserted dwelling of the druid in the form of a swarm of gnats.

Once again this surprising child's mechanical logoi began to rise like iridescent bubbles into that underground place. "When Bleiddyn is obeyed," the child now declared, "there'll be no difference between Brython and Gwyddyl or between Ffichtiaid and Coranian. All will be equal. All will be one. All will be the same. It will be as if Bleiddyn had bitten their hearts out."

And once more y Bychan's voice died down, while through the mouldy dampness and moss-smelling darkness that surrounded the flickering and uneven glimmer of the little lamp there reached Porius's senses from the funnel-like aperture down which they had descended the faint faraway stir of rustling leaves. Painfully he tried to snatch from this natural forest sound something to revive his normal state of consciousness.

"It's simply tiredness," he told himself again. "This child's been brought down here from the mountains, and if its voice sounds queer it's only because—"

But his ponderings were interrupted by what seemed to him like some kind of magnetic jerk or supernatural pull, as if the physical contact between them all had created some sort of invisible link, or bond, or cord, something that ran from the feminine body of Lela at one end of their line to the vegetable substance of the chessboard at the other.

And what disturbed him about this shock, or jerk, or pull, or whatever it was, was the fact that it interrupted his return to normal consciousness. Normal consciousness to him always meant, if he was to enjoy himself, the particular plunge into Nature, or the particular taking Nature into himself, which he called "cavoseniargizing", and it was to this that the sound of rustling leaves in the forest ought to have led him. But the magnetic jerk he had just suffered caught him off guard and taking advantage of his nervous and mental exhaustion dragged him across a sort of eel bridge out of normal consciousness together.

He had a helpless feeling that the child who called himself y Bychan had begun to play tricks with Time and Space! In fact he suddenly felt — though he said to himself, "It's my tiredness! It's my ridiculous tiredness!" — as if y Bychan had transported him to the reedy margin of a much larger water than Saint Julian's. And though he could see and hear, he couldn't make his presence felt by any physical movement.

And it was a devilish cruelty to him that he couldn't move because what he saw seemed to him — if he were powerless to stop it — to be the end of everything. The water was visible — just as Saint Julian's Water was — through masses of waving reeds, but instead of lying or standing among fir trees, for he really didn't know what he was doing for it was as if his body were just a wisp of vapour inhabited by a horribly alert mind, he was hovering about in an enormous orchard of apple trees, every tree weighed down by heavy yellow-coloured fruit and the whole terrible scene surrounded by a mockingly lovely, grey-blue twilight mist.

What he saw were two huge mounds of dead bodies rising up side by side, and on the top of one of them stood the emperor and on the top of the other stood the emperor's nephew; and each held a vast black spear. And the spear in each figure's hand had transfixed the heart of the other figure, so that both the men were dead. Indeed it seemed to him, as he watched them, that they had been corpses for days, perhaps for weeks, just as the dead piled up beneath them had been corpses for days and weeks.

And as he watched all this, too dazed and numb and mute and paralyzed to intervene, it suddenly struck his bewildered brain that there was something monstrously unnatural in the fact that neither the emperor nor his nephew fell down and rolled over, rolled over till he reached the bottom of the heap of dead men upon which they had both been standing.

But as he stared at the horrible mound of corpses with those two figures upright above them, he felt that though the two were doubtless held erect by some natural law of balance as well as by the deadly thrust of their spears it was not for nothing that their figures thus united formed a hieroglyph of the first letter of his own name and of the name of Ynys Prydein as this letter appears in Greek, formed in fact the representation of a trilithic portal, confronting him now, as he gazed upon it, as if it were a living conjunction of heaven and hell, and a spiritual truce between God and the devil, in the shape of a new entrance gate to Annwn, across the reeds and ripples of Avalon's inland sea.

And it seemed to him, as he watched them, that those two figures drew into themselves, as they hung there transfixed by each other's spears, all the desperate opposites in the world whose fanatic teeth are at each other's throats and must be at each other's throats until the end of Time; just those very opposites that Nature was always whispering to him to dodge, evade, avoid, and circumvent.

But what often happened to him in the most lucid moments of his life began to happen to him now. Certain chance-flung or destiny-flung blotches and blurs of drifting shapes and shifting colours distracted his attention from that primeval Homeric letter shaped like a megalithic porch into some mystic paradise of the dead.

What he now saw was a lustreless grey-brown heap of dead leaves, leaves that had lost all recognizable colour save a sort of leaden metallic opacity through which no light shone and from which no gleam radiated. This heap of leaves seemed to him in his paralyzed state to represent, or indeed in some queer sense to be, his old friend Afagddu, only it was an Afagddu who had arrived at such a degree of decomposition as to be hardly recognizable as a human being.

Approaching this heap of leaves was an undulating body of white foam, as beautiful to look upon as it was insubstantial to touch and incalculable in duration; and though it would have been impossible for Porius to have explained to Morfydd, much less to the laughing Amreu or the impassioned Lela, what it was that made him know all this, he knew suddenly with absolute certainty that this wavering body of foam was no other than y Bychan — still a child, but a child-soul on the shore of Limbo.

And it was only when he had at last got it clear to his numb and paralyzed mind that this heap of rotting leaves and this mass of insubstantial foam were really and truly a decomposing but yet living old man and a scarce-embodied but yet living child that the spell which was binding him to Amreu and Lela and this red-haired infant was broken.

"God!" he groaned heavily, "I've been asleep!" And moving blindly and blunderingly, and battling with a convulsive mass of heaving corpses, and oppressed by the fantasy that he was polarizing in his own flesh each of the two spears on which those two had been impaled, he dragged his feet across the soggy ground of that weird chamber and finally shouldered himself free from both its tangible and intangible confusions.

The second he was himself at liberty he realized that the same thing had happened to the others. Amreu's smile had an unusual and what might have been called an immediate significance. And what had been on the shifting, sliding, undulating brink of happening ever since they had entered the place now happened.

The infant's nature in y Bychan broke loose from its Derwydd-imposed self-control. The small creature left his wolf cub on the tripod table, along with the lamp and the black bishop and the chessboard, and rushed to Lela who clasped him passionately to her breast.

Porius looked at them gravely, his corrugated countenance wearing that particular expression of responsible, confused, bewildered, puzzled concern, which more than anything else about him always touched Morfydd's heart.

He came up close to Amreu. "Does this settle your problem then?" he whispered in the man's ear. "Will she let you come to the Gaer every afternoon?"

"Will she let me?" responded the son of Ganion in the same undertone; and then as he assisted his new master to mount the difficult ascent into the forest, the ex-steward of the Modrybedd assumed the look and tone of a specially privileged servant of Pharaoh who falls with diplomatic aplomb into the conspiratorial tone of male amusement confronted by the agreeable spectacle of feminine mutability.

“Come back at the next moon, my Lord Prince, and you’ll see what you’ll see!”

CHAPTER XXXII. Blodeuwedd

WHEN THE LONG CHANTINGS and the desperate prayers and the monotonous requiems for the dead were finished, and the fiercely Christian inner circle of the Gosgordd had gathered about the half-filled hole by the side of the altar, at the bottom of which lay the body of her husband, Euronwy ferch Porius Manlius suddenly realized that, though the troubles connected with Einion's death were safely over, there were other troubles on the wind that were likely to affect her hardly less nearly.

They were filling up the grave incredibly quickly, these devoted young believers in the resurrection, and as she stood with her gaze fixed steadily upon the stones and rubble falling upon the man who had neglected her, her thoughts were clearer and firmer and more definite than she could ever remember them to have been.

With a proud satisfaction, a satisfaction that she felt it would be un-Christian to fondle and cherish, but which it was only fair to herself to enjoy in passing, she recalled how night by night she had rejected the pitiful implorings of the emperor's nephew to let him share her bed.

At the bottom of her heart as she watched the faces of the devoted young men — the grave being filled up now and made level with the choir floor — as they began dragging to the spot the large flat stone that was to conceal the particular crevice in holy ground where the most unholy lips in Ynys Prydein were stopped with dust, at the bottom of her heart she was wondering just how she should put before this young priest, who was clearly more of a zealot than a theologian, all the questionable thoughts she was engaged in strangling.

An hour ago she had passed on her way here the ancient Gaer burying ground and had been astonished to encounter the two old servants from Ty Cerrig, Canna and Gwrgi, removing, with the help a couple of farm boys, the first layer of turf from an oblong patch of grass which they had clearly just marked out to receive the corpse of a young woman that lay there in helpless passivity waiting interment.

Euronwy recognized the face of the corpse at once as that of the wretched creature, Teleri, whose nocturnal wanderings and mysterious origin had long been subjects of fearful and shocking interest among her female attendants.

On this occasion, finding that her daughter-in-law's old nurse and her brother-in-law's old retainer were under instructions from the new princess, she had left them with the congenial advice to be content with a topsoil interment and to hide the disturbed earth by replacing the turf they'd removed.

But the matter had not remained at that point. Indeed, the chief cause of the inspired and dedicated look on the faces of the youths who were now, down here in the church, handling Einion's tombstone, chipping its edges so that it fitted into its place, and, where they dare not risk cracking it, inserting smaller stones at its side, was due to the burning words that the young priest, preaching now to the whole funeral crowd, was pouring forth from the top of half a dozen unfinished steps.

The grey October twilight had already begun, and Euronwy, as she stood there, knowing well how many eyes were fixed upon her, experienced the same sort of defiant satisfaction in the feeling of her loneliness, of her stateliness, of her statuesque dignity, as she did in the strength of her sexual purity and as she did in the image, that had grown to be something like an obsession with her, of Medrawd kneeling night by night on the floor beside her pillow.

Standing there with her gaze fixed steadily on Einion’s grave, it came over her that Medrawd’s eyes beneath her Roman lamp had been night after night like the eyes of a lost soul, a soul in hell, that kept clinging to the down-drooping wing of her unmoved, unperturbed, implacable virtue. And then, just as if the mocking smile of the dead man had begun to reach her in spite of all that was heaped over it, she felt suddenly impelled to defy that smile, to avenge herself on that smile, to drag that smile in chains behind her chariot, so that her mocking husband might realize, out of the dust, that she was strong enough in her Christian stoicism to face the eyes of the whole of Edeyrnion, and yet, daughter of the great house of Manlius as she was, and niece as she was of Uthyr Pendragon, to yield no jot of her dignity and to remain infinitely greater in her retirement than this daughter of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles could possibly be with all her self-assertion and her springing youth.

It was at this moment that she began to grow vaguely aware of what the priest was actually saying. The young men had paused in their work and were listening intently; and Euronwy, watching their faces rather than his, for the new priest clearly took no personal interest in her, and this settled her attitude to him once for all, became aware that this negligible cleric was saying something that it concerned her to know.

The truth is that Euronwy lived in her enforced retirement from the dominant place in the Gaer precisely as she had always lived; lived in fact for a few simple, massive, august, austere, personal sensations.

Her late spiritual director, Minnawc Gorsant, was wont in his affectionate, half-humorous way to make her confess to each one of these: to the sensation of pride at her immunity to sex, to the sensation of being mysterious and inscrutable and utterly unapproachable, and finally to the sensation of feeling that no one could injure her or neglect her with impunity or without coming to a bad end.

Her late director had always done his best to exploit the authentic affection that existed between them in the interest of her immortal soul; and he had succeeded in grafting something of the mystical idea of chastity upon the Roman stoicism she had inherited from her father.

At this moment Euronwy felt she had need of her dead priest as never before. She knew he would have disapproved of the way she was indulging her thirty years' grievance against her husband as she brooded upon the image of the man's mocking beauty, dead, disfigured, done for, under all that rubble and with this mighty flagstone sealing it down forever.

But the intensity of her insatiable grievance balanced against the intensity of her desire to please her dead priest by suppressing any feeling but pious resignation would have been difficult to weigh even in celestial scales; and although she still enjoyed the sensation of feeling herself cold and stately, unapproachable and inscrutable, under the eyes of at least a thousand of her son's subjects, her attention did now begin to flutter away a little from the thirty years' outrage to her pride and from the derisive face under that heavy stone that she would forever associate with it.

But the spectacle upon which she looked from her vantage ground beneath the altar, and within some twenty feet of the flight of unfinished steps on which the young priest stood, was not unworthy to distract even a descendant of the Manlii and a niece of Uthyr Pendragon from the sweet bitterness of personal wrongs. Though the sun had gone, and the autumn twilight was chilly and damp, the sky above the Gaer was not only clear of clouds but revealed a recession of yellow-green space into a depth of ether that had no conceivable or imaginable end.

And moving, so it seemed, out of this yellow-green infinitude, and growing, so it seemed, less faint as they advanced towards the rim of the Gaer — that familiar skyline rim to the northeast, that every frequenter of this old marketplace by the Divine River had come to know so well — she could just see a cluster of stars, visitors from aerial Appian Ways unknown to any Manlius, wanderers from impalpable Caer Dathyls unknown to any Gwydion, stars that brought with them, the immediate second they became visible, a strange sense of the complete removal or entire dissolution of one whole dimension of reality by the introduction of a single elementary atom belonging to another.

And, like a wandering star from a mental dimension wholly different from the one where a single young man's earnestness could cause a thousand people to listen breathlessly to theological words, Euronwy was now aware of the wild and constantly repeated cries of a hoot-owl wheeling about among the high woods and mossy rocks somewhere between Ty Cerrig and Ogof-y-Gawr.

And it struck her faintly, struck her without creating within her the dimmest pulse of real interest, that the impassioned young preacher was now saying something that had caught the fixed attention of the whole mass of his listeners and to which she ought to listen. "It is a warrior and a hunter whose death we are celebrating," he was saying, "and I am speaking to the men here, to the younger men, more than to you women, whether old or young!

"Yes, it is to the men I am speaking, and I call on you to understand that the whole Catholic Church from pole to pole requires of you men that you fling your lives, your feelings, your ideas, your passions, your loves, and your hates into the one sole task of conquering the world for Christ!

"I want you to realize that until every living knee on this planet bows before Christ, and every thought, fancy, hope, imagination, desire, purpose, interest in every individual soul is completely bound and chained to Christ, your victory will not have come!

"It is a battle just as ruthless, just as desperate as the victory our emperor is even now winning over these lost and doomed heathen; and you must fight, we must all fight, with no other purpose in our minds save to compel every living creature in this whole world to fall down and worship Christ!"

In the pause that followed this appeal, the wildly hooting owl, that hitherto had been flapping and fluttering round the heaped-up rocks, the jagged-splintered rocks, the deep-chasmed rocks, between Ogof-y-Gawr and Ty Cerrig, came perceptibly nearer. Was it that the intense human silence of so large a crowd created a fathomless psychic void, a void as infinite as the fading one above the Gaer, but a void with an indrawing, insucking power, a power felt like a whirlpool by this great agitated fluttering creature with its small bones and incredible mass of feathers?

Or was it that a tall and very striking personage, whom Euronwy from her solitary place below the altar could clearly detect descending those hills by a path that came from the direction of Saint Julian's, was alluring this agitated bird, and by some invisible enchantment, some special hud or lledrith, drawing it towards the church and the river?

At any rate the preacher was suddenly inspired by one of those rapid inspirations that born orators alone receive; and at the owl's "tu-whit-tu-who" he made a daring clutch and mingled it boldly with his passionate appeal. Euronwy was torn, in one distressing jerk after another, out of her obstinate feelings.

"Where in heaven's name," she asked herself, "have I seen the person who looks like that and walks like that?"

And then, in a flash, she knew! It was the emperor's counsellor. It was Myrddin Wyllt. "What in the name of all the devils," she thought, "does that man want down here?" And a sudden shudder of fear ran through her. No antiquary studying the varieties of runic or ogamic letters on ancient stones could have been as interested as Euronwy was in her own shudder of fear. "I've only once," she thought, "in all my life before, felt like that. And that was after that woman" — she always thought of Nineue in that way to herself— "had told the empress that the reason I wanted to marry Medrawd was because if the emperor — but that man's bringing that owl nearer."

But it wasn't the owl nor "the man bringing the owl" that interrupted her thoughts. It was the peculiar manner in which the priest was speaking of the owl. It wasn't that he actually challenged the bird's weird cry, which now came nearer and nearer; but he managed by some subtle facial contortion and some wild toss-back of his close-cropped young head, which Euronwy admitted to herself was beautifully shaped, to convey to that Edeyrnion crowd the impression of some terribly inspired force gathering itself together ferociously, against the life of that nocturnal creature.

But the hooting of the owl as an accompaniment to the preacher had naturally aroused in some of the rougher and more impious among that mass of people an irresistible sense of the comic. This finally burst out, in one small group of hearers, into a series of noisy but not particularly owlish "tu-whit-tu-whos," and Euronwy fancied, though the twilight was deepening now, that she recognized, on this profane margin of the crowd, the figures of Rhun ap Gwrnach and Sibylla y Gwyddyles.

Whether the young priest let himself be affected by these improprieties Euronwy couldn't tell. What he did was suddenly to direct his discourse into a channel familiar to them all and launch out into extravagant praise of the noble morality of Gwydion the son of Don in punishing the unfortunate Blodeuwedd for her murderous infidelity to the man whose desires she had been created to satisfy.

"Rightly considered," cried the eloquent young preacher — while the owl's "tu-whits" and the human "tu-whits" seemed as they answered one another to be making that pale un-glittering cluster of timid stars, who had begun to look as if they might sink to sleep for the whole winter on the calm shoulder of the Gaer, take a maidenly if somewhat scandalized interest in this human owl baiting— "rightly considered," cried the priest, "that tremendous conception of your ancestral imagination, whose name you have even, in your beautiful bardic blasphemy, not knowing what you did, given to the thrice-holy Urbs Beata, that far-scattered starry mystery above your heads, the very ramparts of the Blessed Trinity itself; rightly considered, I say," went on the preacher, "the punishment was justly given to this adulteress whose soulless life was only bestowed upon her to satisfy the natural desire of a noble ruler, a ruler high in the hierarchy of God-appointed rulers, a ruler who, instead of being served in docile humble obedience as Christ must be served by His Church, was treacherously murdered by this woman's adulterous lover!"

Long before the priest's voice ceased, Euronwy's soul had returned from its unnatural attempt to follow him and was back in its warm nest in her soft bosom, cosseted and cuddled by her habitual consciousness. But it found itself this time not quite alone. Both her father and her son were there!

Was the younger Porius there because at that identical second, as he gave instructions to Neb ap Digon not to let Myrddin Wyllt out of his sight, he was yielding to a completely irrational fury with his mother over her imagined love affair with Medrawd?

It is likely enough that no occult magic would have brought her son so vividly into her bosom when the twilight was at once uniting and separating the river and the Gaer, and when her own queenlike figure between altar and priest would soon be scarcely visible to that dark crowd, if Porius hadn't, in his excess of indignation, indulged himself in a vicious interior regret that someone, though he would have shrunk from doing it himself, hadn't betrayed this passion of hers to Porius Manlius.

And not only to the Patrician. And here was another occult cause of this symposium of ghosts in the self-loving bosom of the niece of the Pendragon. For as her indignant son revengefully and rather meanly imagined himself telling tales of her to his grandfather, so he longed at that second to scramble down into Brother John's grave and pour out his indignant feelings to him also.

And because all these emotions had to do with death as much as with love it struck the younger Porius how astonishing it was that only five days ago, when he had stood above the eastern gate at this hour, all these three men had been alive and perfectly well. There was certainly something weird as well as something eminently characteristic of this woman in the way the mental eidola of her father and her son were hugged to her heart now, and in the way she felt about these images, which, while retaining their mature appearance, were necessarily reduced in physical size and mental dignity to the stature and texture of tender human-faced toadstools.

And it was clear enough, as she petted and cuddled them, while that "flower-faced" demon was still hooting over her husband's grave, that she actually absorbed them — for all that one of them had been her own father — into herself, into her insatiable, though constantly frustrated, maternal substance.

But the descendant of ten generations of Roman matrons was allowed scant time to absorb the eidola of her men, whether living or buried. Something dramatic and disturbing had begun, something dangerous, perhaps even revolutionary, in that great crowd. There were cries and countercries. There were surgings and heavings and swift eddies, as when, in a narrow river's mouth, the outflowing stream encounters the inflowing tide.

Groups of excited people kept running in and out of the small wooden sheds and warehouses, in and out of the reed huts and the dilapidated stone houses with ancient stone steps that led down to the river's edge. The darkness began to be broken by the flare of torches and of lanterns swinging from poles. The shouts grew louder and more angry, and there were new incursions into the heart of the crowd and into the wide expanse of the big roofless church surrounded by unfinished walls at whose altar Euronwy was still standing.

Presently she saw her son's wife not far off, and then, coming from the opposite direction, she was astonished to see Rhun and Sibylla. But the faster the people rushed from their houses, and the more torches and lanterns were brought out, the harder it became for the contending groups to separate themselves from the general mass of the crowd and the closer everybody was welded together.

But this condition of distracting nearness by no means eased the situation. Persons were desperately hemmed in against one another who had no connection at all, whereas others, separated from their friends, were compelled to utter angry and indignant cries before they could get in touch with them. The curious thing was that in spite of the confusion a certain natural and spontaneous coming together of men and women belonging to the same familiar and social groups began to appear; but this again was soon modified by the much less spontaneous and more organized movements of the armed elements in the crowd.

Rhun and Sibylla, for instance, who seemed in an incredibly short space of time to have gathered about them quite a number of the dispersed retainers of the dead Modrybedd, were already within a few hundred yards of Morfydd, about whose girlish figure Euronwy could detect, as the smoky torch flares blew this way and that, a larger though a much less well-armed portion of the Gosgordd than the one which she felt, now that Einion's grave was filled in, was staunchly and loyally and religiously gathering round herself.

But Euronwy had not lived for half a century among Romanized Brythons, of whom she herself was a supremely characteristic embodiment, without being susceptible to the subtlest vibration of public emotion.

And what she became suddenly aware of now was the unexpected arrival upon the scene of the definite shiver, infectious and alarming, that follows upon the discovery of some deed of horror and shame, some outrage to natural human feeling, some shocking defiance of the decencies of custom. The gravest and most formidable of the Gosgordd youths pressing around her were the first to respond to this rumour of horror and began hurriedly gathering round the priest.

The mother of one Porius and the daughter of another had a shrewd test of her quality, when, on the crest of a wave of excited people, starting apparently from the Gaer side of the concourse and sweeping wildly to where she and the priest were surrounded by the most devoted of their followers, came a group of men dragging with them the expostulating Canna and the still more indignant Gwrgi.

The priest came down the steps and Euronwy forced her way forward, and it was explained to them both that Canna and Gwrgi had been caught in the act of allowing Medrawd ap Llew to commit a monstrous outrage upon the newly buried corpse of the mad girl Teleri. Among the literary treasures that, with the help of the young Boethius and the old Cassiodorus, Morfydd's father had brought to Ty Cerrig there was no copy of the Bacchae; and had there been such a copy its toothless owner would probably have missed the connection.

But no adjective could have been found more suitable for the particular shiver of horror that was now running through that Ultima Thule crowd than the adjective "Euripidean." And yet, despite her knowledge of both Medrawd and Teleri, Euronwy's first reaction to what she heard was anything but a painful one. In fact, if that great, honest, atmospheric artist, Sylvanus Bleheris, the Henog of Dyfed, who had just paused at the market ferry on his way to the Gaer to investigate these shouts, these lights, and all this confused uproar, had been the one describing Euronwy's feelings when news came of this outrage to the corpse of Teleri, he would have felt compelled by his literary conscience to describe it as one of pleasure.

The image of the emperor's nephew, who had been wandering, like a shivering lost soul, round and round her warm bed ever since years ago, so it seemed to her now, her mocking husband had amused himself by being killed, the image of this desperate lust-maddened creature, tantalized and driven crazy by her inscrutable chastity, scrabbling in the grave of a dead whore, and wreaking his passion upon her corpse, must surely have been, so the shameless Henog would feel he had to suggest, the cause of a quickening not a lowering in the beat of Euronwy's steady pulse.

But neither the former Lady of the Gaer nor the youthful present one had much time allowed them at this crucial moment to suffer pleasure or pain, so distracting were the dramatic encounters that now began with shocking speed to crowd on one another and to overlap with one another.

Morfydd, who had not forgotten to repossess herself of the chain of snail shells, had forgotten to replace it between her breasts; and clutched tight in her right hand, it now became the destiny of those shells, once such laborious travellers up and down the stalks of flowers, to swing furiously through the air as with the indignant Canna and Gwrgi before her she overawed their accusers, interpreted the general gist of their testimony, and divined for herself what actually had occurred.

But she soon became aware that quite new and very disturbing things were happening. She hadn’t heard the earlier hootings of this immense owl that persisted in fluttering closer and closer over the unfinished choir of the roofless and half-built church but she now realized what the great infatuated bird was doing. It was circling over the head of Myrddin Wyllt, brushing him with its wings and apparently trying to settle on one or other of his shoulders.

When at last she had succeeded not only in releasing Canna and Gwrgi from the over-officious warriors who had arrested them, but — a much harder task — in coaxing and scaring and compelling these two victims of pious injustice to extricate themselves from this exciting disturbance and hurry quietly home to Ty Cerrig, and when, with anxious eyes, she was following their departure, she received a new shock.

She caught sight, under a sudden blazing torch flare, of a figure she felt sure she recognized. Yes! It was — it must be — none other than that perilous Ffichtiaid woman, the fatal Nineue! Nineue was standing by herself along with a couple of torch bearers, each of whom held a large grey horse by the bridle; and she appeared even more concerned with the flappings of the great owl round the counsellor’s shoulders than were the priest and Euronwy.

But this was not all. Following with her eyes the retreat of her old nurse and sternly waving her on, each time she lingered to look back, for it was evident that while the cautious Gwrgi couldn’t escape fast enough, it wasn’t at all to the old lady's liking to have to leave this surging crowd at a moment when anything might happen, Morfydd perceived that just as Nineue with her torch-bearing bodyguard was intensely absorbed in what the counsellor was doing with the owl, so a small figure flitting about in the shadows behind the two horses was intensely absorbed in Nineue's behaviour in relation to the counsellor.

But Morfydd suddenly sighed as deeply as it is possible for any young woman to sigh; and as she did so she allowed the hand that held Teleri's snail shells to sink down at her side. With an instinctive movement to get comfort from the elements — for she had suddenly thought, "When, in pity's name, am I going to see Porius again?" — she looked across all these waving lights, these white patches of intermittent faces, these glintings of murderous weapons, to the dark vague masses of forest slopes beyond the whitish flow of the river.

The moon was invisible; but the girl felt, and it was probably rather as the daughter of Kymeinvoll the Gwyddyles than of Brochvael the Brython that she felt this, that though it was invisible it had more power to penetrate this portion of Ynys Prydein than if it had been visible.

By remaining hidden — and Morfydd couldn't tell whether it was hidden by clouds or by a film of vapour, or whether the hour had not yet come for its phantomlike glide over the crests of the hills — it proved itself possessed of the power to substitute a totally different element as a darkness disperser from that of either daylight or torchlight.

Indeed it was just because the body of the moon was hidden that this effect of enchantment became so prominent. It was as if an occult entity, to which common speech gave the name of "moonlight," was now being softly diffused from all the pores of the old earth's patient skin.

And not only from the earth’s skin did it pour forth. From exposed roots, from bare branches, from naked rocks, from precipitous gorges, from silvery stretches of river water, from mountain summits and ferny slopes, there rose, in a sacred silence all its own, this magic element, an emanation which, once having emerged, floated away among the zodiacal signs, to dim by its native luminosity the glittering pinpricks of galaxies of stars too remote for thought.

But Morfydd had only time just then to breathe a single heart sigh into that bodiless moonlight, a sigh out of which the phantom of Teleri, occupied now in comforting Medrawd as if he were a hunted fox hidden under her shroud, instantaneously made one more ghostly snail shell!

What she now noticed was the rapid coming together of all the different groups of armed men, each group forcing its way — as was easy enough amid that mass of unarmed people — towards the place where she was standing. And simultaneously with this discovery she recognized its cause. By her side now, after the reluctant departure of Canna, was Nesta the daughter of Aulus and her husband Gwythyr. This latter had brought with him, at Nesta’s suggestion, for the Italian girl had foreseen trouble at Einion’s interment, nothing less than the ex-centurion’s old-fashioned legionary trumpet.

And now it was the notes of this trumpet, which Gwythyr could sound though he could not blow it properly, that was drawing the less disciplined, less well-armed, less Christian, less Brythonic, but much the most numerous portion of the Gosgordd close around her. In fact she was already the centre, the acknowledged chief, the arbitrary leader, of the largest of the armed groups between the river and the roofless church.

Euronwy herself, with the priest at her side and surrounded by their small band of the devoted Christians, the leaders of whom had been responsible for the death of Morfydd's brother, was now within speaking distance of her and had paused, in what might easily have become a hand-against-hand conflict, in direct touch with her supporters.

And while this happened on the river side of Morfydd's position, on the other side, the side towards Ogof-y-Gawr, Rhun and Sibylla and their followers of the last twelve hours — a motley set, it is true, and a somewhat predatory one, but a group that at least possessed something of the old Iberian tradition of the Modrybedd — were moving towards her.

Rhun, indeed, was soon near enough for her to catch a few of his words as he addressed his tatterdemalion adherents, but she couldn't hear what he said to Sibylla; and neither he nor Sibylla had yet made any overt signal of recognition in her direction.

But what had answered Aulus's trumpet more definitely and distinctly than any member of the Gosgordd, whether Christian or heathen, was the owl.

What Morfydd felt about the wild flappings of this creature may of course have been simply due to love longing for Porius. Certainly that life-deep sigh the moonlight had drawn out of her had been followed, in spite of all the necessity for shrewd and unencumbered decisions, by several seconds of lost-to-reality starings into white lichen and black-green spruce foliage, during which she forgot to be a high-spirited and responsible princess and just simply gave herself up to the memory of those delicious abandonments below the old home rock, or craig-y-gartref.

But it was with a strange exultation, inexplicable to herself, and to mention which to Canna, say, or to Rhun, or to her father, would have caused her acute pain, that she watched the wild excitement of this bird as it fluttered round the head of Myrddin Wyllt, who, in his disguise as a savage "herdsman from the south," now came forward slowly towards her, looking larger than human in those tossing torch flares which certainly had a weird effect as seen in that indescribable substitute for daylight or darkness which now filled the valley.

“The owl has gone mad,” she muttered to herself, never thinking for a second that it was an unusual thing to conceive of feathered creatures “going mad” as animals go mad. But as the counsellor came towards her she could see that his eyes were fixed on nobody but Nineue, who, standing between those enormous horses and clutching each of them by its mane, was leaning forward with her whole body taut and stiff.

And then the girl became aware that, roused by that old Uriconium trumpet, the whole assembly of people was straining forward, very much in the same manner as Nineue herself. Suddenly the counsellor uttered a hoarse cry, a cry that could never have been heard if it had not been for a deep and portentous silence that had suddenly fallen upon the whole gathering. Out of the heart of that silence which seemed to draw into itself the very soul of the moonlight, that enormous man in his savage garb lifted both his arms and slowly, powerfully, masterfully, irresistibly, took the bird in his hands and drew it, flapping frantically, under his herdsman’s cloak.

And the silence of that crowd deepened to a level that was like the silence at the bottom of the ocean, and as if through some planetary sluice at the bottom of the ocean the lives of men and animals and birds and fishes, yes! and of plants and trees also, drained away, and nothing was left within that river curve of the Vale of Edeyrnion save the four elements, save the air filled with the mystery of moonlight, save Dyfrdwy, the Divine Water full of the mystery of life, save the waving torch fires full of the mystery of death, save the earth herself, mother of both the darkness of life and the darkness of death.

And as the torches wavered in the moonlight feeding on their own smoke like drunken flowers on their own fragrance, and as all the people waited, expecting a miracle, there came what sounded like the howl of a frustrated wolf from the throat of the young priest who now rushed forward, as if to throw himself in a frantic death hug full upon the counsellor; but he was held back by invisible arms.

"Whore from the beginning of the world!" he screamed; but like Taliesin's mysterious young Gwair, struggling against the cadwyn dromlas, "that heavy grey chain," that kept him prisoner in Caer Sidi, or like Rhiannon with the mynweir, or "horse collar," round her neck, he now stood helpless, motionless, dumb.

Morfydd had her eyes on his face and she could see his blank stupefaction at this sudden paralysis. He was a fearless youth. He had faith. He must have felt that all the devils in hell couldn't stop the impetus of his attack on this defender of lost souls. And yet something had stopped him. But Morfydd's attention suddenly turned to Euronwy, who was now a step or two in advance of the motionless priest. Euronwy had taken no notice of her companion's paralysis. She took no notice now of Myrddin Wyllt. She showed no interest in what was happening under that cloak, that cloak which had become the magnet, the centre, the cynosure, the loadstone, of that whole hushed and fascinated crowd. Morfydd recognized in her the same woman by whom she had stood in that little Gaer chapel, swearing each of them their vow by what each of them held most sacred.

Watching her at this crucial moment the question flashed across her: "Which of us has kept her oath?" But Euronwy was coming towards her now and taking no more notice of her than she had taken of the paralyzed priest or of the miracle that Myrddin Wyllt was working under his cloak. What was she going to do? At whom was she looking?

She was passing her now and Morfydd turned quickly from the counsellor’s cloak, which had begun to bulge and rumple itself and diminish itself and enlarge itself in a different way from the way it had reacted at first under the owl’s flapping wings. Wouldn’t their eyes meet for one single second? “I could,” she thought, “if I’d told him what Teleri said, have made him see her before he went.”

No, she had passed her without a word or a sign, just as if she hadn’t seen her! And then all at once she knew what the woman was doing and at whom she had been looking all this time! She had caught sight of Nineue, that fatal Ffichtiaid devil, standing up there with those two towering horses; and with her instinct for strategy on a large scale and for statecraft on a large scale, she had divined that there was danger to her son in what this sorceress had in mind.

And being, as Morfydd knew, absolutely without fear, what she was doing wasn’t as incredible as might seem. She was going to confront Nineue face to face and challenge her! But the magnetic pull of the miracle Myrddin Wyllt was working, indeed had worked, drew the girl’s attention now. The spell, or whatever it was, that he had cast upon the priest had clearly relaxed so that the man could move again, but it was evident that he was at present far too dazed by what had happened to him to do more than look about him with a puzzled and boyishly indignant stare.

She threw a hurried, half hurt, half self-reproachful look after Euronwy’s Roman-matron form advancing so calmly against that woman with the horses, that woman so accurately divined, by the infallible instinct of a mother bird, to be the real danger to her son. “She might at least have smiled at me,” Morfydd thought almost pathetically, as she herself swung round to the worker of miracles.

The Christian group in the Gosgordd, who hadn't left the priest's side for a second, now watched with horrified intensity every movement of the great magician. There began to emerge from beneath that queerly agitated cloak a pair of long, naked, beautiful, girlish legs. There was still something remotely birdlike about the girl's feet which emerged first, emerged indeed as in some improper and unsatisfactory human birth the feet might precede the head. The creature's hips followed, and then the arms folded across the waist. The girl's hands were clasped tightly together, the knuckles showing deadly white, and there was a lustrous softness, with a maddening appeal to the senses of any male who beheld it, emanating from those tightly folded arms and from that exquisitely tender neck, lacking every sort of ornament, on each side of which a long pair of tightly twisted shining braids— "and what earthly power," Morfydd thought, as with round eyes, open mouth, and panting breath, she stared spellbound, "could have braided that shining stuff in there?" — swayed and swung in the glory of their moonlit beauty, as if in exultant defiance of the dark intention of a second primary world ruler, one to whom everything connected with the pleasure of sex was totally and entirely evil.

Normally feminine as was her whole nature, Morfydd wasn't oblivious to the magic of femininity in its softest, delicatest, and most alluring essence; and at the rebirth of this lost and condemned Blodeuwedd, as if the counsellor's mantle had been a maternal womb, she was fully aware that the faint down of incomparably soft feathers round the thighs and between the thighs of the re-created maid, and the delicately secretive and inviolably shy intimacy of the way the hands of the resuscitated were folded, as if in obedience to some mysterious wisdom, too old to be remembered except by such a sign — yes! she was fully aware that all these things were indisputable evidence that every feminine creature in the whole world had at last found a real champion, even if he were only a magician and not a god.

Certainly while this newly created being remained for a moment or two poised on her feet, ready to use her arms as wings for her restored and reconstituted flights, back and forth, in defiance of the vengeance of Gwydion and of the Church that had accepted such vengeance as its own, over the valleys that were now hers once more to delight in, with or without the soul of Gronwy, with or without any other soul of her choice, between Caer Dathyl and Mur Castell, from one end of Edeyrnion to the other, Morfydd felt a strange outrush of sympathy for her, of sympathy so strong that she never forgot it all her days.

The creature was beyond all words beautiful, in that wild-tossed torchlight under that far-flung moonlight. Her form hadn't only taken into itself the springtime blossoms of its first engendering; it had taken into itself all the moss-deep unfoldings and unsheathings of the loneliest places, all the fibrous disentanglings of velvety filaments from the undersides of silvery-veined boughs, all the tangled growths that hide the secret processes of new life between the dark retreats of marsh waters and the still darker retreats of ancient forests.

But what was this? Morfydd moved straight up to the creature. She had met its eyes; and though its eyes were large as moon daisies they reminded her of Teleri. And the image of Teleri made her think of the snail shells she still held in her hand. Those moon-daisy eyes were asking her for something; and it was as if in the first moment of its elemental freedom the soul of this strange creature craved pitifully for some human touch to give it confidence in its inhuman loneliness, ere it entered its new transformation.

Soon it would become the nightly visitor that could fly through any secluded ramparts between Caer Dathyl and Mur Castell to respond to, to reciprocate, to realize, to satisfy the desperate imaginations of youthful longings and hopeless lusts, tossing on unshared pillows between Deganwy and Bontdu; but before its new transformation the creature seemed to implore her to give it some human recognition, something to link it with reality ere its flights began from dream lover to dream lover.

Those great, round, moon-daisy eyes begged and implored her, and through them it seemed to her that all the underlayers of earth life implored her; that dim existences in mud and moss implored her; and that newts and blindworms implored her; and that fish and frogs implored her; that faint presences too delicate to be caught in the shadows cast by the moon or in the shadows thrown by the torch flares implored her; and finally that Teleri herself from the bottom of her violated grave implored her; and it came over Morfydd, as she yielded to those eyes, that by re-creating Blodeuwedd the counsellor had in some queer way liberated the souls of all the Teleris in the world.

Feeling therefore the necklace of snail shells swaying in her fingers, Morfydd impulsively tore the thing in half, unstrung half the shells and replaced them, loose as they now were, in her own bosom, and proceeded to tie the ends of the string on which the rest were threaded as tight as she could round the nearest of these two golden braids, which was the one that hung across the creature’s left breast, the beautifullest breast in Ynys Prydein, from the Isles of Surluse to the carved tombstones of Iona, and there, twisted into the gold, that had been twisted out of its creator’s life, she left it in the hair of the wanderer — the only ornament she had ever really loved.

And thus adorned, the re-created, unransomed, unredeemed bird maiden swept away over their heads till she was lost in what might have been a cloud chariot made to receive her, save that it had a simpler origin and was in fact a cloud of black smoke sent down the wind from the erratic torches of the wild camp followers of Rhun and Sibylla.

Taking no more notice of her than Euronwy had done, the emperor’s counsellor, wrapping his magic cloak about his shoulders and looking especially ill-favoured and savage in his befouled jerkin blotched with every sort of unappealing stains of the chase, now began hurrying at a speed that was almost comical for a man of such unwieldy bulk towards Nineue and the two big horses. His pace was no doubt accelerated by what Morfydd could now see to be an absorbing encounter between the two formidable women; an encounter which, as far as she could make out, was still undecided.

But it was decided now, and by no means in Nineue’s favour, nor could Morfydd suppress a certain stir of pride in Porius’s mother as she watched her, for her figure was clearly outlined against the pine trees behind her, possess herself of the bridle of one of those enormous horses and draw the animal several yards away from its mate.

It was clearly because of this move that the ungainly form of the counsellor was now to be seen scrambling up the slope with grotesque desperation so that he might help his friend in time. But even so he was too late. With a calculated adroitness, that Morfydd couldn’t help but note with wonder and respect, Euronwy, who had succeeded in leading the horse to the entrance of a long narrow grassy path that plunged from the hilltop into one of the western valleys, now snatched up a fir branch and striking the animal with it sent the great beast thundering down that descent in a panic of terror.

What happened then to Nineue and the counsellor Morfydd no longer cared, but she did catch a sufficient glimpse of them against the moonlit sky to be conscious of two impressions: first, that a group of just visible stars that had an air of being there by more than pure coincidence seemed, from where she stood, to be moving off with them as, mounted together on the remaining great horse, they cantered over the crest of the hill and sank out of sight; and second, that leaping from his hiding place among the pines there suddenly appeared a small boyish figure, who, after a moment's pause, evidently to make out towards what quarter of the horizon that noticeable pair were riding, bolted off himself in the direction of Saint Julian's Fount.

The priest was now lurching unsteadily, just as if he were drunk or drugged, towards the stately figure of Euronwy as she came calmly and triumphantly down the slope; and Morfydd was beginning to gather together her faithful portion of the Gosgordd, with a view to leading them back to the Gaer, when she found herself confronted by two tall men who were absorbingly occupied in the business of carrying a third, whose unwieldy form was at first sight not so much limp and lifeless as tense and stiff in a sort of grown-up childish tantrum.

One of the bearers of this grotesque burden was none other than Lot-el-Azziz; and though Morfydd hadn't seen enough of the doctor to be as weary, as Porius had come to be, of his precious ram's horn, she felt instinctively that the man was completely outside the particular circle of her vital concerns.

"What do you want me to do?" she asked, trying to keep her irritation under control. "Who is this man?" she went on sternly, "and what is the matter with him?"

"In God's name, Princess," began the doctor gravely; but at that point he suddenly stopped, and stooping sideways away from his sulky patient, proceeded to run his thumb up and down the stalk of a plant that had survived the first two months of autumn. "It's a curious order, the Hypericineae," he murmured aloud. "Good for a purgative, you know, as well as for a tonic! This one's stalk's square, as I expected, not round as they are in Gaul." And then, relinquishing this square-stalked specimen of the Hypericineae: "In God's name, Princess, I can't answer your question till I've examined—" Here the physician, having released the stalk, took a firmer hold on his instrument. But at that point Morgant, the brother of Drom, intervened with a rush of such fierce indignant words that the girl was compelled to listen.

"Porius ab Einion," he explained, "ordered me to take him — he's the son and brother of a dead Derwydd, honoured Princess, and, though he's what he is, he's all we've got, all we've got left, O great Princess, of his sacred House — to take him to the tent of the Lord Cynan who's still with the emperor, but the High Prince of Surluse has appeared with an insulting rapscallion of an ignorant Gaul who knows no more of the honour due to the Derwyddon of Ynys Prydein than a pig-hog in Tref-y-Glawdd; and it is because of this ruffian, honoured Princess — I say nothing against the High Prince — we all know him and how he comes from the Blessed Isles and how it's unlucky to reproach him, and I don't reproach him; I mention shame on his servant, shame on this bragging Gaul, shame on—"

But Morfydd interrupted him. "Lay the man down!" she ordered abruptly. "Pardon me, Doctor, but I'm sure you must be exhausted. This man's very heavy and anyone can see he's no corpse. In fact it seems to me there's plenty of life in him, and I don't—"

Drom's brother obeyed her so precipitously that she was interrupted by a peevish and indignant groan from the inert personage now lying full-length upon the ground; and the doctor, kneeling beside him, moved the fellow's heavy head from the sloping side of a molehill till it rested on a tywarch, or "tussock," of grass. Here he lay, muttering and grumbling, but, unless his druidic inheritance had enabled him to become a superhuman humorist, not in any particular discomfort.

"Can you hear what I say, Master?" enquired Morfydd. But the druid's brother contented himself with muttering, "Wine, wine, wine," as if it were the name, not of a drink made from the juice of grapes, but of a pitiful and powerful deity, whose peculiarity it was to appear among men whenever torchlight and moonlight met.

But Morfydd, unperturbed by his rudeness, went on addressing him. "Don't you think, Master," she said, "if you were lifted up and took the doctor's arm, you could walk on your own feet?"

At this the druid's brother did throw upon her a definitely answering glance, and hoarsely and grimly, but with something about his tone that was not entirely removed from the sardonic, replied in a couple of monosyllables.

"Walk where?"

At this, as Morfydd's eyes met those of Lot-el-Azziz, she couldn't help smiling. But, as at the same moment she became aware that the polite space round them was rapidly diminishing and that the well-armed and well-disciplined core of the Gosgordd who supported the priest, acting as if it were a miniature Macedonian phalanx, was wedging into them, she felt impelled to think rapidly, decide rapidly, and not only so but announce her decision as if it had been the result of a month's rather than a moment's consideration.

"We can't have you two at the Gaer," she remarked emphatically, and speaking this time not to the druid's brother but to Drom's brother, "but there may be," she said, "down by the river — a vacant house — or hut — which — with a little — practical assistance — could be—"

It was the man on the ground who spoke now, and spoke quietly, firmly, and a little wearily, as an accomplished actor might speak in a whisper to his fellow about some mutual private affair when it was his stage duty to be dramatically, decently, and portentously dumb.

“The place I want to go to,” he said, “is the Avanc’s Cave, where the disinherited son of the Blessed One used to live who was loved by Princess Tonwen and killed by the same Sais who killed my brother. The Avanc’s Cave is a comfortable place. It is a convenient place. It is an honoured place. It is also a deserted place. No one would dare to live in the Avanc’s Cave because of the son of the Blessed One’s ghost. Morgant here is no more afraid of the son of the Blessed One’s ghost than I am, or of Princess Tonwen’s ghost either. Are you, Morgant? Tell the princess you’re not.”

And Morgant, the brother of Drom, repeated the word “not.” “Tell her what you are afraid of, Morgant,” commanded the druid’s brother.

And Morgant announced with an oath that he was afraid of nothing. The man on the ground promptly sat up and made a face at his follower.

“He’s afraid of women!” he shouted angrily. “Yes, you are! You know you are! You know what you used to call them in the old days.”

The brother of Drom looked from the doctor to Morfydd and from Morfydd to the doctor. Then he boldly blurted out, “That was for him, all for him! It was to save him from Sibylla Gwyddyles who’s now with my Lord Rhun.”

At this word Morfydd turned to the nearest loyal members of the Gosgordd and ordered a couple of them to conduct the disputing master and servant to Ogof-y-Gawr.

“They can get food and blankets there,” she said, “and then go to the other place. And you’ll be free tomorrow, Doctor,” she added, “to visit the man there if you feel you should; but now I want you to return to the Gaer with me to tell me if this girl's body has really been tampered with."

Lot-el-Azziz bowed before the daughter of Brochvael ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn as if she had been the daughter of Pharaoh. By this time the enormous moon had succeeded in surmounting the massive barrier of hills beyond the river; but no sooner had she overcome this obstacle, in obedience — so the brother of Drom implicitly believed — to some private instructions from the petulant individual who lurched along by his side, than she was lost to view in a thick bank of cloud that appeared to have rolled across the valley especially to meet her.

The vast crowd of people had already begun to thin out a little. The overlapping waves of excitement, caused first by the news about Teleri's ravished grave, and then by the counsellor's redemption of Blodeuwedd, had perceptibly died down. The owl's flapping wings and its wild "tu-who!" had been lost in the flower-born girl's recaptured love cry and her enchanted leap into the abiding heaven of the unsatisfied; and for a while this wave-tossing psychic tide of blind reaction and blinder counter-reaction was enjoying the rare sensation of a complete lull in its alternate ebb and flow.

But Sibylla Gwyddyles was the reverse of pleased to observe the relief upon Rhun's furrowed countenance when this lull began, and to note how the relapse into equilibrium of that disturbed soul-sea seemed to answer some psychic need in the rugged Brythonic warriors about her. That it answered no such need in her own "anima Gwyddyles" led her to suspect that the daughter of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles was equally immune to the lulling sorcery of pardon and peace.

And when, having intercepted Morgant and the druid's brother on their way to obtain food and fuel for the Avanc's Cave, she had interpreted this move according to her own instinctive ways and had decided that the daughter of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles was up to some crafty game, she made up her mind to arouse new wrath between Christian and heathen.

With this intent she hurriedly sent round word, leaving Rhun to think what he liked and do what he pleased, to all the ragtag crew who had gathered round the ruined memories of the Modrybedd, calling upon them to chant the forest people's death dirge. Einion ab Iddawc was dead, who was the son of the oldest of the princesses. Why then hadn't it been heard, that dark, ominous, perilous, reckless lilt, that with its insane despair wailing over the rocks and morasses had discomforted the Gwyddylaid themselves, when, thousands of years ago, they hewed their way into the forests with their bronze swords, while the carrion crows croaked over the slain: "Touch wood! Touch wood! Touch wood!"?

The rapid darkening of the landscape by the obscuring of the moon brought the scattered red flames of the torches into relief; and it was from flame to flame of these fiery squadrons that this dirge-wail of flight and disaster now came rising and falling upon the wind, and as it swelled in volume it mounted in fury, and as it mounted in fury it gathered to itself the power to sweep the whole mass of men and women along with it.

And the heart of its effect was upon the young. It stirred the spirit of young girls with every kind of emotion. It stirred the spirit of young men with every kind of passion; and as it stirred them it swept them all in the same direction, that is to say, from southeast to northwest, from the direction of the three peaks of Cader Idris in the direction of the three familiar clefts or indents in the rounded bosom of the Gaer.

The dirge-wail of the forest people had already been a menace and a peril to three successive waves of formidable invaders. All these invaders had sought to suppress it. Every subsequent settled government had sought to suppress it. It was the lilt, the rhythm, the tune that set free the imprisoned devils of centuries and let the buried fires loose; for as the language changed with the years the actual words came to mean little or nothing. It was possible to chant it or to wail it or to shriek it to any words! In vain had the House of Cunedda, with its association with the Romans and later with its association with the emperor, struggled to stamp out this life cry, death cry, earth cry, of the forest people!

For into it had been dropped, somewhere, sometime, somehow, far back in the darkness of prehistory, drops from the terrible semen of Uranus, when the sky above all things was divided from its mother below all things, and its voice could never be altogether hushed.

At least Morfydd was not left alone to watch the impact of it now upon the inflammable people she was destined to rule, for, apart from Lot-el-Azziz, her staunchest and faithfullest supporters, Gwythyr and Nesta ferch Aulus, were with her. With Gwythyr at her right and Nesta at her left, and with the Hebrew doctor peering into his horn of Moses, as if it had the power — and perhaps it had — of magnifying things seen as well as things heard, just behind her, Morfydd could afford to contemplate with equanimity the way the priest and Euronwy — like a black and a white idol washed from a temple court in a flood — were bobbing stiffly and gravely up and down as the rush of the people swept them across the marketplace towards the river.

It had become necessary for Rhun to use his sword hilt as if it were a dagger to extricate himself and Sibylla from the excited pressure of their superstitious adherents. It soon became clear however as Morfydd directed her own little group of more respectable retainers towards the ferry of Rhyd-y-Gaer, where a freed Greek slave from the camp at Uriconium, whose name had been Brythonized into “Non Hen,” earned a farthing, or a hatling, a time for the use of his barge, that the more Christian and consequently the better-armed of the Gosgordd, who had already crossed the old wooden bridge known as Pons Castrum, had carried off with them most of the torches; and this, for the moon was now totally lost under the rolling masses of piled-up clouds, left nothing but a few flickering lanterns, jerked about on poles, to illumine the riverbank at this less frequented spot.

Here they found, impatiently protesting at the extremely long pause made by Non Hen on the Gaer side of the river, none other than the Henog of Dyfed. The Henog was seated on a not altogether uncomfortable bench which old experience had taught the ferryman to provide for his own use on both riverbanks; but as it was too dark to read or write, this greatest artist in words since Homer was fain to sit crouched up like a malevolent toad, flinging curse after curse across the dark-flowing tide.

No sooner however had Morfydd and her companions arrived on the scene than the situation between the two old figures seated in the darkness, with what looked like Time itself flowing between them, began to come to a head and at the same time began to resolve itself. But as with many another crisis the solution introduced new complications.

Although Non Hen's century of autumns in a barbarous Ultima Thule had removed from him much of the ordinary intelligence and not a little of the ordinary appearance of a human being, he could recognize a princess even of an isle like this without the aid of any stronger light than a few waving lanterns. Hastily he rose up; hastily he clambered into his vessel; hastily he plunged his pole into the bank.

But so hastily did he plunge it, and so contrary to his usual habit and custom was this haste, that an event occurred out of all memory and experience in his life as a ferryman. His pole stuck fast. Nothing that he could do was able to release it; and ere long, indicating the uselessness of further effort by a resigned waving of his hands in the air, he sat down in the barge and awaited the progress of events.

“Gwythyr,” said Morfydd, “you’d better go round by the bridge and help him. We’ll all wait here.”

“I’m not going,” she thought, “to risk being caught by Euronwy on my way to that grave,” and she resolutely pressed her knuckles against the place where the unstrung snail shells were scratching and tickling her skin.

But it was easier to say “We’ll all wait here” than to do it with any degree of patience; and as she stood there by Nesta’s side, wondering how soon the Henog would lift up his head, or raise his eyes, or make any move to offer her his seat, or to salute her as his hostess, an extremely worrying thought rushed like a rat across her mind: “What if the whole kitchen and scullery and buttery up yonder have decamped to the funeral and let all the fires go out as they did that day after the Saeson were gone, when the emperor was with us?”

But worries about the kitchen and about what she might see in Teleri’s grave were soon thrust into the background as she shared with Nesta the latter’s warm Etrurian cloak; and into the same background she now drove away that disturbing incident of Blodeuwedd and the owl. “It’s better,” she decided, “not to try to explain things like that! Morvran always used to say some people can make people see things that aren’t there at all.” And then it was that her consciousness was suddenly submerged by the thought of Porius. “Is there any chance,” she said to herself, “that the emperor may send Porius back when he hears of all the trouble his nephew’s been making? No! No chance at all! What’s the matter with me? All the emperor cares for is getting rid of the Saeson; and there’s none can help him in that like Porius.”

Meanwhile in Nesta's head, though they were so close together that the wavy hair of the one touched the curly hair of the other, a totally different landscape took shape, a landscape in which the philosophical Gwythyr had been enabled to arrange, without compromising his principles and as a sort of revolutionary Maecenas under the emperor, every aspect of the lives of all the uncommon ones among the common people.

"Master Henog!" It cannot be denied that Morfydd cried out his name in a more ringing voice than was quite necessary; but she was growing weary of watching the reflections in the river thrown by the swaying lanterns behind her and of speculating upon which of the self-absorbed old men, one on each side of the stream, the erratic flicker would fall next.

Her voice must have had at that moment a quite vicious "carrying" quality, for the aged Greek jerked himself to his feet and ran his fingers up and down the middle of his embedded pole as though her words had been adhesive projectiles smeared with corrosive acid.

And the Henog also got up, though with more deliberation. "Did you address me, Princess? Your husband invited me. My stomach drives me. My imagination reproaches me. My hunger and thirst offer sacrifice within me to my invention and your husband's intention. I gave up attending the late prince's funeral so as not to miss the well-cooked meats of your famous Gaer table. I gave up pouring out wine to the dead so as not to miss—"

"Master Doctor!" Once more her voice rang out so resonantly clear that the ancient ferryman on the further side of the Divine River experienced a second shock. This time, in place of causing him to stroke his embedded pole, it made him collapse again on the edge of his barge.

But Lot-el-Azziz had stepped forward and was bending attentively now by the two young female heads that emerged from Nesta's warm mantle.

"Please explain to our honoured guest, Master Doctor, that the barge will be with us in a minute. Better both of you sit down. Nesta and I are all right as we are."

And so once more as the sacred water gurgled and swallowed and whimpered and splashed and moaned past them, and while the lantern lights caused to leap into momentary vision whirling and swirling gobbets of snow-white foam, Morfydd was able, warmed by the warmth of Nesta's nearness, and Nesta was able, warmed by the warmth of Morfydd's nearness, to tell themselves stories of the future triumphs of their men.

Thus occupied they took as little notice of the deep-toned discussion that soon rose between the doctor and the Henog as they did of the jests and cries and arguments in which the armed lantern bearers behind them were indulging.

"But if you," asseverated the Henog, observing with puzzled interest the heroic efforts the doctor was making to stop himself each time his hand mechanically went up to his black velvet cap, for the poor man had still to contend with that old curst compulsion to tug at his tender topknot, "persist in dragging in Aristotle and Plato in defence of your one eternal perfect model of a universe in the mind of your one eternal First Cause, why isn't it lawful for me to refer to the indestructible elements of Empedocles, the everlasting numbers of Pythagoras, and the well-hooked atoms of Democritus? And if you say the ultimate reality is the One, and I say it is the Many, who is there who can decide between us?"

But it was as if the black tide, full of gurglings and suckings and moanings, lit up by flickering points of lanternlight and bearing on its rapidly moving surface circles and triangles and squares of chance-drawn patterns of swirling foam, did its best to suggest to these disputatious potamogetoi, or "river neighbours," that though it might be impossible for the human brain to imagine such things it was still within the bounds of possibility that the ultimate reality was neither One nor Many, nor even a mysterious mingling of them both, however much helped out, so a few riverbed gurglings seemed to interject, by the Holy Trinity, but was something completely and absolutely different.

“You seem to have completely misunderstood,” retorted the doctor, “every word I said. I wasn’t thinking of such phantasmagoric make-believes as One, or Two, or Three, or Four, or as-many-as-you-like-ad-infinitum. I was thinking of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of how all that playacting we were watching just now, all those magpie tricks of owls and maidens, of dapple-grey horses and outraged sepulchres, would have been torn to fragments at the voice of his thunder and shattered to bits at the shock of his lightning. I was thinking how, while in the depths of our own souls, which is the only force we know from the inside, we feel a power capable of... capable of—”

“Of giving piles to the Philistines!” interrupted the Henog.

But all the doctor did to him under that confused light of a moon heaped over by mountainous cloud ridges and mocked by nodding lanterns was to turn towards him with both hands from where he held it on his knees the round orifice of his indispensable ram’s horn.

“Capable,” he cried, “while you sons of Japhet draw your triangles and measure your paradigms and cast your horoscopes and conjure up your owl girls, capable of tossing continents into the air from whose scattered fragments cataracts of liquid fire will pour down and from whose shaggy promontories great forests will hang head downwards by their roots!”

His raised hand got as far as his chin, but he remembered his vow and dropped it. “Capable,” he burst out again in a still louder tone, “of flinging cascading oceans sky high; yes! oceans full of deep-sea whales, whose lashing tails will curve like tight-strung bows as they fly upward; yes! and full too of vast sea serpents who will wriggle like sand eels and tie themselves in squirming and slithering knots as the Lord of Hosts makes them fly upwards — all, all, all under the invincible power of his might!”

The Henog was clearly impressed by the emotion that might have come direct from the sands of the Red Sea to the banks of Rhyd-y-Gaer. Bent low over his ram’s horn was the doctor now; and very slowly the Henog rose to his feet and passing behind the two women persuaded, after a moment’s explanation, one of the young men to remove the lantern from his pole.

With this in his possession he hurried back to their bench. Seated there again by the doctor’s side he hurriedly opened his tablets and without a moment’s hesitation wrote rapidly a sentence of about a dozen words. As he did this the light of the borrowed lantern flashed up and down the dark figure of his companion; but neither he nor anyone else followed the antics of this lantern, and it thus remained unknown — unless the God of Abraham was as omnipresent as he was powerful — that a strange tribal homesickness affected at that moment the heart of the father of Magog so that a tear as salt as if it had come from the Dead Sea fell upon the ram’s horn.

And in like manner, unless Pryderi the son of Pwyll Pen Annwn had been present in the form of a minute half-dead autumnal moth that fell from the edge of the lantern upon his tablet, it is certain that it will never be known what particular sentence it was, written as a retort to the all-powerful god of the desert, that the Henog, with his insanely intense and incorruptible concentration on the mystery of words, inserted in the portion of Pryden’s life on which he was just then engaged, namely, the god’s imprisonment by some sort of devil in official sheep’s wool who fastened the mynordd, or “door knocker,” of hell’s headquarters securely round his neck.

But there was a simultaneous stir now on both banks of the river, for Gwythyr had arrived at the ferryman's side and the barge was moving across the stream.

"I hear," whispered the doctor to the Henog as they both stepped back behind the two young women, "that the High Prince of Surluse has returned to the camp and brought with him a famous Gallic poet. Is this true, Master? And may I also ask, Master, how it is that you are on this side of the river at all? Didn't you come from the camp?"

"Certainly. But I crossed to see what was going on and then decided that since I was to sup at the Gaer I'd be wiser to await you all here."

The youth from whom the lantern had been borrowed, now that the ladies were already seated in the barge, withdrew it gently from under the Henog's arm and having rehung it on his pole assisted the two men to take their places.

"You were writing something?" enquired the doctor.

"Only my life of a local deity whose name in your moral manner you would probably interpret as 'Sorrow the son of Wisdom.'"

"How do you interpret it?" asked the other.

But in the confusion of their scrambling up the bank and of paying the ferryman, some very carefully murmured words that appeared to the puzzled doctor to resemble the dissolving river foam that was floating away from the barge pole, words that suggested that a woman's fancy, a breath of chance, a touch of magic, and a fluttering leaf could make both wisdom and sorrow cry aloud for their old grandad folly, were lost in the night.

But the doctor and the Henog were destined to forget their dispute sooner than they expected; for as they followed Morfydd and Nesta up the familiar Gaer path, and would soon be reaching the outskirts of the graveyard where Teleri lay, they were witnesses of a scene so agitating that it swept both the Lord of Hosts and the Lord of Annwn out of their minds.

The path that led to the main eastern gate from Rhyd-y-Gaer was joined, just before reaching the graveyard, by the path that came up from the old wooden bridge; and at this point, whether by chance or by intention, Morfydd and Nesta, along with Gwythyr and a few Gosgordd friends of his, were met fair and square on the open hillside by Rhun and Sibylla with a much larger though a much more ragged crowd of followers.

No one in either of the opposed groups took the least notice of the dark forms of the doctor and Henog who, like a lean and observant pair of old devils, might have decided to travel together through the world, to collect support, the one for the totalitarian and the other for the pluralistic college of the Via Perdita of the Infernal City. But the doctor thought, "Surely the Lord will manage better when Magog is grown up," and the Henog thought, "Something tragic and heroic and beautiful and crazy is bound to happen now. Oh, if I can catch it for future generations I shall die happy!"

Fate had decided that at least the moon that night was to have no share in the responsibility for the issue of this encounter; for from zenith to horizon in all the four quarters of the sky dark clouds concealed her from view. This did not mean, however, that the mingling of light and darkness on this eastern slope of the Gaer that night was the same as if the strange influence of that mirror of madness had been entirely absent. There was an interfusion of a ghostly element in the soft autumnal airs that moved and met and parted and met again round the bare shoulders of that grassy promontory, suspended there in eternal vigilance above the concourse of four famous valleys, each of which advanced out of the unknown, and each of which retreated into the unknown, like four immemorial messengers, whose messages were monotonously the same and yet majestically different; and even this ghostly element, carried up and down by these soft airs and enlarged by these messenger valleys, was experienced in oddly various ways by everyone there; but to all it was more like an odour, a taste, a feeling, than it was like a visual thing.

"Think well what you are going to do, Morfydd ferch Brochvael!" cried Rhun in a voice Morfydd had never heard him use before. But she remembered even at that crucial moment in a lightning flash of Time's lantern just exactly where she had heard that particular tone. It was when she was a very young child and had come to spend the day with Alarch the Fair, her father's sister, in that old house that had been half pulled to pieces and half incorporated in the new church buildings, and the voice that uttered it wasn't the voice of the small Rhun, who was fixing a bowstring to his first ash bow, nor was it the voice of the still smaller Porius who, with his hand in his mother's, was observing with puckered brow and shy but intense concentration the appearance of his infant cousin.

It was the voice of Gwrnach, Rhun's father, the son of the Greek slave; and it rang out now across this ascent to the old fortress with the accent of some young Spartan shouting a terrible threat to Andromache across the Scaean gate!

Morfydd moved forward to meet him, while Nesta and Gwythyr followed close behind; whereas Sibylla noticeably held back among their outlawlike band of retainers, whose appearance caused the question to shoot through Morfydd's mind: "Was it pure wicked mischief in me to send the druid's brother to the Avanc's Cave? Have I got from Mother that same vein of devilish revenge in me that Sibylla's got from the Gwyddylaid of the Gwern?" Her own voice was quite calm though her heart was beating fast as she made her reply.

“Rhun, Rhun! I’m going to do nothing but find out whether anyone’s been meddling with this girl’s body. Till Porius comes back I’m in my place here and am alone responsible to the emperor. You know what that priest wants done, and I should have thought it would be as monstrous and inhuman to you as it is to me. He wants her body thrown out of the graveyard and treated like... like those who’ve committed the worst kind of bestiality! If the emperor’s nephew has outraged this corpse, as both Gwrgi and Canna swear he has, it’s Porius’s business — that’s to say, it’s my business — to refuse to have him within the boundaries of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy; and if he won’t leave, to hunt him down like a dangerous beast and put him to death.

“We both of us know this woman, and Euronwy ferch Porius Manlius knows her as well as we do. She’s been queer in her mind ever since we’ve known her. It’s cruel and monstrous of this new priest who knows our customs, for he served in our halls, to do this thing. Rhun, Rhun, you know perfectly well he would destroy Mithras, and all that belongs to Mithras, out of the land, if he dared! You know as well as I do that if Einion ab Iddawc were still alive, or if Porius hadn’t been wanted by the emperor, Prince Medrawd would never have dared to come here at all!

“What am I going to do? I’m going to do justice, as the wife of Porius ab Einion, in the land he rules in his father’s stead! That’s what I’m going to do, Rhun ap Gwrnach, and nothing and no one can stop me.

“Rhun, Rhun! Be reasonable, my Rhun! We’ve known each other from our childhood. We understand each other. We both love Porius. Mithras is as much in danger from this priest as Pryderi and Pwyll and Rhiannon and Manawyddan. This priest is a friend of that horrible devil, Gwydion the son of Don. I needn’t remind you who else he’s a friend of! That other one, that demon Minnawc Gorsant! The one who worked up those pious assassins to murder Morvran!

“Rhun, my dear friend Rhun, Porius’s second self, faithful soldier of Mithras, surely in this struggle for the liberty of all of us from the tyranny of Christ, you are not going to take the wrong side? Hasn’t Ogof-y-Gawr always been a llys of the forest people? And what of the dead Modrybedd? Which side would they take? Would they take the side of a priest of Christus Romanus against a woman, against the ghost of a woman, against the violated corpse of a woman, against the outraged grave of a woman?

“Which side would Auntie Tonwen take and her friend the son of the Blessed One? Would she let a Christian priest throw a woman’s body to the crows? Rhun, Rhun, I beg of you, my friend, my more than... than cousin, stand by me in this thing!”

The doctor and the Henog who had been hovering together side by side on the edge of the circle of light thrown by three separate torches among the Ogof-y-Gawr people and by one single lantern in the hands of Morfydd’s friends, and who to the less involved members of either group must have appeared like a couple of supernatural beings deposited by some magic power upon that familiar slope, were so greatly moved by something in the girl’s appeal, in the special tone of it, and in the slight gesture accompanying her final words, which she made with her right arm and her right hand, that they instinctively moved forward to her support.

So also did one of the oldest and most dilapidated of the hangers-on of Ogof-y-Gawr, a dwarf called Erb, who answered to the name of Paun Bach, or the “Little Peacock,” but who was able to bring with him just then to Morfydd’s aid something more important than his own size or strength, namely, a large, flaming, and well-oiled torch.

And it was by the light of this flaring illumination — for the Little Peacock was an adept at handling it so that its smoke never obscured its blaze — that the Henog and the doctor beheld what then occurred.

Something in her voice, that seemed to force its way through the obstacles that deadened it, resembled the heart-stricken gasp with which Porius had begun his recital of those monstrous Cewri words. For any record of other resemblances you would have to search page by page through the Book of Annwn, that Plutonian chronicle of all the invocations of mankind which have been totally, helplessly, and absolutely forgotten, save when one of those infinitesimally tiny insects, smaller than lice, who are bred in the scalp of the Mother of the Muses, is, once perhaps in every hundred years, caught between its pages.

But so it was now, under that flaring torch of the Little Peacock, that Rhun, hit to the heart, he too, by that vibration in her voice and by that broken and fragmentary gesture of her arm and her hand, made several steps forward towards her.

But Sibylla was too quick for him. With a bound she was upon him, and with one arm twisted tight round his legs she was on the ground behind him and with the other was clutching desperately at any stalk or tuft of bracken that offered itself to her wildly groping fingers.

It was perhaps fortunate for Sibylla, and — who can tell? — perhaps in the end fortunate for Rhun, that it was the Henog and not the doctor that under the blaze of the Little Peacock's torch caught a glimpse of Rhun's face.

Lot-el-Azziz was, for all his science, a hot-blooded child of the desert. Besides he knew not the animal-like cunning of that royal tribe of Brythons, nor the heroic ferocity of the Gwyddylaid of the Alder Swamp. So that the chances were that had he seen what the Henog saw at that moment in Rhun's face he would have rushed forward and interfered.

But the Henog had disciplined himself for half a century in restraining all emotions, save the emotional idea of getting his emotions completely out of the way, while he forced those eidola we call "words" to become dumb transparencies through which the lovely and terrible grotesqueries of the reality beyond words should be suggested by words and seen as he — the dedicated medium between man and man's life on earth — was allowed to see them.

Thus the Henog, even at that fearful moment, relucted at interfering with chance or destiny or the divine mystery of the feminine heart, when he beheld Morfydd fling one deadly look at the clinging figure on the ground, turn her back to Rhun, and, with a brief command to the torch-bearing dwarf to stay at her side, start to climb the rest of the slope towards the graveyard.

All about her, straining and scrambling, pushing and whispering, turning their heads and making covert signs to one another, went her little band; Nesta and Gwythyr, with a consideration that the observant old chronicler failed not to miss, keeping well behind, and keeping also a sharp eye upon the Ogof-y-Gawr crowd they were leaving.

But that motley crew had stopped in total confusion. Sibylla, on her feet again, was shouting at them excitedly, but it was clear that, in their disorganized uproar, they were not listening.

There was no torch near the athletic figure of Rhun. Nor was such a light any further necessary as far as the Henog was concerned. That conjurer with words had seen what he had seen and was already pondering what words he would use to set it down. His method was to get these same troublesome words gathered and scattered, sifted and collected, like a flock of sheep by an imaginative sheepdog, till every ledge in the mental clawdd poncen of his vision — that "upland dyke" connecting what he sees with all its associated ideas — fluttered with those magical wisps of wool out of which alone the many-coloured coat of the essential reality he sought could be woven.

And now the great chronicler was helped beyond all hope by the simple-natural man whose bewildered confounding he had just witnessed. For though it was impossible for him to see Rhun's face, which was still turned towards the retreating torch of the Little Peacock, he had by this time moved up so close to him that he could hear what he was saying. For Rhun was talking to someone, though there was no one, as far as Rhun knew, to hear what he said.

Totally unaware of the Henog's presence, he went on staring after that hill-climbing, red-flaming torch, surrounded by those excited figures, among whom, though only at moments, and first one and then the other, could be discerned the two women.

But Rhun was talking, not to Morfydd, but to Porius. He was obstinately, blunderingly, and with many repetitions, explaining to Porius on what grounds he had undertaken the task of being the successor of the Three Aunties; and how it was that, being now practically married to Sibylla, he could not desert her, even to help Morfydd against the priest.

But in the midst of his explanation, apparently addressed to an invisible Porius through whose transparent body could be seen that red meteoric flare, whose far-tossed column of smoke was lost in the darkness as it paused at the entrance to the graveyard, Rhun became aware of two obstinately repeated sounds that were battering against his ear from opposite directions, one from due north and one from due south. The southern one was from only a few yards away in fact from Sibylla, and it desired him, in no uncertain terms, to turn round and rejoin her; but the other one came down the slope from the animal stockade where there were steers and heifers, a stockade which had been relegated, in the casual use-and-wont habits of the centuries, to a cuplike hollow in the shoulder of the promontory just outside the fortress's massive walls and closely adjoining the graveyard.

From here there now floated down the slope, to the ears of Rhun and to the ears of the Henog, the lamentable complaint of some agitated steer, who either had its own troubles to confide to the hidden moon or had simply been disturbed by Paun Bach's unusual torch. And thus there was flung like a stone from a sling into the soul of the astounded storyteller his final problem concerning this weird encounter.

For quite clearly and unmistakably he now heard, proceeding from the lips of that paralyzed figure, the following blasphemous words, words uttered quietly and in a low voice and with the puzzled hurt tone of an indignant little boy: "Mithras, Mithras! Why hast thou forsaken me?"

But, after that, Rhun shook his head; shook it to the left with three little jerks, shook it to the right without any more jerks, and then went down as silently to join Sibylla as the Henog went up to join Morfydd.

But the Henog thought as he went: "It was that red flame and the noise of that bullock. Why can't I pray to Pryderi as well as write about him, as the priest prays to Jesus, the Jew to Jehovah, and this madman to his Dog-and-Bull sun god? I know Pryderi's as much a god as Jesus or Jehovah, and a good deal more of one than Mithras. Why then can't I pray to him? Is it because I know him too well? Is it easier to worship foreign gods and gods we don't know? Is that why the Romans have deserted Mercury and Venus for Jesus and Mary?"

Stumbling and slipping in the deep-trenched cart tracks of this century-old ascent, and feeling as if he were swallowing with each breath a peculiar certainty of the presence of the invisible moon, just as if that far-floating ether-poised luminary on the further side of the cloud roof had been a vast orb of overripe autumnal fruit diffusing a supernatural fragrance, to breathe which was like inhaling the sweet and secret madness of a calm interior illumination, this querulous chronicler of a god who was too well known to be worshipped arrived at the graveyard.

Here the torches and lanterns and raised voices, and the wild-tossed reflections of fire upon bronze and iron, and the overlapping of distorted shadows and angry human faces, drove both Mithras and Pryderi out of the Henog's mind. From where he paused on the outskirts of the opposing groups he couldn't see any new-made grave. In fact the crowd was so thick that he couldn't see any grave at all. But he saw a compact phalanx of well-armed Brythonic spearmen with the dangerous excitement of religious fanaticism in their faces, and, confronting them, Morfydd and Nesta, with Gwythyr and a few other faithful ones.

And as he stood there in weary and anxious concern rather than agitation it struck the Henog that there was real danger of a bloody conflict breaking out among these graves. The Henog was not an excitable man and he was a man who possessed at a crisis a rather startling power of self-control, but the incredible words he had heard Rhun utter had upset him; and here he was confronted, even in the midst of these graves by just the same sort of rumbling thunder.

He had trained himself to hold all his stronger emotions in control — and this accounted for his increasing peevishness and querulousness over minor contradictions — but as he thought of Rhun's feeling for Mithras and of the stark bedrock gulf yawning here now before his face between the friends of the daughter of the sceptical Brochvael and these fierce young soldiers of Christ burning with the certainty that theirs was the secret of life he felt that he had been left behind.

"My gods," he said to himself, "have never demanded these final intensities and absolute devotions. They have been magical and magnanimous. They have been faithful to their friends, but they have never divided the world into opposed camps of the good and the evil."

He shivered. He had sweated as he climbed the slope; but now he felt as if a score of underground passages were breathing out mortal chills upon him. Various disquieting memories of certain hints he'd had from Brother John, who declared he'd had them from Pelagius, about the Eleusinian Mysteries began to trouble his mind. There were no Mysteries, surely, of that sort in connection with Annwn or Caer Sidi?

But his uneasiness and discomfort increased. He imagined that he could smell breaths of charnel-house corruption reaching him from underground in wafture after wafture of dissolution and decomposition.

"Surely," he told himself, "whatever Brother John might have fancied in his death fever or might have heard Pelagius fancying in his death fever, the Classic Mysteries were like our Festival of the Sowing, the very opposite of purity, chastity, sanctity, and holiness."

Once more he shivered. And once more he experienced that uneasy feeling of being left behind. "Curse it all!" he said to himself, "I'm not bound to accept Myrddin Wyllt's nonsense about the future because I'm writing his life, nor am I bound to un-deify Pryderi because he had another god's door knocker hung round his neck. Are there to be no gods at all except the sort who fight against Nature and follow chastity and purity and holiness?"

He suddenly began to feel a petulant irritation with Porius for having left his wife at this crucial hour. “If the man’s not a coward,” he thought, “he’s an imbecile! This girl will never get those fanatical young madmen to get out of her way or do what she wants.”

The uneasy Henog was not the only one in that place who hesitated about the issue of this conflict. Gwythyr himself began to feel more than a little doubtful.

But Morfydd continued confident, though attempt after attempt to make these young images of implacable resolution stir from their stand round that open grave had already failed. But she alone knew the secret cause of her confidence. She had suddenly become convinced that the power of the emperor’s counsellor was upon her and the magic of his presence was about her, for something had happened when she first reached the spot that to the end of her days she would never forget.

She and Nesta had outrun the rest and reached Teleri’s violated grave before that half-dozen of formidably well-armed warrior-Christians, hurriedly despatched by the priest, had appeared on the scene at all. The grave had hardly been filled in when the appalling sacrilege was committed, and Teleri’s body, covered with what old Canna had wrapped round her and with what must have been Medrawd’s own mantle, lay on its side only about six inches down.

The two young women met with no difficulty in uncovering the face of the corpse; but what Morfydd saw, when with her excited fingers clutching at the unstrung snail shells in her bosom she lifted the wrapping from the girl’s throat, was the thing that gave her — with a shock that she was never able, even to Porius, to describe adequately — this supernatural confidence. For there, neatly folded under the girl’s chin, lay the string of snail shells which she herself had tied round one of the owl girl’s braids!

From where he stood, however, the weary and dejected Henog couldn't even see the half-empty grave in which the body of Teleri, wrapped about once more in the cloak of the emperor's nephew, lay in untroubled peace, as indifferent to all that had happened as it was indifferent to all that did not happen. It had been this indifference — too extreme to be called contemptuous and too elemental to be called remote — that had caused Morfydd, when Nesta was preparing to mend the broken thread and to lift up the dead girl's head to place it round her neck, to insist on leaving both the strung and the unstrung shells just as they were, heaped together between the cold chin and the cold breasts, to insist on wrapping the necrophiliast's cloak once more around her, and finally to insist on climbing, without further delay, out of the grave, so as to be ready to resist with equanimity any further attack upon the abysmally indifferent dead either by the righteous or the unrighteous.

Sick of the whole business of being the prose Homer of Ynys Prydein the Henog of Dyfed, not in sardonic irony but in a mood of weary, only half-serious, totally irresponsible experiment, did what he had never done in his life before and what Brother John certainly would have assured him nobody of their generation was ever likely to do again. He prayed, and prayed in definite, articulate, though absolutely silent words, to Pryderi son of Pwyll Pen Annwn that Morfydd ferch Brochvael ab Iddawc might work her will upon events, whatever that will, when she discovered in herself what it was, might turn out to be.

It was certainly curious how confident Morfydd herself felt, against all appearances, that she would have her way. Three times, with all the menacing dignity and grave authority she could assume, she had implored these men, who, with their polished battle spears and bull's-hide shields and their young faces aflame with fanaticism in the torchlight, stood staring in front of them like a row of bronze statues, to get back to the Gaer and attend the banquet, the hour for which had already long passed.

But her entreaties had been of no avail. What made the situation harder for her was that'none of these young men seemed to be the leader. She just knew their faces by sight, but that was all. Living at Ty Cerrig she had had no opportunity to become personally acquainted with any of them, and though treating her with respect as the new Lady of the Gaer she felt they regarded her authority in moral matters as of less weight than the antennae of a butterfly. They had told her when they first appeared what the priest's commands had been. They were to keep watch, fasting as they were, till all but themselves had left the spot. Then they were to remove the body, carry it to the bank of the river, dismember it as the Church decreed devil-possessed witches should be dismembered, and cast its remnants into the water.

The weary and disheartened Henog felt his indignation on her behalf increasing in proportion as he realized more and more fully the hopelessness of the situation. And if the Church, in the person of this autocratic young priest, overcame her now, what hope would there be for her in the future if her husband continued absent? How could she possibly resist the combined power of Euronwy and the Church?

But the astonishing young woman seemed certain she would win in the end. What on earth gave her this confidence? It hadn't occurred to her — that was certain — to utter, even in silence, experimental prayers to Pryderi.

What followed remained indeed for the Henog of Dyfed, observing all this beneath a sky where piled-up, overlapping clouds, ridges upon ridges of them, couldn't prevent something from the full moon — the gods alone knew what — pouring down upon this primeval fortress of Rhitta Gawr, what followed remained for this honest and bewildered chronicler, this disillusioned old adept in the difficult art of word hunting and the still more difficult art of god hunting, an experience he wouldn't have missed for all the Pedeir Sarnau, or "four sacred steps," that lead to that "seat in Caer Sidi" which he felt in his heart of hearts was his by right whatever that boy might say, or that Jew, or even Myrddin Wyllt himself; for this was an experience that confirmed him, tired and disenchanted as he was and weary as he was in his whole trade of chronicling life, confirmed him in his certainty that there was no such thing as a "One God," or a "One Absolute Being," but that life was an everlasting succession of many worlds and of innumerable creative and destructive gods and demigods. This night was indeed one of the nights that gave the Henog of Dyfed the culminating inspiration of his life, the inspiration that enabled him to go on to extreme old age polishing, revising, and adding more and yet more to the "four branches" of his prose poem concerning Pryderi.

And yet while he stood there on the edge of an angrily murmuring crowd, that seemed to need only a word from their new princess to fling themselves like wild cats against that little line of pointed spears and implacable profiles, he was so tired out, both mentally and physically, as to feel sceptical about every solid fact, and every rational explanation of every solid fact, offered to his attention. He was so tired that he began to feel a little light-headed. Petulant and querulous rather than unhappy, he felt as if the whole panorama of this fantastic scene were a dream within a dream!

Light-headed was the precise word, and he knew it was, for what he felt about this crazy spectacle, and about these human dolls who took their gestures, and the stage on which they made their gestures, so portentously! What absurd nonsense it all was! Why couldn't people see that the whole business was a lively, amusing, horrible comical, pitiful, cruel Incomprehensibility! For that was what it was. Not a tragedy, for it was too pitiful. Not a farce, for it was too cruel. Not a mystery, for the physical was too thick, and our capacity for response to everything else too quickly at its limit.

It clearly couldn't be very serious or matter very much. We were all comparatively soon dead; and meanwhile life could be deliciously pleasant and appallingly unpleasant. It could be endurable. It could be unendurable. It could be first the one and then the other. Good and evil in it were hopelessly mixed up, as also were justice and injustice.

An Incomprehensibility — that's the only word for it! And what applies to men applies to the gods also. "If I could magic myself into an eagle of Zeus and carry all these people up through those black clouds into the moonlight on my wings, would I do it?" he thought. "No, I would not do it! Why should I do it?"

It would only be from one incomprehensible dream into another! "It certainly is incredible," so the thoughts of the light-headed Henog ran on, "how that girl can go on being so sure of herself, and so sure she can outwit those savage infants. If I stay here much longer I'll be growing into a bard like young Taliesin! God! But those boys under that fiery torch look like a ring of blood-red roses! How about 'The Ring of Life,' my philosophical Doctor, as a subject for a philosophical poem? But what, in the devil's name, are you up to now?"

For he had suddenly become conscious that the begetter of Magog was making extraordinary noises through his ram's horn; was treating it, in fact, as if it really were a musical instrument. "Well," thought the exhausted Henog, looking vaguely round for a grave on which he could sit down, "I'll show the boy-bard he's not the only one who can tap out tunes.

"But what's the doctor doing now? Calling on Jehovah to scatter these cherubs? The ring! The ring! The ring! I can make rhymes for 'The Ring of Life' as well as another!

Make it and don't let it make you!
Wear it and don't let it wear you!
Leave it and don't let it leave you!
Let the last word that's uttered between you
Be yours on it, not its upon you!
Bendigeitfran! But I want my supper!"

At this point the Little Peacock, seized with a bold idea of his own, felt it advisable — in spite of the blazing torch he held — to turn his head so as to get some notion of the number of people that Gwythyr and Nesta could count on to make a concerted attack on these pious young gladiators supposing it happened that some unimportant and easily spared person felt a crazy impulse to gather an armful of spears into his own body, making thereby a yawning gap in that formidable half circle!

In the process of counting the crowd he perceived the tall dark form of the Henog hovering waveringly behind the rest; and at the moment he did so he saw the man totter and stoop and sink on his knees and begin groping on all fours in the dim, down-trodden, ghost-coloured grass. The truth was that feeling faint from want of food, dizzy from the unusual task of composing rhymes, and confused by the amount of rich material for his art that kept pouring in when his winnowing flail was out of order, the unfortunate Henog had allowed to slip from his fingers to the ground a particular graphis, or "scribbling pen," with which he was accustomed to make hurried hieroglyphical jottings of special impressions; and for this precious tool of his trade he was now searching with a nervous, irritable, absorbed intensity, which reminded Paun Bach of the way he had once seen his mother go on making bread when the friends and enemies of Gorthevyr Bendigeit were slaughtering each other in the next hamlet.

He handed his torch to his nearest neighbour who gladly accepted it, thinking, as Paun Bach could clearly detect in the fellow's eye by the light of this same torch, that at any moment there might be a stampede from the spot and it might fall to his lot in the general confusion to find himself at his own door with this exceptionally good torch still in his hands.

But free now, and of slight stature as he was, it was easy for the little man to slip round the anxious crowd of Gwythyr's comrades, and approaching the groping and crawling Henog not only with a respectful whisper to join in his search, but, just as if he had brought his torch with him, to find the lost object.

And now, even while the tall man was bending down, almost as low as before, to murmur to the tiny creature what this help meant to him, Paun Bach interrupted him with an excited, "Hush, Master Henog! Listen!"

The Henog straightened his lean dark figure and proceeded to obey his small mentor. And assuredly if every eye in that surging and shouting crowd hadn't been fixed on the young princess and her antagonists there would have been a stir of derisive whispering and nudging, and of neighbour pointing out to neighbour the humorous effect of that tiny elfin figure staring across the river and compelling his tall companion to listen to some sound in the distance with the intensity of a horned lamb directing the attention of its mother ewe to some startling phenomenon. But the "tu-whit-tu-who!" came now quite distinct from across the river, so that the Little Peacock and the Henog of Dyfed weren't the only ones who heard it.

But the Henog soon became aware that the little man by his side had something more to communicate, for Paun Bach began tugging so hard at one of his long sleeves that the chronicler, who was feeling more and more dizzy and shaky, very nearly fell over, and though he regained his balance he had to bend down in an almost painful attempt to catch, amid the shouts and lurchings forward and back shufflings of the crowd, what the small creature was so anxious to tell him.

And indeed the dialogue that now ensued would have needed for its interpretation a person as learned in mythology as Ul-Kessar, or Julius Caesar, and even he would have had to glance now and again at his attendant druid. For what the Little Peacock was desperately trying to make clear to this tall dark tottering person was nothing less than the deep element of the inexplicable in the events of his own life, an element which he suddenly felt an upsurging longing to justify to at least one lonely scholar of Ynys Prydein as a thing that could endure the sifting and winnowing, the raking and shaking, of all the sciences of Greece and Rome without losing a single grain or drop of its original mystery!

The most striking of these experiences had had to do with this same owl-girl who had made the cruel Gwydion and his sharpshooting incestuous offspring, Llew, look a fine pair of fools by proving to them that though any clever god can create a woman no god can command the emotions of a woman's heart when once she is created. Sympathetic though he was with Paun Bach's notions of what constitutes the supernatural, as he listened to the little man's broken, interjected, and fragmentary words, reaching him on the fringe of that sullen crowd like the thin pattering of persistent rain through the rumblings of thunder and the groanings of branches, the exhausted historian had a dreamy feeling that these intermittent pattering drops of revelation, subhuman though they were, really did, in that Gaer graveyard, convey one at least of the magical secrets of life.

Peevishly disputing with Myrddin Wyllt, in favour of the past as against the future, whenever they met, and less awed by this mysterious being than any other man of Brythonic blood, Sylvanus Bleheris, Henog of Dyfed, was as fully convinced of the importance of magic as was its great practitioner.

And now as the crowd grew momently more agitated and as Morfydd's entreaties, addressed to that half circle of Christ-enchanted youths, grew obviously more hopeless, the thing the Henog did gather from the dwarf's words was indeed a thing most germane to the present situation, namely, that in this part of Edeyrnion what the pureblooded Brython feared more than anything else, feared in fact with panic-terror, was the hooting of an owl, and more — oh, much more — than its hooting, any near approach of the owl itself!

"No Silurian in Dyfed or Gwent," said the Henog to himself, as he listened with his empty stomach, his dizzy brain, his shaky legs, to the Little Peacock's impassioned revelations, "would believe such foolishness possible! There must be more Ffichtiaid blood, more Gwyddylaid blood, or — heaven alone knows — more Cewri blood — up here than there is with us in the—"

But he suddenly interrupted himself: "And more magic too!" And straightening his back with a groan he gazed down with genuine wonder on the pygmy at his side. For the little man had suddenly begun hooting like an owl; and, as he did so, not only did half the crowd swing round with a hoarse confusion of frightened cries, but the owl itself, obviously as completely fooled as the crowd, came flapping towards them.

And in good hour did it come; for to the faithful Gwythyr and Nesta it had begun to seem as though the end of this protracted psychic struggle over an outraged grave were at hand, and that good had been defeated by evil. Nor was it concealed from them, nor from Lot-el-Azziz either, that if the new Gaer Princess was defeated tonight it would be the Church of Rome and not the House of Cunedda who would rule Edeyrnion, and it would be the Church too who would henceforth decide for the people where lay the difference between the evil and the good.

What was it in Morfydd that enabled her, in face of all this, "not to yield," as el-Azziz told himself, "a jot or a tittle?" This was the question that Nesta hesitated not to ask Morfydd herself that night when she was leaving her in that very room where the now securely buried Teleri had given up the ghost.

And Morfydd could only reply in a variety of simple phrases all of which meant the same thing. "I just felt strong," she told Nesta. "I just felt as if they couldn't do us down." And then again: "No, I don't believe I thought of my husband, nor of my father. I don't believe I thought of anyone. I just knew that those half a dozen boys feeling so fierce and pious and noble, and not a single one of them without a secret temptation to ponder on what it would be like when the moment came for cutting up a girl's body as food for fishes — I tell you, Nesta, I just knew it! — those boys weren't a match for you and me!"

"But," Nesta went on pressing her, "but didn't you feel all was lost when Gwythyr's war cry failed and even the doctor failed?"

And hearing her like this, as their talk lingered on by the light of the Chimaera lamp, while they decided that since Gwythyr must be already fast asleep they could give themselves another five minutes, Morfydd wondered whether after all she was speaking the truth. "Yes," she thought, when the Italian girl had gone and she had put out the lamp, "I do believe I was." And in the darkness, for the clouds still blotted out even the thin shaft of moonlight that usually entered Nesta's chamber at this hour, it came over her, without any particular thrill of pleasure, but also without any confused sense of apprehension or dread, that during all her girlhood she had had a queer feeling that to be really herself she needed some large free scope for action.

Often and often she had had the impression that her real self was half-asleep, untouched and unaffected by the practical interests and emotional preoccupations of her life at Ty Cerrig. Even after her betrothal to Porius, even after acknowledging to herself her love for Rhun, she hadn't felt herself to be herself as she did now. "No! I don't believe I lied to Nesta," she told herself, and in order to satisfy her critical mind she went over every episode out there by Teleri's grave. It was certainly all clear enough still, clear enough in the most grotesque and comical aspects of some of it.

She recalled how, after whispered consultations among themselves, Gwythyr and Nesta and the Jewish doctor had tried first one trick and then another to scare, cajole, wheedle, decoy, persuade, or compel those devoted bodysnatchers to forsake their post. Lot-el-Azziz at one point had even put his ram's horn to its natural and dedicated use. His figure limned itself now upon that portion of the obscurity around her into which the arrow slit in the thick wall was introducing a faint dilution of darkness, and there came back upon her the extraordinary effect he produced, as he stood upright and bareheaded before them all, blowing upon his horn, while the tuft on his head seemed to enlarge itself and straighten itself by its own volition. For a moment she thought he really was going to drive those holy executioners from the girl's grave; for she could feel the extreme tension which these strange shrill sounds created among them, weird and discordant sounds suggesting terrifying sandstorms crossing the changing-unchanging desert.

But the grim young profiles at her side, staring obstinately across those far-stretching arable uplands that extended westward from ridge to valley and from valley to ridge till they reached the foothills of Eryri, staring obstinately over these things at a remorseless vacancy, a vacancy palpitating with the temptation to anticipate the moment when they would be at work on Teleri's defenceless body, remained heroically unmoved.

And out of that same alleviated and diluted oblong of half-conquered darkness she re-visioned the grand final attempt made by Gwythyr to sweep away these angelic-looking young demons from their necrophagous vigil.

Whether Nesta knew what he was going to attempt or whether she didn't, Morfydd couldn't decide, but she was inclined to think she didn't; for the special new feeling, revolutionary and popular, and yet, in a strange sense, religious and mystical, that was beginning to cling, like a cloud of pungent incense, round the word "Cymry," and to leave a spiritual overtone behind it that suggested fraternity in trouble, had already begun by reason of something rather masculine than feminine in its composition to appeal more to men than to women.

But how well she now could see, in that portion of the darkness of the chamber where the night air was entering, the figure of young Gwythyr as he made this particular appeal. As she hugged herself under Nesta's blankets to drive out the chill of this bed where the reckless half-woman had given up the ghost, she found herself envying her friend, if nothing else, at least the warmth of her husband's body.

Twice did Gwythyr call upon those obsessed lads as fellow Cymry, but in vain. Three times did he call upon that close-packed crowd as fellow Cymry, summoning them to rush upon these treacherous convertites to Rome and overwhelm them, but in vain.

It was not that the crowd was unmoved by his appeal. It was deeply moved. Incoherent and inarticulate spasms of feeling passed through them, and she got glimpses in the torchlight of some faces that looked more than tense with excitement, looked in fact pitifully convulsed with what they were feeling.

But though each time Gwythyr lifted up in his clear youthful voice, using a particular lilt he had himself invented, and repeating the syllables as if they were the notes of a silver trumpet, the new "Cymry cry," there surged and shivered among his hearers, clearly affecting, though they struggled against it, even the young spearmen at the grave, irresistible ground swells of emotion that curved and crested and scooped and careered through the most complicated channels of their hearts, no part of this response, no flicker of this disturbance, showed the faintest tendency to express itself in action. Gwythyr might cry himself hoarse with his Cymry! Cymry! — and she still could hear, even in the silent darkness of Nesta's room, even with the faint odour of Teleri's death in her nostrils, the resounding power of his young voice — but not a man, not a woman, in that whole crowd could be roused to action.

And she remembered how when she spoke of this to the Henog — whom because of his exhausted condition she had taken care to keep close to her at that night's banquet — he had drifted off into an explanation so complicated by doubts and twists and hesitations that the mere thought of it now caused a thousand little black diamonds to cross and recross the dense darkness of the room and even turn into vague grey squares where the air was coming through the arrow slit opposite her half-turned head.

But though as soon as she had made sure that the meat and the wine had restored the Henog to his normal condition, she had allowed her attention to wander, curious broken fragments of his discourse came back to her now, came back along with the memory in the darkness of the special horn goblet rimmed with silver she had caused to be brought to him, a goblet that she visualized now rather painfully because, in his excitement, the Henog had let it be filled to such an overbrimming that the wine ran down the cup to the edge of the table and thence to the floor between her and him.

One thing that the man had said she could recall clearly; namely, that the word "Cymry," or "comrades," came into existence by a very curious magic that carried a tynged, or “special destiny,” with it, the tynged, namely, that the unity it evoked could only be used for things that belonged to peace and never for things that belonged to war.

But Morfydd now began to suffer from a nervous trouble that was one of the very few things that could — and it only happened very rarely — keep her from going to sleep the moment she desired to do so. This was a tendency for some physical object, like the horn cup rimmed with silver out of which the Henog had spilt that wine, some object associated with an accident, a tribulation, a blunder, a sacrilege, an impious deed, or simply with a malicious and vindictive deed, to obsess her brain so that the more or less thick darkness about her bulged and bellied and billowed with the object in question, and she would feel — such was the horrid fancy — that this accurst devil of an ordinary object was bent on persecuting her and with this purpose went on and on projecting itself into her inmost being, into her flesh, so it seemed to her, and into her consciousness too, until her soul felt like a mouse, surrounded on all sides by grinning cats.

Tonight these obsessing objects were very simple ones: goblets of wine with the wine spilling over the edges. With a resolute heave she swung her neatly moulded skull, with its thick, wavy brown hair, clear away from the chink in the darkness where the night air was blowing in through the arrow slit, clear away from the door, as well as from the extinguished Chimaera lamp, clear away, in fact, from all she had previously been facing, until her forehead was only a few inches from the inner wall of Nesta’s room.

Here, though the impression on the atmosphere left by Teleri’s death was stronger than before, the horn goblets with wine running over their edges were left behind. And to summon sleep to come to her she called up the final scene at Teleri’s grave. In her nostrils was the smell of the oily smoke from the fast-burning torch which she herself had snatched from the man to whom it had been entrusted, before, in his wild terror, the fellow had had time to throw it away.

She saw again the terrifying manner in which the great grey-white owl, still hooting and flapping its wings, had kept beating against the brink of the grave, as if the creature had been a monstrous moth to whose madness the girl's body was a magnet. She saw again that amazing little pygmy supporting the tottering Henog. She heard again the howls of terror with which the whole crowd had fled. Men, women, and children had scampered away, as if from a burning city; and she remembered how queer it had seemed to her that they should have fled uphill, towards the Gaer, instead of downhill, towards the river! And now as she faced the safe inner wall of her friend's room she extricated both her hands from the warm blankets and with clasped fingers beat a resolute tune on that smooth death-cold surface. For she saw those half a dozen youthful warriors of Christ, who had been terrorizing that simple crowd, bolt like rabbits to their burrows! Pell-mell, hell for leather, they fled up the hill, outstripping the people, flinging the people aside, some of them even throwing away their weapons as they ran, and each one of them transported out of himself in a blind surge of panic-terror!

She remembered how she and Nesta, with the now almost prostrate Henog, had exultantly waited while with the doctor's help Gwythyr, who was himself trembling a little, filled up the grave; and how the tiny Paun Bach, after listening intently till the last hootings of the owl had died away, adjusted with exquisite care one single owl's feather between a couple of heavy quartzlike stones.

"But feather or no feather," the little man had muttered as they turned away from the girl's grave, "not a man between Deganwy and Llyn Tegid will dare to come within ten yards of this place; no! not till we are all as dead and buried as that poor wrapped-up thing we've left to itself!"

And so beneath her warm blankets Morfydd's hands were folded. Peacefully relaxed, they were folded under her chin; and all the trouble in her nerves was soothed away. She had the feeling that she was floating upon two storm-drifting tree trunks bound together by unbreakable cords. Riding upon these she was carried down the river towards the ocean of sleep, and she knew one of them to be the vow she had made to Rhitta Gawr and she knew the other to be the child she would bear to Porius.

CHAPTER XXXIII. Cronos

WHAT MOST ASTONISHED the horse tamer from Deganwy, who was Porius's new armour bearer and general attendant, about his Herculean master was that master's complete ignorance of animals. And considering how the two of them, themselves not too badly mounted, though Neb was riding with the one and Gunta with the other, were now advancing at a fairly fast trot only about a furlong behind the fantastically large horse that carried the counsellor and his Ffichtiaid sorceress, and were thus exposed to the confused backrush of the various forest creatures who as usual made impetuous if spasmodic and convulsive efforts to obey the attraction of their mysterious fellow exile from the Age of Gold, it was clear to the man that the new Prince of Edeyrnion would have been helpless without him.

Ignorant of animals, whether wild or tame, Porius certainly was, but the dejected look and disordered droop and drift of these creatures' behaviour as they loped away increased his conviction that this man was no ordinary magician, and even might be — for, as Morfydd once told him, her father used to quote from the Eirene of that comedian of his, "a mass of things escapes us" — some sort of super natural being.

He was compelled at one point, humiliating as it was, with little Gunta holding on to him and missing nothing, to let Owain Pen Uchel catch hold of his horse's bridle; for the creature became extremely restive when a couple of excited deer, a screaming jay, a flapping and fluttering magpie whose agitation was expressed in sounds that were almost human, a long-snouted badger, a pair of wildly leaping hares, a frantically chattering squirrel, dispersed just in front of them, east, west, and north.

Nor was it easy for him, even when his horse-taming retainer had released his hold, to listen to what Neb, who was diplomatically taking advantage of the Deganwy man's concern about the horses to discuss more momentous events, now began to reveal with regard to the counsellor's intentions.

"He wants," Neb explained, "to go under a stone for two thousand years. For he says that by that time Ynys Prydein will be entering a different zodiacal sign which will end in a second Golden Age wherein men and animals and birds and fishes will live in peace, and both the god of thunder and the god of hell will be driven away to a far-off island from which they'll never come back."

Never had Porius's philosophy of equanimity been tested more cruelly than during this first part of that ride. On his feet, tired as his body might have been, his mind would have been patient and long-suffering, possibly even, under the present conditions, a good deal amused, by the quaint way in which Neb described the intentions of Myrddin Wyllt; but astride on this uncomfortably living back he felt so much out of his element that an unforgettable irritation chafed him and fretted him all the time, an irritation caused by the fact that he couldn't give himself up to what Neb was saying, nor wholly and entirely to anything at all save to an obstinate determination, as massively biological as the back he bestrode, to accept without protest the whole destiny of ease and unease, comprehensibility and incomprehensibility, as these entangled opposites presented themselves in ever new and ever more complicated combinations.

As time went on and their track through that devious forest among the mountains began its long and gradual ascent to the foothills of Eryri, the most muscular as well as the most clumsy of all the princes who had ever moved in that direction between Caer Einion and Caer Dathyl began to find things a little easier.

"No!" he kept saying to himself. "I shan't try to see Morfydd again until there's not a Sais left in Ynys Prydein! But that can't, no! it absolutely can't, take more than six months. So if not at Christmas, at Easter, and if not at Easter, at Pentecost, and if not at Pentecost, by John Baptist's Day!

"Oh, I shall come back to her before the summer's over! But how odd it is" — for after riding steadily for several hours and holding little Gunta firmly in front of him as he rode, his mind felt freer to take stock of things, especially when he realized that the little girl, with her doll squeezed under her belt, was by this time fast asleep— "how odd it is that while we ride on like this, with those two weird figures on that enormous horse in front of us, not one of us grasps the absolutely fantastic, crazy, insane situation we're in, all four of us, two men and two — what can I call these small creatures? — two changelings! It's the future" — so his thoughts raced on, accompanying the thud on grass, the clink on stone, the crack on sticks, the "plugalog" in wet mud, the "suckaglob" in reedy marshes, the brushing of living fir needles, the rustling of dead beech leaves, and finally the long-drawn hoarse susurration from the treetop branches of the tall pines above their heads— "it's this thrice-accurst unknown future that gulps down our life blood as we ride!"

He scowled at the great drops of sweat on the neck of his horse; he squinnied down at the disordered bright hair sprayed out against his chest; he gathered up, as if it were a material thing, his power of sensuous contemplation, and using it like the flat surface of a great echoing bronze sword kept striking it upon the threefold object moving in front of them, that man, that woman, and that colossal horse, as if they were a vast inanimate statue possessed of a tremendous secret movement as well as of some tremendous secret of reverberation from which, as from Memnon's statue, a vibration could be struck that could go thundering across the edges of the entire world.

He glanced sideways at the horse tamer from Deganwy to whom Neb seemed to have been relating for hours some complicated tale of shameful intrigue connected with the imperial stables somewhere in Gwlad-y-Haf.

"Neb's enjoying himself by astonishing him," he thought, "and he's enjoying his own astonishment as if he were at a play. This little golden head against my hard heart is having, let's hope, nice dreams; but the odd thing is that in front of us all, and moving as we move, is the black adamantine wall separating us from the future! I can see the thing. I can touch the thing. It's black as basalt, black as that slate stone, black as that rarest of water-dripping precipices, the rock above the river Styx that Neb says the counsellor's always talking about as if it were his ultimate horror. I can almost feel it too, yes! I can," he thought, "but I can't see through it, no! not one little inch!"

At that moment he became aware of a faint desire to make water; and this set him wondering what the little girl in his lap would do if she felt more than a faint desire of the same nature, and, from this, crossing in the maze of his brain a psychic bridge of hours and seasons, he reminded himself that the night he'd just passed, in what was now no longer Brother John's cell but the abode of a learned Jew, a prolific Moabitess, a lusty Gog and a suckling Magog, together with the youthful Pen Beirdd of Ynys Prydein, a night in which he had had his couch to himself, for Nineue had slept with the counsellor, a night in which Lot-el-Azziz, too tired to be particular, had wrapped a blanket about him and thrown himself on the floor as close as he could to his wife and his newborn son, and as far as he could from the inspired bard, was as a matter of fact the night of what this little yellowhead would, in the language of her dad’s Seisnig, call “Woden’s day,” while he himself, in his Romanized Brythonic, preferred to call it dydd Mercher, or “Mercury’s day.”

So it had, Porius now reminded himself, come round full-circle this eventful week; for it was only last Thursday, Jove’s day or Thor’s day, the day anyway of a wielder of thunderbolts and a destroyer of the Age of Gold, that he had stood on the platform above the eastern gate of the Gaer and sworn to escape! And now tomorrow would again be Jove’s day or Thor’s day, and he felt such a need for supernatural aid that it stirred in him a sort of petulance to think that unless he defied this whole business of sacred days, if he were now to lift up his spirit in prayer it would have to be to a Christian version of Lot-el-Azziz’s Jehovah, or to Porius Manlius’s Jupiter, or to Gunta’s Thor! Why hadn’t he got some tribal god of his own to turn to at this troublesome moment?

Old Rhun’s honey Sacrament had bound him to Rhun, but it had left him singularly unaffected by Mithras. And then, as he saw that huge unwieldy nonhuman back, encircled by that deadly white arm and mounted on that superequine rump, catch on its surface the first golden rays of the sunrise, while their own grotesque shadows, Pen Uchel’s and Neb’s like a centaur with two heads, and his and Gunta’s like that nameless sea creature Homer simply calls “the Monster,” it struck him that this “unknown future” into which they were all advancing would have as much cause, if their portentous shadows preceded them, for dreading their arrival, as they had for dreading what they found!

And then he thought, “But what madness to make our state of mind at the moment depend on our fears or hopes about the future! It’s just as crazy as to make it depend on our memories of the past.”

And he tried to remember with whom it was that his father had been talking when he suddenly heard him say, “If you start playing with Life, my good lad, there’ll come a time when you’ll have to catch her by the hair or she’ll strangle you!” “He over there,” he now rather wistfully thought, “sure was clever, much cleverer than I’ll ever be! But I don’t envy him the power to utter aphorisms like that.”

He sighed as he watched the overlapping rims of their two grotesque shadows begin a slow and solemn dance upon the swaying but unruffled surface of the counsellor’s back.

“Oh, why did he die, just when I needed him most?” he cried in his heart thinking of Brother John.

And he remembered a certain morning in October, soon after he had returned home from his long years at the Bishop’s School across the mountains, when he was present at the final dispute between Minnawc Gorsant and Brother John. From that time on these two men had kept up a mortal contest which had culminated on the day the young zealots of the Gaer murdered Morvran ap Brochvael. Brother John was very old even then. He must have been over ninety when he died.

But he was no mean philosophical disputant. It was on this occasion that he related to Minnawc Gorsant the whole story, told to him by Pelagius himself, of that great thinker’s encounter with the popular Dewi Sant. Pelagius at that time was an extremely old man and in complete obscurity — indeed in a kind of anonymous retreat from orthodox vengeance — and his natural philosophy had been recently startlingly challenged by the burning zeal of the youthful saint; and of course Brother John was very young then, for indeed the sum of the combined lives of these two sages covered the best years of a couple of centuries.

On this occasion Porius himself had been so scared of being dismissed by one or other of the disputants as too young to understand that he had withdrawn into the shadow, not precisely "hiding his head" but making himself as indistinguishable as he could.

It had been into that familiar portico of Saint Julian's cell that he had withdrawn; and, as he called up the scene now, it was still so vivid to him that the noise of the hooves of the horse beneath him and of the horse in front of him and the voices of Neb and Pen Uchel were transformed into the lapping of lake water and into the rustling of a mighty wind in the close-grown pines.

But it would indeed have needed a subtler ear than his in that elemental background to have distinguished the voice of the water from the voice of the wind. The old Brother had remembered every word of that tremendous dispute between Pelagius and Dewi Sant; and Porius recalled the dramatic force with which the old man compelled Minnawc Gorsant to follow it as if it had happened the day before.

He told Minnawc Gorsant how Pelagius had ridiculed the horrible idea of predestination and how he had denounced as an invention of the devil in the hearts of designing priests the notion that man's heart is desperately evil.

"The heart of man," Brother John had cried, "is naturally good! And what's more," the old man had gone on, confusing in his indignation Pelagius's feelings with his own, "what you priests and bishops from Rome are aiming at now in the tossing floods of the world is to lure us into the Ark of the Church by the magnetic loadstone of the Horror of Sin! Yes, you picture the simple minds of our ordinary Gaer people and our ordinary Ogof-y-Gawr people as containing deep hell pools and dark Tartaruses of abominations of which they themselves are totally ignorant save when huge, horrible, hairy heads come to the top out of these hidden depths!"

On and on Porius jogged, in that singular ride, so extremely uncomfortable and so miserably stiff, pressing Gunta to his chest, and watching their four weird shadows crossing and recrossing the forms of the counsellor and Nineue, while the heavy "thud-thud" of those three big horses, one of them leading and two of them following, became a rhythmic accompaniment to his memory of Brother John's words.

"You pile up the horrors of our sin and the miracles of Christ's mercy," the old man had shouted at the Gaer priest, "in order to draw us into your power! It is a tricky lie to say that simple Gaer men and women, and harmless Ogof-y-Gawr men and women, carry about in their souls without knowing it, engendered by the Fall and eternally reproduced from the slimy spawn of the loathsome seed of Adam, blood-sucking dragons and flesh-devouring Avancs, yes! and titanic apparitions too, like Typhoeus, Cottus, and Gyges, like Briareus and the Gorgons, like Orthus and Echidna, like Hydra and Geryones and the Harpies!"

Porius certainly derived a peculiar satisfaction in reciting to himself, across the little girl's golden head, these incongruous names, names as monstrous in the mention as their possessors were in the imagination; and it tickled his fancy to note that though he had learnt enough in Saint Julian's cell and in the school across the mountains to be able to rattle off these Hesiodic horrors he had completely forgotten the conclusion of the old Brother's outburst and how he had analyzed the nature of the soul so as to rid it of all these unspeakably alien "selves," for the reception of which, taking advantage of the victim's unconsciousness, these clever ones had lowered into those innocent depths enormous Stygian tanks and Acherontic cisterns.

But here he was, still jog trotting on, and feeling more and more uncomfortable; and he couldn't help thinking how nice it was to be Gunta or even Gunta's doll, since they had nothing to do but "to rest in peace," like the blessed dead, the one against a man's belly and the other against a man's chest, not only completely indifferent as to whether the devil's eggs had been spawned by the soul and in the soul, or been deposited there by some wily theological crocodile, but completely indifferent as to whether there were such a thing as the soul at all.

But as the hours went on, Porius began to recognize that he was destined to lose, as often happened at this season of the year, the pleasure of seeing the sun float free in the high inhuman ether, unvexed by man's dreams of zodiacal monsters, happy in its elemental loneliness, in the organic chemistry of its primordial being, for between him now and the sky's concave zenith there had suddenly gathered a jagged-edged,, indigo-coloured cloud; and the high-pitched boyish voice of Neb and the murmured astonishment, half-real and half-assumed, of the cautious animal trainer had both of them sunk into silence.

Something was being discussed — that much he could clearly make out — between the counsellor and Nineue; for the great unwieldy head with its abnormally large ears was several times impatiently lifted heavenwards, as if its owner had a piled-up private account to settle with the arbitrary sky god, whether that deity was, as Homer has it, the father of Apollo, or, as Saint Paul declared, the father of Jesus.

But the three horses and their six riders still moved on, all silent now, and the one among them who might well have been regarded as far the most at ease was, without question, far the most uncomfortable.

But a change had now appeared in the character of their surroundings. The oaks and alders and birches and beeches had been left behind, and they were following a path between scattered fir trees and moss-covered slaty rocks. Moreover they had perceptibly begun to ascend. They had clearly arrived at the foothills of Eryri and, from now on, the ascent would grow steeper and steeper.

It was then that Porius's whole soul, the part that had been occupied with the monsters squeezed alive into those terrible tanks, as well as the part that had been watching the indigo-black cloud, gathered itself together with a sudden convulsive movement and began to heave itself up, clumsily, awkwardly, inarticulately, but resolutely, and with a single-hearted purpose in view.

Had he been called upon to describe the precise conditions of this sudden heaving up he'd have had difficulty in doing so. But in his groping, fumbling, sense-thick way he would probably have explained that the urge to make such a move came primarily from the necessity of escaping extreme physical discomfort, the aching of the bones, the devilish soreness of his buttocks, and an infernal stiffness that caused all the muscles in the lower part of his body to produce the impression on his brain that they were giving vent to a horrid succession of whimpering squeals.

The odd thing was, so he would have struggled to make plain to anyone he could have got to listen to him, that there was never a moment when some interior entity, or self, or rational consciousness within him, such as the Athenians would have called his nous or reasonable intelligence, made up its mind to issue orders to his body to lift the little girl from his lap and dismount from the horse. Body, mind, soul, spirit, will, desire, consciousness, and intention, all seemed to be heaving up together in one confused inchoate movement.

But once on the ground, helping little Gunta to balance herself on that broad perspiring back, and a whole rush of clear essential decisions took shape within him. What had started this activity may well have been simply an instinctive animal-like urge to put an end to discomfort; but, although, as we have seen, it was unusual for Porius's mind and body to coalesce and move in a closely knit unity, on this rare occasion, whatever it was that set them off, they proved as working partners surprisingly resolute and rapid.

And the curious thing was that though the initial upheaval in which he shook off his numb lethargy and aching stiffness gave him the sense of wrenching himself out of his own skin and leaving it glued to the horse, the moment he was free of the creature and, with his arm thrust through its bridle, was supporting the disturbed, somewhat apprehensive, and not a little petulant Gunta, who took at that second no pleasure at all in balancing herself by herself on that broad back, his whole being became more at one with itself and more under the control of his deepest identity than he could remember ever before having felt it to have been.

He called across the back of the horse and across the awkwardly straddling legs of the child and the protruding feet of the unruffled doll, begging Owain and Neb who had already reined up at their side to dismount too.

"The ground rises from now on — eh?" he said, in as low a voice as he could; for the horse in front of them had also been reduced to a walking pace and Porius got the impression that Nineue, if not her companion, was alert to catch the drift of their little council of war.

Owain agreed that save for a few miles of level ground, between two small hamlets he named, the ground rose steadily, growing steeper and steeper till it reached the foot of yr Wyddfa, "the Tomb," which was the summit of Eryri.

"In that case," Porius went on, speaking quietly and slowly, but in a tone of authority that was unusual to him, "in that case I think we'd better separate at this point. And I'll tell you what I've decided. I want you, Owain, taking both these horses, to carry Neb and Gunta back to the Gaer. I couldn't have got as far as this without a horse, and it's certain I couldn't have ridden a horse without your help. But I can manage on my feet now till we meet again. And what I want you to do is this, Owain, and I'll tell Neb and Gunta in a second what I want them to do.

"I want you, Owain, when you've left them at the Gaer, to take two horses again, these or others — I leave that entirely to you — and ride as slowly as you please, for as I shall be on foot there'll be no hurry, and wait for me at the old llys in Harlech in Ardudwy. Make all the preparations you need for a long ride and come with whatever arms you may prefer for yourself — and will you greet the Princess Morfydd, please, and tell her that for me you might bring a short hunting spear and the shortest Roman sword you can find, and for yourself, remember, whatever you fancy most, and make sure you get it, Owain Pen Uchel, make sure you get it! But you will, if you greet the princess from me, and tell her I want you to have just what it is you want.

"Bring any cold meat and bread and so forth you'll need for yourself and plenty of cheese for me, that's all I'll want, plenty of cheese, but of course if you could bring us each a flask of wine it would be best of all! I don't know whether the princess could get hold of a couple of the sort of flasks my father used to carry about with him? I don't want, tell her, another of the big Roman ones."

The man from Deganwy listened in silence to all this; nor could Neb, who watched his face attentively, gather from its expression whether he was pleased or displeased. And Neb politely let him hear it to the end before he said a word himself. Then, however, he burst out; and with a torrent of cajoling, protesting, deprecating, imploring, and almost hysterical appeals he implored Porius that he and Gunta might remain with Myrddin Wyllt.

“I’m his gwas,” he cried, “his servant, his squire, his armour bearer, his messenger, his watchman, his observer. I’m everything to him! I’m all his senses, eyes, ears, taste, touch, smell! Without me” — here he reached up to whisper in Porius’s ear— “he’ll never be able to get out from under that stone, however much he wants to. And she’ll” — here he glanced at the now stationary horse of the two they were following and made a grimace at Porius— “she’ll pretend it’s all right and that he knows the countercharm perfectly well; when really he doesn’t know it at all and he knows that only she in the whole wide world knows it. He’s pretending to her now, all this time, that he knows it, and sometimes she thinks he does, and sometimes she’s sure he doesn’t!

“It’s a funny business between those two, my Lord, I mean my Prince, and I often feel certain that neither the one nor the other of them knows how it’s going to end. But I mustn’t, I mustn’t, I mustn’t leave him now; and as for this one” — and he nodded at Gunta who, ready for all upshots, had squeezed the doll’s protruding ankles and neat woollen sandals more closely under her belt and was sitting sideways, ready to slip off at a sign, and was murmuring over and over: “Quiet, good horse, quiet now, good horse!” as if the animal had been made of painted wood and possessed ears, eyes, nostrils, and even teeth that could be rubbed and scrubbed like the ones her dad had devised for the toy pony kept in her doll’s stable— “as for her, of course she’s only a girl, but I’ve known her explain things that I myself couldn’t explain; and I’m sure, while you, my Prince, are cutting off the heads of Saeson, the master will have need of her and me.”

The long narrow face of the tamer of dogs and horses stared hopelessly at Porius. It was evident that, as far as this business went, he regarded the prince as a baffled, frustrated, and defeated man, and that he viewed the situation as one that could only have one issue, namely, that of leaving the counsellor to Nineue's mercy and conveying these inconvenient youngsters to the place from which they came, the antechamber of Caergwynt or Caerleon.

"And the souls I'll pray for," thought Owain Pen Uchel, "when I'm in the great church at Caergwynt won't be those of these urchins, even if we have to leave them to the Witches of Caerloyw. It'll be those of the horse the prince gave to the son of the Blessed One and the hound my Lord Rhun kept in the Cave of the Ford!"

What puzzled the horse tamer at this moment was the fact that Porius had suddenly shut his eyes. How could the man know that the pupil of Brother John was desperately trying to remember the names of half a dozen at least of the daughters of Nereus? How could he know that the relief of having his feet on the earth again was so intense that his body and mind felt a harmony that was impossible to them when hoisted up on a great quadruped's back? And they were now in full swing together!

He turned to Gunta. "Neb doesn't know," he said, "though why he doesn't I can't understand, for he knows the Henog well from whom I heard it only yesterday; but Neb doesn't know that where Myrddin Wyllt is going, after I get him out from under the stone on yr Wyddfa, is to an island in the sea where he'll be served and tended by the fifty beautiful daughters of the Old Man of the Sea, very young and very lovely young girls, who never grow up, and among whom the cleverest are Amphitrite, Eudore, Galene, Glauce, Thetis, Cymothoe, Melite, Agave, and Doris."

Gunta stopped tapping her heels against the belly of the horse. She stopped patting its perspiring back with her small competent hands. She ceased looking round to catch the latest fleeting expression on the countenance of Neb. She contemplated with a grave frown the ground beneath her swinging sandals, as if deciding whether to make a jump to the left or a jump to the right.

It was at this point that the horse trainer from Deganwy "felt it incumbent upon him," as he had often heard the youthful Malcunus's tutor say when he brought the boy to the stables, to speak up and give expression to his feelings. "If I'm really," he thought, "destined to serve this mad scholar whom, just for a joke, the gods of his fathers have made the strongest as well as the craziest man in Ynys Prydein, I'd better begin at once by treating him as I treat my best-bred horses, that is to say, by keeping children and idiots out of the stable yard."

"May I speak, my Prince?" he enquired gravely, leading his horse, with Neb upon it, round the flanks of the one on which Gunta — very quiet now and though not precisely repeating the alluring syllables "Cymothoe, Melite, Agave, Doris" clearly giving their melodious suggestiveness her fullest attention — sat motionless with her eyes on the ground.

"Of course," replied Porius, moving aside a little so as to keep the counsellor and Nineue in uninterrupted view. "Of course you must say just what you think, Owain, only for Christ's sake keep your voice low!"

"I think," declared the man, and it was clear that the art of conveying important matters in a whisper was no more popular at Deganwy than it was at Caer Dathyl, "I think that the sooner these children are taken back to the empress's nursery the better for them and the better for us all."

Down came Gunta with a leap to the ground, and down slid Neb from his steed no less rapidly; and in a second, with their heads close together and their excited hands and fingers emphasizing what their lips murmured, the two were in deep colloquy.

The two men watched them in silence, and so apparently did the two horses; and, if Porius's wary eye was to be trusted, so also did Myrddin Wyllt and Nineue. In fact at that moment, for the wind had dropped and there was no sound from wolf or fox or raven or crow or woodpecker, no sound from waterfall or brook, no crash, no start, no plunge into the undergrowth of stag or of deer, it struck Porius that the whole wide-stretching forest from the pretended grave of the deathless Pryderi at Maen-Tyriawc-uch-y-Velenryt to the foot of yr Wyddfa was waiting with held-in breath the result of this consultation between Neb and Gunta.

And it had to wait quite a perceptible while. It had to wait long enough for Owain Pen Uchel to loosen a leather strap on the horse he'd been riding and to tighten one on the horse from whose back Gunta had just jumped, and long enough for Porius to imagine at some length the various scenes that the Muse of Chance would be bound to play on the stage of her private mirror when Morfydd's encounter with Neb and Gunta was reflected in its ephemeral recess.

But if the huge autumnal forest between the pretended grave of Pryderi and the pretended grave of a far more powerful deity than any son of Pwyll Pen Annwn had been waiting for the upshot of the talk between Neb the son of Digon and Gunta the daughter of Gunhorst, it would have understood it clearly enough when it came. For when it came it seemed to turn autumn into spring and was like the note of a bullfrog in the marshes of Cattraeth answering a reed warbler from the sedges of Rhydant.

"Gunta and I will go with Owain Pen Uchel to the Gaer, great Prince, and when there we will serve my Lady Morfydd until my master the counsellor calls us in his own voice and in his own language to come to him in his sea fortress."

Porius was surprised by his feelings when he gave a farewell kiss to Neb and Gunta, the girl on the top of her head and the boy on his high pale forehead. But that these feelings had more to do with Morfydd than with them was proved by the fact that, when the two horses carrying the three of them were out of hearing, his imagination was so dominated by the image of his wife that it wasn't till he had reached the spot where the counsellor and Nineue had been watching them that he realized they had gone off at a gallop and were out of sight.

This, however, caused him no distress. All that fate held for him to do on behalf of this strange being, at once so powerful and so weak, so godlike and so animal-like, was simply, as he had known at the back of his mind since they first met, to break the bonds, whatever these might prove to be, that were now threatening to imprison him, as Neb ap Digon had put it, "under a stone."

And this "stone" could only be at one place, that is to say, at the topmost peak of yr Wyddfa. Right well he knew, in the marrow of his bones, in the pit of his stomach, in the zodiacal loadstone of his skull, how to reach the summit of yr Wyddfa. Besides, was there any reason to suppose that the whole range of Eryri would be covered with the darkest of mists or with the thickest of clouds?

It wasn't even essential that he reach the summit this night of the day that for his grandfather was dedicated to Mercury and for Gunta's father to Woden, this night of October the twenty-fourth. No, no; if he reached it tomorrow, seven days since he and Rhun had set out from the Gaer to meet the emperor's mission, the imperative of his inner compulsion would be satisfied.

The ground under his feet as he went forward grew steeper and steeper. He was impeded by rocks, by rushing torrents, by falling cataracts, by precipitous and slippery gorges. Two or three times he suffered an extremely disagreeable fall. As his path — for, though there were no longer any hoof marks, there still was a path to follow — began to show signs of leading him to what might be fairly described as a mountain slope, the pines and birches, the sycamores and mountain ashes fell away; and first in obscure glimpses, and then by wider and wider expanses of unfolding visions, the tremendous prospect of what Brochvael always swore was a grander natural panorama than anything in Gaul or Italy, that is to say, the up-shouldering, up-heaving, up-curving, up-gathering, up-toppling, up-towering ascent of the supreme ridge, and, in the midst of that ridge, the supreme peak of the mountains of Eryri was revealed.

When at last, near to the base of the final ascent to the summit, Porius sat down to rest, he could see, less than a quarter of a mile away, one of the deepest, though also one of the smallest, of all Eryri's mountain tarns. A lemon-coloured phantom of a sun, looking larger than natural in its dimmed luminosity, seemed to be riding at anchor behind a thin screen of transparent vapour.

Clearly visible though it was, the sun was rendered completely shadowless by this filmy screen. Porius stretched himself out luxuriously in this lucky spot with the back of his skull against a mossy rock and nothing beneath him but dead dry bracken. And a languid wonder stole over him as to the difficulty these word artists, like his friend the Henog, or that Gallic flatterer of the High Prince, or the youthful Taliesin, must experience when confronted by an effect as delicate as this windless expanse under a luminary you could contemplate in comfort and free from all dazzlement. He even went so far in his mood of aesthetic lassitude as to try to select the sort of rarefied Brythonic words with which the Henog might describe his hero Pryderi awaiting on such a mountainside the approach of some messenger from his fatal enemy, the son of Don.

"What he'd have to aim at," Porius told himself in his analytical lethargy, "would be to capture the atmosphere produced by this occulted and tempered sunlight. He'd have to capture it in a net of words woven differently from the kind that could catch a flock of birds. It would have to be an atmosphere net, not a fowler's net."

And as he flung out his arms on both sides of him, his fingers lax and loose, and his muscles so blessedly free from the burden of any weapon or the strain of any struggle, he carelessly fished up such words as "fine-spun," "winnowed," "attenuated," "purged," "smokeless," "vapourless," only to toss them back as totally inadequate.

"It's this October softening the burning sun," he thought, "that fills the air with a new element, an element like a great melted pearl, through which you see everything."

He felt something that was like sleep falling upon him; but it wasn't sleep, and he knew that it wasn't. What was it? And then in place of any answer coming to him out of that windless air he suddenly thought of Rhun. What brought the image of Rhun to his mind he didn't bother to question. The thought of Rhun was independent of the vast wide-stretched landscape laid bare before him, north, east, and south — his back was to the west — for his spirit to embrace, to merge with, to lose himself in — to "cavoseniargize", if he could!

Yes, the thought of Rhun was "outside" — or perhaps he ought rather to call it "inside" — all this floating, swimming, hovering, and yet so strangely solid spectacle about him, these forests upon forests, these hills upon hills, and in front of him, all naked, all clear-cut, against this vast-stretched leaf-dropping umbrageousness islanded by fir trees, this hard cold granite-bastioned basin of dark green water. Yes, the thought of Rhun, whether “outside” or “inside” all this tremendous vision, was totally divided from it.

Again Porius had the sensation of falling asleep. “There!” he sighed with a curious satisfaction, “I was nearly off then!” But he was not off. He was still on the brink, awaiting his embarkation. For it was with his waking eyes that he could still see that hard granite basin of green water; while beyond it, in one great receding panorama of rolling forests crossed by silvery gleams of lakes and marshes and rivers, stretched the land over which he had inherited the rule.

“I-suppose,” he thought, “I couldn’t possibly see the Divine River from here, or Lake Tegid either, or Saint Julian’s Fount. No, there are too many hills between.” And then he thought, “But the whole view looks like an enormous ethereal bridge. I’m resting my head on a ridge of Eryri at one end of it, and from here it spans the whole gulf of air, clear away to that misty triple-peaked crest on the horizon that for all I know may be Cader Idris!”

And then once more his mind reverted to Rhun. He thought of Rhun’s figure, of Rhun’s way of speech, of his way of looking at things, his way of deciding what was right and what was wrong, yes and by God, his way of getting what he wanted by a timely use, like his father before him, of his speed of foot!

And not only did the thought of Rhun dominate his mind, and an “idea” it certainly was rather than a presence, and this fact saved him from the least suspicion that any accident might have befallen his foster-brother, but this “idea” was entirely independent of the tremendous vision that lay stretched out before him.

It was independent of the veiled sun, however potent that Mithraic lord of light might be. But if the thought of old Rhun, carrying with it all his integrity and intense religious feeling, as well as all his innocence and simplicity, were something so independent of these mountains and forests that you could imagine it existing in an empty void, "what," Porius asked himself, "of that queer notion Brother John told me once he had got from Pelagius, that notion that so shocked Minnawc Gorsant, about Time being so much more real than Space that it might be called the Begetter of the Illusion of Space?"

Languidly he lifted his outstretched wrists and let them fall again. There seemed to be, for some mysterious reason, a delicious human satisfaction, in defiance of so many austere and implacable metaphysicians, in thinking of Time, Time the alter-ego of crooked-counselling Cronos, as the creator of all the value and beauty there was in Space, if not of Space itself!

Porius's countenance in that windless air and under that veiled sun had already assumed — as his head rested, like the head of Lot-el-Azziz's ancestor, the patriarch Jacob, against a cracked and jagged stone — that particular expression of clouded and puzzled bewilderment that always so touched the heart of Morfydd.

But though he felt that his brain, especially in this delicious lethargy of his body, was totally unequal to the task of weighing in the scales the claim of Time against the claim of Space, as life's dominant reality, he had no doubt about his memory being correct when he visualized Minnawc Gorsant's face convulsed with emotion and heard his voice quivering with indignation as he cried aloud that the Christian faith demanded and exacted not only the external reality of Space, that noumenal matrix of all life, but the complete dependence upon it of the inferior phenomenon, nay! the wretched necessity, of this half-unreal, half-untrue thing, Time!

“Upon what great word,” Minnawc Gorsant had cried out, “does our Christian faith depend?” Porius could remember how the shadow of a cracked and crooked rafter with a bunch of dried herbs suspended from it by a nail gave to Brother John’s old face, as this question was flung at him, an extremely odd expression. But the priest answered it himself. “Eternity!” he shouted. “And it is this,” he went on, “that makes all ancient and modern wisdom, all human progress, all the triumphs of Greek science so completely unimportant!

“And what does eternity destroy? Not Space, for it needs and requires Space; indeed, in a sense it might be called the Apotheosis of Space. No! What eternity destroys — swallows up, rather! — is this contemptible, this miserable, this wretchedly human thing, Time!

“I am afraid, Brother” — and Porius could well remember the playfully sorrowful air with which the priest uttered this— “that you are yourself a little tempted — I only say a little — to the special and peculiar sin of Ynys Prydein, the heresy of Pelagius.

“I fear, I grievously suspect and fear, that you believe in human progress, that you are labouring under the fatal and wicked error that man is naturally good; and that he even can, under favourable conditions, actually become better. It is clear to me” — and Porius could well recall the queer little laugh that accompanied these words— “that you think the human race was created for some other purpose altogether than the true one. The human race wasn’t created to be happy, or to be good, or to be wise, or to improve its lot. The human race was created, purely, solely, exclusively, arbitrarily, absolutely, for the glory of God, and for that alone.

“These Pelagian ideas of yours, Brother, may be enlightened ideas, may be clever ideas, may be pretty ideas. One thing I can tell you, and I beg you to lay it to heart, they are not Christian ideas!”

Lying out of reach, as he was, of any priest, especially of the late priest of Corwen, who had died a martyr to his zeal for the Church of Christ, Porius felt at that moment so hostile to the man whose words he recalled that he began pounding with one hand a plant growing beside him, the proper name of which his uncle Brochvael had learnt from a botanist in Rome to be Empetrum nigrum, and with the other a plant that the same authority had declared to be Calluna vulgaris; but since both these plants had been dead for several weeks his wrath had small effect.

As if aware of the folly of revenging himself on dead men by attacking dead plants he now stiffened his formidable muscles and sat up.

"I must think this out," he said to himself, clasping his fingers round his knees and staring at that far-away ridge with three peaks that he pretended to himself was Cader Idris. "Time and Space aren't a monopoly of theologians."

The first detail his eyes encountered when he surveyed the world from this more potent position was the quite ordinary spectacle — about half a mile beyond the granite tarn — of three black moving objects crossing an open stubble field between two dark patches of fir forest. Wondering vaguely whether these objects were cows or sheep or men or women or dogs or wolves, he obstinately set himself to consider the nature of Time and Space as if it were as simple and natural an undertaking as to cut and bend and string an ash bow.

He determined to start at the very beginning or in other words at the very bottom of the inescapable process used by his own mind and for that reason necessarily observable and describable by his own mind.

Had his foster-mother, Alarch the Fair, seen him as he sat there frowning and hugging his knees, she would have been irresistibly reminded of a particular occasion where, returning to him from some necessary absence with her son Rhun, she had found him, this eccentric infant nephew whom she had suckled as her own, fallen into a sort of trance of wonder as he contemplated a row of six wooden letters forming his own name that had been arranged for him on the floor.

The child seemed unable to explain to her the cause of this rapturous trance; but Brother John, who was the township's sole spiritual interpreter in those days for it was before the time of Minnawc Gorsant, assured her, not entirely correctly, but in the direction of the truth, that the child had felt inexpressible delight in the idea that, small though he was, there was something in him, different from hand or foot or neck or chin or eye or ear, and different from everybody else in the world, that could be expressed by a row of wooden shapes put side by side on the floor, so that anyone who saw them would say, "Why, that's Porius — that's the little boy who has the great runner Rhun ap Gwrnach for a foster-brother."

But what Porius was saying to himself as he clasped his hands round his knees and stared at those black dots crossing the stubble field was this: "The thing in me that says I am I can divide itself into two and yet be the same. It can say 'you' to itself when there's nothing but itself there."

It remains a question whether Alarch the Fair, who, like her brothers Einion and Brochvael, had inherited plenty of intelligence from Iddawc and Indeg, if she had actually been watching at that moment the infant she had suckled, would have smiled or sighed to observe the complacent satisfaction, for it could hardly be called "ecstasy," with which his frown disappeared as he muttered to himself: "It can say 'you' to itself when there's nothing but itself there," and added: "That's the first step!"

"And the second step," so this self-satisfied Hercules continued philosophizing, "is to note that the 'I' who can say 'you' to itself can imagine itself and very often does imagine itself moving through Space quite independently of its body, that is to say, if it is the ‘I-you’ who usually inhabits Porius’s body, it can imagine itself leaving Porius’s body and taking an airy journey to the top of yr Wyddfa, ‘the Tomb’. But though it can imagine itself flying about outside its body it cannot imagine itself escaping from Space. Wherever it imagines itself flying it cannot imagine itself ridding itself of the idea that it is still somewhere, that is to say, somewhere in Space. But the third step” — so the new ruler of Edeyrnion went on, in his metaphysical catechism at the foot of the final ascent to yr Wyddfa— “is to note that although it is easy to imagine this ‘I am I’ leaving its body and moving from one spot in Space to another it is impossible to imagine this ‘I am I’ as totally devoid of any point of localization; though this ‘point’ need be no more than a moving speck.”

Here, in the simplicity of his philosophizing, the great-grandson of Edeyrn ap Cunedda and of Creiddylad y Gawres became aware that the “moving specks” he had observed crossing the cornfield between the two fir copses had now advanced and were so much nearer that their three heads, all three of them bareheaded, could be seen like three round black knobs approaching the further rim of that granite tarn; and not only approaching it, for as he watched them he could make out that two of them remained in close proximity and, though they bobbed up and down in a queer manner, their distance from one another remained unchanged while the distance between them and the third knob kept altering and shifting; this third one being sometimes on the west of the other two and sometimes on the east.

As often happens, however, with a person who is absorbed in a special train of thought, Porius’s awareness of these three objects was a double one. With one part of his consciousness he noted that these approaching objects were not wolves or sheep or dogs or cattle but human beings and that this fact in this lonely spot and with a view to his present quest was something that must shortly be faced.

With the more active part of his mind, however, he just swept these advancing objects — treating them as inanimate knobs rather than human heads — into his present sequence of thought, where they fell into place as organic illustrations of the dynamic importance of Time compared with the cumbrous necessity of Space.

“The ‘I am I’ in us all” — so his mind forced itself to advance in hops like a colossal frog, though it didn’t get ahead much quicker than it had done on the day when Alarch the Fair found him in a childish “glory trance” over those wooden letters on the floor— “is forced to give itself some sort of material embodiment so as to obtain for itself this necessary localization in Space. We can imagine this embodiment as reaching the ultimate limit of the insubstantial. We can imagine it composed of a bubble of the thinnest air, or, if you please, as nothing more tangible than a moving point in Space; but what we cannot do is to think away, or imagine away, or conceive as nonexistent, some kind of faint, dim, intangible, impalpable, atmospheric ‘presence’ as the spatial accompaniment of the ‘I am I,’ even if it be no more than a wave of vibration upon the air.”

It was just then that this metaphysical foster-child of Alarch the Fair whom fate had made the Herculean inheritor of the muscles as well as the fortress of Rhitta Gawr began to recognize as by no means unknown to him the three heads and shoulders that now manifested themselves over the brink of the eastern ridge of the granite tarn; but the part of his mind that achieved this recognition was by no means the dominant part. It was in fact much less than half of his consciousness.

So that although this watchman on the tower reported that there was danger on the wind, the wind itself continued obstinately to blow straight from southwest to northeast, and as it blew it seemed to this simple thinker on the slopes of Eryri that it was calling upon him in the name of Pelagius, the sea-born philosopher of Ynys Prydein, to prove to birds and beasts and men and gods that Time had more of the magic of life in it than Space.

"But if what in me says 'I am I,'" so his simple logic continued, "is something that cannot imagine itself without some localization in Space even if that localization be reduced to a moving point, another assumption is far more important to its life and activity, namely, the more personal, more subjective, more intimate conditions in the midst of which and inspired by which it draws the energy to go on living, that is to say, the condition of Time. For even if the 'I am I' of that crafty creature Homo sapiens had not invented water clocks for measuring the hours of night and the hours of day there would still be the endless recession of Time past and the endless procession of Time future, without which that immortal urge to burst out, to break down, to grow, to act, to commit crime, to rescue the perishing, to unbind Prometheus, to free Cronos from the chains of Zeus, would lack the will to take the initial plunge, make the original start, and thus get into motion at all.

"For if the condition of Space supplies the air and the freedom, the expanse and the scope, the height, depth, breadth, length, and all the boundless emptiness above and beneath, within which the embodiments of every conceivable sort of 'I am I,' whether these be wholly self-conscious or whether they be elemental existences that are barely conscious at all, can enlarge or diminish, retreat or advance, flourish or fade, survive or perish, the condition of Time is the inner, subjective condition within which every conceivable 'I am I' has to function the moment it asserts its living existence. If the 'I am I' cannot imagine itself free of its usual body without localizing itself in a point of Space, it cannot imagine itself acting in any way at all or thinking in any way at all without a fatal conditioning of that single act or thought or of that sequence of many acts and of many thoughts by the necessity of placing it somewhere between the infinite ‘backward’ and the infinite ‘forward’ of the mystery of Time.”

It was at this point that Porius’s mind, usually preternaturally swift in its movements, found the heave and tug of his philosophizing beyond the strength of his mental muscles. This was no doubt partly due to the fact that the portion of his mind, which just then was obstinately holding back what his eyes had revealed to it, by its very inability to assist his laborious digging and heaving, as he hugged his knees on that ridge of Eryri, had enfeebled his mental energy. He might be thinking with a good deal more than half his mind but he wasn’t thinking with the whole of it. And thus it was that in his violent desire to prove the superiority of Time over Space he suddenly unclasped his fingers and scrambled to his feet. And this move was fatal to his intention.

It is true that the physical stimulus of the leap to his feet brought back the natural swiftness of his mind; but in a flash he saw that he had only been doing on the side of Time precisely what the theologians had been doing on the side of Space, that is to say, transforming a condition into an entity. If they had been entities it would have been lawful enough to argue that Time was the male partner, and Space the female, but they were not; and to turn either of them into a demiurge capable of creating or devouring the other was to exalt the two conditions of there being anything at all into formidable things in themselves.

But he saw more than this now and he saw it in a different dimension of sight. He saw that the three men who were standing on the further edge of the small lake in front of him were, each one of them, well known to him.

Two of the black dots whom he had watched crossing that stubble field between the fir trees were Medrawd and Afagddu, their hands tied and bound together by a cord that trailed loosely between them, while the third black dot, evidently their captor and guard, was none other than Rhun himself. “So this,” thought Porius, “is why he’s been forcing me to think of him for the last two hours!”

He waved his right arm at once to them from where he stood, and they all three came rapidly towards him. While he awaited them he wondered how he’d best behave to them, and by the time they had saluted him, the emperor’s nephew with a sulky nod and the others with a quick bending into the bracken of their left knees and an hasty upward fling of their right arms, he had decided exactly on the line he would take.

“Rhun!”

“My Prince?”

“Do you mind going back to the water down there for a bit, while I talk with Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch and with our friend Afagddu? Only before you go, Rhun, you might leave me that dagger of yours — I’ll give it back to you — but I may decide to cut their cords. No! I said ‘cords,’ not ‘throats,’ Afagddu, so you needn’t agitate your new master!”

Without a word Rhun drew from his belt the large hunting knife, familiar to both of them from boyhood as a gift of their grandmother Indeg, drew it from its sheath by its handle, and straightway handed it to his foster-brother by its blade. Then he turned in silence, and presently they saw him settle himself down with his back to them on the nearest bank of the circular tarn. They had all three instinctively turned in their nervousness to watch Rhun descend the slope to the water; but now that he was disposed of they swung round and faced each other.

"Bid Afagddu sit down, Prince, and sit down yourself, for we need have no secrets from so faithful a servant. I've only got a few questions to ask you, and then we'll go upon our several quests."

The son of Anna ferch Uthyr made a faint affirmative sign to Afagddu, and both men with no further glance at each other did as Porius suggested. Afagddu's countenance appeared to be as furrowed with misery as it was carved and graved and scooped out in its appalling ugliness.

He sat now with his bound wrists on his gaunt knees, with his powerful shoulders hunched up and bent forward, with his straggly grey hairs nearly touching his bony knuckles, and with his eyes fixed upon one of his sandalled feet upon the bare instep of which a little trickle of blood had dried into the shape of the Greek letter gamma.

Medrawd looked up at Porius who had remained on his feet. "What kind of question do you want to ask me, Porius ab Einion, and what kind of punishment do you have in mind for that idiot of a Mithras worshipper down there, who thought he acquired merit with his Bull god, or kudos with his slave ancestor, I really don't know which, by tying a piece of string round the wrists of the grandson of Uthyr Pendragon."

"To which of the emperor's courts," enquired Porius patiently and rather formally, "are you proposing to make your way?"

Instead of replying to this calm question Medrawd lay back against a molehill and proceeded to give three intermittent tugs to the cord by which his two wrists were tied to Afagddu's two wrists. These tugs punctuated like cautious semicolons the astonishing statements he now made, and at each one of the three tugs poor old Afagddu gave a jerk, as if his wounded conscience were pulsing within him like a second heart, a heart situated under his right ribs it might be, or peradventure in his bowels.

"I told you, didn't I," Medrawd went on, "how I seduced your lady mother?" — here Afagddu gave his first jerk— "She is the third woman of renowned loveliness and chastity whose sweet citadel I have taken" — at this a second jerk came from Afagddu— "and I told you too, didn't I, upon what philosophical principle I bring these proud creatures down to earth?" — here it was from the very bottom of his conscience that Afagddu's jerk came— "namely, the principle that death is better than life and that it would have been better if life had never been started at all. I don't suppose in these wilds you've ever heard," Medrawd went on, looking up at Porius, "a ditty about certain chaste and lovely ladies that begins with a reference to the wife of Catgor?"

Porius shook his head. But old Afagddu, by making a barely perceptible movement of his neck, was just able to envisage at one glimpse both the two men, his former master, and, if he remained true to his dishonour, his future one. And he never forgot the sight. Medrawd's beautiful and pallid features, with their habitual expression of ghastly insomnia, as if he had been a wandering and sleepless ghost for two thousand years, presented the most extraordinary appearance as they protruded from the gold torque of the House of Pendragon. The man's shoulders, one of them permanently a little higher than the other, still rested against the molehill of freshly turned brown earth, which a very slight black frost had hardened just sufficiently for the excrescences of its surface to have coagulated into a scaly cushion; and it may well have been the scaly surface of this molehill, hardened by last night's frost and softened by today's veiled sun, that caused old Afagddu, as he squinnied sideways at this disturbing encounter of his two masters, to receive a singular and a very disconcerting impression.

The impression he got was indeed a characteristic one; in fact it was an outward and visible manifestation of his own feelings, for it struck him that the dead-weary, dead-lost, dead-indifferent, death-embracing eye that fixed itself upon Porius ab Einion from the cadaverous skull surmounting that saurian neck was nothing less than the eye of an Avanc, the eye of that creature about whom, surviving from prehuman, prehistoric times and suspected of still haunting the pools and caves of Eryri, there breathed such a salt-marsh atmosphere of haunting terror that Brythonic mothers, who without hesitation would scare their offspring with tales of enchanters and devils, kept silent.

And silent was Afagddu now as he shut his eyes and prayed to a composite deity he had himself invented. He invented this composite god — so he would explain to the boys in the Gaer armoury — out of all the gods he was told to pray to. This queer divinity Afagddu had scrupled not to patch together from the divine attributes that struck him as most likely to imply a merciful attitude to nervous and remorseful old men, cruelly tempted to serve two masters.

The name of the all-powerful and all-merciful deity invented by Afagddu was "Jehovahtimamlu," and on several occasions — very memorable to Afagddu if to no one else — Jehovahtimamlu had favourably responded to the prayers of his conscience-stricken creator.

Yes, with his eyes shut like this, he could no longer see the lowering brows and the small greenish yellow eyes of his old legal master, this silent inscrutable strong man, on the one hand the grandson of a Roman Patrician and on the other the great-grandson of a yet more mysterious creature, an authentic cawres of the Cader!

Nor, while he prayed to Jehovahtimamlu with his eyes shut so tight, could he see the ghastly profile of his new illegal master, this unspeakable Man-Avanc from some bottomless pool in Gwent, whose mother — for Afagddu obscurely imagined the emperor, whom he had seen at the Gaer but had hardly dared to look upon for fear of being struck by a thunderbolt, as having, like other demigods, a succubus for his sister-spouse — whose mother came straight from Acheron.

But Jehovahtimamlu lacked the power, and perhaps the will, to make his votary deaf, so that the luckless Afagddu was now compelled to listen to Medrawd's childish bawdiness.

"Yes, with Arddun gwraig Catgor our ditty began," went on Medrawd, "and shall I tell you who the others were? The other chaste ladies in our poem were Efiliau gwraig Gwydyr Drwm and Emerchred gwraig Mabon ap Dewein Hen. And shall I tell you what happened to these chaste ladies, Porius ab Einion? Exactly the same as happened a few days ago, as I told you, to Euronwy ferch Porius Manlius! They were all three brought down, down, down, down! And now that you and I are together again, Porius ab Einion, wouldn't you like to know what the 'half woman,' as she called herself, of your own Gaer, was able to teach me, the heir to Ynys Prydein? You would? Oh, you can shake your head and frown as much as you like; you know very well you would! Your Gaer 'half woman' taught me when she was a corpse, you know — oh, yes! and when she'd begun to stink too — that it's possible — did you know that it's possible, Porius ab Einion? — for the death spirit to ravish the death body?"

There was a long pause, during which Afagddu expected the earth to open and swallow up both his two masters and himself. But the earth remained as usual, and when the man without a nose opened his eyes as well as his ears it were only to find the great-grandson of the cawres on his knees by his side cutting Rhun's cord with Rhun's dagger.

And not only so; the Prince of Edeyrnion was talking to him in a friendly natural voice, while the emperor's nephew was already on his feet licking his wrists where the cord had been pulled too tight.

“Do you understand what I’m saying to you, Afagddu?”

The disfigured man bent his head. Big tears had already begun to slide, one after another, down his defeatured cheeks. But Porius went on, “I want you to remember this moment till we—”

He stopped suddenly, and Afagddu saw him rise and stand on his feet and listen intently. If he’d seen him stand on his head the old man couldn’t have been more bewildered. For it seemed to his confused old brain that he also heard a sound on the air; and it seemed to him that the sound he heard was like the sound of a human voice.

And torn as he was between his awe of the great-grandson of a cawres and his awe of a son of the emperor’s sister, it was a relief to revert to an ordinary supernatural event of which he had heard rumours since he was an apprehensive but docile infant. To watch Porius ab Einion’s face as it appeared now, reduced to a frozen hush, and, as you might say, transfixed by its intense listening, brought back to old Afagddu’s mind the words of his mother when in relating to him for the hundredth time the familiar tale of “Lludd and Llevelys” she came to the part about those strange invaders called the Coranians. “Ac nat oed ymadrawd, ‘and there was no talk,’” she whispered, “dros wyneb yr ynys, ‘over the face of the island,’ yr isset ydywettit os kyvarffei ygwynt ac ef nys gwypynt, ‘however low it was spoken; if the wind met it, it would be known.’”

The curious thing was that the whole psychic situation between these three men had grown suddenly quite different; indeed, in a sense you might say it had become completely reversed. When Porius sent Rhun down to the water and was left alone with the two captives, he felt in high spirits. His brain had been wrestling with the teasing dependence of the human mind upon its inescapable framework of Time and Space; and to be forced to plunge down from this slippery eel bridge of the ultimate anangke into the swirling foam of the confused mingling of good and evil and compelled to swim for his life had so magnetized and energized him that he felt in a mood of such psychological well-being that he could afford to patronize with a sort of magnanimous humour, not unlike that of his ironical begetter, both Medrawd's insane devilry and Afagddu's morbid remorse.

But now, here was Medrawd licking his wrist with an air of detached common sense and Afagddu agreeably recalling the superstitions of his childhood, while he himself — but what shift of the wind, or motion of the mist, or weird acoustic peculiarity of their last resting place before the final ascent to yr Wyddfa had brought to his ears this murmured reply of Myrddin Wyllt to some unheard question uttered by his companion?

"All three of them," were the words he heard, "all three of them with the emperor and on a day three times ten years from today, and this tynged none can change except themselves—" and then, though he remained stiff and still, like a crouching stag listening to a horn, or the soul of a newly dead warrior to the dogs of Gwyn ap Nudd, the only other sound he could catch was the word "Camlan."

"Camlan," he repeated and stared stupidly at his self-absorbed companion; and then as often happens with human beings, and probably with animals too, when a sound that is similar to another sound, and yet belongs to a totally different level of sounds, repeats from this other level an echo of the first, it seemed to his bewildered sense that from Medrawd also there came the word "Camlan," whereas all that really came from Medrawd, who was still licking his chafed wrist, was a sucking noise that might as easily have resembled "Ramlan" as "Camlan."

Thus it was with an angry feeling of having been made a fool of that Porius turned to Afagddu who by this time was on his feet. Porius had already decided what he intended to do in this remorseful old traitor's case.

He intended to overcome the man's remorse by commanding him to serve the emperor's nephew till the hour came when Medrawd took up arms against the emperor.

And the mere thought of doing this had thrown him into a childish glow of moral satisfaction. Could the ghost of Alarch the Fair have seen her foster-child's expression when he thought of what he was going to say to Afagddu she would have remembered how once when she enquired why he looked so happy the little boy had replied that it was because he was good. "I am good, I am!" he had told her when Rhun had been behaving badly; but it was immediately after that, when Rhun's father had left the body of a newly killed wolf on their threshold and Rhun had let it lie there, that the little Porius, without a thought of "being good," heaved it over his small shoulder and carried it away.

But now the psychological contrast between instinctive goodness and self-conscious goodness occurred in the reverse order; for his irritation that the sucking noise Medrawd was making with his lips and his wrist resembled the word "Camlan" was transformed once more into complacency when he turned to Afagddu.

"Is there anything," he asked the old man, "that I could say to you at this moment of our parting that would make your conscience absolutely clear?"

The old man looked at him with a look he remembered to his dying day and to his dying day was totally unable to explain.

"Is there such a word, Afagddu?" he repeated.

But the emperor's nephew intervened. "Come!" he commanded, and Afagddu obeyed. Quietly, submissively, resolutely, and passively, he obeyed. And in some odd way Porius got the feeling that he obeyed with an indescribable sense of relief.

And the feeling also reached him that the old traitor had seen through the self-satisfied magnanimity of his gesture and preferred to serve henceforth and until the end a disillusioned devil rather than a patronizing moralist.

"We'll go back first," Medrawd added, "to that hut where the Mithras ruffian made us leave our money and weapons. You may be sure that old couple have kept them well out of sight and hidden away. Go ahead, Afagddu, yes! straight ahead towards that field in the wood! You can see it from here. I'll follow you in a minute."

The old servant did what he was told without once turning his head. "You see what a thought reader I am, Porius ab Einion," said Medrawd as soon as they were alone. "I know what you were going to tell him. You were going to tell him he could serve me now with a free mind because it would be at your command."

Like a badger and a fox who have met in a clearing by pure accident the two men glanced furtively at each other. Then Porius said, "May I ask you one thing, Prince Medrawd?"

"Ask me as many things as you like."

"Why is it that in you and me good and evil are so mixed up, whereas in others—"

"Good and evil? I don't know what you mean, Porius ab Einion. Your good's what you want; mine's what I want. And it's the same with evil. Good is what benefits us. Evil is what hurts us. There are only two real opposites, life and death. And your good is life; and my good is death."

"What about Nature? What about the gods?"

"Do you know, Porius ab Einion, I sometimes wonder, if you didn't stop growing up when you were ten."

"Did all the gods die when I was eleven?"

"You know perfectly well that there is and can be only one god."

“Who says so?

“Jesus says so. Paul says so. The emperor says so. Your mother says so. Every woman I’ve ever loved has said so. Yes, my worthy Prince of Lakes and Caves and Forests, you are too primitive to comprehend what an intelligent man means when he says there are only two real opposites — life and death! Your good is life; my good is death.”

Porius’s retort to this was prompt though he looked a little puzzled. “What of guarding Ynys Prydein from her enemies? What of serving the emperor?”

Forgetting all about his tender wrist Medrawd actually made a gesture as if to clap his hands, while a faint flicker, like the last glow of an extinct crater, crossed his beautiful deep-sunken eyes.

“You talk like a child, my good man,” he said. “How on earth do you know that it’s best for this island to be ruled by the bastard of Uthyr Pendragon? How do you know that it wouldn’t be a good thing for Ynys Prydein if the forest people, helped by the Gwyddylaid and Ffichtiaid, and for all we know by those clever devils they call the genedyl-y-Carraneit, were to rise in revolt and drive you Romanized Brythons and Brythonized Romans with all your sacerdoting pontifexes into the salt sea, as you want to drive these Seisnig towheads back to Germania? And how do you know it wouldn’t be the best thing for Ynys Prydein if the Saeson did conquer us? They’d soon learn that God is One and that he is life! They’d soon learn that the Devil is One and that he is death! ‘No Devil, no God,’ as the saying is! All your people believe that I serve the Devil. You believe it yourself! It’s no use pretending you don’t. You’re on the way now to the top of yr Wyddfa to rescue a man from a woman, whereas, as any sensible person knows, the embracing of women by men is the best worship of life. But you can take my word for it that you yourself are on the last lap of your ridiculous life. Your Mithras friend down there thinks you're running away from your own woman. That old man down there thinks you've done homage to me in place of the son of Uthyr. Your mother is on my side already. Your Brother John is dead. Your Gaer is helpless against the Church. You're still too stupid to recognize that all you've got, that all you've ever had, that all you will ever have, is your love of life, that is to say, your love of God; for God is life and life is God, and the opposite is simply death. Oh, you ten-year-old boy! Can't you yet see the truth of what I'm saying?"

Porius lowered his head like an ass who has been harnessed to a load meant for a horse. He stared at a patch of bracken that had not yet turned brown. Then he said speaking very slowly: "What I feel about these things, Medrawd ap Llew, is hard to put into words. I thought just now — but I dare say it was all in my own brain — that I heard a voice that told me that you and I and that old man yonder would meet again in thirty years at some place that sounded like Ramlan or Kamlan — something of that sort — and that the emperor would be there too! But whether you and I are or are not fated to live for thirty years more isn't the point. The point is whether you are right or whether you are wrong in thinking that there's nothing in the world but this eternal God and his eternal opposite."

He stopped and glanced down at the two other figures on that mountain slope under that veiled sun, the one seated by the water and the other moving towards the open field in the enclosed wood. To his surprise Medrawd had ceased to argue and was now chanting in a dull toneless voice some unintelligible Ffichtiaid chant that was like a dirge over a drowned world, or at least over a submerged continent.

But Porius said slowly, "Medrawd, I don't believe in your eternal opposites. I don't believe in your God or in your Devil. I've seen plenty of living things turn into dead things, and I've seen plenty of living things born out of dead things, and I've seen living things that wished to die and dying things that wished to live, and I've seen plenty of good deeds and plenty of evil deeds, but I've never seen what you call life or what you call death or what you call God or what you call the Devil. What I feel is that everything that exists is the private experience — shared only very superficially and very casually by others — of a particular consciousness with its own particular powers of awareness."

Here he stopped for a second and moving up very close to Medrawd flicked away with a rough gesture of his finger and thumb a small insect whose field of experience just then was a sultry and salty path between the right-hand corner of the right eye of this enemy of life and an infinitesimal bare scar in the centre of that eye's eyebrow.

"Pardon me," he cried, "but the point is this. Isn't it safer and more sensible, as well as kinder to ourselves and others, to take things as we feel them and see them? Isn't it better to take for granted that there's a host of worlds and a host of gods and a host of consciousnesses and more universes than we can imagine; and get rid, once and for all, of the unnatural and confining notion, however logical and rational it may be, that there's only one God and only one opposite of God? Don't you see, Medrawd, what you take for the whole of reality isn't even one tiny little corner of what really exists. It's only a tedious alphabetical catalogue of hollow meaningless abstractions. I grant that your metaphysical world, neatly composed of one God and one Devil, and one good and one evil, may be what you call 'logical'; I grant that it may have an interesting philosophical history.

"It may even very likely — where can I get the knowledge to deny it? — have its own sort of puppet-show-doll's-house Urim-Thummim, mynweir and mynord, cat's-cradle corner of meaning; but in this vast fathomless congeries of souls and bodies, of worlds and creators of worlds, of dreams within dreams within dreams within dreams, of multiverses beyond multiverses, it seems to me, Medrawd ap Llew, that this mania for polishing things off so roundly with these logical opposites of yours, with this intolerable horrible contemptible life on the one hand, and this lovely liberating redeeming death on the other, this blessed good and this accursed evil, this One God, who is everything, and this One Devil, who is nothing, doesn't... doesn't... oh, I don't know how to put all that I feel!... doesn't seem... I'm not a philosopher, Prince Medrawd... doesn't seem... well! let me put it plainly, doesn't seem complicated or multifarious or scattered or mixed-up enough! In fact, your God-life on one hand, and your Devil-death on the other, to tell you the honest truth, Prince, doesn't strike me as mysterious enough!

"I'm not trying to be clever, Prince, but it does seem to me there's a very wide gulf between your view of what's going on in this world and the view of that gnat I knocked off your face a minute ago; nor is there anyone to tell us which set of impressions — the gnat's or yours — is the more objective and the less distorted by emotion."

He stopped and gazed stupidly at the man opposite him, like an animal that has made a spring and brought down his prey, and then, instead of letting it lie, has struck at it again, only to find that, as Arawn Pen Annwn found over the body of Hafgan, King of the other half of Annwn, his second stroke has spoilt the effect of the first and indeed has healed the quarry completely; so that the creature has bounded off, safe and sound, with more energy than before!

But Medrawd merely smiled at him, a sad gentle smile; and shaking his head as if deploring the fact that this strong man with the muscles of Hercules should share the philosophy of a gnat, turned his back upon him and hastened after Afagddu.

A few minutes later, when, having joined Rhun by the edge of that mountain pond, he was talking to him as freely as he had ever done in their earliest youth, he wondered in his heart on which side of this "Life and Death Struggle" he and his foster-brother were now ranging themselves. And were they on the same side?

He turned from studying Rhun's face to glance at the whole tremendous up-towering of Eryri, with yr Wyddfa crouching like a titanic dragon foetus, its scaly tail twisted about it in a womb of rock but ready to claw its way forth and hurl itself through the air leaving behind it a fiery scoriac scurf of smouldering afterbirth, and it seemed to him that for all the beautiful, hollow-staring, world-despairing eyes of the emperor's nephew, neither his God nor his Devil, neither his good nor his evil, were mysterious enough to correspond with the multitudinous waves of the oceans of being that wash us up and suck us down along the shores of the boundless.

Rhun and he had soon seated themselves on the edge of that solitary circle of water and were exchanging their experiences as if the unruffled element before them were a magic mirror that by its primeval power reflected realities in their natures unknown even to themselves.

"Didn't you tell any of this to Morfydd?" Porius asked him, feeling no more difficulty in speaking of her to Rhun than he would have felt if fifteen years had been lifted away from the piled-up account of what he had decided was the mere "condition" of Time's "necessity" in the framework of life.

"I've told you what I told her," replied Rhun, throwing a small flat stone into the water in such a way as to make it skim the surface and raise four little splashes ere it sank, "but of course you can't tell her everything. I told her about my living with Sibylla and about our wanting to live, if you approved, at Ogof-y-Gawr. But though I saw her looking at my broken sword I didn't tell her how it was broken. Of course, she could see I was still upset about the scurvy way Gwendydd behaved, running off with that Greek pirate, and prepared to pretend that they are emissaries from Ynys Prydein concerning the revising of the condemnation of Pelagius, and I made no attempt to hide how upset I was. You know what Morfydd is, and how she can get anything out of a person. I'm afraid I just let myself go, and she was sweet to me. She thought it was only about Gwendydd, but it wasn't only about Gwendydd; though Gwendydd came into it."

They were now lying stretched out on the sloping bank so near to that small lake that their sandals almost touched the water; in fact, at certain moments stirred into existence by the breath of a faint breeze, a ripple did just touch one of Rhun's heels. This Porius observed. And as his gaze wandered up the man's form till it reached the well-known profile and then descended again till, from Rhun's grandly shaped Greek-athlete's legs, it rested on the water, he couldn't help thinking, "One of the deities that Medrawd's God-Devil, life-death, chip-chop, see-saw, one-is-three-and-three-is-one vision of things leaves out entirely is Uncle Brochvael's bitch queen of the dice, the great goddess Chance!

"If it isn't Chance that with a puff of air suddenly sends a ripple nearer old Rhun's heel than the rest, what is it? And isn't it infinitely better to be creatures dependent on Chance than creatures pulled in half all the time between good and evil and God and the Devil, especially when you're always catching the same expression whether under the crown or under the horns?

"Medrawd, I suppose, would argue that it's our ignorance of causes that blots out the sequence of minute events that led up to a ripple long enough to wet old Rhun's heel; but where is there an atom in the world that hasn't some sort of a soul of its own? Where a will is, there a chance is; for as the proverb says, 'While Chance hides, will bides, and, when Chance hollos, will follows.'"

This not strikingly logical victory over the emperor's nephew combined beautifully with the indescribable comfort of being free and at ease with Rhun; and the two things together soon set Porius off "cavoseniargizing" in a more rapturous way than he'd ever done in his life before! He really did feel as if he positively had the power, and were actually using it, of entering into the inner existence of all the natural entities and all the primeval elements that wavered and flickered, hung suspended or lay inert, in this vast landscape under this veiled sun.

In the rush of happiness that came over him and in a blundering, obscure desire to re-establish the simple boy-to-boy relationship of their life in that llys of Alarch the Fair that Minnawc Gorsant had appropriated for his new church he now began tightening the deerskin straps that crossed one another over Rhun's ankles, and as he did so he didn't hesitate to give a powerful jerk to the ankle nearest that incoming ripple, whose inrush, whether due to some unpredictable elemental "will," or to Brochvael's goddess of pure chance, was already washing against the man's foot.

But Rhun drew up both his feet and turning on his side towards his foster-brother began talking rapidly. Porius had so seldom heard him talk rapidly that he knew at once that all this had been seething in his brain for the last twelve hours. He even suspected him of having tracked him down, independently of Medrawd and Afagddu, in order to release his conscience from some particular load.

"Oh, these consciences!" he thought. "Here's even old Rhun justifying the madness of that liar I've just left! Oh, how long it takes us all to learn the trick of 'laying down the law', as they say, 'each for himself,' and of carrying about with us the responsibility for ourselves like a good slice of bread to feed upon! That's the thing to do — live upon the stuff of your conscience and see to it that you keep it fresh and wholesome!"

But Rhun, in too awkward a posture to throw any more stones into the tarn, was now relieving his conscience with a vengeance.

"What brought him there," he was saying, "I've no more notion than that thing has!" And he pointed to a gaunt, dead, three-month-old thistle whose fleshless spikes seemed to have been turned to metal so that they might reflect more of the veiled sun than was permitted to anything except a skeleton. "But there he was, that new priest from the Bishop's School, who hates us all so much and has been sent here only to make trouble; and of course he must needs appear just when I was picking up Sibylla who had fallen exhausted just where — you know how it is at Ogof-y-Gawr — just where there's a turn in the approach to the porch and some of the old steps are worn away.

"He must have known her well; for they say — though I don't remember him — that Minnawc Gorsant took him out of the kitchen to send him to that school. But anyway, he no sooner saw her than he took upon himself to order a couple of lads he'd just caught with a horse and cart stealing things from the Modrybedd's roomsto lift her in and carry her for him to the church prison. Naturally I came between them, sent the boys off, and told the fellow I intended — in your name, Porius, of course! — to take possession of the Aunties' llys and to live there myself; and as to Sibylla I told him I would give her sanctuary there and look after her there until I heard from you, or from Morfydd, of course, what you wished done with her. The fellow became arrogant; he said I'd no right to the Aunties' llys; he said the emperor always gave a deserted palace like this — a conquered rebel's palace — to the Church; and he finally said, if the Church didn't have it, that a dangerous centre of druidism of this sort, a hotbed of all the worst heathenism of the forest people, now that by the will of God it was deserted, ought to be destroyed by fire. Here I confess I couldn't restrain my anger and when I saw those two boys, with their thievish cart and horse, clearly hoping to atone for their rascality by obeying the fellow, start laying hands on Sibylla, who, half-dead with exhaustion and terror, couldn't speak a word, I drew my sword and waved them off with it. But it was what happened after that which upset me so. I tell you, Porius, I was so ashamed and humiliated that I cried like a child. I hardly know what started me off.

"It was that man's arrogance, I suppose, and his insulting Mithras, and a feeling in my heart — by the Dog and the Bull I could cry again when I think of it! — that I'd betrayed Mithras and shamed all my vows. I was blubbering like a baby when Morfydd found me in the chapel, and she must have seen my broken sword. But do you know, Porius, I couldn't tell her! You're cleverer than I am, with your schooling and Brother John and all that, and you probably know better than I just why I couldn't tell her. But I made out — for women understand feelings like that! — that it was because Gwendydd had gone off with the Greek. That may have made me — you know, Porius? — a bit jumpy. I don't say it didn't. But it wasn't that which made me cry. It was breaking my sword. You see, it was like this, Porius. I'd lowered my sword to argue with the priest — with Sibylla on the grass between us — when the biggest of the boys with the cart started again to take hold of her with the idea of heaving her into the cart as the priest had bidden. You see, he wanted to have her shut up in the church prison and kept there away from us all till he'd sent a letter to the bishop about her. He forgot that there is such a thing as a prince in Edeyrnion!

"It was then that I really went for them with my sword; and I dare say I did look like a crazy Phrygian. I dare say I wrinkled my phiz into one of those 'Babylonish faces' you and Morfydd used to tease me about. But at any rate the two lads snatched up whatever came to their hand out of their precious cart while their old horse looked round at me as much as to say: 'Better humour them, my friend, as I always do! They're very young and very stupid!'

"'Twould have been a good thing, I dare say, if I'd taken that old horse's advice, but I didn't. For do you know what I heard? I heard the priest mumble a prayer, yes! a prayer to his god, that I should break my sword! And by the blessed gods, Porius ab Einion, that's just what I did!

"Both lads were standing up to me and one had a pitchfork, and the other some kind of an iron thing — I couldn't see what it was — and with these they were hitting back and trying to crack my skull! The priest kept on: 'Break his sword, Lord Christ! Break his sword, Lord Christ!' And the repetition of this — you know how it is with certain sounds, Porius, when you're wrought up? — so maddened me that I forgot the humorous advice of that old horse and I let drive at them like the devil.

"It wasn't worthy of me, nor of the House of Cunedda, nor of you, nor of Morfydd, and it was shameful in a servant of Mithras, but by the Power and the Dog, Porius, I struck at those two young scamps as if they'd been great lusty, yellow-haired Saeson — and brave boys they were too, to stand up to me! — and at last, on that curst iron thing one of them had, my sword broke in half! You should have heard the cry the boy uttered, and you should have seen the priest's face! He was dumb with surprise at his own damned miracle. But he sent them off after that and he went off himself, but I heard him tell that boy to publish it through all Edeyrnion that Christ had conquered Mithras.

"I couldn't think of anything at first when they'd gone but of comforting Sibylla. And I tell you, Porius, I never knew that a woman could be as sweet to a man as she was to me. But later when I was alone in the Gaer chapel a terrible shame came over me about my forgetting myself and aiming at the boy's face and breaking my sword and disgracing Mithras. Do you know what I did, Porius? I made out to Morfydd that it was about Gwendydd I was unhappy when really I couldn't bear my shame over breaking my sword and bringing disgrace on Mithras. Why do you think I did that, Porius? Sometimes I do things that I can't understand."

And at this point without a moment's pause, Rhun leapt to his feet. "But there's another thing, Porius ab Einion," he cried, "that I've got to tell you! Last night, after your father's funeral, but before the Gaer banquet, and before our first real supper at Ogof-y-Gawr, things happened that you ought to know everything about. I would, all the same, Porius, greatly prefer, if you don't mind, not to be the one to tell you about them."

Here Rhun bent down, as was his habit when embarrassed, and proceeded to occupy himself with a meticulous smoothing out of every crease in the leather folds of his tunic and an elimination, by a series of obstinate boyish jerks, of every wrinkle in his tight-fitting, delicately woven drawers, as if it had been solely for this purpose that he had risen to his feet.

Very deliberately too and as if he were weighing the significance of every least movement he made, Porius also rose to his feet, and the two cousins and foster-brothers faced each other in silence.

Then Porius said, "You are older than I am, Rhun, and your ideas haven't been confused like mine by going to that school across the mountains and listening to the talk of Brother John. I can quite imagine the sort of trouble at my father's funeral to which you refer — the old, old trouble between Gaer and Church — but I don't see what can possibly have happened in this old dispute of sufficient importance for you to be loth to speak of it. But, let it go, old friend, let it go! If you, as a sworn soldier of Mithras, could neither champion Morfydd against my mother nor my mother against Morfydd — for I got an idea of how things were going from Neb ap Digon — I'm not prepared to blame you for it at this last moment. I knew my father's funeral might lead to a clash and I just played the coward and kept out of it. So if anyone's to blame for deserting Morfydd at a pinch, it's her husband, not you."

Rhun's relief was so palpably and pathetically expressed in the sudden relaxing of his heavy scowl of distress that Porius then and there made up his mind that he had taken the right line.

"If my mother and this infernal priest," he thought, "had forced the thing to a showdown and done Morfydd's position any dangerous harm with the people, he'd have known it and would have told me. He wouldn't let me go if she were in any really serious trouble. It must have been something between the two of them. He didn't tell her all; and I dare say she didn't tell me all."

Thus did Porius's mind race to and fro, like a builder with heavy stones, building up at top speed the narrow entrance to the court of his conscience towards which — and he fancied he could catch the creature's breathing upon the air — the guilt-hound of Medrawd's God-Devil was already sniffing his way. And yet it remains that if the perilous Nineue, who was doubtless preparing even now her fatal esplumeoir, as the High Prince's chronicler would have called it, for her magician-lover, had, in her malice against more normal human feelings, transported Morfydd invisibly to this spot, where each of her old playmates was suffering at the bottom of his heart a faint uneasy feeling that he ought to be at her side rather than on this lofty slope of Eryri, it is possible, such is the nature of that incalculable mystery, a woman's heart, that instead of a shuddering pulse beat of loathing for the sickening stupidity of the male animal, or a vibrant head toss of ice-cold contempt for his selfishness, the girl would have felt nothing but a humorous and tender indulgence for the uncertain emotions expressed in each of those two clouded and bewildered countenances.

"Well!" and Porius hurriedly addressed himself to the relief he saw in Rhun's face, "I've got to follow Myrddin Wylk to the top of yr Wyddfa, and then on with him, if he hasn't come to disaster, which the gods forbid! — to the emperor at Mount Badon. And you, brother, have to get back to Sibylla. But I'd like to know before we part" — and at this point had Morfydd really been watching them she would have seen a similar discomfort and a similar embarrassed concentration in both faces, an embarrassment that was betrayed in the way Porius lifted one foot and began scraping the side of one sandal against the side of the other, and in the way Rhun began mechanically putting the tips of his fingers in his mouth and cleaning with them the silver buckle of his belt— "I'd like to know whether you think I'm talking like a fool when I say that it's not easy for any man to satisfy any woman or for any woman to satisfy any man."

Having uttered these words just as if, instead of pondering on the mystery of Space and Time, he had for several hours been struggling with the desperate contradictions of sex, Porius fixed his gaze upon that three-peaked ridge in the remote distance that he had been trying for some while to believe was Cader Idris.

"I mean," he went on, weighing his words as if he and Rhun were rowing in a boat together towards the last shore of the last ocean of this ultimate secret, "I mean that the difference between us — between men and women — is far wider than we usually realize. That sounds simple enough, I know, and a bit silly; but what I mean is that it's crazy to argue with women at all on our own terms and in our own language.

"We can't of course properly understand theirs but we must in some sort of way translate ours into a blundering interpretation of theirs. I don't mean that there's any better or any worse in it, or that there's any superiority or any inferiority in it. What I mean is that there is simply an unfathomable difference.

"This can be proved by the fact that women always feel especially friendly to us in two situations — I am excluding lovemaking now, you understand — first, when we strike them as inscrutable and mysterious, and second, when we strike them as absurdly and humorously simple. And the queer thing is that it is exactly the same with us! We feel most friendly to them, on the one hand when they are most difficult to understand, and on the other when they are most absurdly simple. And that's why — as I expect we've all noticed — each of us loves to think of the other as childish, as like a child. But it's this mystery part of it we've got to think about, brother Rhun; for we can't be always playing at children. And my idea about it is this. And I'll just tell you, and then I must go; and you can think whether you agree with me when I'm gone.

"I think their 'mystery' forces them to try to possess us, to surround us with themselves, to draw us into themselves, to make us part of themselves, in a word to swallow us. But — and here comes the extraordinary contradiction — in their deepest selves they want us always to escape being swallowed! Therefore the thing we've got to do is never to cease running away, never to cease escaping being swallowed! And it's our 'mystery' that we are able to do this and thus to give them the undying pleasure of an endless pursuit."

At this point Porius received two shocks, both of them visual ones, and, in a certain sense, both mythological ones. For he suddenly became conscious that there had appeared a slit or rent in the veiled sky, and that through this slit or rent the sun was shooting a dazzling ray of blinding light; and simultaneously with this he became aware that Rhun's eyes had ceased to be half screwed-up as was their wont, and that, for he had his back to this Mithraic invader, they were almost wide open with wonder.

"But, Porius," he protested, "isn't it we who pursue them?"

"Certainly," said the other, turning his head almost irritably to escape the sun, "certainly we pursue them, for of course there is pursuit on both sides; but the 'mystery' of women is the opposite of the 'mystery' of men, and what suits women best is... is—"

But here as he moved his head with blinking lids to dodge that fierce sun ray and perceived how wide open Rhun's eyes had become, he made a very odd noise at the back of his throat; a noise that to his own ears sounded like a rather forced chuckle but to Rhun's like a somewhat brutal oath, and he abruptly concluded, " — is to be caught!"

The moment he'd finished speaking a queer shyness seized him; and all he wanted to do was to cover up a feeling he knew only too well, a feeling he had so often suffered from as a boy, the feeling, namely, that the idea he was struggling to express was a foolish one, if not an absolutely insane one.

But what he did now had a simpler motive than any covering up; it was to blot out from his mind the appalling thought — a thought that needed more mental strength than he possessed to endure — that he and old Rhun might never meet again. It was to blot out this possibility by a strong physical gesture that he now flung his arms round the man and hugged him to his heart, kissing him with fierce and hard kisses full on the mouth.

In spite of this oblivious plunge, however, into the simple Lethe pool of a completely un-erotic, un-Socratic, brother-in-arms affection, it was not till he was within a few hundred yards of the summit of yr Wyddfa that Porius ceased revolving over and over in his mind his relations with Rhun since his first awareness of his comings and goings from his own place of infantile safety in the lap of Alarch the Fair.

What swept Rhun out of his mind and everything else but the immediate occasion was the ice-cold mist that covered that lonely peak. Not only had the sun disappeared, but in its passing it had carried off the whole sky. It had wrapped the whole sky round itself like a shroud and had dived into Space. Head first it had dived, like a self-executioner hugging his drowning stone; and now it was wholly gone.

Porius was so icily aware of being left on the bare up-slope of those last hundred yards absolutely alone, alone without a sky as well as without a sun, that a very queer feeling began to assail him, the feeling of being a thing of sport to the whole universe, a stalking horse and a laughingstock for the derision of the elements, for gods and demigods. In fact he began to feel as he climbed, as he very slowly climbed, lifting up each leg, at each upward move, as if it were made of stone, a weird impression that it wasn't Space at all through which he was moving, but Time; that he was in fact tramping across great yawning gulfs of Time, surrounded by a solitude that was much more than loneliness since there was now no longer any Space in which to be lonely. The sun had drawn to itself either some iron-ribbed meteoric stone or some huge lava-cold scoriac stone and hugging this to its burning heart had plunged and sunk.

And it had dragged the sky down with it! That was the thing that made climbing this last hundred yards of yr Wyddfa such an odd experience. He was alone in a world without a sky. But this was not all. "What," he asked himself, "was the boundless sky?" Only another name for Space! It was Space then, Space, that body of the one God, which the sun had carried down with it, down into — well! into Tartarus, let us say!

But if the sun and the sky, and even Space itself, were all gone, what was he doing here, lifting up first one heavy leg and then another heavy leg as he ascended yr Wyddfa? And it was this feeling, not so much of physical as of psychic dizziness, this feeling of crossing with each step he took great gaping gulfs and jagged chasms of Time and yet of being perfectly aware all the while that in a few minutes, possibly in exactly five minutes, he would reach the top, that made what he had come here to do seem, as he mounted up step by step, step by leaden step, step by iron step, step by adamantine step, as if it were something he had had to accomplish aeons of Time ago, something he had had to achieve before the ages of iron and bronze and silver gathered up their offspring, like death mounds of multitudinous leaves, and swept them into the whirlpools of the waters and into the winnowing fans of the winds.

As he approached the summit the mist around him seemed to be thinning out a little. "But it isn't mist at all!" he thought, trying to join in this elemental joke at his expense. "It's only that like all other strong men of the tribe I am a fool in the clouds!"

But he had no time to reconcile his fancy about the sun hugging some magic loadstone to its heart and plunging with the whole of Space wrapped round it into the abyss with the fact that now that he had really reached the summit not only did the air become clearer but a faint gleam of pale but unmistakably real sunlight fell on that stony death mound of whatever being it was who had been buried with this whole peak upon him, as if only a mountain could hold him down and a range of mountains be his final sepulchre; for Porius suddenly realized that he was no longer alone. There, outlined somewhat obscurely before him but not more than thirty feet away, sat Nineue herself on her gigantic horse.

And then it was that, with an effort that seemed to blend itself as he made it with the titanic-moulded hindquarters and mist-defying shoulders of the great horse upon which the woman sat, he set himself to shake off as far as he could certain invisible doubts and troubling hesitations that had been afflicting him ever since he had sent Neb and Gunta back to the Gaer. It had even crossed his mind that this had been a mistake and that what he needed at this moment were a few shrewd suggestions from the son of Digon. But what about Gunta? Wouldn't she be better at the Gaer than on the top of yr Wyddfa? But he was thinking like a fool. Gunta would take care of herself wherever she was!

No, what troubled him was his old trouble, a peculiar kind of uncertainty about the value of all powerful and formidable and persevering efforts; a doubt in fact as to whether, whatever he did, his help would really be of any lasting use to Myrddin Wyllt. But the worst trouble was a certain confusion in his own mind and a fear lest, after all, he should miss, by reason of his natural absentmindedness, doing the thing he had set out to do. He had the strength of an Hercules. He knew that. But had he, down at the bottom of his heart, any clear notion of what fate intended him to do?

The honest truth was he didn't believe in that sort of fate. He was vaguely aware of some curious link binding his destiny with the counsellor's; a link that seemed to come from some previous life, but he knew he wasn't on the top of Eryri, and facing that woman on that horse, simply because of former events in some remote and inconceivable past.

What was his purpose now? His purpose was as misty as this huge peak of Eryri, and as obscure as the titanic outlines of the animal before him with that woman on its back. He stood stock still, hoping for an inspiration from somewhere in this ice-cold mist through which, carried there, it seemed, on intermittent gusts of desolately whistling wind, there flickered at intervals momentary gleams of yellow sunlight, gleams that fell on the form of the woman and on the form of the horse, and on the form, hardly less arresting, of a queer pile of huge stones that rose behind the woman and the horse.

These stones were certainly banked up together in close contact, but, as the yellow gleams struck at them through the mist, they presented themselves as four-sided, as in fact a bedd pedryal, or "four-sided grave." Nineue must have seen him — she must be watching him — but for the moment she made no sign. She just let the horse move about at its will, searching, he supposed, for something to nibble, though there was no grass nor moss nor lichen on these bare stones, nothing but patches of some sort of greenish mould.

And where was Myrddin Wyllt? Had this sorceress disposed of him already? Was he even now under that great bedd pedryal with all this natural carnedd of solid rock heaped above his head? Was it too late to help him now? Had the wavering modern Hercules delayed too long in reaching yr Wyddfa?

"Tungerong larry ong! Endure to the end!" he muttered. It was odd the comfort he got from the simple repetition of this obstinate saying; and it was still more odd the way he kept associating his confidence with the unnaturally powerful haunches and shoulders of this great dim misty animal on which the Ffichtiaid woman was seated. Was this big horse a stallion, and was there something about the treachery planned and perhaps executed by this corrupter of Cewri that automatically leagued against her every male entity she encountered?

This thought, the moment it sprang up in Porius's brain, created — such was the contrariness of his nature — a dangerous reaction in Nineue's favour! If she had no other friend in the whole wide world, what was he that he should join the wolves against her?

Dominated by this new feeling he now actually began moving towards the woman on the horse, and, as he moved, he felt as if he were drawing from the mountain under his feet a greater strength than he had ever possessed before. It was not a purely physical strength that he felt; for his mind seemed ever lighter and quicker and more mercurial than it was wont to be, and it had always been an ill-assorted "guest and companion" for his Herculean muscles, but it came with the premonition that there was that on the wind, or on some leaf scroll shaken by the wind, that would soon be offering him the opportunity he had longed for all his life of using his great strength in a region more planetary, more astronomical, and much nearer the real substance of things than Chance had hitherto allowed.

And as he moved towards the woman on the horse, stepping slowly and cautiously, for he felt as if he were crossing a scoriac crust below which a fiery eruption might at any second burst forth, he cursed himself yet once more for his ignorance of horses. A proper fool indeed, in this modern age, not even to know whether the great beast before him really were the stallion he imagined it to be! In his ignorance he didn't even know whether women ever rode on stallions!

But Nineue had suddenly waved to him and was changing her position on the horse. She was smiling her recognition of him. She was treating that great horse's back as if it were a couch of love and she were waiting there for his embrace. No! It couldn't be an ordinary horse or it wouldn't be moving as slowly and majestically as a monstrous ox and sniffing those bare misty stones as if searching for something to eat!

He was himself walking now as slowly as the horse, and since the horse, as it sniffed at the stones, began making erratic and arbitrary changes in its direction, he began to feel as if the whole occasion had got out of rational control and had even become a little comic, like a solemn, crazy, erotic dance on the summit of Eryri!

He thought, "If I go up to her and touch her, it's certain I shan't be able to stop there. I'll be pulling her to the ground and loving her to the limit; and the question then will be: is it possible that she could respond to such an extent" — here Alarch the Fair would have seen her foster-child's face assume the expression she had caught on it when he was playing with those letters on the floor— "that Nature would make her pregnant; and, if so, if the Ffichtiaid woman could bear me a child, and did bear me a child, wouldn't that be the best of all possible ways of distracting her attention from this infernal scheme of making Myrddin Wyllt her prisoner of love?"

"What I'm scared of," he thought, as he continued his slow grotesque erotic encircling of these two creatures, for it had now become nothing less, "is that by taking her I shall be lavishing so much strength that the thing I've been waiting for all day — I don't know what it is; but I know it'll need all the power I've got — will be... will be beyond—"

But the great goddess of chance must have made herself at that moment an accomplice of this Ffichtiaid seducer of giants. A yellow flicker from what looked, in the richness of its gold, a final ray of the already sinking sun fell upon horse and rider; and taking instantaneous advantage of the fact that this miraculous glow coincided with a pause in the great beast's placid movements the provocative girl stretched herself out at full length on that sun-flecked back, like a mermaid on a golden reef, and went so far even in that ice-cold air as to loosen some of the garments she wore, as if their warmth discommoded her, and to allow one of her soft wrists and delicate hands to sink negligently down upon the curve of a thigh worthy of Aphrodite on the bed of Hephaestus as she stirred to madness the longing of Ares.

With a rush Porius was at her side, one hand on the beast's rump and one on the woman's knee, and in that last flicker of the sunset his eyes met hers, and up to those arrow slits his whole soul climbed and peered into her soul and was on the edge of forcing itself through those slits into her soul and of plunging down.

But even on that edge he waited; for the long habit of his whole conscious life kept the time gap still gaping between his slow obedient big-beast muscles, and his swift-exploring, light-feathered, Hermes-heeled thoughts.

Indeed it is likely enough that had the temptation to take her been less powerful he would have yielded to it at once and let his thoughts wander as they would. It was the very strength of desire that pulled him up and halted him there on the edge of satisfaction. For his light-winged mind began weighing results, just as it used to do as a child when he played with Rhun and Morfydd at the home rock.

Even on this summit of Eryri and with his hand on Nineue's knee, his mind left his great lust-aroused muscles like a seagull leaving the rocky ledges of its home and set itself to explore the currents of the surrounding tide as they entered the mouth of an unknown river. In other words, his mind began weighing the effect of a presumably accomplished fact before the process necessary to accomplish it had been set in motion.

It had been this innate habit of his that had made him so superficially easy and so profoundly difficult for both Euronwy and Morfydd to influence. It had been this that had made Einion despise him and Rhun open his eyes in bewilderment at him. It was the presence in him at one and the same time of the blood of Iddawc the Apostate and the blood of Creiddylad, Iddawc's mother.

And so it happened now. Just, it might almost seem, to tease and taunt himself, on this day that Gunhorst would have called Woden's and Porius Manlius Mercury's, he began, as he pressed that woman's knee and that horse's rump, to mutter aloud all the words he had learnt of the ancient language of the Cewri.

And the curious thing was that as he muttered in a low, rapid, mumbling murmur these weird syllables of the aboriginal tongue of Ynys Prydein, it seemed to him that his thoughts were completely independent of the sounds that were issuing from his mouth; just as if these sounds were not words at all, but reverberations — element against element — of what was being done by earthquake and whirlpool and avalanche and torrent and hurricane.

But as he muttered this primordial incantation and kept repeating it till the horse twitched its tail and the woman's eyes lost their brilliance, his thoughts began to drift like a tossing cloud of Eryri ravens down into the valleys of the limitless earth. Round and round they whirled, so it felt to him, round and round a titanic stele, in this case the oar of a trireme, dragged inland from the sea and set up as the turning post in a multitudinous foot race with all the valleys of the limitless earth as its course and all the children of men forced to take part in it.

Yes, whether they ran, or tripped, or danced, or tottered, or limped, or hobbled, or crept, all the generations of men, from the beginning of Time, were forced to compete in that race. And the great power with which they competed was neither tynged, nor fate, nor necessity. It was a power with thighs as beautiful and eyes as inscrutable, and a hand as deadly and inert as Nineue's. It was a power that like Nineue was carried on the back of a great beast, a beast whose movements were erratic as they were casual and slow, but who could turn at the post where the ravens circled and cover the course and arrive at the end, against the strongest and the weakest, the oldest and the youngest, the wisest and the most foolish.

Held up by Eryri's summit above the four quarters of the winds and the four quarters of the seas, one hand still on Nineue's knee and one still on the horse's rump, Porius felt that it was infinitely preferable for the unnumbered gods and men and spirits and elementals and beasts and birds and fishes and reptiles and worms and insects and all vegetation and for the air and the earth and the sun and the stars and all the waters to have nothing to struggle with beyond themselves, and nothing to compete with beyond themselves, and nothing to punish them or reward them beyond themselves, save only that mystery of mysteries, that liberator of liberators, that everlasting friend of the Many against the One, Tyche Soteer, "Chance, the Saviour".

Beat! Beat! Beat! Beat! went the pulse of Time in Porius's veins; but fast as his thoughts were moving there was still enough delay in his action for Nineue's eyes to begin to grow glazed. And still, like a magical-mechanical incantation to a Time Tune whose pulses were in himself that he might assert free will against all those false fates and sham destinies that the priests of the One God and the priests of the One Devil are always turning into One Necessity, his voice went on, as if it were the voice of every living creature protesting the freedom of its free choice: Thumberol gonquod tungerong larry ruggerug gwork ong!

"Beat! Beat! Beat! Beat!" went the Time pulses in Porius's own veins. And suddenly as if the sun were stretching out a last passionate pharos ray in search of some invisible stele, or "death pillar," on the very summit of yr Wyddfa, Nineue's figure under Porius's hand became transmuted into glowing gold.

And, though her eyes remained glazed, just as if, Porius thought, she had been "cavoseniargizing" and forgetting his presence, she now deliberately, heedless of the icy air about her, for the red-gold light only looked warm, exposed one of her breasts. Tungerong larry ong! So the inanimate noise sounds of the Cewri tongue had propitiated the Mystery of Chance.

For the truth is that by reason of some obscure babyish association, in the process of his foster-suckling by Rhun's mother, Porius was attracted to fully and largely developed breasts in women only when their nipples were abnormally small, as indeed had been the case with his luckless giant girl.

But Chance must have nursed a grudge against this Ffichtiaid enemy of the Cewri; for in her absentminded enjoyment of the sun's last rays, Nineue's amorous spirit had slipped away from behind the arrow slit of her eyes and lost itself in response to this more tremendous lover. Thus, when, in amorous answer to that golden glow, there appeared an unusually large nipple in the midst of an unusually small breast, in place of being excited beyond endurance the opposite result ensued, and the attraction that had drawn him to her side was utterly broken.

But it was then, and not till then, and only then, that he became fully aware of the element of primordial grandeur in the personality of this seducer of prophets. For in place of being angry or showing the least sense of affront in the presence of the worst insult which femininity can suffer, this extraordinary woman smiled at him more indulgently than he had ever seen her smile, and, as she covered up the exposed breast with its erring nipple, she drew forth from between her unequalled thighs a small, hard, heavy, pear-shaped lump of iron ore and handed it to him.

As she did so he noticed that the ice-cold air about them caused a delicate wafture of faint grey steam — so warm had the thing grown against her flesh — to float away between them.

"He gave it to me," she whispered. "It has been in his body since the lightning struck him on the day he fell. You can give it back to him now. He has escaped from the wheel that turns."

But Porius, without relaxing the clutch of his fingers on the meteorite she had given him, pressed the back of his knuckles against her body and implored and entreated her to tell him where the counsellor was.

At first she was silent under his fervent supplication, and he went on imploring her in that golden light and repeating: "One word, Nineue! Just one word!" And then when he grew weary of all speech and simply implored her in intense and silent entreaty to tell him where her companion was, a singular trance fell upon him and he began to feel that there was some close connection between this extraordinary person and the planetary earth.

He remembered afterwards exactly how he felt, for he "went over" in his mind for the next thirty years, over and over, every least detail of what happened on this Wednesday the twenty-fourth of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, and he didn't feel that Nineue shared with the planetary earth the teeming maternity of that mother of all. What she shared with the earth — with Nature, with the great Her of this present visible world — was a quite special sort of pitiless craft and cunning, with the power of using every kind of mirage, illusion, phantasmagoria, and enchantment.

He must have been in some kind of trance just then for, as he looked into her eyes imploring her and beseeching her to reveal what sorcery she had used upon Myrddin Wyllt, he felt as if both of them, and the horse too, were larger than the men, women, and horses he was accustomed to, and as if the four-square carnedd behind horse and rider was larger than the burial mounds of Edeyrnion, or, it might be, than the burial mounds of the whole of Ynys Prydein.

And he felt something much more definite than this; something that had to do, it seemed to him, with that ironstone fallen from the sky which she had given him, warm from her body and so recently taken from Myrddin Wyllt's body, and which he himself was clutching tightly in the fingers he was pressing against that seductive breast he had just rejected. He was praying with all the power he had to the soul within her, and though she rejected him she was also indulgent to him, indulgent to him with a supernatural planetary indulgence totally beyond anything humanly maternal, but not impossible to associate with the boundless earth, mother of the Titans, nor impossible to associate with her who betrayed Uranus to crooked-counselling Cronos, and then again Cronos to the hurler of thunderbolts.

If Porius was ignorant of horses, his real insight into what might be called "the Feminine Principle in Life" was liable to be obscured by lapses that were pathetically grotesque. What must he do now but actually begin to throw into his appeal to this superhistoric creature the sort of servile abandonment of all dignity that a goose girl would scorn in a shepherd boy.

Nineue's indulgent smile turned into a deep-throated mocking laugh, a laugh so shrill that at the sound of it two drastic things happened simultaneously. The yellow light went out, just as if an arrow had pierced the sun; and the horse, or the stallion, if such it were, lifted its head from licking the stones of yr Wyddfa and uttered a resounding neigh.

This concatenation of events broke rudely into the time gap, always existing but at this crucial moment unusually wide, between Porius's senses and his intelligence; and the nervous disturbance within him, produced by this divergence, resulted in a burst of extravagant violence as surprising to himself as it was to the woman.

He tore himself from her side and from the side of the horse, just as if she and the horse and himself had been for twenty thousand years some primordial outcropping of earth’s rocky ribs, resembling, by pure cosmogonic chance, the fearful mate of the terrible sky in the act of being implored by a cloudy Herculean shape to have mercy on her own offspring; while now in catastrophic upheaval, this fragment of elemental sculpture had rent itself out of those earth ribs; and lo! the sculptured rock that was the man had divided itself from the rock that was the woman and the horse, and had flung itself into the gulf that had been Space.

Having thus torn himself free, Porius actually did fling himself headlong against the grey monolith resting on the four horizontal stones — all of them half-sunk now by the process of Time into the ground — that had come at last to form the bedd pedryal that had given its name to yr Wyddfa. None of these four stones were completely buried in the ground but they were all fixed and stationed as if they had not been moved since the last convulsion that had shaken Eryri’s peaks and ridges, promontories and precipices, into their present planetary position. All except one! Yes, one of the four, as, in that ice-cold twilight, he fumbled and groped on his hands and knees, growling the words “Thumberol gongquod” with a curious animal noise that startled his own ears, for it reminded him of a sound that during their desperate encounter he had heard in the throat of the old cawr, Creiddylad’s father, one of the four had been moved — he could feel it. He could even faintly see it. And now that he came to touch it he found that the stone itself was unmistakably loose.

Trembling in that icy mist, and contorting his face in the shivering compulsion of his excitement, he seized the corner of that loose stone, and kneeling on the ground, and bending his back like an Iberian bow strung to the limit, he heaved and tugged and strained and wrenched and shook it.

But for all the heavings of his enormous muscles that has anaidees, that “obstinately stubborn stone,” refused to move.

In order to use his full strength upon the stone he was compelled to find a place for the thunderbolt Nineue had given him. Automatically opening his jaws wide, like a bewildered animal, he squeezed the rough and hoary and wrinkled iron ball between his tongue and the roof of his mouth. Thus he set himself to wrestle with the greatest task that any human frame or any human muscles had dared to take in hand in that place since the central fires subsided into quiescence or the towering upsurge of the waters receded.

“Stone!” he growled in his subhuman frenzy, “has anaidees! Most obstinate of stones! Your moment of defeat has come!”

And then there occurred in his mind a convulsive movement parallel to the appalling efforts he was making with his superhuman muscles. But unlike those efforts this mental convulsion landed him upon a curious psychic ledge, resting quite calmly on which, as upon a centre point in the midst of appearing and disappearing universes, he enjoyed for the moment, even at the core of his heartbreaking heavings and strainings, a mad delicious sensation that he held Time itself in his hands! “Not an atom in the whole of Space,” he thought, “but has its moment, its hour, its century, its aeon, of tragic differentiation and mutation! And now you” he told himself, “who for thousands of centuries have waited here on the summit of Eryri, feeling yourself secure, feeling that what the cloud gatherer and the lightning hurler had flung down, and what the father of gods and men had hidden, would never be lifted out, would never be uncovered, shall be exposed and laid bare!” He swayed to and fro now in the extremity of his straining as if he were no longer a mind or a body but some impersonal force of Nature. “Exposed and laid bare,” his thoughts groaned and shuddered on, till they almost cracked his skull, "scooped and scored and scoured to the uttermost!"

And now there came to his ears, sharply, distinctly, louder than the far-off terrible screams of eagles, the metallic strokes, like some mineral Space clock, matching the motion of Time's water clock, of the hoof beats of Nineue's horse as it carried her away.

The sound increased the fury of his efforts. He felt as if he was tugging at some huge tap root of the whole of Eryri. Sweat streamed down his back and trickled down his face. He began making a queer moaning sound as if he were a beast whose single offspring was buried under this has anaidees. And then quite suddenly the stone yielded. It toppled sideways, remained horribly balanced for a second, and then lay upside down. It lay indeed so motionlessly upside down that its whiteness in that perishing twilight had a positively ghastly quality, at once phantomlike and phosphorescent.

For a second or two he was too exhausted and too dazed to do more than sway backwards and forwards and stare helplessly down into that shocking gulf. Then he realized that he was staring straight into the eyes of Myrddin Wyllt, who in a hideously ungainly posture was stretched across a cloven rock, a cloven slab of slate rock, that had no less than three inch-wide clefts in it, each of which appeared to descend down immeasurable depths. And what at once fascinated and horrified Porius was the fact that these chasms, of which the two outer ones were under the prostrate man's armpits and the middle one under the nape of his neck and the fork of his body, instead of being in the complete and pitchy darkness that anyone would have expected, were faintly illuminated as they all three descended, for he could catch a glimpse of that subterranean phosphorescence between the man's thighs. "If only it was black darkness!" he thought with a shrinking that struck him as being very old, as if it had descended uncounted aeons of Time to reach him.

"He has grown smaller!" was his next thought as he stared through the grey icy mist at that dark figure outstretched above those three cracks in the solidity of the boundless earth; and indeed Myrddin Wyllt had the look of a petrified creature whose natural bulk had been reduced by the endurance of aeons of both water and ice.

But he had the same familiar awe-inspiring hideousness that Porius had by this time come to find almost endearing. His ears were as unnaturally large, his forehead as unnaturally low, his greenish black eyes as magnetic as ever. As he looked down on him Porius had the odd fancy that he could even catch, above those great flapping ears, the visible rudiments of horns!

And though those greenish black orbs beneath their shaggy eyebrows stared back at him in ghastly reciprocity he got the feeling that there was no perception, no understanding, no recognition in them. Was the man dead? Had Nineue with the aid of some unearthly magnet and by drawing out of his inmost vitals that fatal thunderbolt brought his weird half-human life to an end?

While keeping his own small yellowish green bear's eyes, with their brows corrugated and wrinkled now even beyond their wont, fixed steadily upon that terrible stare, Porius opened his mouth and disembogued, though not without stretching his jaws nigh to the breaking point, that iron-ribbed meteorite.

Anxious to rouse the counsellor from his trance and naturally fearful of adding his own weight to the other's upon that rock ledge above the glimmerings of Tartarus, he took that smallest of thunderbolts in his right hand and swinging his arm back and forth over the mouth of the gulf hesitated as to the portion of the figure beneath him at which it were best to aim.

And as he swung his arm backwards and forwards he felt that this highest peak of Eryri must indeed have been named yr Wyddfa, “the Tomb,” by destiny itself. He decided that it must be one of the four great gates into that World of the Dead to which Brochvael had once told him certain Cisalpine Gallic tribes used to offer large four-square barley cakes made without milk and without the shedding of blood.

He felt as if he stood on an earth crust that covered a cosmogonic cavern wherein the bones and ashes and the mouldering dust of gods and men and beasts and birds and fishes and reptiles had been gathered into a multitudinous congregated compost, out of which by the creative energy of Time new life could be eternally spawned; spawned, it might be, for the use of other universes, when this one had been dissolved.

Balanced as he was above this motionless figure in the form of a man, from beneath which rose a phosphorescent gleam of inconceivable decomposition, Porius, as he swung his thunderbolt, had the feeling that he was suspended above the whole rondure of the earth, and that worlds upon worlds of every sort surrounded him, and that he, the child of Time, was absolutely alone with this physical mirage, this primordial abyss, this necessary illusion, this holy nothing, that is called Space.

And he became aware of an unfathomable power within him, a power that was at once divine and human, animal and elemental, a power that could be drawn upon at will, not to create or to destroy, but simply to enjoy: gorsorb larry ong, “enjoy to the end.”

He felt as if the rock-ledge on which he stood, swinging his meteorite above that being in the Pit, were itself rising, rising, rising through illimitable distances of empty blackness. “This,” he thought, “is what I’ve often feared as pure madness. And yet it doesn't seem madness now; or is it that" — and he began swinging the meteorite more slowly in the intensity of his thought— "is it that a person can enjoy being alone in absolute darkness? I must remember to ask Morfydd whether she thinks a person can be mad and yet not mad; alone among millions of universes and yet enjoying himself, as small and weak and helpless in the abysses of existence as a worm or a fly, and yet able to rescue a god?"

Whether it was his sudden feeling of deep content that he had someone to whom he could relate all this that unsettled him, or whether it was that he had sweated so much that he was now taken with a shivering fit; anyway, his arm suddenly ceased to swing, his hand and his fingers relaxed, and he dropped the meteorite. Full upon the forehead of Myrddin Wyllt it fell, and from off that uneven resting place it rolled, without a sound, down into the abyss.

Then Porius, trembling like a poplar leaf on the very edge of the Cimmerian gulf, saw that grand hideous terrible visage contort itself. A convulsion passed across it, and the being to whom it belonged began using the muscles of chest, abdomen, and neck, to heave itself up. Far away, down the slopes and the precipices and the rocks and the caverns, Porius was aware of a sound he knew well — the screaming of eagles.

He felt as if he saw this sound enter the great flapping, shaggy, animal-like ears of the being beneath him.

"They know me," whispered the counsellor, "but they've never been my friends! They've always been the friends of the tyrants. They know me, the eagles, and they're afraid!"

Even while he was speaking he was using his enormous hands and feet to get himself upright; and then with Porius's help he had no difficulty in clambering up to the side of his very human and very shivering rescuer.

And once out of that living tomb, once out of yr Wyddfa, it was he who did all that had to be done. The first thing he did was to twist his huge form with all its heavy garments of goatskin and sheepskin round and round, until, like that famous four-sided island tower in the waters of Annwn, it seemed palpably to counterbalance that bedd pedryal from whose gorge it had been excavated. And the next thing he did was to extricate with the help of his rescuer from some hidden wallet in the lining of one of these garments an extremely greasy leather bottle.

On the opening of this bottle it was found to contain a fluid so potent that it not only quelled Porius's ague fit but submerged that collapsed Hercules in the most delicious ocean of dreams he had ever known.

More and more steadily and firmly the counsellor took control. He made his exhausted and shivering rescuer recline against a lichen-covered rock that had nothing to do with the bedd pedryal, while he himself began filling up and sealing down that gaping hole with the clear intention that it should never be uncovered again as long as the earth lasted. The large mouthfuls Porius was swallowing from the counsellor's mysterious and perhaps divine bottle did not overpower his consciousness all at once. He could recall later most of his impressions, and many of his conclusions.

The image in the twilight of that extraordinary figure with its vast bulk, its eyes so sunken that they resembled the eye holes of a skull into which two burning green-black lamps had been inserted, the great flapping ears, the indescribable mouth that was at once a tragic classic mask and the distended lips of a wild stag in desperate flight, the wind-blown garments waving steadily northwest as the wind blew from the Cader towards Conway, would be forever associated with one word at least that he heard the man muttering as he toiled at this task of sealing up forever the gaping mouth of yr Wyddfa.

Myrddin Wyllt groaned forth other words; but it was the echoing, iron-jarring, primeval-metallic sound of this particular word that caused it to come back to Porius all the rest of his life. It was the word “karcharodonta”; and Porius, recalling it all later, remembered that as the man uttered this word along with the others he scowled up at the grey clouds with features contorted by a terrible and immortal defiance; “jagged” was the word; “jagged” the weapon; “jagged” the man’s face.

More and more strongly did Porius get the feeling that in his isolation on this peak of the planet by the side of this titanic creature of whose essential being he knew so little, and even felt disinclined to know more, he was reliving an experience he had had long ago when the world was young.

He could still hear the far-away screaming of eagles, but the sound had grown so faint that it seemed as if Myrddin Wyllt had been correct in declaring that those great Birds of Absolute Power had felt some counterbolt whistling past their small, cruel, beautiful, imperial, exquisitely feathered skulls!

And as he listened, watching the great beast ears above him quiver like sails in that icy wind, he fancied he could catch moving up to that mountaintop a vast, indescribable, multitudinous murmur, groping up, fumbling up, like a mist among mists, from all the forests and valleys of Ynys Prydein, the response of innumerable weak and terrified and unbeautiful and unconsidered and unprotected creatures, for whom this first-born and first-betrayed of the wily earth, this ancient accomplice of Time, this angulo-meetis of subtle counsels, was still plotting a second Age of Gold.

And as he went on swallowing that Saturnian nepenthe Porius saw, and saw as clearly as if it were down there between his sandals, the floating blood and the strewn hair and the green water in those foothills of the Cader.

“O Creiddylad! O Creiddylad!” he groaned within himself. “Tungerong larry ong!” And he thought how absolutely alone in this chaos of things was every single soul, whether of insect or worm or reptile or fish or beast or bird or man or god.

“There’s nothing I can do,” he said to himself, “but just accept this crazy loneliness in this unbounded chaos, and hope for the best among all the other crazy lonely selves! And why not? Such a chance-ruled chaos of souls, none of them without some fellow feeling, some kindliness, at least to their offspring, at least to their mates, at least to their friends, is a better thing than a world of blind authority, a world ruled by one Caesar, or one God, or one—”

But it was at this point, at least as far as his intermittent memory served him, that the counsellor’s divine bottle blotted out his thought. Nor, when the morning of Thursday the twenty-fifth of October in the year of Christ four hundred and ninety-nine struck his senses and his mind as a reality, and he found himself, as his friend the Henog of Dyfed says in his Life of Pryderi, “ar garrec Harlech uch penn y weilgi, “““on a rock at Harlech above the sea,” was he in the least startled or bewildered by this magical transportation in the course of one night, nor by finding himself completely alone.

Nor indeed was he greatly vexed by the fact that so heavy a mist covered the sea that although he heard its waves breaking a few hundred yards beneath him, he could catch no glimpse of it at all. The truth of the matter was that, with his back against the broken wall of some ancient fortress and his belly and legs well covered with the shaggy goatskin of a “herdsman from the south," Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda felt warm and comfortable and content.

"I needn't bother to think of moving from here for hours," he told himself. "Owain Pen Uchel can't possibly get here till sunset, and I don't feel hungry or thirsty or anything. I don't even feel sleepy. I'll just enjoy the mist and the smell of seaweed and try to think how to tell Morfydd what I've decided about Myrddin Wyllt. There are many gods; and I have served a great one. She alone will understand."

Wood and Stone (1915)

Wood and Stone was first published in 1915 by G. Arnold Shaw in New York, USA and by William Heinemann in Britain in 1917. It was the author's debut novel, written when he was already in his early forties. He had begun his literary career as a young man in his twenties releasing Odes and Other Poems in 1896 followed by Poems in 1899. However, over the course of the next fifteen years he had little opportunity to write as he spent most of his time and energy on the lecture circuit, travelling across the USA. In 1914, the political and philosophical text The War and Culture (1914) was published and in 1915 a collection of essays of literary criticism entitled Visions and Revisions was released.

Wood and Stone is set in the fictional village of Nevilton, near the border between Somerset and Dorset. Powys based Nevilton on his memories and experiences of Montacute, the village where his father was the vicar for more than thirty years. The novel focuses on the lives and dynamics of the characters and the tensions that arise in a community where power and sadism confront gentleness and acts of self-sacrifice. Nature and the landscape form a vital and intrinsic element to the narrative, as does the history and mythology of the region. Powys dedicated the book to Thomas Hardy, a clear influence on his writings, whom he describes as 'the greatest poet and novelist of our age'.

PREFACE

THE FOLLOWING NARRATIVE gathers itself round what is, perhaps, one of the most absorbing and difficult problems of our age; the problem namely of getting to the bottom of that world-old struggle between the "well-constituted" and the "ill-constituted," which the writings of Nietzsche have recently called so startlingly to our attention.

Is there such a thing at all as Nietzsche's born and trained aristocracy? In other words, is the secret of the universe to be reached only along the lines of Power, Courage, and Pride? Or, — on the contrary, — is the hidden and basic law of things, not Power but Sacrifice, not Pride but Love?

Granting, for the moment, that this latter alternative is the true one, what becomes of the drastic distinction between "well-constituted" and "ill-constituted"?

In a universe whose secret is not self-assertion, but self-abandonment, might not the "well-constituted" be regarded as the vanquished, and the "ill-constituted" as the victors? In other words, who, in such a universe, are the "well-constituted"?

But the difficulty does not end here. Supposing we rule out of our calculation both of these antipodal possibilities, — both the universe whose inner fatality is the striving towards Power, and the universe whose inner fatality is the striving towards Love, — will there not be found to remain two other rational hypotheses, either, namely, that there is no inner fatality about it at all, that the whole thing is a blind, fantastic, chance-drifting chaos; or that the true secret lies in some subtle and difficult reconciliation, between the will to Power and the will to Love?

The present chronicle is an attempt to give an answer, inevitably a very tentative one, to this formidable question; the writer, feeling that, as in all these matters, where the elusiveness of human nature plays so prominent a part, there is more hope of approaching the truth, indirectly, and by means of the imaginative mirror of art, than directly, and by means of rational theorizing.

The whole question is indeed so intimately associated with the actual panorama of life and the evasive caprices of flesh and blood, that every kind of drastic and clinching formula breaks down under its pressure.

Art, alone, — that mysterious daughter of Life, — has the secret of following the incalculable movements of the Force to which she is so near akin. A story which grossly points its moral with fixed indicative finger is a story which, in the very strain of that premature articulation, has lost the magic of its probability. The secret of our days flies from our attempts at making it fit such clumsy categories, and the maddening flavour of the cosmic cup refuses to be imprisoned in any laboratory.

At this particular moment in the history of our planet it is above all important to protest against this prostituting of art to pseudo-science. It must not be allowed to these hasty philosophical conclusions and spasmodic ethical systems, to block up and close in, as they are so ready to do, the large free horizons of humour and poetry. The magic of the World, mocking both our gravity and our flippancy, withdraws itself from our shrewd rationalizations, only to take refuge all the deeper in our intrinsic and evasive hearts.

In this story the author has been led to interest himself in the curious labyrinthine subtleties which mark the difference, — a difference to be observed in actual life, quite apart from moral values, — between the type of person who might be regarded as born to rule, and the type of person who might be regarded as born to be ruled over. The grand Nietzschean distinction is, in a sense, rejected here upon its own ground, a ground often inconsequently deserted by those who make it their business to condemn it. Such persons are apt to forget that the whole assumption of this distinction lies in a substitution of æsthetic values, for the values more commonly applied.

The pivotal point of the ensuing narrative might be described as an attempt to suggest, granting such an æsthetic test, that the hearts of "ill-constituted" persons, — the hearts of slaves, Pariahs, cowards, outcasts, and other victims of fate, — may be at least as interesting, in their bizarre convolutions, as the hearts of the bravest and gayest among us. And interest, after all, is the supreme exigency of the æsthetic sense!

In order to thrust back from its free horizons these invasions of its prerogatives by alien powers, Art must prove itself able to evoke the very tang and salt and bitter-sweetness of the actual pell-mell of life — its unfolding spaces, its shell-strewn depths. She must defend herself from those insidious traitors in her own camp who would betray her into the hands of the system-makers, by proving that she can approach nearer to the magic of the world, without a system, than all these are able to do, with all of theirs! She must keep the horizons open — that must be her main concern. She must hold fast to poetry and humour, and about her creations there must be a certain spirit of liberation, and the presence of large tolerant after-thoughts.

The curious thing about so many modern writers is, that in their earnest preoccupation with philosophical and social problems, they grow strained and thin and sententious, losing the mass and volume, as well as the elusive-blown airs, of the flowing tide. On the other hand there is an irritating tendency, among some of the cleverest, to recover their lost balance after these dogmatic speculations, by foolish indulgence in sheer burlesque — burlesque which is the antithesis of all true humour.

Heaven help us! It is easy enough to criticize the lath and plaster which, in so many books, takes the place of flesh and blood. It is less easy to catch, for oneself, the breath of the ineffable spirit!

Perhaps the deplorable thinness and sententiousness, to which reference has been made, may be due to the fact that in the excitement of modern controversy, our enterprising writers have no time to read. It is a strange thing, but one really feels as though, among all modern English authors, the only one who brings with him an atmosphere of the large mellow leisurely humanists of the past, — of the true classics, in fact, — is Mr. Thomas Hardy.

It is for this reason, for the reason that with this great genius, life is approached in the old ample ironic way, that the narrator of the following tale has taken the liberty of putting Mr. Hardy's name upon his title-page. In any case mere courtesy and decency called for such a recognition. One could hardly have the audacity to plant one's poor standard in the heart of Wessex without obeisance being paid to the literary over-lord of that suggestive region.

It must be understood, however, that the temerity of the author does not carry him so far as to regard his eccentric story as in any sense an attempted imitation of the Wessex novelist. Mr. Hardy cannot be imitated. The mention of his admirable name at the beginning of this book is no more than a humble salutation addressed to the monarch of that particular country, by a wayward nomad, lighting a bivouac-fire, for a brief moment, in the heart of a land that is not his.

CHAPTER I. LEO'S HILL

MIDWAY BETWEEN GLASTONBURY and Bridport, at the point where the eastern plains of Somersetshire merge into the western valleys of Dorsetshire, stands a prominent and noticeable hill; a hill resembling the figure of a crouching lion.

East of the hill, nestling at the base of a cone-shaped eminence overgrown with trees and topped by a thin Thyrsus-like tower, lies the village of Nevilton.

Were it not for the neighbourhood of the more massive promontory this conical protuberance would itself have stood out as an emphatic landmark; but Leo's Hill detracts from its emphasis, as it detracts from the emphasis of all other deviations from the sea-level, between Yeoborough and the foot of the Quantocks.

It was on the apex of Nevilton Mount that the Holy Rood of Waltham was first found; but with whatever spiritual influence this event may have endowed the gentler summit, it is not to it, but to Leo's Hill, that the lives and destinies of the people of Nevilton have come to gravitate. One might indeed without difficulty conceive of a strange supernatural conflict going on between the consecrated repository of Christian tradition guarding its little flock, and the impious heathen fortress to which day by day that flock is driven, to seek their material sustenance.

Even in Pre-Celtic times those formidably dug trenches and frowning slopes must have looked down on the surrounding valley; and to this day it is the same suggestion of tyrannical military dominance, which, in spite of quarries and cranes and fragrant yellow gorse, gives the place its prevailing character.

The rounded escarpments have for centuries been covered with pleasant turf and browsed upon by sheep; but patient antiquarian research constantly brings to light its coins, torques, urns, arrow-heads, amulets; and rumour hints that yet more precious things lie concealed under those grassy mounds.

The aboriginal tribes have been succeeded by the Celt; the Celt by the Roman; the Roman by the Saxon; without any change in the place's inherent character, and without any lessening of its tyranny over the surrounding country. For though Leo's Hill dominates no longer by means of its external strength, it dominates, quite as completely, by means of its interior riches.

It is, in fact, a huge rock-island, washed by the leafy waves of the encircling valleys, and containing, as its hid treasure, stone enough to rebuild Babylon.

In that particular corner of the West Country, so distinct and deep-rooted are the legendary survivals, it is hard not to feel as though some vast spiritual conflict were still proceeding between the two opposed Mythologies — the one drawing its strength from the impulse to Power, and the other from the impulse to Sacrifice.

A village-dweller in Nevilton might, if he were philosophically disposed, be just as much a percipient of this cosmic struggle, as if he stood between the Palatine and St. Peter's.

Let him linger among the cranes and pulleys of this heathen promontory, and look westward to the shrine of the Holy Grail, or eastward to where rested the Holy Rood, and it would be strange if he did not become conscious of the presence of eternal spiritual antagonists, wrestling for the mastery.

He would at any rate be made aware of the fatal force of Inanimate Objects over human destiny.

There would seem to him something positively monstrous and sinister about the manner in which this brute mass of inert sandstone had possessed itself of the lives of the generations. It had come to this at last; that those who owned the Hill owned the dwellers beneath the Hill; and the Hill itself owned them that owned it.

The name by which the thing had come to be known indicated sufficiently well its nature.

Like a couchant desert-lion it overlooked its prey; and would continue to do so, as long as the planet lasted.

Out of its inexhaustible bowels the tawny monster fed the cities of seven countries — cities whose halls, churches, theatres, and markets, mocked the caprices of rain and sun as obdurately as their earth-bound parent herself.

The sandstone of Leo's Hill remains, so architects tell us, the only rival of granite, as a means for the perpetuation of human monuments. Even granite wears less well than this, in respect to the assaults of rain and flood. The solitary mysterious monoliths of Stonehenge, with their unknown, alien origin, alone seem to surpass it in their eternal perdurance.

As far as Nevilton itself is concerned everything in the place owes its persuasive texture to this resistant yet soft material. From the lordly Elizabethan mansion to the humblest pig-stye, they all proceed from the entrails of Leo's Hill; and they all still wear — these motley whelps of the great dumb beast — its tawny skin, its malleable sturdiness, its enduring consistence.

Who can resist a momentary wonder at the strange mutability of the fate that governs these things? The actual slabs, for example, out of which the high shafts and slender pinnacles of the church-tower were originally hewn, must once have lain in littered heaps for children to scramble upon, and dogs to rub against. And now they are the windy resting-places, and airy "coigns of vantage," of all the feathered tribes in their migrations!

What especially separates the Stone of Leo's Hill from its various local rivals, is its chameleon-like power of taking tone and colour from every element it touches. While Purbeck marble, for instance, must always remain the same dark, opaque, slippery thing it was when it left its Dorset coast; while Portland stone can do nothing but grow gloomier and gloomier, in its ashen-grey moroseness, under the weight of the London fogs; the tawny progeny of this tyrant of the western vales becomes amber-streaked when it restricts the play of fountains, orange-tinted when it protects herbacious borders, and rich as a petrified sunset when it drinks the evening light from the mellow front of a Cathedral Tower.

Apart from any geological affinity, it might almost seem as though this Leonian stone possessed some weird occult relation to those deep alluvial deposits which render the lanes and fields about Nevilton so thick with heavy earth.

Though closer in its texture to sand than to clay, it is with clay that its local usage is more generally associated, and it is into a clay-bed that it crumbles at last, when the earth retakes her own. Its prevailing colour is rather the colour of clay than of sand, and no material that could be found could lend itself more congruously to the clinging consistence of a clay floor.

It would be impossible to conceive of a temple of marble or Portland stone rising out of the embrace of the thick Nevilton soil. But Leonian sandstone seems no more than a concentrated petrifaction of such soil — its natural evocation, its organic expression. The soil calls out upon it day and night with friendly recognition, and day and night it answers the call. There is thus no escape for the human victims of these two accomplices. In confederate reciprocity the stone receives them from the clay, and the clay receives them from the stone. They pass from homes built irretrievably of the one, into smaller and more permanent houses, dug irretrievably out of the other.

The character of the soil in that corner of Somersetshire is marked, beyond everything else, by the clinging tenacity of its soft, damp, treacherous earth. It is a spot loved by the west-wind, and by the rains brought by the west-wind. Overshadowed by the lavish fertility of its abounding foliage, it never seems to experience enough sunshine to draw out of it the eternal presence of this oppressive dampness. The lush pastures may thicken, the rich gardens blossom, the ancient orchards ripen; but an enduring sense of something depressing and deep and treacherous lurks ever in the background of these pleasant things. Not a field but has its overshadowing trees; and not a tree but has its roots loosely buried in that special kind of soft, heavy earth, which an hour's rain can change into clinging mud.

It is in the Nevilton churchyard, when a new grave is being dug, that this sinister peculiarity of the earth-floor is especially noticeable. The sight of those raw, rough heaps of yellow clay, tossed out upon grass and flowers, is enough to make the living shrink back in terror from the oblong hole into which they have consigned their dead. All human cemeteries smell, like the hands of the Shakespearean king, of forlorn mortality; but such mortality seems more palpably, more oppressively emphasized among the graves of Nevilton than in other repositories of the dead. To be buried in many a burying-ground one knows, would be no more than a negative terror; no more than to be deprived, as Homer puts it, of the sweet privilege of the blessed air. But to be buried in Nevilton clay has a positive element in its dreadfulness. It is not so much to be buried, as to be sucked in, drawn down, devoured, absorbed. Never in any place does the peculiar congruity between the yellowness of the local clay and the yellowness of the local stone show so luridly as among these patient hillocks.

The tombstones here do not relieve the pressure of fate by appealing, in marble whiteness, away from the anthropophagous earth, to the free clouds of heaven. They are of the earth, and they conspire with the earth. They yearn to the soil, and the soil yearns to them. They weigh down upon the poor relics consigned to their care, in a hideous partnership with the clay that is working its will upon them.

And the rank vegetation of the place assists this treachery. Orange-tinted lichen and rusty-red weather-stains alternate with the encroachments of moss and weeds in reducing each separate protruding slab into conformity with what is about it and beneath it. This churchyard, whose stone and clay so cunningly intermingle, is in an intimate sense the very navel and centre of the village. Above it rises the tall perpendicular tower of St. Catharine's church; and beyond it, on the further side of a strip of pasture, a stagnant pond, and a solitary sycamore, stands the farm that is locally named "the Priory." This house, the most imposing of all in the village except the Manor, has as its immediate background the umbrageous conical eminence where the Holy Rood was found. It is a place adapted to modern usage from a noble fragment of monastic ruin. Here, in mediæval days, rose a rich Cistercian abbey, to which, doubtless, the pyramidal mount, in the background, offered a store of consecrated legends.

North of the churchyard, beyond the main village street with its formal town-like compactness, the ground slopes imperceptibly up, past a few enclosed cottage-orchards, to where, embosomed in gracious trees and Italianated gardens, stands the pride and glory of Nevilton, its stately Elizabethan house.

This house, founded in the reign of Henry VIII, synchronized in its foundation with the overthrow of the Cistercian Order, and was constructed entirely of Leonian stone, removed for the purpose of building it from the scene of the Priory's destruction. Twice over, then, in their human history, since they left the entrails of that brooding monster over which the Nevilton people see the sun set each day, had these carved pieces of sandstone contributed to the pride of the rulers of men.

Their first use had not been attended with an altogether propitious destiny. How far their present use will prove of happier omen remains a secret of the adamantine Fates. The imaginary weaving of events, upon which we are just now engaged, may perhaps serve, as certain liturgical formulæ of propitiation served in former days, as a means of averting the wrath of the Eumenides. For though made use of again and again for fair and pious purposes, something of the old heathen malignity of the Druid hill still seems to hang about the stone it yields; and over the substance of that stone's destiny the two Mythologies still struggle; Power and Sacrifice dividing the living and the dead.

CHAPTER II. NEVILTON

UNTIL WITHIN SOME twenty years of the date with which we are now concerned, the distinguished family who originally received the monastic estates from the royal despot had held them intact and unassailed. By an evil chance however, the property had extended itself, during the eighteenth century, so as to include the larger portion of Leo's Hill; and since that day its possession had been attended by misfortune. The ancient aboriginal fortress proved as fatal to its modern invaders as it had proved in remoter times to Roman, Saxon and Norman.

A fanciful imagination might indeed have amused itself with the curious dream, that some weird Druidic curse had been laid upon that grass-grown island of yellow rock, bringing disaster and eclipse to all who meddled with it. Such an imagination would have been able to fortify its fancy by recalling the suggestive fact that at the bottom of the large woodland pond, indicated in this narrative under the name of Auber Lake, was discovered, not many years before, an immense slab of Leonian stone, inscribed with symbols baffling interpretation, but suggesting, to one antiquarian mind at least, a hint of prehistoric Devil-Worship. However this may be, it is certain that the family of Seldom found themselves finally faced with the alternative of selling the place they loved or of seeing it lapse under their hands into confusion and neglect. Of these evil alternatives they chose the former; and thus the estates, properties, royalties, and appurtenances, of the historic Manor of Nevilton fell into the hands of a clever financier from Lombard Street.

The family of Mr. Mortimer Romer had never at any time bowed its knee in kings' houses. Nor were its religious antecedents marked by orthodox reputation. Mr. Romer was indeed in every sense of the word a "self-made man." But though neither Christian nor Jew, — for his grandfather, the fishmonger of Soho, had been of the Unitarian persuasion — it cannot be denied that he possessed the art of making himself thoroughly respected by both the baptized and the circumcised. He indeed pursued his main purpose, which was the acquiring of power, with an unscrupulousness worthy of a Roman Emperor. Possibly it was this Roman tenacity in him, combined with his heathen indifference to current theology, which propitiated the avenging deities of Leo's Hill. So far at any rate he had been eminently successful in his speculations. He had secured complete possession of every quarry on the formidable eminence; and the company of which he was both director and president was pursuing its activities in a hundred new directions. It had, in the few last years, gone so far as to begin certain engineering assaults upon those remote portions of the ancient escarpments that had been left untouched since the legions of Claudius Cæsar encamped under their protection.

The bulk of Mr. Romer's stone-works were on the Hill itself; but others, intended for the more delicate finishing touches, were situated in a convenient spot close to Nevilton Station. Out of these sheds and yards, built along the railway-track, arose, from morning to night, the monotonous, not unpleasing, murmur of wheels and saws and grindstones. The contrast between these sounds and the sylvan quietness of the vicarage garden, which sloped down towards them, was one of the most significant indications of the clash of the Two Mythologies in this place. The priest meditating among his roses upon the vanity of all but "heavenly habitations" might have been in danger of being too obtrusively reminded of the pride of the houses that are very definitely “made with hands.” Perhaps this was one of the reasons why the present incumbent of Nevilton had preferred a more undisturbed retreat.

The general manager of Mortimer Romer’s quarries was a certain Mr. Lickwit, who served also as his confidential adviser in many other spheres.

The works at Nevilton Station were left to the superintendence of two brothers named Andersen, skilled stone-cutters, sons of the famous Gideon Andersen known to architects all over the kingdom for his designs in Leonian stone. Both Gideon and his wife Naomi were buried in Nevilton churchyard, and the brothers were condemned in the village as persons of an almost scandalous piety because of their innocent habit of lingering on warm summer evenings over their parents’ grave. They lived together, these two, as lodgers with the station-master, in a newly built cottage close to their work. Their social position in the place was a curious and anomalous one. Their father’s reputation as a sculptor had brought him into touch with every grade of society; and the woman who became his wife was by birth what is usually termed a lady. Gideon himself had been a rough and gross fellow; and after his wife’s death had hastened to take his sons away from school and apprentice them to his own trade. They were in many respects a noteworthy pair, though scarcely favourites, either with their fellow-workmen or their manager.

James Andersen, the elder by some ten years, was of a morose, reserved temper, and though a capable workman never seemed happy in the work-shop. Luke, on the contrary, possessed a peculiarly sunny and serene spirit.

They were both striking in appearance. The younger approximated to that conventional type of beauty which is popularly known as being “like a Greek god.” The elder, tall, swarthy, and sinister, suggested rather the image of some gloomy idol carved on the wall of an Assyrian temple. What, however, was much more remarkable than their appearance was their devoted attachment to one another. They lived, worked, ate, drank, walked and slept together. It was impossible to separate them. Had Mr. Lickwit dismissed James, Luke would immediately have thrown down his tools. Had Luke been the banished one, James would have followed him into exile.

It had fallen to Mr. Romer, some seven years before our narrative begins, to appoint a new vicar to Nevilton; and he had appointed one of such fierce ascetic zeal and such pronounced socialistic sympathies, that he had done nothing since but vehemently and bitterly repent his choice.

The Promoter of Companies had been betrayed into this blunder by the impulse of revengeful caprice, the only impulse in his otherwise well-balanced nature that might be termed dangerous to himself.

He had quarrelled with the bishop over some matter connected with his stone-works; and in order to cause this distinguished prelate grief and annoyance he had looked about for someone to honour who was under the episcopal ban. The bishop, however, was of so discreet a temper and so popular in his diocese that the only rebel to his authority that could be discovered was one of the curates of a church at Yeoborough who had insisted upon preaching the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation.

The matter would probably have lapsed into quiescence, save for the crafty interference in the local newspaper of a group of aggressive Nonconformists, who took this opportunity of sowing desirable dissension between the higher and lower orders of the hated Establishment.

Mr. Romer, who, like Gallio, cared for none of these things, and was at heart a good deal worse than a Nonconformist, seized upon the chance offered by the death of Nevilton’s vicar; and installed as his successor this rebel to ecclesiastical authority.

Once installed, however, the Rev. Hugh Clavering speedily came to an understanding with his bishop; compromised on the matter of preaching Transubstantiation; and apparently was allowed to go on believing in it.

And it was then that the Promoter of Companies learned for the first time how much easier it is to make a priest than to unmake him. For situation after situation arose in which the master of the Leonian quarries found himself confronted by an alien Power — a Power that refused to worship Sandstone. Before this rupture, however, the young Priest had persuaded Mr. Romer to let him live in the Old Vicarage, a small but cheerful house just opposite the church door. The orthodox vicarage, a rambling Early Victorian structure standing in its own grounds at the end of the West Drive, was let — once more at the Priest's suggestion — to the last living representatives of the dispossessed Seldoms.

It indicated a good deal of spirit on the part of Valentia Seldom and her daughter thus to return to the home of their ancestors.

Mrs. Seldom was a cousin of the man who had sold the estate. Her daughter Vennie, brought up in a school at Florence, had never seen Nevilton, and it was with the idea of taking advantage for the girl's sake of their old prestige in that corner of England that Valentia accepted Mr. Romer's offer and became the vicarage tenant.

The quarry-owner himself was influenced in carrying through this affair, by his anxiety, for the sake of his daughter, to secure a firmer footing with the aristocracy of the neighborhood. Here again, however, he was destined to disappointment: for once in possession of her twenty years' lease the old lady showed not the least intention of letting herself be used as a social stepping-stone.

She had, indeed, under her own roof, cause enough for preoccupation and concern.

Her daughter — a little ghost-moth of a girl, of fragile delicacy — seemed entirely devoid of that mysterious magnetic attraction which lures to the side of most virgins the devotion of the opposite sex. She appeared perfectly content to remain forever in her tender maidenhood, and refused to exert the slightest effort to be "nice" to the charming young people her mother threw in her way. She belonged to that class of young girls who seem to be set apart by nature for other purposes than those of the propagation of the race.

Her wistful spirit, shrinking into itself like the leaves of a sensitive plant at the least approach of a rough hand, responded only to one passionate impulse, the impulse of religion.

She grew indeed so estranged from the normal world, that it was not only Valentia who concealed the thought that when she left the earth the ancient race of Seldoms would leave it with her.

Nor was it only in regard to her child's religious obsession that the lady suffered. She had flatly refused to let her enter into anything but the coldest relations with "those dreadful people at the House"; and it was with a peculiar shock of dismay that she found that the girl was not literally obeying her. It was not, however, to the Romers themselves that Vennie made her shy overtures, but to a luckless little relative of that family now domiciled with them as companion to Gladys Romer.

This young dependent, reputed in the village to be of Italian origin, struck the gentle heart of the last of the Seldoms with indescribable pity. She could not altogether define the impression the girl produced upon her, but it was a singularly oppressive one, and it vexed and troubled her.

The situation was wretchedly complicated. It was extremely difficult to get a word with the little companion without encountering Gladys; and any approach to intimacy with “the Romer girl” would have meant an impossible scene with Mrs. Seldom. Nor was it a light undertaking, in such hurried interviews as she did manage to secure, to induce the child to drop her reserve. She would fix her great brown foreign eyes — her name was Lacrima Traffio — on Vennie’s face, and make curious little helpless gestures with her hands when questions were asked her; but speak of herself she would not.

It was clear she was absolutely dependent on her cousins. Vennie gathered as much as that, as she once talked with her under the church wall, when Gladys was chatting with the vicar. A reference to her own people had nearly resulted in an outburst of tears. Vennie had had to be content with a broken whisper: “We come from Rapallo — they are all dead.” There was nothing, it appeared, that could be added to this.

It was perhaps a little inconsistent in the old lady to be so resolute against her daughter’s overtures to Lacrima, as she herself had no hesitation in making a sort of protégé of another of Mr. Romer’s tribe.

This was an eccentric middle-aged bachelor who had drifted into the place soon after the new-comer’s arrival and had established himself in a dilapidated cottage on the outskirts of the Auber woods.

Remotely related to Mrs. Romer, he had in some way become dependent on her husband, whose financial advantage over him was not, it seemed, as time went on, exerted in a very considerate manner.

Maurice Quincunx, for such was his unusual name, was an illegitimate descendant of one of the most historic houses in the neighborhood, but both his poverty and his opinions caused him to live what was practically the life of a hermit, and made him shrink away, even more nervously than little Vennie Seldom, from any intercourse with his equals.

The present possessors of his queer ancient name were now the Lords of Glastonbury, and had probably never so much as heard of Maurice's existence.

He would come by stealth to pay Valentia visits, preferring the evening hours when in the summer she used to sit with her work, on a terrace overlooking a sloping orchard, and watch Vennie water her roses.

The vicarage terrace was a place of extraordinary quiet and peace, eminently adapted to the low-voiced, nervous ramblings of a recluse of Maurice Quincunx's timidity.

The old lady by degrees quite won this eccentric's heart; and the queerly assorted friends would pace up and down for hours in the cool of the evening talking of things in no way connected either with Mr. Romer or the Church — the two subjects about which Mr. Quincunx held dangerously strong views.

Apart from this quaint outcast and the youthful parson, Mrs. Seldom's only other intimate in the place was a certain John Francis Taxater, a gentleman of independent means, living by himself with an old housekeeper in a cottage called The Gables, situated about half-way between the vicarage and the village.

Mr. Taxater was a Catholic and also a philosopher; these two peculiarities affording the solution to what otherwise would have been an insoluble psychic riddle. Even as it was, Mr. Taxater's mind was of so subtle and complicated an order, that he was at once the attraction and the despair of all the religious thinkers of that epoch. For it must be understood that though quietly resident under the shadow of Nevilton Mount, the least essay from Mr. Taxater's pen was eagerly perused by persons interested in religious controversy in all the countries of Europe.

He wrote for philosophical journals in London, Paris, Rome and New York; and there often appeared at The Gables most surprising visitors from Germany and Italy and Spain.

He had a powerful following among the more subtle-minded of the Catholics of England; and was highly respected by important personages in the social, as well as the literary circles, of Catholic society.

The profundity of his mind may be gauged from the fact that he was able to steer his way successfully through the perilous reefs of “modernistic” discussion, without either committing himself to heretical doctrine or being accused of reactionary ultramontanism.

Mr. Taxater’s written works were, however, but a trifling portion of his personality. His intellectual interests were as rich and varied as those of some great humanist of the Italian Renaissance, and his personal habits were as involved and original as his thoughts were complicated and deep.

He was perpetually engaged in converting the philosopher in him to Catholicism, and the Catholic in him to philosophy — yet he never permitted either of these obsessions to interfere with his enjoyment of life.

Luke Andersen, who was perhaps of all the inhabitants of Nevilton most conscious of the drama played around him, used to maintain that it was impossible to tell in the last resort whether Mr. Taxater’s place was with the adherents of Christ or with the adherents of Anti-Christ. Like his prototype, the evasive Erasmus, he seemed able to be on both sides at the same time.

Perhaps it was a secret consciousness of the singular position of Nevilton, planted, as it were, between two streams of opposing legend, that originally led Mr. Taxater to take up his abode in so secluded a spot.

It is impossible to tell. In this as in all other transactions of his life he combined an unworldly simplicity with a Machiavellian astuteness. If the Day of Judgment revealed him as being on the side of the angels, it might also reveal him as having exercised, in the microcosmic Nevilton drama, as well as in his wider sphere, one of the most subtle influences against the Powers of Darkness that those Powers ever encountered in their invisible activity.

At the moment when the present narrative takes up the woven threads of these various persons' lives there seemed every prospect that in external nature at least there was going to be an auspicious and halcyon season. June had opened with abnormal pleasantness. Exquisite odours were in the air, wafted from woods and fields and gardens. White dust, alternating with tender spots of coolness where the shadows of trees fell, lent the roads in the vicinity that leisured gala-day expectancy which one notes in the roads of France and Spain, but which is so rare in England.

It seemed almost as though the damp sub-soil of the place had relaxed its malign influence; as though the yellow clay in the churchyard had ceased its calling for victims; and as though the brooding monster in the sunset, from which every day half the men of the village returned with their spades and picks, had put aside, as irrelevant to a new and kindlier epoch, its ancient hostility to the Christian dwellers in that quiet valley.

CHAPTER III. OLYMPIAN CONSPIRACY

THE DEPTHS OF Mr. Romer’s mind, as he paced up and down the Leonian pavement under the east front of his house on one of the early days of this propitious June, were seething with predatory projects. The last of the independent quarries on the Hill had just fallen into his hands after a legal process of more than usual chicanery, conducted in person by the invaluable Mr. Lickwit.

He was now occupied in pushing through Parliament a bill for the reduction of railway freight charges, so that the expense of carrying his stone to its various destinations might be materially reduced. But it was not only of financial power that he thought as the smell of the roses from the sun-baked walls floated in upon him across the garden.

The man’s commercial preoccupations had not by any means, as so often happens, led to the atrophy of his more personal instincts.

His erotic appetite, for instance, remained as insatiable as ever. Age did not dull, nor finance wither, that primordial craving. The aphrodisiac instincts in Mortimer Romer were, however, much less simple than might be supposed.

In this hyper-sensual region he had more claim to artistic subtlety than his enemies realized. He rarely allowed himself the direct expansion of frank and downright lasciviousness. His little pleasures were indirect, elaborate, far-fetched.

He afforded really the interesting spectacle of one whose mind was normal, energetic, dynamic; but whose senses were slow, complicated, fastidious. He was a formidable forward-marching machine, with a heart of elaborate perversity. He was a thick-skinned philistine with the sensuality of a sybarite.

I do not mean to imply that there was any lack of rapacity in the senses of Mr. Romer. His senses were indeed unfathomable in their devouring depths. But they were liable to fantastic caprices. They were not the simple animal senses of a Gothic barbarian. They assumed imperial contortions.

The main eccentricity of the erotic tendencies of this remarkable man lay in the elaborate pleasure he derived from his sense of power. The actual lure of the flesh had little attraction for him. What pleased him was a slow tightening of his grip upon people — upon their wills, their freedom, their personality.

Any impression a person might make upon Mr. Romer's senses was at once transformed into a desire to have that person absolutely at his mercy. The thought that he held such a one reduced to complete spiritual helplessness alone satisfied him.

The first time he had encountered Lacrima Traffio he had been struck by her appealing eyes, her fragile figure, her frightened gestures. Deep in his perverted heart he had desired her; but his desire, under the psychic law I have endeavoured to explain, quickly resolved itself into a resolution to take possession of her, not as his mistress, but as his slave.

Nor did the subtle elaboration of his perversity stop there. It were easy and superficial to dominate in his own person so helpless a dependent. What was less easy was to reduce her to submission to the despotic caprices of his daughter, a girl only a few years older than herself.

The enjoyment of a sense of vicarious power was a satisfaction curiously provocative to his predatory craving. Nor did subtlety of the situation stop at that point. It was not only necessary that the girl who attracted him should be at his daughter's mercy; it was necessary that his daughter should not be unconscious of the rôle she herself played. It was necessary that they should be in a sense confederates in this game of cat-and-mouse.

As Mr. Romer paced the terrace of his imposing mansion a yet profounder triumph presented itself in the recesses of his imperial nature.

He had lately introduced into his "entourage" a certain brother-in-law of his, the widower of his sister, a man named John Goring. This individual was of a much simpler, grosser type than the recondite quarry-owner. He was, indeed, no more than a narrow-minded, insolent, avaricious animal. He lacked even the superficial gentility of his formidable relation. Nor had his concentrated but unintelligent avarice brought him, so far, any great wealth. He still remained, in spite of Romer's help, what he had been born, an English farmer of unpropitiating manners and supernal greed.

The Promoter of Companies was, however, not unaware, any more than was Augustus Cæsar, of the advantage accruing to a despot from the possession of devoted, if unattractive, tools; and contemptuously risking the shock to his social prestige of such an apparition in the neighborhood, he had secured Mr. Goring as a permanent tenant of the largest farm on his estate. This was no other than the Priory Farm, with its gentle monastic memories. What the last Prior of Nevilton would have thought could he have left his grave under St. Catharine's altar and reappeared among his dove-cotes it is distressing to surmise. He would doubtless have drawn from the sight of John Goring a profoundly edifying moral as to the results of royal interference with Christ's Holy Church. Nor is it likely that an encounter with Mr. Romer himself would have caused less astonishment to his mediæval spirit. He would, indeed, have recognized that what is now called Progress is no mere scientific phrase; but a most devastating reality. He would have found that Nevilton had "progressed" very far. He would have believed that the queer stone-devils that his monks had carved, half emerging from the eaves of the church-roof, had got quite loose and gone abroad among men. Had he probed, in the manner of clairvoyant saints, the troubled recesses of Mr. Romer's mind as that gentleman inhaled the sweet noon air, he would have cried aloud his indignation and made the sign of the cross as if over a mortuary of spiritual decomposition.

For as the mid-day sun of that hot June morning culminated, and the clear hard shadows fell, sharp and thin, upon the orange-tinted pavement, it entered Mr. Romer's head that he might make a more personal use of his farmer-brother than had until now been possible.

With this idea in his brain he entered the house and sought his wife in her accustomed place at the corner of the large reception-hall. He sat down forthright by the side of her mahogany table and lit a cigar. As Mr. Romer was the species of male animal that might be written down in the guidebook of some Martian visitor as "the cigar-smoking variety" his wife would have taken her place among "the sedentary knitting ones."

She was a large, fair, plump, woman, as smooth and pallid as her husband was grizzled and ruddy. Her obsequious deference to her lord's views was only surpassed by her lethargic animal indolence. She was like a great, tame, overgrown, white-skinned Puma. Her eyes had the greenish tint of feline eyes, and something of their daylight contraction. Her use of spectacles did not modify this tendency, but rather increased it; for the effect of the round glass orbs pushed up upon her forehead was to enhance the malicious gleam of the little narrow-lidded slits that peered out beneath them.

It may be imagined with what weary and ironical detachment the solemn historic portraits of the ancient Seldoms — for the pictures and furniture had been sold with the house — looked out from their gilded frames upon these ambiguous intruders. But neither husband nor wife felt the least touch of "compunctuous visiting" as they made themselves at ease under that immense contempt.

"I have been thinking," said Mr. Romer, puffing a thick cloud of defiant smoke into the air, so that it went sailing up to the very feet of a delicate Reynolds portrait; "I have been thinking that I am really quite unjustified in going on with that allowance to Quincunx. He ought to realize that he has completely exhausted the money your aunt left him. He ought to face the situation, instead of quietly accepting our gift as if it were his right. And they tell me he does not even keep a civil tongue in his head. Lickwit was only complaining the other day about his tampering with our workmen. He has been going about for some time with those damned Andersen fellows, and no doubt encouraging them in their confounded impertinence.

"I don't like the man, my dear; — that is the plain truth. I have never liked him; and he has certainly never even attempted to conceal his dislike of me."

"He is very polite to your face, Mortimer," murmured the lady.

"Exactly," Mr. Romer rejoined, "to my face he is more than polite. He is obsequious; he is cringing. But behind my back — damn him! — the rascal is a rattlesnake."

"Well, dear, no doubt it has all worked out for the best"; purred the plump woman, softly counting the threads of her knitting. "You were in need of Aunt's money at the time — in great need of it."

"I know I was," replied the Promoter of Companies, "I know I was; and he knows I was. That is why I have been giving him six per cent on what he lent me. But the fellow has had more than that. He has had more by this time than the whole original sum; and I tell you, Susan, it's got to end; — it's got to end here, now, and forever!"

Mr. Romer's cigar-smoke had now floated up above the feet of the Reynolds Portrait and was invading its gentle and melancholy face. It was a portrait of a young girl in the court-dress of the time, but with such pathetic nun-like features that it was clear that little Vennie was not the only one of her race to have grown weary of this rough world.

"It is a providential thing, dear," whispered the knitting female, "that there were no horrid documents drawn up about that money. Maurice cannot impose upon us in that way."

"He is doing worse," answered her husband. "He is imposing upon us on the strength of a disgusting sort of sickly sentiment. He has had all his money back and more; and he knows he has. But he wants to go on living on my money while he abuses me on every occasion. Do you know, he even preaches in that confounded social meeting? I shall have that affair put a stop to, one of these days. It is only an excuse for spreading dissatisfaction in the village. Lickwit has complained to me about it more than once. He says that Socialistic scoundrel Wone is simply using the meeting to canvass for his election. You know he is going to stand, in place of Sir Herbert Ratcliffe? What the Liberal Party is doing I cannot conceive — pandering to these slimy windbags! And your blessed relation backs him up. The thing is monstrous, outrageous! Here am I, allowing this fellow a hundred a year to live in idleness; and he is plotting against me at my very doorstep."

"Perhaps he does not know that the Conservative member is going to retire in your favour," insinuated the lady.

"Know? Of course he knows! All the village knows. All the country knows. You can never hide things of that kind. He knows, and he is deliberately working against me."

"It would be nice if he could get a place as a clerk," suggested Mr. Quincunx's relative, pensively. "It certainly does not seem fair that you, who work so hard for the money you make, should support him in complete idleness."

Mr. Romer looked at her thoughtfully, knocking the ashes from his cigar. "I believe you have hit it there, my dear," he said. Then he smiled in a manner peculiarly malignant. "Yes, it would be very nice if he could get a place as a clerk — a place where he would have plenty of simple office work — a place where he would be kept to his desk, and not allowed to roam the country corrupting honest workmen. Yes, you are quite right, Susan; a clerk's place is what this Quincunx wants. And, by Heaven, what he shall have! I'll bring the affair to a head at once. I'll put it to him that your aunt's money is at an end, and that I have already paid him back in full all that he lent me. I'll put it to him that he is now in my debt. In fact, that he is now entirely dependent on me to the tune of a hundred a year. And I'll explain to him that he must either go out into the world and shift for himself, as better men than he have had to do, or enter Lickwit's office, either in Yeoborough or on the Hill."

"He will enter the office, Mortimer," murmured the lady; "he will enter the office. Maurice is not the man to emigrate, or do anything of that kind. Besides he has a reason" — here her voice became so extremely mellifluous that it might almost be said to have liquefied— "to stay in Nevilton."

"What's this?" cried Romer, getting up and throwing his cigar out of the window. "You don't mean to tell me — eh? — that this scarecrow is in love with Gladys?"

The lady purred softly and replaced her spectacles. "Oh dear no! What an idea! Oh certainly, certainly not! But Gladys, you know, is not the only girl in Nevilton."

"Who the devil is it then? Not Vennie Seldom, surely?"

"Look nearer, Mortimer, look nearer"; murmured the lady with sibilant sweetness.

"Not Lacrima! You don't mean to say—"

"Why, dear, you needn't be so surprised. You look more angry than if it had been Gladys herself. Yes, of course it is Lacrima. Hadn't you observed it? But you dear men are so stupid, aren't you, in these things?"

Mrs. Romer rubbed one white hand over the other; and beamed upon her husband through her spectacles.

Mr. Romer frowned. "But the Traffio girl is so, so — you know what I mean."

"So quiet and unimpressionable. Ah! my dear, it is just these quiet girls who are the very ones to be enjoying themselves on the sly."

"How far has this thing gone, Susan?"

"Oh you needn't get excited, Mortimer. It has not really 'gone' anywhere. It has hardly begun. In fact I have not the least authority for saying that she cares for him at all. I think she does a little, though. I think she does. But one never can tell. I can, however, give you my word that he cares for her. And that is what we were talking about, weren't we?"

"I shall pack him off to my office in London," said Mr. Romer.

"He wouldn't go, my dear. I tell you he wouldn't go."

"But he can't live on nothing."

"He can. He will. Sooner than leave Nevilton Maurice would eat grass. He would become lay-reader or something. He would sponge on Mrs. Seldom."

"Well, then he shall walk to Yeoborough and back every day. That will cool his blood for him."

"That will do him a great deal of good, dear; a great deal of good. Auntie always used to say that Maurice ought to take more exercise."

"Lickwit will exercise him! Make no mistake about that."

"How you do look round you, dear, in all these things! How impossible it is for anyone to fool you, Mortimer!"

As Mrs. Romer uttered these words she glanced up at the Reynolds portrait above their heads, as if half-suspecting that such fawning flattery would bring down the mockery of the little Lady-in-Waiting.

"I can't help thinking Lacrima would make a very good wife to some hard-working sensible man," Mr. Romer remarked.

His lady looked a little puzzled. "It would be difficult to find so suitable a companion for Gladys," she said.

"Oh, of course I don't mean till Gladys is married," said the quarry-owner quickly. "By the way, when is she going to accept that young fool of an Ilminster?"

"All in good time, my dear, all in good time," purred his wife. "He has not proposed to her yet."

"It's very curious," remarked Mr. Romer pensively, "that a young man of such high connections should wish to marry our daughter."

"What things you say, Mortimer! Isn't Gladys going to inherit all this property? Don't you suppose that a younger son of Lord Tintinhull would jump at the idea of being master of this house?"

"He won't be master of it while I live," said Mr. Romer grimly.

"In my opinion he never will be"; added the lady. "I don't think Gladys really intends to accept him."

"She'll marry somebody, I hope?" said the master sharply.

"O yes she'll marry, soon enough. Only it'll be a cleverer man, and a richer man, than young Ilminster."

"Have you any other pleasant little romance to fling at me?"

"O no. But I know what our dear Gladys is. I know what she is looking out for."

"When she does marry," said Mr. Romer, "we shall have to think seriously what is to become of Lacrima. Look here, my dear," — it was wonderful, the pleasant ejaculatory manner in which this flash of inspiration was thrown out,— "why not marry her to John? She would be just the person for a farmer's wife."

Mrs. Romer, to do her justice, showed signs of being a little shocked at this proposal.

"But John," — she stammered;— "John — is not — exactly — a marrying person, is he?"

"He is — what I wish him to be"; was her husband's haughty answer.

"Oh well, of course, dear, it's as you think best. Certainly" — the good woman could not resist this little thrust— "it's John's only chance of marrying a lady. For Lacrima is that — with all her faults."

"I shall talk to John about it"; said the Promoter of Companies. Feline thing though she was, Susan Romer could not refrain from certain inward qualms when she thought of the fragile hyper-sensitive Italian in the embraces of John Goring. What on earth set her husband dreaming of such a thing? But he was subject to strange caprices now and then; and it was more dangerous to balk him in these things than in his most elaborate financial plots. She had found that out already. So, on the present occasion, she made no further remark, than a reiterated— "How you do look all round you, Mortimer! It is not easy for anyone to fool you."

She rose from her seat and collected her knitting. “I must go and see where Gladys is,” she said.

Mr. Romer followed her to the door, and went out again upon the terrace. The little nun-like Lady-in-Waiting looked steadily out across the room, her pinched attenuated features expressing nothing but patient weariness of all the ways of this mortal world.

CHAPTER IV. REPRISALS FROM BELOW

IT WAS APPROACHING the moment consecrated to the close of the day’s labour in the stone-works by Nevilton railway-station. The sky was cloudless; the air windless. It was one of those magical arrests of the gliding feet of time, which afternoons in June sometimes bring with them, holding back, as it were, all living processes of life, in sweet and lingering suspense. The steel tracks of the railway-line glittered in the sun. In the fields, that sloped away beyond them, the browsing cattle wore that unruffled air of abysmal indifference, which seems to make one day in their sight to be as a thousand years. To these placid earth-children, drawing the centuries together in solemn continuity, the tribes of men and their turbulent drama were but as vapours that came and went. The high elms in the hedges had already assumed that dark monotonous foliage which gives to their patient stillness on such a day an atmosphere of monumental expectancy. A flock of newly-sheared sheep, clean and shining in the hot sun, drifted in crowded procession down the narrow road, leaving a cloud of white dust behind them that remained stationary in the air long after they had passed. In the open stone-yard close to the road the brothers Andersen were working together, chipping and hammering with bare arms at an enormous Leonian slab, carving its edges into delicate mouldings. The younger of the two wore no hat, and his closely clipped fair curls and loose shirt open at the throat, lent him, as he moved about his work with easy gestures, a grace and charm well adapted to that auspicious hour.

A more sombre form by his brother’s side, his broad brimmed hat low down over his forehead, the elder Andersen went on with his carving, in imperturbable morose absorption.

Watching them with languid interest, their arms linked together, stood the figures of two girls. The yellow dust from the sandstone rose intermittently into the air, mingling with the white dust from the road and settling, as it sank earthward, upon the leaves of the yet unbudded knapweed and scabious which grew in the thin dusty grass.

Between Gladys and her cousin — for the girls had wandered as far as this in search of distraction after their lazy tea on the great lawn — a curious contrast was now displayed.

Gladys, with slow provocative interest, was intent on every movement of Luke's graceful figure. Lacrima's attention wandered wistfully away, to the cattle and the orchards, and then to the sheep, which now were being penned in a low line of spacious railway trucks.

Luke himself was by no means unaware of the condescending interest of his master's daughter. He paused in his work once or twice. He turned up his shirt-sleeves still higher. He bent down, to blow away the dust from the moulding he had made. Something very like a flash of amorous admiration passed across his blue eyes as he permitted them slyly to wander from Gladys' head to her waist, and from her waist to her shoes. She certainly was an alluring figure as she stood there in her thin white dress. The hand which pulled her skirt away from the dust showed as soft and warm as if it were pleading for a caress, and the rounded contours of her bosom looked as if they had ripened with the early peaches, under the walls of her stately garden. She presently unlinked her arm from her companion's, and sliding it softly round Lacrima's side drew the girl close against her. As she did this she permitted a slow amorous glance of deliberate tantalization to play upon the young carver. How well Luke Andersen knew that especial device of maidens when they are together — that way they have of making their playful, innocent caresses such a teasing incentive! And Luke knew well how to answer all this. Nothing could have surpassed in subtle diplomacy the manner in which he responded, without responding, to the amorous girl's overtures. He let her realize that he himself understood precisely the limits of the situation; that she was perfectly at liberty to enter a mock-flirtation with him, without the remotest risk of any "faux pas" on his part spoiling the delicacy of their relations.

What was indeed obvious to her, without the necessity of any such unspoken protestation, was the fact that he found her eminently desirable. Nor did her pride as "the girl up at the house" quarrel with her vanity as the simple object of Luke's admiration. She wanted him to desire her as a girl; — to desire her to madness. And then she wanted to flout him, with her pretensions as a lady. This particular occasion was by no means the first time she had drifted casually down the vicarage hill and lingered beside the stone-cutters. It was, however, an epoch in their curious relations. For the first time since she had been attracted to him, she deliberately moved close up to the stone he worked at, and entered into conversation. While this occurred, Lacrima, released from her rôle as the accomplice of amorous teasing, wandered away, picking listlessly the first red poppies of the year, which though less flaunting in their bold splendour than those of her childhood's memories, were at least the same immortal classical flowers.

As she bent down in this assuaging pastime, letting her thoughts wander so far from Nevilton and its tyrants, Lacrima became suddenly conscious that James Andersen had laid down his tools, resumed his coat, and was standing by her side.

"A beautiful evening, Miss"; he said respectfully, holding his hat in his hand and regarding her with grave gentleness.

“Yes, isn’t it?” she answered at once; and then was silent; while a sigh she could not suppress rose from the depths of her heart. For her thoughts reverted to another fair evening, in the days when England was no more than a name; and a sudden overpowering longing for kind voices, and the shadows of olives on warm hill-sides, rushed, like a wave, over her.

“This must be near the Angelus-hour,” she thought; and somehow the dark grave eyes of the man beside her and his swarthy complexion made her think of those familiar forms that used to pass driving their goats before them up the rocky paths of the Apennine range.

“You are unhappy, Miss,” said James in a low voice; and these words, the only ones of genuine personal tenderness, except for poor Maurice’s, that had struck her sense for the last twelve months, brought tears to her eyes. Vennie Seldom had spoken kindly to her; but — God knows — there is a difference between the kindness even of the gentlest saint and this direct spontaneous outflow of one heart to another. She smiled; a little mournful smile.

“Yes; I was thinking of my own country,” she murmured.

“You are an Italian, Miss; I know it”; continued Andersen, instinctively leading her further away from the two golden heads that now were bending so close together over the Leonian stone.

“I often think of Italy,” he went on; “I think I should be at home in Italy. I love everything I hear of it, everything I read of it. It comes from my mother, this feeling. She was a lady, you know Miss, as well born as any and with a passionate love of books. She used to read Dante in that little ‘Temple’ Series, which perhaps you have seen, with the Italian on one side and the English on the other. I never look at that book without thinking of her.”

"You have many books yourself, I expect, — Mr. — Andersen. You see I know your name." And Lacrima smiled, the first perfectly happy smile she had been betrayed into for many months.

"It is not a very nice name," said James, a little plaintively. "I wish I had a name like yours Miss — Traffio."

"Why, I think yours is quite as nice," she answered gravely. "It makes me think of the man who wrote the fairy stories."

James Andersen frowned, "I don't like fairy stories," he said almost gruffly. "They tease and fret me. I like Thomas Hardy's books. Do you know Thomas Hardy?" Lacrima made a little involuntary gesture of depreciation. As a matter of fact her reading, until very lately, had been as conventual as that of a young nun. Vennie Seldom or the demure Reynolds girl could not have been more innocent of the darker side of literature. Hardy's books she had seen in the hands of Gladys, and the association repelled her. Pathetically anxious to brush away this little cloud, she began hurriedly talking to her new friend of Italy; of its cities, its sea-coasts, its monasteries, its churches. James Andersen listened with reverential attention, every now and then asking a question which showed how deeply his mother's love of the classical country had sunk into his nature.

By this time they had wandered along the road as far as a little stone bridge with low parapets which crosses there a muddy Somersetshire stream. From this point the road rises quite steeply to the beginning of the vicarage garden. Leaning against the parapet of the little bridge, and looking back, they saw to their surprise that Gladys and Luke had not only not followed them but had completely disappeared.

The last of the unskilled workmen from the sheds, trailing up the road together laughing and chatting, turned when they passed, and gazed back, as our two companions were doing, at the work-shops they had left, acknowledging Lacrima’s gentle “good-night” with a rather shifty salutation. — This girl was after all only a dependent like themselves. — They had hardly gone many steps before they burst into a loud rough guffaw of rustic impertinence.

Lacrima struck the ground nervously with her parasol. “What has happened?” she asked; “where has Gladys gone?”

James Andersen shrugged his shoulders, “I expect they have wandered into the shed,” he rejoined, “to look at my brother’s work there.”

She glanced nervously up and down the road; gave a quaint little sigh and made an expressive gesture with her hands as if disclaiming all responsibility for her cousin’s doings. Then, quite suddenly, she smiled at Andersen with a delicious childish smile that transfigured her face.

“Well, I am glad I am not left alone at any rate,” she said.

“I have a presentiment,” the stone-cutter answered, “that this is not the last time you will be thrown upon my poor company.”

The girl blushed, and smiled confidingly. Her manner was the manner of a child, who has at last found a safe protector. Then all of a sudden she became very grave. “I hope,” she said, “that you are one of the people who are kind to Mr. Quincunx. He is a great friend of mine.”

Never had the melancholy intimation, that one could not hope to hold anything but the second place in a woman’s heart, been more tenderly or more directly conveyed!

James Andersen bowed his head.

“Mr. Quincunx has always been very kind to me,” he said, “and certainly, after what you say, I shall do all in my power to help him. But I can do very little. I believe Mrs. Seldom understands him better than anyone else.”

He had hardly finished speaking when the figures of two men made themselves visible opposite the back entrance of the vicarage. They were leisurely strolling down the road, and every now and then they would pause, as if the interest of their conversation was more than the interest of the way.

"Why! There is Mr. Quincunx," cried the Italian; and she made an instinctive movement as if to put a little further space between herself and her companion. "Who is that person with him?" she added.

"It looks like George Wone," answered the stone-cutter. "Yes, it is George; and he is talking as usual at the top of his voice. You'd suppose he wanted to be heard by all Nevilton."

Lacrima hesitated and looked very embarrassed. She evidently did not know whether to advance in the direction of the new-comers or to remain where she was. Andersen came to her rescue.

"Perhaps," said he, "it would be better if I went back and told Miss Romer you are waiting for her." Lacrima gave him a quick glance of responsive gratitude.

"O, that would be really kind of you, Mr. Andersen," she said.

The moment he had gone, however, she felt annoyed that she had let him go. It looked so odd, she thought, his leaving her so suddenly, directly Maurice came on the scene. Besides, what would Gladys say at this interruption of her pleasure? She would suppose she had done it out of pure spitefulness! The moments seemed very long to her as she waited at the little bridge, tracing indecipherable hieroglyphics in the dust with the end of her parasol. She kept her eyes steadily fixed on the tall retreating figure of the stone-cutter as he slouched with his long shambling stride towards the work-shop. The two men were not, however, really long in approaching. Maurice had seen her from the beginning, and his replies to Mr. Wone's oratory had grown proportionally brief.

When they reached her, the girl shook hands with Maurice and bowed rather coldly to Mr. Wone. That gentleman was not however in the least quelled or suppressed. It was one of his most marked characteristics to have absolutely no consciousness of season or situation. When less clever people would have wished the earth to swallow them up, Mr. Wone remained imperviously self-satisfied. Having exchanged greetings, Lacrima hastened to explain that she was waiting at this spot till Miss Romer should rejoin her. “Luke Andersen is showing her his work,” she said, “and James has gone to tell her I am waiting.”

Mr. Wone became voluble at this. “It is a shame to keep a young lady like yourself waiting in the middle of the road.” He turned to Mr. Quincunx. “We must not say all we think, must we? But begging this young lady’s pardon, it is just like the family. No consideration! No consideration for anyone! It is the same with his treatment of the poor. I am talking of Mr. Romer, you know, Miss. I would say the same thing to his face. Why is it that hard-working clever fellows, like these Andersens for instance, should do all the labour, and he get all the profits? It isn’t fair. It’s unjust. It’s an insult to God’s beautiful earth, which is free to all.” He paused to take breath, and looked to Maurice for confirmation of his words.

“You are quite right, Wone; you are quite right,” muttered the recluse in his beard, furtively glancing at Lacrima.

Mr. Wone continued his discourse, making large and eloquent allusion to the general relations in England between employer and employed, and implying plainly enough his full knowledge that at least one of his hearers belonged to the latter class. His air, as he spoke, betrayed a certain disordered fanaticism, quite genuine and deeply felt, but queerly mingled with an indescribable element of complacent self-conceit. Lacrima, in spite of considerable sympathy with much that he said, felt that there was, in the man himself, something so slipshod, so limp, so vague, and so patently vulgar, that both her respect for his sincerity and her interest in his opinions were reduced to nothing. Not only was he narrow-minded and ignorant; but there was also about him, in spite of the aggressive violence of his expressions, an odd sort of deprecatory, apologetic air, as though he were perpetually endeavouring to cajole his audience, by tacit references to his deferential respect for them. There was indeed more than a little in him of the sleek unction of the nonconformist preacher; and one could well understand how he might combine, precisely as Mr. Lickwit suspected, the divergent functions of the politician and the evangelist.

"I tell you," he was saying, "the country will not long put up with this sort of thing. There is a movement, a tendency, a volcanic upheaval, a stirring of waters, which these plutocrats do not realize. There is a surging up from the depths of — of—" He paused for a word.

"Of mud," murmured Mr. Quincunx.

" — Of righteous revolt against these atrocious inequalities! The working people are asleep no longer. They're roused. The movement's begun. The thunder's gathering on the horizon. The armies of the exploited are feeling the impulse of their own strength, of that noble, that splendid anger, which, when it is conceived, will bring forth — will bring forth—"

"Damnation," murmured Mr. Quincunx.

The three figures as they stood, thus consorted, on the little stone bridge, made up a dramatic group. The sinking sun threw their shadows in long wavering lines upon the white road, distorting them to so grotesque a length that they nearly reached the open gates of the station.

Human shadows! What a queer half-mocking commentary they make upon the vanity of our passionate excitements, roused by anything, quieted by nothing, as the world moves round!

Lacrima, in her shadow, was not beautiful at all. She was an elongated wisp of darkness. The beard of Mr. Quincunx looked as if it belonged to a mammoth goat, and the neck of Mr. Wone seemed to support, not a human cranium at all, but a round, wagging mushroom.

The hushed fields on each side of the way began to assume that magical softness which renders them, at such an hour, insubstantial, unreal, remote, transformed. One felt as though the earth might indeed be worthy of better destinies than those that traced their fantastic trails up and down its peaceful surface. Something deeply withheld, seemed as though it only needed the coming of one god-like spirit to set it free forever, and, with it, all the troubled hearts of men. It was one of those moments which, whether the participants in them recognize them or not, at the actual time, are bound to recur, long afterwards, to their memory.

Lacrima, half-listening to Mr. Wone, kept her head anxiously turned in the direction of the sheds, into one of which she had observed James Andersen enter.

Maurice Quincunx, his mood clogged and clotted by jealousy, watched her with great melancholy grey eyes, while with his nervous fingers he plucked at his beard.

“The time is coming — the time is coming”; cried Mr. Wone, striking with the back of his fist, the parapet against which he leaned, “when this exploitation of the poor by the rich will end once for all!” The warmth of his feeling was so great, that large drops of sweat trickled down his sallow cheeks, and hanging for a moment at the end of his narrow chin, fell into the dust. The man was genuinely moved; though in his watery blue eyes no trace of any fire was visible. He looked, in his emotion, like an hypnotized sick person, talking in the stress of a morbid fever. It was the revolt of one who carried the obsequious slavery of generations in his blood, and could only rebel in galvanized moribund spasms. The fellow was unpleasing, uninspiring: not the savage leader of a race of stern revolutionary devotees fired by the iron logic of their cause, but the inchoate inarticulate voice of clumsy protest, apologizing and propitiating, even while it protested. The vulgarity and meanness of the candidate's tone made one wonder how such a one as he could ever have been selected by the obscure working of the Spirit of Sacrifice, to undertake this titanic struggle against the Spirit of Power. One turned away instinctively from his febrile rhetoric, to cast involuntary incense at the feet of the masterful enemy he opposed. He had no reticence in his enthusiasm, no reserve, no decency.

"You may perhaps not know," he blundered on; "that the General Election is much nearer than people think. Mr. Romer will find this out; he will find it out; he will find it out! I have good authority for what I say. I speak of what I know, young lady." This was said rather severely, for Lacrima's attention was so obviously wandering.— "Of course you will not breathe a word of this, up there," — he nodded in the direction of the House. "It would not do. But the truth is, he is making a great mistake. I am prepared for this campaign, and he is not. He is even thinking of reducing the men's wages still further. The fool — the fool — the fool! For he is a fool, you know, though he thinks he is so clever."

Even Mr. Wone would scarcely have dared to utter these bold asseverations in the ear of Gladys Romer's cousin, if Maurice's innate indiscretion had not made it the gossip of the village that the Italian was ill-treated "among those people." To the pathetic man's poor vulgar turn of mind there was something soothing in this confidential abuse of the lord of Nevilton Manor to his own relation. It had a squalid piquancy. It was itself a sort of revenge.

Once more he began his spasmodic enunciation of those sad economic platitudes that are the refuge of the oppressed; but Mr. Quincunx had crossed the road, in the pursuit of a decrepit tiger-moth, and was listening no more. Lacrima's attention was completely withdrawn.

"Well, dear friends," he concluded, "I must really be getting back to my supper. Mrs. Wone will be unbearable if I am late." He hesitated a moment as if wondering whether the occasion called for any further domestic jocosity, to let these high matters lightly down to earth; but he contented himself with shaking hands with Mr. Quincunx and removing his hat to Lacrima.

"Good night, dear friends," he repeated, drifting off, up the road, humming a hymn tune.

"Poor man!" whispered the girl, "he means well."

"He ought to be shot!" was the unexpected response of the hermit of Dead Man's Cottage, as he let the tiger-moth flutter down into the edge of the field. "He is no better than the rest. He is an idiot. He ought to learn Latin."

They moved together towards the station.

"I don't like the way you agree with people to their face," said Lacrima, "and abuse them behind their backs."

"I don't like the way you hang about the roads with handsome stone-cutters," was Mr. Quincunx's surly retort.

Meanwhile, a quite interesting little drama had been unfolding itself in the neighbourhood of the half-carved block of sandstone. Instructed, by a swift flash of perception, into what the situation implied, Luke's quick magnetic fingers soon drew from his companion's an electric responsive clasp, as they leant together over the mouldings. The warmth and pliable softness of the girl's body seemed to challenge the man with intimations of how quickly it would yield. He pointed to the shed-door, wide open behind them.

"I will show you my work, in there, in a moment," he murmured, "as soon as they have gone."

Her breast rose and fell under the increased excitement of her breathing. Violent quivers ran up and down her frame and communicated themselves to him. Their hearts beat fiercely in reciprocal agitation. Luke's voice, as he continued his conventional summary of the quality and destination of the stone, shook a little, and sounded queer and detached.

"It is for Shaftesbury church," he said, "for the base of the column that supports the arch. This particular moulding is one which my father designed. You must remember that upon it will rest a great deal of the weight of the roof."

His fellow workmen had now collected their tools and were shuffling nervously past them. It required all Gladys' sang-froid to give them the casual nod due from the daughter of the House to those who laboured in its service. As soon as they were well upon their way, with a quick glance at the distant figures of Lacrima and James, Gladys turned rapidly to her companion.

"Show me," she said.

He went before her and stood in the entrance of the work-shop. When she had passed him into its interior, he casually closed behind them one of the rough folding doors. The contrast from the horizontal sun outside, turning the sandstone blocks into ruddy gold, to the shadowy twilight within, was strangely emphatic. He began to speak; saying he hardly knew what — some kind of stammered nonsense about the bases and capitals and carved mouldings that lay around them. But Gladys, true to her feminine prerogative, swept all this aside. With a bold audacity she began at once.

“How nice to be alone and free, for a little while!”

Then, moving still further into the shadow, and standing, as if absorbed in interest, before the rough beginnings of a fluted pillar which reached as high as the roof —

“What kind of top are you going to put on to that thing?”

As she spoke she leant against the pillar with a soft, weary relaxation of her whole form.

“Come near and tell me about it,” she whispered, as if her breath caught in her throat.

Luke recognized the tone — the tone that said, so much more distinctly than words, “I am ready. Why are you so slow?” He came behind her, and as gently and lightly as he could, though his arms trembled, let his fingers slide caressingly round her flexible figure. Her breath came in quick gasps, and one hot small hand met his own and pressed it against her side. Encouraged by this response, he boldly drew her towards him. She struggled a little; a shy girlish struggle, more than half conventional — and then, sliding round in his arms with a quick feline movement, she abandoned herself to her craving, and embraced him shamelessly and passionately. When at last in sheer weariness her arms relaxed and she sank down, with her hands pressed to her burning cheeks, upon an unfinished font, Luke Andersen thought that never to his dying day would he forget the serpentine clinging of that supple form and the pressure of those insatiable lips. He turned, a little foolishly, towards the door and kicked with his foot a fragment of a carved reredos. Then he went back to her and half-playfully, half-amorously, tried to remove her hands from her face.

“Don’t touch me! I hate you!” she said.

"Please," he whispered, "please don't be unkind now. I shall never, never forget how sweet you've been."

"Tell me more about this work of yours," she suddenly remarked, in a completely changed voice, rising to her feet. "I have always understood that you were one of our best workmen. I shall tell my father how highly I think of what you're doing — you and your brother. I am sure he will be glad to know what artists he has among his men."

She gave her head a proud little toss and raised negligent deliberate hands to her disarranged fair hair, smoothing it down and readjusting her wide-brimmed hat. She had become the grand lady again and Luke had become the ordinary young stone-mason. Superficially, and with a charming grace, he adapted himself to this change, continuing his conventional remarks about fonts, pillars, crosses, and capitals; and calling her "Miss" or "Miss Gladys," with scrupulous discretion. But in his heart, all the while, he was registering a deep and vindictive vow — a vow that, at whatever risk and at whatever cost, he would make this fair young despot suffer for her caprice. Gladys had indeed, quite unwittingly, entered into a struggle with a nature as remorseless and unscrupulous as her own. She had dreamed, in her imperial way, of using this boy for her amusement, and then throwing him aside. She did not for a moment intend to get entangled in any sentimental relations with him. A passing "amour," leading to nothing, and in no way committing her, was what she had instinctively counted on. For the rest, in snatching fiercely at any pleasure her fervent senses craved, she was as conscienceless and antinomian, as a young tiger out of the jungle. Nor had she the remotest sense of danger in this exciting sport. Corrupt and insensitive as any amorous courtezan of a pagan age, she trusted to her freedom from innocence to assure her of freedom from disaster. Vaguely enough in her own mind she had assumed, as these masterful "blond beasts" are inclined to assume, that in pouncing on this new prey she was only dealing once more with that malleable and timorous humanity she had found so easy to mould to her purpose in other quarters. She reckoned, with a pathetic simplicity, that Luke would be clay in her hands. As a matter of fact this spoiled child of the wealth produced by the Leonian stone had audaciously flung down her challenge to one who had as much in him as herself of that stone's tenacity and imperviousness. The daughter of sandstone met the carver of sandstone; and none, who knew the two, would have dared to predict the issue of such an encounter.

The young man was still urbanely and discreetly discoursing to his lady-visitor upon the contents of the work-shop, when the tall figure of James Andersen darkened the door.

"Excuse me, Miss," he said to Gladys, "but Miss Lacrima asked me to tell you that she was waiting for you on the bridge."

"Thank you, James," answered the girl simply, "I will come. I am afraid my interest in all the things your brother has been so kindly showing me has made you both late. I am sorry." Here she actually went so far as to fumble in her skirt for her purse. After an awkward pause, during which the two men waited at either side of the door, she found what she sought, and tripping lightly by, turned as she passed Luke and placed in his hand, the hand that so recently had been clasped about her person, the insolent recompense of a piece of silver. Bidding them both good-night, she hurried away to rejoin Lacrima, who, having by this time got rid of Mr. Quincunx, moved down the road to meet her.

Luke closed and locked the door of the shed without a word. Then to the astonishment of James Andersen he proceeded to dance a kind of grotesque war-dance, ending it with a suppressed half-mocking howl, as he leant exhausted against the wall of the building.

“I’ve got her, I’ve got her, I’ve got her!” he repeated. “James, my darling Daddy James, I’ve got this girl in the palm of my hand!” He humorously proceeded to toss the coin she had given him high in the air. “Heads or tails?” he cried, as the thing fell among the weeds. “Heads! It’s heads, my boy! That means that Miss Gladys Romer will be sorry she ever stepped inside this work-shop of ours. Come, let’s wash and eat, my brother; for the gods have been good to us today.”

CHAPTER V. FRANCIS TAXATER

THE DAY FOLLOWING the one whose persuasive influence we have just recorded was not less auspicious. The weather seemed to have effected a transference of its accustomed quality, bringing to the banks of the Yeo and the Parret the atmospheric conditions belonging to those of the Loire or the Arno.

Having finished her tea Valentia Seldom was strolling meditatively up and down the vicarage terrace, alternately stopping to pick off the petals of a dead flower, or to gaze, with a little gloomy frown, upon the grass of the orchard.

Her slender upright figure, in her black silk dress, made a fine contrast to the rich green foliage about her, set on one side with ruby-coloured roses and on the other with yellow buttercups. But the old lady was in no peaceful frame of mind. Every now and then she tapped the gravel impatiently with her ebony stick; and the hand that toyed with the trinkets at her side mechanically closed and unclosed its fingers under the wrist-band of Mechlin lace. It was with something of an irritable start, that she turned round to greet Francis Taxater, as led by the little servant he presented himself to her attention. He moved to greet her with his usual imperturbable gravity, walking sedately along the edge of the flowery border; with one shoulder a little higher than the other and his eyes on the ground.

His formidable prelatical chin seemed more than ever firmly set that afternoon, and his grey waistcoat, under his shabby black coat, was tightly drawn across his emphatic stomach. His coal-black eyes, darkened yet further by the shadow of his hat, glanced furtively to right and left of him as he advanced. In the manner peculiar to persons disciplined by Catholic self-control, his head never followed, by the least movement, the shrewd explorations of these diplomatic eyes.

One would have taken him for a French bishop, of aristocratic race, masquerading, for purposes of discretion, in the dress of a secular scholar.

Everything about Francis Taxater, from the noble intellectual contours of his forehead, down to his small satyr-like feet, smacked of the courtier and the priest; of the learned student, and the urbane frequenter of sacred conclaves. His small white hand, plump and exquisitely shaped, rested heavily on his cane. He carried with him in every movement and gesture that curious air of dramatic weight and importance which men of diplomatic experience are alone able to use without letting it degenerate into mannerism. It was obvious that he, at any rate, according to Mr. Quincunx's favourite discrimination, "knew Latin." He seemed to have slid, as it were, into this commercial modern world, from among the contemporaries of Bossuet. One felt that his authors were not Ibsen or Tolstoy, but Horace and Cicero.

One felt also, however, that in sheer psychological astuteness not even Mr. Romer himself would be a match for him. Between those two, the man of modern wisdom and the man of ancient wisdom, any struggle that might chance to occur would be a singularly curious one. If Mr. Taxater really was "on the side of the angels," he was certainly there with the full weight of organized hierarchies. If he did exert his strength upon the side of "meekness," it would be a strength of no feverish, spasmodic eruption.

If Satan threw a Borgia in Mr. Taxater's path, that Borgia, it appeared, would find his Machiavel.

"Yes, it is a lovely day again," said the old lady, leading her visitor to a seat and placing herself by his side. "But what is our naughty Monsignor doing, playing truant from his consistory? I thought you would be in London this week — at the Eucharist Conference your people are holding? Is it to the loveliness of the weather that we owe this pleasant surprise?"

One almost expected — so formal and old-fashioned were the two interlocutors — that Mr. Taxater would have replied, in the tone of Ivanhoe or the Talisman, "A truce to such jesting, Madam!" No doubt if he had, the lady would hardly have discerned any anachronism. As a matter of fact he did not answer her question at all, but substituted one of his own.

"I met Vennie in the village," he said. "Do you think she is happier now, in her new English circle?"

"Ah! my friend," cried the old lady, in a nervous voice, "it is of Vennie that I have been thinking all this afternoon. No, I cannot say I think she is happier. I wonder if it is one thing; and then I wonder if it is another. I cannot get to the bottom of it and it worries me."

"I expect it is her nerves," said the diplomatist. "Though the sun is so warm, there has been a constant east wind lately; and, as you know, I put down most of our agitations to the presence of east wind."

"It will not do, Mr. Taxater; it will not do! It may be the east wind with you and me. It is not the east wind with Vennie. Something is troubling her. I wish I could discern what it is?"

"She isn't by any chance being vexed by some theological dispute with the Vicar, is she? I know how seriously she takes all his views. And his views are, if I may say so, decidedly confusing. Don't misunderstand me, dear lady. I respect Mr. Clavering and admire him. I like the shape of his head; especially when he wears his beretta. But I cannot feel much confidence in his wisdom in dealing with a sensitive child like your daughter. He is too impulsive. He is too dogmatic. He lives too entirely in the world of doctrinal controversy. It is dangerous"; here Mr. Taxater luxuriously stretched out his legs and lit a cigarette; “it is dangerous to live only for theology. We have to learn to live for Religion; and that is a much more elaborate affair. That extends very far, Mrs. Seldom.” The old lady let her stick slide to the ground and clasped her hands together. “I want to ask you one thing, Mr. Taxater. And I implore you to be quite direct with me. You do not think, do you, that my girl is tending towards your church — towards Rome? I confess it would be a heavy blow to me, one of the heaviest I have ever had, if anything of that kind happened. I know you are tolerant enough to let me speak like this without scruple. I like you, my dear friend—” Here a soft flush spread over Valentia’s ivory-coloured cheeks and she made a little movement as if to put her hand on her companion’s arm. “I like you yourself, and have the utmost confidence in you. But Oh, it would be a terrible shock to me if Vennie became a Roman Catholic. She would enter a convent; I know she would enter a convent and that would be more than I could bear.” The accumulated distress of many years was in the old lady’s voice and tears stood in her eyes. “I know it is silly,” she went on as Mr. Taxater steadily regarded the landscape. “But I cannot help it. I do so hope — Oh, I can’t tell you how much — that Vennie will marry and have children. It is the secret burden of my life, the thought that, with this frail little thing, our ancient race should disappear. I feel it my deepest duty — my duty to the Past and my duty to the Future — to arrange a happy marriage for her. If only that could be achieved, I should be able to die content.”

“You have no evidence, no authority for thinking,” said Mr. Taxater gravely, “that she is meditating any approach to my church, as you call it, have you?”

“Oh no!” cried the old lady, “quite the contrary. She seems absorbed in the services here. She works with Mr. Clavering, she discusses everything with Mr. Clavering, she helps Mr. Clavering with the poor. I believe" — here Valentia lowered her voice; "I believe she confesses to Mr. Clavering."

Francis Taxater smiled — the smile of the heir of Christendom's classic faith at these pathetic fumblings of heresy — and carefully knocked the ashes from his cigarette against the handle of his cane.

"You don't think, dear lady," he said, "that by any chance — girls are curiously subtle in these little things — she is 'in love,' as they call it, with our nice handsome Vicar?"

Valentia gave an involuntary little start. In her heart there rose up the shadow of a shadow of questioning, whether in this last remark the great secular diplomatist had not lapsed into something approaching a "faux pas."

"Certainly not," she answered. "Vennie is not a girl to mix up her religion with things of that sort."

Francis Taxater permitted the flicker of a smile to cross his face. He slightly protruded his lower lip which gave his countenance a rather sinister expression. His look said, more clearly than words, that in his opinion there was no woman on earth who did not "mix up these things" with her religion.

"I have not yet made my request to you," continued the old lady, with a certain nervous hesitation. "I am so afraid lest you should think it an evidence of a lack of confidence. It isn't so! It really isn't so. I only do it to relieve my mind; — to make my food taste better, if you understand? — and to stop this throbbing in my head." She paused for a moment, and picking up her stick, prodded the gravel with it, with lowered face. The voices of not less than three wood-pigeons were audible from the apple-orchard. And this soft accompaniment to her words seemed to give her courage. Fate could not, surely, altogether betray her prayers, in a place so brooded over by "the wings of the dove." In the exquisite hush of the afternoon the birds' rich voices seemed to take an almost liturgical tone — as though they were the ministers of a great natural temple. To make a solemn request of a dear friend under such conditions was almost as though one were exacting a sacred vow under the very shadow of the altar.

So at least Valentia felt, as she uttered her serious petition; though it may well be that Mr. Taxater, skilled in the mental discipline of Saint Ignatius, knew better how to keep the distracting influences of mere "Nature," in their proper secondary place.

"I want you faithfully to promise me," she said, "that you will in no way — in no way at all — use your influence over Vennie to draw her from her English faith." The old lady's voice became quite husky in her emotion. "It would be dreadful to me to think, — I could not bear to think" — she went on, "that you should in the smallest degree use your great powers of mind to disturb the child's present attitude. If she is not happy, it is not — Oh, I assure you, it is not — in any sense due to her being dissatisfied with her religion. It must be something quite different. What it is, I cannot guess; but it must be something quite different from that. Well, dear friend," and she did now, quite definitely, lay her hand on his arm, "will you promise this for me? You will? I know you will."

Francis Taxater rose from his seat and stood over her very gravely, leaning upon his cane.

"You have done well to tell me this, Mrs. Seldom," he said. "Most certainly I shall make no attempt to influence Vennie. It would be indeed contrary to all that I regard as wise and suitable in the relations between us. I never convert people. I believe you will find that very few of those who are born Catholics ever interfere in that way. It is the impetuosity of new-comers into the church that gives us this bad name. They often carry into their new faith the turbulent theological zeal which distinguished them in their old one. I, at any rate, am not like that. I leave people alone. I prefer to watch them develop on their own lines. The last thing I should wish to do would be to meddle with Vennie's religious taste. It would be a blunder as well as an impertinence. Vennie would be the first to resist any such proceeding. It would destroy her respect for me. It might even destroy her affection for me. It certainly would not move her. Indeed, dear lady, if I wished to plant the child's soul irrevocably in the soil prepared by our good vicar I could not do anything more effective than try to persuade her of its deficiencies. No, no! You may rely upon me to stand completely aside in this matter. If Vennie were led to join us — which for your sake, dear Mrs. Seldom, I hope will never happen, — you may accept my word of honour it will be from her own spontaneous impulse. I shall make not the least movement in the direction you fear. That I can devoutly promise."

He turned away his head and regarded with calm, placid detachment the rich, shadowy orchard and the golden buttercups.

The contours of his profile were so noble, and the pose of his head so majestic, that the agitated mother was soothed and awed into complete confidence.

"Thank God!" she exclaimed. "That fear, at any rate, has passed. I shall be grateful to you forever, dear friend, for what you have just now said. It is a direct answer to my prayers."

"May I, in my turn," said Mr. Taxater, resuming his seat by her side, "ask you a bold and uncalled for question? What would you do, if in the changes and chances of this life, Vennie did come to regard Mr. Clavering with favour? Would you for a moment consider their union as a possible one?"

Valentia looked not a little embarrassed. Once more, in her heart, she accused the urbane scholar of a lack of delicacy and discretion. These little questions are not the ones to put to a perturbed mother.

However, she answered him plainly enough. “I should not like it, I confess. It would disappoint me. I am not ambitious, but sometimes I catch myself desiring, for my beloved child, a marriage that would give her the position she deserves, the position — pardon a woman’s weakness, sir! — that her ancestors held in this place. But then, again, I am only anxious for her happiness. No, Mr. Taxater. If such a thing did occur I should not oppose it, Mr. Clavering is a gentleman, though a poor one and, in a sense, an eccentric one. But I have no prejudice against the marriage of our clergy. In fact I think they ought to marry. It is so suitable, you know, to have a sensible woman endowed with such opportunities for making her influence felt. I would not wish Vennie to marry beneath her, but sooner than not see her married — well! — That is the kind of feeling I have about it, Mr. Taxater.”

“Thank you — thank you. I fear my question was impertinent; but in return for the solemn oath you exacted from me, I think I deserved some reward, don’t you? But seriously, Mrs. Seldom, I do not think that any of these less desirable fates will befall our dear child. I think she will marry a pillar of the aristocracy, and remain herself a pillar of the Anglican Church! I trust she will not, whatever happens, lose her regard for her old Catholic friend.”

He rose as he spoke and held out his hand. Mrs. Seldom took it in her own and held it for a moment with some emotion. Had he been a real Monsignor, he could not have looked more calm, more tolerant, more kind, than he looked at that moment. He wore the expression that high ecclesiastics must come to wear, when devoted but somewhat troublesome daughters of the church press close to kiss the amethystine ring.

A few minutes later he was passing out of the vicarage gate. The new brood of warblers that flitted about the tall bushes at that spot heard — with perfect unconcern — a mysterious Latin quotation issue from that restrained mouth. They could hardly be blamed for not understanding, even though they had migrated to these fields of heresy from more classic places, that the plain English interpretation of the dark saying was that all things are lawful to him whose motive is the "Potestas Civitatis Dei!"

He crossed the dusty road and was proceeding towards his own house, which was hardly more than a hundred yards away, when he saw through a wide gap in the hedge a pleasant and familiar sight. It was a hay-field, in the final stage of its "making," surrendering to a great loose stack, built up beneath enormous elm-trees, the last windrows of its sweet-scented harvest.

Pausing for a moment to observe more closely this pleasant scene — for hay-making in Dorsal Field amounted to a village ritual — Mr. Taxater became aware that among the figures scattered in groups about the meadow were the very two whose relation to one another he had just been discussing. Vennie and the young clergyman were engaged in an animated conversation with three of the farm-boys.

Mr. Taxater at once climbed through the gap, and crossing the field approached the group unobserved. It was not till he was quite close that Vennie caught sight of him. Her pale, pinched little face, under its large hat, flushed slightly as she held out her hand; but her great steady grey eyes were full of friendly welcome.

Mr. Clavering too was effusive and demonstrative in his greeting. They chatted a little of indifferent matters, and the theologian was introduced to the shy farm-boys, who stared at him in rustic wonder.

Then Hugh Clavering said, “If you’ll pardon me for a moment, I think I ought to go across and speak to John Goring,” and he indicated the farmer’s figure bending over a new gleaning-machine, at the opposite end of the field. “Don’t go away, please, Mr. Taxater, till I come back. You will keep him, won’t you, Miss Seldom?”

He strode off; and the boys drifted away after him, leaving Mr. Taxater and the girl together, under the unfinished hay-stack. “I was so much wanting to speak to you,” began Vennie at once. “I very nearly ran in to the Gables; but I saw Mrs. Wotnot over the wall, and she told me you were out. I am in serious need of advice upon a thing that is troubling me, and you are the only person who can really help.”

The expression of Mr. Taxater’s face at that moment was so sympathetic, and yet so grave, that one would hardly have been surprised to hear him utter the conventional formula of a priest awaiting confession. Though unuttered, the sacred formula must have been telepathically communicated, for Vennie continued without a pause, holding her hands behind her back, and looking on the ground. “Ever since our last serious conversation — do you remember? — after Easter, I have been thinking so much about that phrase of yours, referring to the Pope, as the eternal living defender of the idea of Love as the secret of the universe. Mr. Clavering talks to me about love — you know what I mean,” she smiled and blushed prettily, with a quick lifting of her head, “but he never gives me the feeling of something real and actual which we can approach on earth — something personal, I mean. And I have been feeling so much lately that this is what I want. Mr. Clavering is very gentle with me when I try to explain my difficulties to him; but I don’t think he really understands. The way he talks is beautiful and inspiring — but it somehow sounds like poetry. It does not give me anything to lay hands on.” And she looked into Mr. Taxater’s face with a pathetic wide-eyed appeal, as if he were able to call down angels from heaven.

“Dear child,” said the diplomatist, “I know only too well what you mean. Yes, that is the unfortunate and necessary limitation of a heretical church. It can only offer mystic and poetic consolations. It has lost touch with the one true Vine, and consequently the full stream of life-giving sap cannot flow through its veins.”

“But I have felt so strengthened,” said Vennie mournfully, “by the sacrament in our Church; so strengthened and inspired! It seems dreadful that it should all be a sort of mockery.”

“Do not speak like that, dear child,” said Mr. Taxater. “God is good; and in his knowledge of our weakness he permits us to taste of his mystery even in forbidden cups. The motive in your heart, the faith in your soul, have been pure; and God has given to them some measure, though but an imperfect one, of what he will grant to your complete obedience.”

Vennie bent down and picking up a swathe of sweet-scented hay twisted it thoughtfully in her fingers. “God has indeed been working miracles on your behalf,” continued Mr. Taxater. “It must have been your guardian angel that led me to speak to you as I did at that time. For in future, I regret to say, I shall be less free. But the good work has been done. The seed has been sown. What follows must be at your own initiative.”

Vennie looked at him, puzzled, and rather alarmed. “Why do you say you will be less free? Are we going to have no more lovely conversations at the bottom of our orchard? Are you going to be too busy to see me at all?”

Mr. Taxater smiled. “Oh no, it isn’t as bad as that,” he said. “It is only that I have just faithfully promised your mother not to convert you to Catholicism.”

“Mother had no right to make you give any such promise,” cried the girl indignantly.

“No,” responded the diplomatist, “she had no such right. No one has a right to demand promises of that kind. It is one of the worst and subtlest forms of persecution.”

“But you did not promise? You surely did not promise?”

“There was no escaping it,” replied Mr. Taxater. “If I had not done so she would have given you no peace, and your future movements would have been mercilessly watched. However,” he went on, smilingly, “a promise exacted under that kind of compulsion must be interpreted in a very large and liberal way. Relatively I must avoid discussing these things with you. In a higher and more absolute sense we will combine our thoughts about them, day and night, until we worship at the same altar.”

Vennie was silent. The noble and exalted sophistry of the subtle scholar puzzled and bewildered her. “But I have no idea of what to do next,” she protested. “I know no Catholics but you. I should feel very nervous on going to the priest in Yeoborough. Besides, I don’t at all like the look of him. And the people here say he is often drunk. You wouldn’t send me to a man like that, would you? Oh, I feel so angry with mother! She had no right to go to you behind my back.”

Francis Taxater laid his hand gently on the girl’s shoulder. “There is no reason for haste,” he said. “There is no cause to agitate yourself. Just remain quietly as you are. Say nothing to your mother. It would only cause her unnecessary distress. I never promised not to lend you books. All my shelves are at your service. Read, my dear Vennie, read and think. My books will supply the place of my words. Indeed, they will serve the purpose much better. In this way we shall at once be obeying your earthly mother, and not disobeying your heavenly mother, who is now — Ave Maria gratiæ plena! — drawing you so strongly towards her."

"Shall I say anything to Mr. Clavering?"

"Not a word! not a word! And enter as little as possible into argument with him. If he fancies, from your silence, that he has quelled your doubts, let him fancy so. The mistake will be due to his own pride and not to any deception. It is wrong to lie — but we are not called upon to dispel illusions arising from the self-conceit of others."

"But you — will — think — of me?" pleaded little Vennie. "I may know that you have not deserted me? That you are always ready — always there?"

Mr. Taxater smiled benignly. "Of course I shall be ready, dear child. And you must be ready. That is why I only ask you to read and think. God will answer your prayers if you show patience. He has taught his church never to clamour for hurried conversions. But to wait, with all her reservoirs of mysteries, till they come to her of their own accord. You will come, Vennie, you will come! But it will be in God's hour and not in ours."

Vennie Seldom thanked him with a timid glance of infinite gratitude and confidence. A soft luminous happiness suffused her being, into which the scents and sounds of that felicitous hour poured their offerings of subtle contentment. In after years, in strange and remote places, she never forgot the high thrilling exultation, calm, yet passionate as an indrawn wave, of that unrecurring moment.

The security that filled her passed, indeed, only too quickly away. Her face clouded and a little anxious frown puckered her narrow white forehead.

"There is something else I wanted to ask you," she said hurriedly, "and I must say it quickly because I am afraid of Mr. Clavering coming back. It has to do with Mr. Clavering. I do not think you realize what influence you have over people, what powerful influence! Mr. Clavering adores you. He would do anything for you. He respects you as a thinker. He venerates you as a good man. Now, Mr. Taxater, please, please, use your influence with him to save him — to save him—" She stopped abruptly, and a flood of colour rushed to her cheeks.

"To save him from what, dear child? I am afraid there is no hope of Mr. Clavering coming to our way of thinking."

"It isn't that, Mr. Taxater! It's something else; — something to do with his own happiness, with his own life. Oh, it is so hard for me to tell you!" She clenched her hands tightly together and looked steadily away from him as she spoke. "It is that that dreadful Gladys Romer has been plaguing him so — tempting him to flirt with her, to be silly about her, and all that sort of thing. He does not really like her at all. That I know. But he is passionate and excitable, and easily led away by a girl like that. Oh, it all sounds so absurd, as I say it," cried poor Vennie, with cheeks that were by this time flaming, "but it's much, much more serious than it sounds. You see, I know Mr. Clavering very well. I know how simple and pure-minded he is. And I know how desperately he prays against being led away — like this. Gladys does not care for him really a bit. She only does it to amuse herself; to satisfy her wicked, wicked nature! She would like to lead him as far as she possibly could, and then to turn upon him and make him thoroughly miserable. She is the kind of girl — Oh what am I saying to you, Mr. Taxater? — that men always are attracted by. Some men I believe would even call her beautiful. I don't think she's that at all. I think she is gross, fleshly, and horrid! But I know what a danger she is to Mr. Clavering. I know the dreadful struggle that goes on in his mind; and the horrible temptation she is to him. I know that after seeing her he always suffers the most cruel remorse. Now, Mr. Taxater, use your influence to strengthen him against this girl’s treachery. She only means him harm, I know she does! And if a person like you, whom he loves and admires so much, talked to him seriously about it, it would be such a help to him. He is so young. He is a mere boy, and absolutely ignorant of the world. He does not even realize that the village has already begun its horrid gossip about them. Do — do, do something, Mr. Taxater. It is like that young Parsifal, in the play, being tempted by the enchantress.”

“But how do they meet?” asked the diplomatist, with unchanged gravity. “I do not see how they are ever alone together.”

“She has arranged it. She is so clever; the bad, bad girl! She goes to him for confirmation lessons. He teaches her in his study twice a week — separately from the others.”

“But her father is a Unitarian.”

“That does not interfere. She does what she likes with Mr. Romer. Her game now is to want to be baptized into our church. She is going to be baptized first, and then confirmed.”

“And the preparation for baptism is as dangerous as the preparation for confirmation,” remarked the scholar; straightening the muscles of his mouth, after the discipline of St. Ignatius.

“The whole thing is horrible — dreadful! It frets me every hour of the day. He is so good and so innocent. He has no idea where she is leading him.”

“But I cannot prevent her wanting to be baptized,” said Mr. Taxater.

“You can talk to him,” answered Vennie, with intense conviction. “You can talk to him and he will listen to you. You can tell him the danger he is in of being made miserable for life.” She drew her breath deeply. “Oh the remorse he will feel; the horrible, horrible remorse!”

Mr. Taxater glanced across the hay-field. The sun, a red globe of fire, was resting on the extreme edge of Leo's Hill, and seemed like a great blood-shot eye regarding them with lurid interest. Long cool shadows, thrown across the field by the elms in the hedge and by the stack beside them, melted magically into one another, and made the hillocks of still ungathered grass soft and intangible as fairy graves.

"I will do my best," said the scholar. "I will do my best." And indicating to Vennie, who was absorbed in her nervous gratitude, the near approach of the object of their saintly conspiracy, he led her forward to meet the young clergyman with an appropriate air of friendly and casual nonchalance.

"I am sorry to have to say it," was Mr. Clavering's greeting, "but that farmer-fellow is the only person in my parish for whom I have a complete detestation. I wish to goodness Mr. Romer had never brought him into the place!"

"I don't like the look of his back, I must say," answered the theologian, following with his eyes the retreating figure of Mr. John Goring.

"He is," said the young priest, "without exception the most repulsive human being I have ever met in my life. Our worthy Romer is an angel of light compared with him."

With Mr. Goring still as their topic, they strolled amicably together towards the same gap in the hedge, through which the apologist of the papacy had emerged an hour before. There they separated; Vennie returning to the vicarage, and the young clergyman carrying off Mr. Taxater to supper with him in his house by the church.

Clavering's establishment consisted of a middle-aged woman of inordinate volubility, and the woman's daughter, a girl of twelve.

The supper offered by the priest to his guest was "light and choice" — nor did it lack its mellow accompaniment of carefully selected, if not

"Attic," wine. Of this wine Mr. Taxater did not hesitate to partake freely, sitting, when the meal was over, opposite his host at the open window, through which the pleasant murmurs of the evening, and the voices of the village-street, soothingly and harmoniously floated.

The famous theologian was in an excellent temper. Rich recondite jests pursued one another from his smiling lips, and his white hands folded themselves complacently above the cross on his watch-chain.

Lottie Fringe, the child of Clavering's servant, tripped sportively in and out of the room, encouraged in her girlish coquetries by the amiable scholar. She was not yet too old to be the kittenish plaything of the lighter moments of a wise and scholarly man, and it was pleasant to watch the zest with which the vicar's visitor entered into her sportive audacities. Mr. Taxater made her fill and refill his glass, and taking her playfully on his knee, kissed her and fondled her many times. It was the vicar himself, who finally, a little embarrassed by these levities, sent the girl off to the kitchen, apologizing to his guest for the freedom she displayed.

"Do not apologize, dear Mr. Clavering," said the theologian. "I love all children, especially when they are girls. There is something about the kisses of a young girl — at once amorous and innocent — which reconciles one to the universe, and keeps death at a distance. Could one for a moment think of death, when holding a young thing, so full of life and beauty, on one's knee?"

The young priest's face clouded. "To be quite honest with you, Mr. Taxater," he murmured, in a troubled voice, "I cannot say that I altogether agree. We are both unconventional people, so I may speak freely. I do not think that one does a child any good by encouraging her to be playful and forward, in that particular way. You live with your books; but I live with my people, and I have known so many sad cases of girls being completely ruined by getting a premature taste for coquetry of that kind.”

“I am afraid, my friend,” answered Mr. Taxater, “that the worst of all heresies is lodged deep in your heart.”

“Heresies? God knows,” sighed the priest, “I have enough evil in my heart — but heresies? I am at a loss to catch your meaning.”

In the absence of his playful Clerica — to use the Pantagruelian allusion — the great Homenas of Nevilton was compelled to fill his “tall-boy of extravagant wine” with his own hand. He did so, and continued his explanation.

“By the worst of all heresies I mean the dangerous Puritan idea that pleasure itself is evil and a thing detestable to God. The Catholic doctrine, as I understand it, is that all these things are entirely relative to the persons concerned. Pleasure in itself is, in the Aristotelian sense, a supreme good. Everyone has a right to it. Everyone must have it. The whole thing is a matter of proportion and expediency. If an innocent playful game, of the kind you have just witnessed, was likely in this definite particular case to lead to harm, then you would be justified in your anxiety. But there must be no laying down of hard general rules. There must be no making a virtue of the mere denying ourselves pleasure.”

Mr. Clavering could hardly wait for his guest to finish.

“Then, according to your theory,” he exclaimed, “it would be right for you, or whoever you will, — pardon my making the thing so personal — to indulge in casual levities with any pretty barmaid, as long as you vaguely surmised that she was a sensible girl and would not be harmed?”

“Certainly it would be right,” replied the papal apologist, sipping his wine and inhaling the perfume of the garden, “and not only right, but a plain duty. It is our duty, Mr. Clavering, to make the world happier while we live in it; and the way to make girls happier, especially when their occupations are laborious, is to kiss them; to give them innocent and admiring embraces.”

“I am afraid you are not quite serious, Mr. Taxater,” said the clergyman. “I have an absurd way of being direct and literal in these discussions.”

“Certainly, I am serious. Do you not know — young puritan — that some of the noblest spirits in history have not hesitated to increase the pleasure of girls’ lives by giving them frequent kisses? In the Greek days he who could give the most charming kiss was awarded a public prize. In the Elizabethan days all the great and heroic souls, whose exquisite wit and passionate imagination put us still to shame, held large and liberal views on this matter. In the eighteenth century the courtly and moral Joseph Addison used never to leave a coffee-house, however humble and poor, without bestowing a friendly embrace upon every woman in it. The religious Doctor Johnson — a man of your own faith — was notoriously in the habit of taking his prettier visitors upon his knee, and tenderly kissing them. It is no doubt due to this fact, that the great lexicographer was so frequently visited; — especially by young Quakers. When we come to our own age, it is well known that the late Archbishop Taraton, the refuter of Darwin, was never so happy as when romping round the raspberry-canes in his garden with a crowd of playful girls.

“These great and wise men have all recognized the fact that pleasure is not an evil but a good. A good, however, that must be used discreetly and according to the Christian self-control of which God has given his Church the secret. The senses are not under a curse, Mr. Clavering. They are not given us simply to tempt and perplex us. They are given for our wise and moderate enjoyment.”

Francis Taxater once more lifted his glass to his lips.

“To the devil with this Protestant Puritanism of yours! It has darkened the sun in heaven. It is the cause of all the squalid vice and gross excesses of our forlorn England. It is the cause of the deplorable perversities that one sees around one. It is the cause of that odious hypocrisy that makes us the laughing-stock of the great civilized nations of France, Italy and Spain.” The theologian drew a deep breath, and continued. “I notice, Mr. Clavering, that you have by your side, still unfinished, your second glass of wine. That is a mistake. That is an insult to Providence. Whatever may be your attitude towards these butterfly-wenches, it cannot, as a matter of poetic economy, be right to leave a wine, as delicate, as delicious as this, to spoil in the glass.

“I suppose it has never occurred to you, Mr. Clavering, to go and sit, with the more interesting of your flock, at the Seldom Arms? It never has? So I imagined from my knowledge of your uncivilized English ways.

“The European café, sir, is the universal school of refined and intellectual pleasure. It was from his seat in a Roman café — a place not unknown to me myself — that the great Gibbon was accustomed to survey the summer moon, rising above the Pantheon.

“It is the same in the matter of wine as in the other matter. It is your hypocritical and puritanical fear of pleasure that leads to the gross imbibing of villainous spirits and the subterranean slavery of prostitution. If you allowed yourselves, freely, naturally, and with Christian moderation, to enjoy the admirable gifts of the supreme giver, there would no longer be any need for this deplorable plunging into insane vice. As it is — in this appalling country of yours — one can understand every form of debauchery.”

At this point Mr. Clavering intervened with an eager and passionate question. He had been listening intently to his visitor’s words, and his clear-cut, mobile face had changed its expression more than once during this long discourse.

“You do not, then, think,” said he, in a tone of something like supplication, “that there is anything wrong in giving ourselves up to the intense emotion which the presence of beauty and charm is able to excite?”

“Wrong?” said Mr. Taxater. “It is wrong to suppress such feelings! It is all a matter of proportion, my good sir, a matter of proportion and common sense. A little psychological insight will soon make us aware whether the emotion you speak of is likely to prove injurious to the object of our admiration.”

“But oneself — what about oneself?” cried the young priest. “Is there not a terrible danger, in all these things, lest one’s spiritual ideal should become blurred and blighted?”

To this question Mr. Taxater returned an answer so formidable and final, that the conversation was brought to an abrupt close.

“What,” he said, “has God given us the Blessed Sacraments for?”

Hugh Clavering escorted his visitor to the corner of the street and bade him good-night there. As he re-entered his little garden, he turned for a moment to look at the slender tower of St. Catharine’s church, rising calm and still into the hot June sky. Between him and it, flitted like the ghost of a dead Thaïs or Phryne, the pallid shadow of an impassioned temptress holding out provocative arms. The form of the figure seemed woven of all the vapours of unbridled poetic fantasy, but the heavy yellow hair which most of all hid the tower from his view was the hair of Gladys Romer.

The apologist of the papacy strolled slowly and meditatively back to his own house with the easy step of one who was in complete harmony both with gods and men. Above him the early stars began, one by one, to shine down upon the earth, but as he glanced up towards them, removing his hat and passing his hand across his forehead, the great diplomatist appeared quite untroubled by the ineffable littleness of all earthly considerations, under the remoteness of those austere watchers.

The barking of dogs, in distant unknown yards, the melancholy cry of new-shorn lambs, somewhere far across the pastures, the soft, low, intermittent breathing, full of whispers and odours, of the whole mysterious night, seemed only to throw Mr. Taxater back more completely and securely upon that firm ecclesiastical tradition which takes the hearts of men in its hands and turns them away from the Outer Darkness.

He let himself quietly into the Gables garden, by the little gate in the wall, and entered his house. He was surprised to find the door unlocked and a light burning in the kitchen. The careful Mrs. Wotnot was accustomed to retire to rest at a much earlier hour. He found the good woman extended at full length upon three hard chairs, her head supported by a bundle of shawls. She was suffering from one of her chronic rheumatic attacks, and was in considerable distress.

To a less equable and humane spirit there might have been something rather irritating than pathetic about this unexpected finale to a harmonious day. But Mr. Taxater's face expressed no sign of any feeling but that of grave and gentle concern.

With some difficulty, for the muscles of her body were twisted by nervous spasms, the theologian supported the old woman up the stairs, to her room under the eaves. Here he laid her upon the bed, and for the rest of the night refused to leave her room, rubbing with his white plump hands her thin old legs, and applying brandy to her lips at the moments when the nervous contractions that assailed her seemed most extreme. The delicate light of dawn showed its soft bluish pallour at the small casemented window before the old lady fell asleep; but it was not till relieved by a woman who appeared, several hours later, with their morning’s milk, that the defender of the Catholic Faith in Nevilton retired to his well-earned repose.
